I. At Shiloh, in the fields, all the young ladies of that city met to dance, in honour of a feast of the Lord, probably the feast of tabernacles (v. 19), for that feast was the only season wherein the Jewish virgins were allowed to dance, and that not so much for their own recreation as to express their holy joy, as David when he danced before the ark. The dancing was very modest and chaste. However their dancing thus in public made them an easy prey to those that had a design upon them.

II. The elders of Israel gave authority to the Benjamites to lie in wait in the vineyards and catch every man a wife for himself, and carry them straight away to their own country, v. 20, 21. Here was a very preposterous way of match-making, when both the mutual affection of the young people and the consent of the parents must be presumed to come after; the case was extraordinary, and may by no means be drawn into a precedent. Overhasty marriages often occasion a leisurely repentance; and what comfort can be expected from a match made either by force or fraud?

III. They undertook to pacify the fathers of these young women. The oath they were bound by, not to give their daughters to Benjamites, might perhaps stick with some of them, whose consciences were tender. The necessity was urgent (v. 22): We reserved not to each man his wife, owning now that they did ill to destroy all the women, and desiring to atone for their too rigorous construction of their vow to destroy them by the most favourable construction of their vow not to match with them.

Lastly, In the close of all we have, 1. The settling of the tribe of Benjamin again. The few that remained returned to the inheritance of that tribe, v. 23. And soon after from among them sprang Ehud, who was famous in his generation, the second judge of Israel, ch. iii. 15. 2. The disbanding and dispersing of the army of Israel, v. 24. They did not set up for a standing army, nor pretend to make any alterations or establishments in the government; but, when the affair was over for which they were called together, they quietly departed in God's peace, every man to his family.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, ON

THE BOOK OF RUTH

This short history of the domestic affairs of one particular family fitly follows the book of Judges (the events related here happening in the days of the judges), and fitly goes before the books of Samuel, because in the close it introduces David. It relates not miracles nor laws, wars nor victories, nor the revolutions of states, but the affliction first and afterwards the comfort of Naomi, the conversion first and afterwards the preferment of Ruth. The design of this book is, I. To lead to providence, to show us how conversant it is about our private concerns. See 1 Sam. ii. 7, 8; Ps. cxiii. 7–9. II. To lead to Christ, who descended from Ruth, and part of whose genealogy concludes the book, whence it is fetched into Matt. i. In the conversion of Ruth the Moabitess, and the bringing of her into the pedigree of the Messiah, we have a type of the calling of the Gentiles in due time into the fellowship of Christ Jesus our Lord. The afflictions of Naomi and Ruth we have an account of, ch. i. Instances of their industry and humility, ch. ii. The bringing of them into an alliance with Boaz, ch. iii. And their happy settlement thereby, ch. iv. And let us remember the scene is laid in Bethlehem, the city where our Redeemer was born.

CHAP. I

In this chapter we have Naomi's afflictions. I. As a distressed housekeeper, forced by famine to remove into the land of Moab, ver. 1, 2. II. As a mournful widow and mother, bewailing the death of her husband and her two sons, ver. 3–5. III. As a careful mother-in-law, desirous to be kind to her two daughters, ver. 6–18. IV. As a poor woman sent back to the place of her first settlement, ver. 19–22.

Verses 1–5

The first words give all the date we have of this story. It was in the days when the judges ruled (v. 1). It must have been towards the beginning of the judges' time, for Boaz, who married Ruth, was born of Rahab, who received the spies in Joshua's time. Some think it was in the days of Ehud, others of Deborah; the learned Bishop Patrick inclines to think it was in the days of Gideon, because in his days only we read of a famine by the Midianites' invasion, Judges vi. 3, 4.

I. A famine in the land, in the land of Canaan, that land flowing with milk and honey. This was one of the judgments which God had threatened to bring upon them for their sins, Lev. xxvi. 19, 20. When the land had rest, yet it had not plenty; even in Bethlehem, which signifies the house of bread, there was scarcity. A fruitful land is turned into barrenness, to correct and restrain the luxury and wantonness of those that dwell therein.

II. An account of one particular family distressed in the famine; it is that of Elimelech. His name signifies my God a king. His wife was Naomi, which signifies my amiable or pleasant one. But his son's names were Mahlon and Chilion, sickness and consumption, perhaps because weakly children.

III. The removal of this family from Bethlehem into the country of Moab on the other side Jordan, for subsistence, because of the famine, v. 1, 2. It seems there was plenty in the country of Moab when there was scarcity of bread in the land of Israel. Thither Elimelech goes, to sojourn for a time, during the dearth, as Abraham, on a similar occasion, went into Egypt, and Isaac into the land of the Philistines. Now here, 1. Elimelech's care to provide for his family, and his taking his wife and children with him, were without doubt commendable. But, 2. I see not how his removal into the country of Moab, upon this occasion, could be justified. The seed of Israel were now fixed, and ought not to remove into the territories of the heathen. What reason had Elimelech to go more than any of his neighbours? If he could not be content with the short allowance that his neighbours took up with, if he could not live in hope that there would come years of plenty again in due time, or could not with patience wait for those years, it was his fault, and he did by it dishonour God and the good land he had given them, weaken the hands of his brethren, with whom he should have been willing to take his lot, and set an ill example to others. It is an evidence of a discontented, distrustful, unstable spirit, to be weary of the place in which God hath set us, and to be for leaving it immediately whenever we meet with any uneasiness or inconvenience in it. Or, if he would remove, why to the country of Moab? If he had made enquiry, it is probable he would have found plenty in some of the tribes of Israel, those, for instance, on the other side Jordan, that bordered on the land of Moab; if he had had that zeal for God and that affection for his brethren which became an Israelite, he would not have persuaded himself so easily to go and sojourn among Moabites.

IV. The marriage of his two sons to two of the daughters of Moab after his death, v. 4. All agree that this was ill done. The Chaldee says, They transgressed the decree of the word of the Lord in taking strange wives. It does not appear that the women they married were proselyted to the Jewish religion, for Orpah is said to return to her gods (v. 15). It is a groundless tradition of the Jews that Ruth was the daughter of Eglon king of Moab.

V. The death of Elimelech and his two sons, and the disconsolate condition Naomi was thereby reduced to. Her husband died (v. 3) and her two sons (v. 5) soon after their marriage, and the Chaldee says, Their days were shortened, because they transgressed the law in marrying strange wives. When Naomi had lost her husband she put so much the more confidence in her sons. How disconsolate the spirit of poor Naomi, when the woman was left of her two sons and her husband; When these two things, loss of children and widowhood, come upon her in a moment, by whom shall she be comforted? Isa. xlvii. 9; li. 19. It is God alone who has wherewithal to comfort those who are thus cast down.

I. The good affection Naomi bore to the land of Israel, v. 6. Though the country of Moab had afforded her shelter and supply in a time of need, yet she did not intend it should be her rest for ever; no land should be that but the holy land, in which the sanctuary of God was.

1. God, at last, returned in mercy to his people. At length God graciously visited his people in giving them bread. Plenty is God's gift, and it is his visitation which by bread, the staff of life, holds our souls in life. Though this mercy be the more striking when it come after famine, yet if we have constantly enjoyed it, and never known what famine meant, we are not to think it the less valuable.

2. Naomi at last has good news brought her of plenty in Bethlehem, and then she can think of no other than returning thither again. Though there be a reason for our being in bad places, yet, when the reason ceases, we must by no means continue in them. Forced absence from God's ordinances, and forced presence with wicked people, are great afflictions; but when the force ceases, and such a situation is continued of choice, then it becomes a great sin. The land of Moab had now become a melancholy place to her. Now she will go to Canaan again. Earth is embittered to us, that heaven may be endeared.

II. The good affection which her daughters-in-law, and one of them especially, bore to her, and her generous return of their good affection.

1. They were both so kind as to accompany her, some part of the way at least, when she returned towards the land of Judah. By this we see both that Naomi, as became an Israelite, had been very kind to them and had won their love, and that Orpah and Ruth had a just sense of her kindness. They had dwelt together in unity, though those were dead by whom the relation between them came. Though they retained an affection for the gods of Moab (v. 15), and Naomi was still faithful to the God of Israel, yet that was no hindrance to either side from love and kindness, and all the good offices that the relation required. Mothers-in-law and daughters-in-law are too often at variance (Matt. x. 35), and therefore it is the more commendable if they live in love.

2. When they had gone a little way with her, Naomi, with a great deal of affection, urged them to go back (v. 8, 9): Return each to her mother's house. Naomi suggests that their own mothers would be more agreeable to them than a mother-in-law, especially when their own mothers had houses and their mother-in-law was not sure she had a place to lay her head in which she could call her own. She dismisses them,

(1) With commendation.

(2) With prayer. It is very proper for friends, when they part, to part with prayer. She sends them home with her blessing; and the blessing of a mother-in-law is not to be slighted. In this blessing she twice mentions the name Jehovah, Israel's God, and the only true God, that she might direct her daughters to look up to him as the only fountain of all good. That they might be happy in marrying again: The Lord grant that you may find rest, each of you in the house of her husband.

(3) She dismissed them with great affection: She kissed them, wished she had somewhat better to give them, but silver and gold she had none. However, this parting kiss shall be the seal of a true friendship.

3. The two young widows could not think of parting with their good mother-in-law, so much had the good conversation of that pious Israelite won upon them. "Surely we will return with thee unto thy people, and take our lot with thee." It is a rare instance of affection to a mother-in-law and an evidence that they had, for her sake, conceived a good opinion of the people of Israel. Even Orpah, who afterwards went back to her gods, now seemed resolved to go forward with Naomi.

4. Naomi sets herself to dissuade them from going along with her, v. 11–13.

(1) Naomi urged her afflicted condition. If she had had any sons in Canaan, or any near kinsmen, whom she could have expected to marry the widows it might have been some encouragement to them to hope for a comfortable settlement at Bethlehem. The greatest grievance of that poor condition to which she was reduced was that she was not in a capacity to do for them as she would. She laments most the trouble that redounded to them from it. A gracious generous spirit can better bear its own burden than it can bear to see it a grievance to others, or others in any way drawn into trouble by it. Naomi could more easily want herself than see her daughters want.

(2) Did Naomi do well thus to discourage her daughters from going with her, when, by taking them with her, she might save them from the idolatry of Moab and bring them to the faith and worship of the God of Israel? Naomi, no doubt, desired to do so. But, [1] If they did come with her, she would not have them to come upon her account. Those that take upon them a profession of religion only in complaisance to their relations, to oblige their friends, or for the sake of company, will be converts of small value and of short continuance. [2] If they did come with her, she would have them to make it their deliberate choice, and to sit down first and count the cost, as it concerns those to do that may take up a profession of religion. It is good for us to be told the worst. Our Saviour took this course with him who, in the heart of zeal, spoke that bold word, Master, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest. "Come, come," says Christ, "canst thou fare as I fare? The Son of man has not where to lay his head; know this, and then consider whether thou canst find in thy heart to take thy lot with him," Matt. viii. 19, 20. Thus Naomi deals with her daughters-in-law. Thoughts ripened into resolves by serious consideration are likely to be kept always in the imagination of the heart, whereas what is soon ripe is soon rotten.

5. Orpah was easily persuaded to yield to her own corrupt inclination, and to go back to her country, her kindred, and her father's house, now when she stood fair for an effectual call from it. They both lifted up their voice and wept again (v. 14), being much affected with the tender things that Naomi had said. But it had a different effect upon them: to Orpah the representation Naomi had made of the inconveniences they must count upon if they went forward to Canaan sent her back to the country of Moab, but, on the contrary, it strengthened Ruth's resolution. (1) Orpah kissed her mother-in-law, that is, took an affectionate leave of her, bade her farewell for ever. Orpah's kiss showed she had an affection for Naomi and was loth to part from her; yet she did not love her well enough to leave her country for her sake. Thus many have a value and affection for Christ, and yet come short of salvation by him, because they cannot find in their hearts to forsake other things for him. They love him and yet leave him, because they do not love him enough, but love other things better. Thus the young man that went away from Christ went away sorrowful, Matt. xix. 22. But, (2) Ruth clave unto her. Whether, when she came from home, she was resolved to go forward with her or no does not appear.

6. Naomi persuades Ruth to go back, urging, as a further inducement, her sister's example: Now, return thou after thy sister, that is, "If ever thou wilt return, return now. This is the greatest trial of thy constancy; stand this trial, and thou art mine for ever."

7. Ruth puts an end to the debate by a most solemn profession of her immovable resolution never to forsake her, nor to return to her own country, and her old relations again, v. 16, 17.

(1) Nothing could be said more fine, more brave, than this. She seems to have had another spirit, and another speech, now that her sister had gone, and it is an instance of the grace of God inclining the soul to the resolute choice of the better part. [1] She begs of her mother-in-law to say no more against her going: Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee. [2] She is very particular in her resolution to cleave to her and never to forsake her; and she speaks the language of one resolved for God and heaven. First, She will travel with her: Whither thou goest I will go, though to a country I never saw, though far from my own country, yet with thee every road shall be pleasant. Secondly,

She will dwell with her: "Where thou lodgest I will lodge, though it be in a cottage, nay, though it be no better a lodging than Jacob had when he had the stones for his pillow. Thirdly, She will twist interests with her: Thy people shall be my people. Fourthly, She will join in religion with her. Thus she determined to be hers—usque ad aras—to the very altars: "Thy God shall be my God." Fifthly, She will gladly die in the same bed: Where thou diest will I die. Sixthly, She will desire to be buried in the same grave, and to lay her bones by hers: There will I be buried, not desiring to have so much as her dead body carried back to the country of Moab, in token of any remaining kindness for it; but, Naomi and she having joined souls, she desires they may mingle dust, in hopes of rising together, and being together for ever in the other world. [3] She backs her resolution to adhere to Naomi with a solemn oath: The Lord do so to me, and more also (which was an ancient form of imprecation), if aught but death part thee and me.

(2) This is a pattern of a resolute convert to God and religion. Thus must we be at a point. [1] We must take the Lord for our God. "This God is my God for ever and ever; I have avouched him for mine." [2] When we take God for our God we must take his people for our people in all conditions; though they be a poor despised people, yet, if they be his, they must be ours. [3] Having cast in our lot among them, we must be willing to take our lot with them and to fare as they fare.

8. Naomi is hereby silenced (v. 18): When she saw that Ruth was steadfastly minded to go with her (which was the very thing she aimed at in all that she had said, to make her of a steadfast mind in going with her), when she saw that she had gained her point, she was well satisfied, and left off speaking to her.

Naomi and Ruth, after many a weary step, came at last to Bethlehem. And they came very seasonably, in the beginning of the barley-harvest, which was the first of their harvests, that of wheat following after. And now they had opportunity to provide for winter.

I. The discomposure of the neighbours upon this occasion (v. 19): All the city was moved about them. Her old acquaintance gathered about her, to enquire concerning her state, and to bid her welcome to Bethlehem again. Or perhaps they were moved about her, lest she should be a charge to the town, she looked so bare. And they said, Is this Naomi? Those with whom she had formerly been intimate were surprised to see her in this condition; she was so much broken and altered with her afflictions. Is this Naomi? The generality asked it in compassion and commiseration: "Is this she that lived so plentifully, and kept so good a house, and was so charitable to the poor? Afflictions will make great and surprising changes in a little time. When we see how sickness and old age alter people, change their countenance and temper, we may think of what the Bethlehemites said: "Is this Naomi?" God, by his grace, fit us for all such changes, especially the great change!

II. The composure of Naomi's spirit. If some upbraided her with her poverty, she was not moved against them, as she would have been if she had been poor and proud: Call me not Naomi, call me Mara, &c. "Naomi signifies pleasant or amiable; but all my pleasant things are laid waste; call me Mara, bitter or bitterness, for I am now a woman of a sorrowful spirit."

1. The change of her state, and how it is described, with a pious regard to the divine providence, and without any passionate murmurings or complaints. She now came home again empty, a widow and childless, and probably had sold her goods, and of all the effects she took with her brought home no more than the clothes on her back. (2) She acknowledges the hand of God, his mighty hand, in the affliction. "It is the Lord that has brought me home again empty; it is the Almighty that has afflicted me." Note, Nothing conduces more to satisfy a gracious soul under an affliction than the consideration of the hand of God in it. He that empties us of the creature knows how to fill us with himself.

2. The compliance of her spirit with this change: "Call me not Naomi, for I am no more pleasant, either to myself or to my friends; but call me Mara, a name more agreeable to my present state." If God deal bitterly with her, she will accommodate herself to the dispensation, and is willing to be called Mara, bitter. An affliction rightly borne does us good. Tribulation works patience.

CHAP. II

I. Ruth's humility and industry in gleaning corn, Providence directing her to Boaz's field, ver. 1–3. II. The great favour which Boaz showed to her in many instances, ver. 4–16. III. The return of Ruth to her mother-in-law, ver. 18–23.

Verses 1–3

Naomi had now gained a settlement in Bethlehem among her old friends; and here we have an account,

I. Of her rich kinsman, Boaz, a mighty man of wealth, v. 1. The Chaldee reads it, mighty in the law. He carries might in his name, Boaz—in him is strength; and he was of the family of Elimelech, that family which was now reduced and brought so low.

II. Of her poor daughter-in-law, Ruth. 1. Her condition was very low and poor, which was a great trial to the faith and constancy of a young proselyte. Naomi and her daughter-in-law have no way of getting necessary food but by gleaning corn. 2. Her character, in this condition, was very good (v. 2). She is not mindful of the country from which she came out, otherwise she had now a fair occasion to return. The God of Israel shall be her God, and, though he slay her, yet will she trust in him and never forsake him. Let me go to the field, and glean ears of corn. Let Ruth be remembered, who is a great example, (1) Of humility. When Providence had made her poor she did not say, "To glean, which is in effect to beg, I am ashamed." She does not tell her mother she was never brought up to live upon crumbs. Though she was not brought up to it, she is brought down to it, and is not uneasy at it. (2) Of industry. "Let me go and glean ears of corn, which will turn to some good account." A disposition to diligence bodes well both for this world and the other. We must not be shy of any honest employment, though it be mean, ἐργον ουδεν ὀνειδος—No labour is a reproach. (3) Of regard to her mother. Though she was but her mother-in-law, she is dutifully observant of her. (4) Of dependence upon Providence, intimated in that, I will glean after him in whose sight I shall find grace. She knows not which way to go, nor whom to enquire for, but will trust Providence to raise her up some friend or other that will be kind to her. And it did well for Ruth; for when she went out alone, without guide or companion, to glean, her hap was to light on the field of Boaz, v. 3. To her it seemed casual but Providence directed her steps to this field. Many a great affair is brought about by a little turn, which seemed fortuitous to us, but was directed by Providence with design.

Now Boaz himself appears, and a great deal of decency appears in his carriage:

I. Towards his own servants, and those that were employed for him in reaping and gathering in his corn. Harvest-time is busy time, many hands must then be at work. Boaz is here an example of a good master.

1. He had a servant that was set over the reapers, v. 6.
2. Yet he came himself to his reapers, to see how the work went forward. It was for the encouragement of his servants, who would go on the more cheerfully in their work when their master countenanced them so far as to make them a visit.
3. Kind and pious salutations were interchanged between Boaz and his reapers.

(1) He said to them, The Lord be with you; and they replied, The Lord bless thee, v. 4. Hereby they expressed, [1] Their mutual respect to each other. Things are likely to go on well in a house where there is such goodwill as this between master and servants. [2] Their joint-dependence upon the divine providence. They express their kindness to each other by praying one for another.

(2) Let us hence learn to use, [1] Courteous salutations, as expressions of a sincere goodwill to our friends. [2] Pious ejaculations, lifting up our hearts to God for his favour, in such short prayers as these. Only we must take heed that they do not degenerate into formality.

4. He took an account from his rearers concerning a stranger he met with in the field, and gave necessary orders concerning her, that they should not touch her (v. 9) nor reproach her, v. 15. He also ordered them to be kind to her, and let fall some of the handfuls on purpose for her.

II. Boaz was very kind to Ruth, and showed her a great deal of favour, induced to it by the account he had of her, and what he observed concerning her.

1. The steward gave to Boaz a very fair account of her, proper to recommend her to his favour, v. 6, 7. (1) That she was a stranger, and therefore one of those that by the law of God were to gather the gleanings of the harvest, Lev. xix. 9, 10. (2) That she was allied to his family; she came back with Naomi, the wife of Elimelech, a kinsman of Boaz. (3) That she was a proselyte, for she came out of the country of Moab to settle in the land of Israel. (4) That she was very modest, and had not gleaned till she had asked leave. (5) That she was very industrious, and had continued close to her work from morning even until now. Now, in the heat of the day, she tarried a little in the booth that was set up in the field for shelter.

2. Boaz was hereupon extremely civil to her. (1) He ordered her to attend his reapers in every field they gathered in and not to glean in the field of another, for she should not need to go anywhere else to better herself (v. 8). (2) He charged all his servants to be very tender of her and respectful to her. She was a stranger, and it is probable her language, dress, and mien differed much from theirs. (3) He bade her welcome to the entertainment he had provided for his own servants. He ordered her, not only to drink of the water which was drawn for them, but at meal-time to come and eat of their bread (v. 14), yea, and she should be welcome to their sauce too: Come, dip thy morsel in the vinegar, to make it savoury. And he himself, happening to be present when the reapers sat down to meat, reached her parched corn to eat. (4) He commended her for her dutiful respect to her mother-in-law, whom, though he did not know her by sight, yet he had heard of (v. 11). But that which especially he commended her for was that she had left her own country, and had become a proselyte to the Jewish religion. (5) He prayed for her (v. 12): The Lord recompense thy work. Those that by faith come under the wings of the divine grace may be sure of a full recompence of reward for their so doing. The Jews describe a proselyte to be one that is gathered under the wings of the divine majesty. (6) He encouraged her to go on in her gleaning. Boaz ordered his servants to let her glean among the sheaves and not to reproach her.

3. Ruth received his favours with a great deal of humility and gratitude. She paid all possible respect to him, and gave him honour, according to the usage of the country (v. 10): She fell on her face, and bowed herself to the ground. She humbly owned herself unworthy of his favours: "I am a stranger (v. 10) and not like one of thy handmaids (v. 13). She begs the continuance of his good-will. When Boaz gave her her dinner with his reapers she only ate so much as would suffice her, and immediately rose up to glean, v. 14, 15.

I. Ruth finishes her day's work, v. 17. 1. She took care not to lose time, for she gleaned until evening. 2. She took care not to lose what she had gathered, but threshed it herself, that she might the more easily carry it home, and might have it ready for use. Ruth had gathered it ear by ear, but, when she had put it all together, it was an ephah of barley, about four pecks.

II. She paid her respects to her mother-in-law and showed her what she had gleaned, that she might see she had not been idle. She gave her an account of her day's work, and how a kind providence had favoured her in it. Naomi asked her where she had been: Where hast thou gleaned to-day? Ruth gave her a particular account of the kindness she had received from Boaz (v. 19) and the hopes she had of further kindness from him, he having ordered her to attend his servants throughout all the harvest, v. 21. Naomi prayed heartily for him that had been her daughter's benefactor, even before she knew who it was (v. 19), Blessed be he, whoever he was, that did take knowledge of thee, shooting the arrow of prayer at a venture. She now remembered the former kindnesses Boaz had shown to her husband and sons, and joins those to this: he has not left off his kindness to the living and to the dead. She acquainted Ruth with the relation their family was in to Boaz: The man is near of kin to us. Observe the chain of thought here, and in it a chain of providences, bringing about what was designed concerning Ruth. Ruth names Boaz as one that had been kind to her. Naomi bethinks herself who that should be, and presently recollects herself: "The man is near of kin to us; now that I hear his name, I remember him very well." She appointed Ruth to continue her attendance in the fields of Boaz (v. 22): "Let them not meet thee in any other field, for that will be construed a contempt of his courtesy." Has the Lord dealt bountifully with us? Let us not be found in any other field, nor seek for happiness and satisfaction in the creature. Ruth dutifully observed her mother's directions; she continued to glean, to the end, not only of barley-harvest, but of the wheat-harvest, which followed it, that she might gather food in harvest to serve for winter, Prov. vi. 6–8.

CHAP. III

I. The directions Naomi gave to her daughter-in-law how to claim Boaz for her husband, ver. 1–5. II. Ruth's punctual observance of those directions, ver. 6, 7. III. The kind and honourable treatment Boaz gave her, ver 8–12. IV. Her return to her mother-in-law, ver. 16–18.

Verses 1–5

I. Naomi's care for her daughter's comfort is without doubt very commendable. She is full of contrivance how to get her well married. Her wisdom projected that for her daughter which her daughter's modesty forbade her to project for herself, v. 1. This she did, 1. In justice to the dead, to raise up seed to those that were gone, and so to preserve the family from being extinct. 2. In kindness and gratitude to her daughter-in-law, who had conducted herself very dutifully and respectfully to her. "My daughter" (said she, looking upon her in all respects as her own), "shall I not seek rest for thee," that is, a settlement in the married state. A married state is, or should be, a state of rest to young people. Wandering affections are then fixed, and the heart must be at rest. It is at rest in the house of a husband, and in his heart, ch. i. 9. Those are giddy indeed that marriage does not compose.

II. The course she took in order to her daughter's preferment was very extraordinary and looks suspicious. If there was any thing improper in it, the fault must lie upon Naomi, who put her daughter upon it, and who knew, or should know, the laws and usages of Israel better than Ruth. 1. It was true that Boaz, being near of kin to the deceased, and (for aught that Naomi knew to the contrary) the nearest of all now alive, was obliged by the divine law to marry the widow of Mahlon, who was the eldest son of Elimelech, and was dead without issue (v. 2). "Why should we not remind him of his duty?" 2. It was a convenient time to remind him of it, now that he had got so much acquaintance with Ruth by her constant attendance on his reapers during the whole harvest, which was now ended. It was a good opportunity to apply to him when he made a winnowing-feast at his threshing-floor (v. 2). 3. Naomi thought Ruth the most proper person to do it herself; and perhaps it was the usage in that country that in this case the woman should make the demand; so much is intimated by the law, Deut. xxv. 7–9. "Wash thyself and anoint thee, put on thy raiment, and go down to the floor," whither, it is probable, she was invited to the supper there made; but she must not make herself known, that is, not make her errand known till the company had dispersed and Boaz had retired. But, 4. Her coming to lie down at his feet, when he was asleep in his bed, had such an appearance of evil, that we know not well how to justify it. All agree that it is not to be drawn into a precedent; neither our laws nor our times are the same that were then; yet I am willing to make the best of it. If Boaz was, as they presumed, the next kinsman, she was his wife before God (as we say), and there needed but little ceremony to complete the nuptials; and Naomi did not intend that Ruth should approach to him any otherwise than as his wife. She knew Boaz to be a grave sober man, a virtuous and religious man, and one that feared God. She knew Ruth to be a modest woman, chaste, and a keeper at home, Tit. ii. 5. Naomi herself designed nothing but what was honest and honourable. If what she advised had been then as indecent and immodest (according to the usage of the country), as it seems now to us, we cannot think that Naomi would have had so little wisdom as to put her daughter upon it, and have alienated the affections of so grave and good a man as Boaz from her. We must therefore think that the thing did not look so ill then as it does now. We may be sure, if Ruth had apprehended any evil in that which her mother advised her to, she was a woman of too much virtue and too much sense to promise as she did (v. 5): All that thou sayest unto me I will do.

I. Boaz's good management of his common affairs. It is probable, according to the common usage, 1. When his servants winnowed, he was with them to prevent carelessness in the winnowing. 2. When he had more than ordinary work to be done, he treated his servants with extraordinary entertainments, and, for their encouragement, did eat and drink with them. 3. When Boaz had supped with his workmen, and been awhile pleasant with them, he went to bed in due time, so early that by midnight he had his first sleep (v. 8). 4. He had his bed or couch laid at the end of the heap of corn; he was like his father Jacob, a plain man, that, when there was occasion, could make his bed in a barn, and, if need were, sleep contentedly in the straw.

II. Ruth's good assurance in the management of her affair. When he awaked in the night, and perceived there was somebody at his feet, and enquired who it was, she told him her name and then her errand (v. 9), that she came to put herself under his protection, as the person appointed by the divine law to be her protector: "Thou art he that has a right to redeem a family and an estate from perishing, and therefore let this ruin be under thy hand: and spread thy skirt over me—be pleased to espouse me and my cause."

III. The good acceptance Ruth gained with Boaz. He knew her demand was just and honourable, and treated her accordingly. Boaz knew it was not any sinful lust that brought her thither, and therefore bravely maintained both his own honour and hers.

(1) He commended her, spoke kindly to her, called her his daughter, and spoke honourably of her, as a woman of eminent virtue. It was very kind to leave her own country and come along with her mother to the land of Israel, to dwell with her, and help to maintain her. For this he had blessed her (ch. ii. 12); but now he says, Thou hast shown more kindness in the latter end than at the beginning (v. 10), in that she consulted not her own fancy, but her husband's family, in marrying again.

(2) He promised her marriage (v. 11): "Fear not that I will slight thee, or expose thee; no, I will do all that thou requirest, for it is the same that the law requires, from the next of kin, and I have no reason to decline it, for all the city of my people doth know that thou art a virtuous woman," v. 11.

(3) He made his promise conditional, and could not do otherwise, for it seems there was a kinsman that was nearer than he, to whom the right of redemption did belong, v. 12. He would himself propose it to the other kinsman, and know his mind. If the other kinsman refused to do the kinsman's part, he would do it, would marry the widow, redeem the land, and so repair the family. Bishop Hall thus sums up this matter: "Boaz, instead of touching her as a wanton, blesseth her as a father, encourageth her as a friend, promiseth her as a kinsman, rewards her as a patron, and sends her away laden with hopes and gifts, no less chaste, more happy, than she came."

I. How Ruth was dismissed by Boaz. 1. With a charge to keep counsel (v. 14): Let it not be known that a woman came into the floor, and lay all night so near to Boaz. 2. He dismissed her with a good present of corn, which would be very acceptable to her poor mother at home, and an evidence for her that he had not sent her away in dislike, which Naomi might have suspected if he had sent her away empty. He gave it to her in her veil, or apron, or mantle, gave it to her by measure.

II. How she was welcomed by her mother-in-law. She asked her, "Who art thou, my daughter? Art thou a bride or no? Must I give thee joy?" So Ruth told her how the matter stood (v. 17), whereupon her mother, 1. Advised her to be satisfied in what was done: Sit still, my daughter, till thou know how the matter will fall (v. 18). 2. She assured her that Boaz, having undertaken this matter, would approve himself a faithful careful friend: He will not be at rest till he have finished the matter.

CHAP. IV

I. How Boaz got clear of his rival, and fairly shook him off, ver. 1–8. II. How his marriage with Ruth was publicly solemnized, and attended with the good wishes of his neighbours, ver. 9–12. III. The happy issue that descended from this marriage, Obed, the grandfather of David, ver. 13–17. And so the book concludes with the pedigree of David, ver. 18–22.

Verses 1–8

1. Boaz calls a court immediately. It is probable he was himself one of the elders (or aldermen) of the city. But why was Boaz so hasty, why so fond of the match? Ruth was not rich, but a poor stranger. But that which made Boaz in love with her, and solicitous to expedite the affair, was that all her neighbours agreed she was a virtuous woman. He will therefore bring it to a conclusion immediately. It was not court-day, but he got ten men of the elders of the city to meet him in the town hall over the gate, where public business used to be transacted, v. 2. So many, it is probable, by the custom of the city, made a full court. 2. He summons his rival to come and hear the matter that was to be proposed to him (v. 1). 3. He proposes to the other kinsman the redemption of Naomi's land, which, it is probable, had been mortgaged for money to buy bread with when the famine was in the land (v. 3): "Naomi has a parcel of land to sell." This he gives the kinsman legal notice of (v. 4), that he might have the refusal of it. 4. The kinsman seemed forward to redeem the land till he was told that, if he did that, he must marry the widow, and then he flew off. "I cannot redeem it for myself. I will not meddle with it upon these terms, lest I mar my own inheritance." The land, he thought, would be an improvement of his inheritance, but not the land with the woman; that would mar it. 5. The right of redemption is fairly resigned to Boaz. If this nameless kinsman lost a good bargain, a good estate, and a good wife too, he may thank himself for not considering it better, and Boaz will thank him for making his way clear to that which he valued and desired above any thing. In those ancient times it was not the usage to pass estates by writings, as afterwards (Jer. xxxii. 10, &c.), but by some sign or ceremony, as with us by livery and seisin, as we commonly call it, that is, the delivery of seisin, seisin of a house by giving the key, of land by giving turf and a twig. The ceremony here used was, he that surrendered plucked off his shoe and gave it to him to whom he made the surrender, intimating thereby that, whatever right he had to tread or go upon the land, he conveyed and transferred it, upon a valuable consideration, to the purchaser: this was a testimony in Israel, v. 7. And it was done in this case, v. 8.

Boaz now sees his way clear to perform his promise made to Ruth that he would do the kinsman's part, but in the gate of his city, before the elders and all the people, publishes a marriage-contract between himself and Ruth the Moabitess, and therewith the purchase of all the estate that belonged to the family of Elimelech. Now concerning this marriage it appears,

I. That it was solemnized, or at least published, before many witnesses, v. 9, 10. 1. "That I have bought the estate. Whoever has it, or any part of it, mortgaged to him, let him come to me and he shall have his money." 2. "That I have purchased the widow to be my wife." He had no portion with her; what jointure she had was encumbered, and he could not have it without giving as much for it as it was worth, and therefore he might well say he purchased her. He designed, in marrying her, to preserve the memory of the dead, that the name of Mahlon, though he left no son to bear it up, by this means might be preserved. And observe that because Boaz did this honour to the dead, as well as this kindness to the living, God did him the honour to bring him into the genealogy of the Messiah, by which his family was dignified above all the families of Israel; while the other kinsman, that was so much afraid of diminishing himself, and marring his inheritance, by marrying the widow, has his name, family, and inheritance, buried in oblivion and disgrace. Our Lord Jesus is our Goel, our Redeemer, our everlasting Redeemer. He looked, like Boaz, with compassion on the deplorable state of fallen mankind. At a vast expense he redeemed the heavenly inheritance for us, which by sin was mortgaged, and forfeited into the hands of divine justice, and which we should never have been able to redeem.

II. That it was attended with many prayers. The elders and all the people, when they witnessed to it, wished well to it, and blessed it, v. 11, 12.

1. The senior elder, it is likely, made this prayer, and the rest of the elders, with the people, joined in it, and therefore it is spoken of as made by them all; for in public prayers, though but one speaks, we must all pray. Marriages ought to be blessed, and accompanied with prayer. We ought to desire and pray for the welfare and prosperity one of another.

2. Now here, (1) They prayed for Ruth, The Lord make the woman that has come into thy house like Rachel and Leah, that is, "God make her a good wife and a fruitful mother." (2) They prayed for Boaz. They desired that the wife might be a blessing in the private affairs of the house, and the husband a blessing in the public business of the town, that she in her place, and he in his, might be wise, virtuous, and successful. (3) They prayed for the family: "Let thy house be like the house of Pharez," that is, "let it be very numerous, let it greatly increase and multiply as the house of Pharez did." The Bethlehemites were of the house of Pharez. Now they prayed that the family of Boaz, which was one branch of that stock, might in process of time become as numerous and great as the whole stock now was.

I. Ruth a wife. Boaz took her, with the usual solemnities, to his house, and she became his wife (v. 13). Boaz had prayed that this pious proselyte might receive a full reward of her courage and constancy from the God of Israel, under whose wings she had come to trust; and now he became an instrument of that kindness, which was an answer to his prayer, and helped to make his own words good.

II. Ruth a mother: The Lord gave her conception; for the fruit of the womb is his reward, Ps. cxxvii. 3.

III. Ruth still a daughter-in-law, and the same that she always was, to Naomi, who was so far from being forgotten that she was a principal sharer in these new joys. Prayer to God attended the marriage (v. 11), and praise to him attended the birth of the child. What a pity it is that such pious language should either be disused among Christians or degenerate into a formality. "Blessed be the Lord that has sent thee this grandson," v. 14, 15. They say of Ruth that she loved Naomi, and therefore was better to her than seven sons. The bonds of love prove stronger than those of nature, so here there was a daughter-in-law better than an own child. (1) The child is named by the neighbours, v. 17. The good women would have it called Obed, a servant, either in remembrance of the meanness and poverty of the mother or in prospect of his being hereafter a servant, and very serviceable, to his grandmother. (2) The child is nursed by the grandmother. Grandmothers are often the most fond.

IV. Ruth is hereby brought in among the ancestors of David and Christ, which was the greatest honour. The genealogy is here drawn from Pharez, through Boaz and Obed, to David and so leads towards the Messiah.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE FIRST BOOK OF SAMUEL

This book, and that which follows it, bear the name of Samuel in the title, not because he was the penman of them, but because the first book begins with a large account of him, his birth and childhood, his life and government; and the rest of these two volumes that are denominated from him contains the history of the reigns of Saul and David, who were both anointed by him. And, because the history of these two kings takes up the greatest part of these books, the Vulgar Latin calls them the First and Second Books of the Kings, and the two that follow the Third and Fourth, which the titles in our English Bibles take notice of with an alias: otherwise called the First Book of the Kings, &c. The LXX calls them the first and second Book of the Kingdoms. These two books contain the history of the last two of the judges, Eli and Samuel, who were not, as the rest, men of war, but priests (and so much of them is an appendix to the book of judges), and of the first two of the kings, Saul and David, and so much of them is an entrance upon the history of the kings. This first book gives us a full account of Eli's fall and Samuel's rise and good government, ch. i.–viii. Of Samuel's resignation of the government and Saul's advancement and maladministration, ch. ix.–xv. The choice of David, his struggles with Saul, Saul's ruin at last, and the opening of the way for David to the throne, ch. xvi.–xxxi.

CHAP. I

The history of Samuel here begins even before he was born. The story of Samuel introduces him as a child of prayer. Samson's birth was foretold by an angel to his mother; Samuel was asked of God by his mother. Samuel's mother was Hannah, the principal person concerned in the story of this chapter. I. Here is her affliction — she was childless, and this affliction aggravated by her rival's insolence, but in some measure balanced by her husband's kindness, ver. 1–8. II. The prayer and vow she made to God under his affliction, in which Eli the high priest at first censured her, but afterwards encouraged her, ver. 9–19. III. The birth and nursing of Samuel, ver. 19–23. IV. The presenting of him to the Lord, ver. 24–28.

We have here an account of the state of the family into which Samuel the prophet was born. His father's name was Elkanah, a Levite, and of the family of the Kohathites (the most honourable house of that tribe) as appears, 1 Chron. vi. 33, 34. His ancestor Zuph was an Ephrathite, that is, of Bethlehem-Judah, which was called Ephrathah, Ruth i. 2. There this family of the Levites was first seated, but one branch of it, in process of time, removed to Mount Ephraim, from which Elkanah descended. This Elkanah lived at Ramah, or Ramathaim, which signifies the double Ramah, the higher and lower town.

I. It was a devout family. All the families of Israel should be so, but Levites' families in a particular manner. Ministers should be patterns of family religion. Elkanah went up at the solemn feasts to the tabernacle at Shiloh, to worship and to sacrifice to the Lord of hosts. Probably Samuel the prophet was the first that used this title of God, for the comfort of Israel, when in his time their hosts were few and feeble and those of their enemies many and mighty; then it would be a support to them to think that the God they served was Lord of hosts, of all the hosts both of heaven and earth. Elkanah was a country Levite, and, for aught that appears, had not any place or office which required his attendance at the tabernacle, but he went up as a common Israelite, with his own sacrifices, to encourage his neighbours and set them a good example. And that which made it the more commendable in him was, 1. That there was a general decay and neglect of religion in the nation. 2. That Hophni and Phinehas, the sons of Eli, were the men that were now chiefly employed in the service of the house of God; and they were men that conducted themselves very ill in their place, yet Elkanah went up to sacrifice. If the priests did not do their duty, he would do his.

II. Yet it was a divided family, and the division of it carried with them both guilt and grief.

1. The original cause of this division was Elkanah's marrying two wives, which was a transgression of the original institution of marriage, to which our Saviour reduces it. Matt. xix. 5, 8, From the beginning it was not so. It made mischief in Abraham's family, and Jacob's, and here in Elkanah's.

2. That which followed upon this error was that the two wives could not agree. They had different blessings: Peninnah, like Leah, was fruitful and had many children, which should have made her easy and thankful, though she was but a second wife, and was less beloved; Hannah, like Rachel, was childless indeed, but she was very dear to her husband. But they were of different tempers: Peninnah could not bear the blessing of fruitfulness, but she grew haughty and insolent; Hannah could not bear the affliction of barrenness, but she grew melancholy and discontented: and Elkanah had a difficult part to act between them.

(1) Elkanah kept up his attendance at God's altar notwithstanding this unhappy difference in his family, and took his wives and children with him, that, if they could not agree in other things, they might agree to worship God together. If the devotions of a family prevail not to put an end to its divisions, yet let not the divisions put a stop to the devotions.

(2) He did all he could to encourage Hannah, and to keep up her spirits under her affliction, v. 4, 5. At the feast he offered peace-offerings, to supplicate for peace in his family. [1] He studied to show his love so much the more because she was afflicted, insulted, and low-spirited. [2] He showed his great love to her by the share he gave her of his peace-offerings. Thus we should testify our affection to our friends and relations, by abounding in prayer for them.

(3) Peninnah was extremely peevish and provoking. [1] She upbraided Hannah with her affliction, despised her because she was barren, and gave her taunting language, as one whom Heaven did not favour. [2] She envied the interest she had in the love of Elkanah. [3] She did this most when they went up to the house of the Lord, perhaps because then they were more together than at other times, or because then Elkanah showed his affection most to Hannah. That which she designed was to make her fret, perhaps in hopes to break her heart, that she might possess her husband's heart solely.

(4) Hannah (poor woman) could not bear the provocation: She wept, and did not eat, v. 7. Yet it was her infirmity so far to give way to the sorrow of the world as to unfit herself for holy joy in God. Those that are of a fretful spirit, and are apt to lay provocations too much to heart, are enemies to themselves, and strip themselves very much of the comforts both of life and godliness.

(5) Elkanah said what he could to her to comfort her. Hannah, why weepest thou? Those that by marriage are made one flesh ought thus far to be of one spirit, too, to share in each other's troubles, so that one cannot be easy while the other is uneasy. He intimates that nothing should be wanting on his part to balance her grief: "Am not I better to thee than ten sons? Thou knowest thou hast my entire affection, and let that comfort thee." Note, We ought to take notice of our comforts, to keep us from grieving excessively for our crosses; for our crosses we deserve, but our comforts we have forfeited. If we would keep the balance even, we must look at that which is for us, as well as at that which is against us, else we are unjust to Providence and unkind to ourselves.

Elkanah had gently reproved Hannah for her inordinate grief, and here we find the good effect of the reproof.

I. It brought her to her meat. She ate and drank, v. 9. She did not harden herself in sorrow, nor grow sullen when she was reproved for it. It is as great a piece of self-denial to control our passions as it is to control our appetites.

II. It brought her to her prayers. "Instead of binding the burden thus upon my own shoulders, had I not better ease myself of it, and cast it upon the Lord by prayer?" If ever she will make a more solemn address than ordinary to the throne of grace upon this errand, now is the time. They are at Shiloh, at the door of the tabernacle, where God had promised to meet his people, and which was the house of prayer. They had recently offered their peace-offerings. Now concerning Hannah's prayer,

1. The warm and lively devotion there was in it, which appeared in several instances, for our direction in prayer. (1) She improved the present grief and trouble of her spirit for the exciting and quickening of her pious affections in prayer: Being in bitterness of soul, she prayed, v. 10. This good use we should made of our afflictions, they should make us the more lively in our addresses to God. Our blessed Saviour himself, being in an agony, prayed more earnestly, Luke xxii. 44. (2) She mingled tears with her prayers. It was not a dry prayer: she wept sore. (3) She was very particular, and yet very modest, in her petition. She begged a child, a man-child, that it might be fit to serve in the tabernacle. (4) She made a solemn vow, or promise, that if God would give her a son she would give him up to God, v. 11. He would be by birth a Levite, and so devoted to the service of God, but he should be by her vow a Nazarite, and his very childhood should be sacred. Note further, it is very proper, when we are in pursuit of any mercy, to bind our own souls with a bond. Not that hereby we can pretend to merit the gift, but thus we are qualified for it and for the comfort of it. In hope of mercy, let us promise duty. (5) She spoke all this so softly that none could hear her. Her lips moved, but her voice was not heard, v. 13. She trusted God's knowledge of the heart. Thoughts are words to him.

2. The hard censure she fell under for it. Eli was now high priest, and judge in Israel; he sat upon a seat in the temple, to oversee what was done there, v. 9. The tabernacle is here called the temple, because it was now fixed, and served all the purposes of a temple. There Eli sat to receive addresses and give direction, and somewhere (it is probable in a private corner) he espied Hannah at her prayers, and by her unusual manner fancied she was drunken, and spoke to her accordingly (v. 14): How long wilt thou be drunken?—the very imputation that Peter and the apostles fell under when the Holy Ghost gave them utterance, Acts ii. 13. Perhaps in this degenerate age it was no strange thing to see drunken women at the door of the tabernacle. When a disease is epidemical every one is suspected to be tainted with it. She had been reproved by Elkanah because she would not eat and drink, and now to be reproached by Eli as if she had eaten and drunk too much was very hard.

3. Hannah's humble vindication of herself from this crime with which she was charged. (1) In justice to herself she expressly denies the charge. "No, my lord, it is not as you suspect; I have drunk neither wine nor strong drink, not any at all, count not thy handmaid for a daughter of Belial." Note, The very manner of her speaking in her own defence was sufficient to demonstrate that she was not drunk. (2) In justice to him, she gives an account of her present behaviour. She had been more than ordinarily fervent in prayer to God, and this, she tells him, was the true reason of the transport and disorder she seemed to be in.

4. The atonement Eli made for his rash unfriendly censure, by a kind and fatherly benediction, v. 17. He now encouraged Hannah's devotions as much as before he had discountenanced them; and intimated that he was satisfied of her innocency by those words, Go in peace. The God of Israel grant thee thy petition, whatever it is, that thou hast asked of him.

5. The great satisfaction of mind with which Hannah now went away, v. 18. She went her way and did eat of what remained of the peace-offerings and her countenance was no more sad. Whence came this sudden happy change? She had by prayer committed her case to God and left it with him, and now she was no more perplexed about it. She had prayed for herself, and Eli had prayed for her; and she believed that God would either give her the mercy she had prayed for or make up the want of it to her some other way. Prayer is heart's ease to a gracious soul.

I. The return of Elkanah and his family to their own habitation, when the days appointed for the feast were over, v. 19. They had a journey before them, and a family of children to take with them, and yet they would not stir till they had worshipped God together. Prayer and provender do not hinder a journey.

II. The birth and name of this desired son. At length the Lord remembered Hannah, for she conceived and bore a son. This son the mother called Samuel, v. 20. Some make the etymology of this name to be much the same with that of Ishmael—heard of God, because the mother's prayers were remarkably heard, and he was an answer to them. Others, because of the reason she gives for the name, make it to signify asked of God. Mercies in answer to prayer are to be remembered with peculiar expressions of thankfulness, as Ps. cxvi. 1, 2. How many seasonable deliverances and supplies may we call Samuels, asked of God! He was asked of God and was at the same time dedicated to him.

III. The close attendance Hannah gave to the nursing of him, not only because he was dear to her, but because he was devoted to God. Hannah, though she felt a warm regard for the courts of God's house, begged leave of her husband to stay at home; for the women were not under any obligation to go up to the three yearly feasts, as the men were. However Hannah had been accustomed to go, but now desired to be excused, 1. Because she would not be so long absent from her nursery. God will have mercy and not sacrifice. Those that are detained from public ordinances by the nursing and tending of little children may take comfort from this instance, and believe that, if they do that with an eye to God, he will graciously accept them therein. 2. Because she would not go up to Shiloh till her son was big enough, not only to be taken thither, but to be left there; for, if once she took him thither, she thought she could never find in her heart to bring him back again.

IV. The solemn entering of this child into the service of the sanctuary. Some think it was as soon as he was weaned from the breast, which, the Jews say, was not till he was three years old. Others think it was not till he was weaned from childish things, at eight or ten years old. It is said (v. 24), The child was young. Observe how she presented her child, 1. With a sacrifice; no less than three bullocks, with a meat-offering for each, v. 24. A bullock, perhaps, for each year of the child's life. Or one for a burnt-offering, another for a sin-offering, and the third for a peace-offering. 2. With a grateful acknowledgment of God's goodness in answer to prayer. This she makes to Eli, because he had encouraged her to hope for an answer of peace (v. 26, 27): "For this child I prayed." 3. With a full surrender of all her interest in this child unto the Lord (v. 28): I have lent him to the Lord as long as he liveth. (1) Whatever we give to God, it is what we have first asked and received from him. Of thy own, Lord, have we given thee, 1 Chron. xxix. 14, 16. (2) Whatever we give to God may upon this account be said to be lent to him. When by baptism we dedicate our children to God, let us remember that they were his before by a sovereign right, and that they are ours still so much the more to our comfort.

Lastly, The child Samuel did his part beyond what could have been expected from one of his years; for of him that seems to be spoken, He worshipped the Lord there, that is, he said his prayers. Little children should learn betimes to worship God. Their parents should instruct them in his worship and bring them to it, put them upon engaging in it as well as they can, and God will graciously accept them and teach them to do better.

CHAP. II

I. Hannah's song of thanksgiving to God for giving her Samuel, ver. 1–10. II. Their return to their family, with Eli's blessing, ver. 11, 20. The increase of their family, ver. 21. Samuel's growth and improvement (ver. 11, 18, 21, 26), and the care Hannah took to clothe him, ver. 19. III. The great wickedness of Eli's sons, ver. 12–17, 22. IV. The over-mild reproof that Eli gave them, ver. 23–25. V. The justly dreadful message God sent him by a prophet, ver. 27–36.

We have here Hannah's thanksgiving, dictated, not only by the spirit of prayer, but by the spirit of prophecy. Observe in general, 1. When she had received mercy from God she owned it, with thankfulness to his praise. Praise is our rent, our tribute. We are unjust if we do not pay it. 2. The mercy she had received was an answer to prayer, and therefore she thought herself especially obliged to give thanks for it. 3. Her thanksgiving is here called a prayer: Hannah prayed; for thanksgiving is an essential part of prayer. Her voice was not heard; but in her thanksgiving she spoke, that all might hear her. She made her supplication with groanings that could not be uttered, but now her lips were opened to show forth God's praise. Three things we have in this thanksgiving:

I. Hannah's triumph in God, in his glorious perfections, and the great things he had done for her, v. 1–3.

1. What great things she says of God. She takes little notice of the particular mercy she was now rejoicing in. She overlooks the gift, and praises the giver; whereas most forget the giver and fasten only on the gift. Four of God's glorious attributes Hannah here celebrates, (1) His unspotted purity. There is none holy as the Lord. (2) His almighty power: Neither is there any rock like our God. (3) His unsearchable wisdom: The Lord, the Judge of all, is a God of knowledge. (4) His unerring justice: By him actions are weighed.

2. How she solaces herself in these things. What we give God the glory of we may take the comfort of. Hannah does so, (1) In holy joy: My heart rejoiceth in the Lord; not so much in her son as in her God. (2) In holy triumph: "My horn is exalted; not only is my reputation saved by my having a son, but greatly raised by having such a son." My horn is exalted means this, "My praises are very much elevated to an unusual strain." My mouth is enlarged, that is, "Now I have wherewith to answer those that reproached me."

3. How she herewith silences those that set up themselves as rivals with God and rebels against him (v. 3): Talk no more so exceedingly proudly.

II The notice she takes of the wisdom and sovereignty of the divine providence, in its disposals of the affairs of the children of men.

1. The strong are soon weakened and the weak are soon strengthened, when God pleases, v. 4. On the one hand, if he speak the word, the bows of the mighty men are broken; they are disarmed, disabled to do as they have before done and as they have designed to do. On the other hand, if the Lord speak the word, those who stumble through weakness, who were so feeble that they could not go straight or steady, are girded with strength, in body and mind, and are able to bring great things to pass.

2. The rich are soon impoverished, and the poor strangely enriched on a sudden, v. 5. Riches flee away (Prov. xxiii. 5), and leave those miserable who, when they had them, placed their happiness in them. To those that have been full and free poverty and slavery must needs be doubly grievous. But, on the other hand, sometimes Providence so orders it that those who are hungry cease, that is, cease to hire out themselves for bread as they have done. It may be understood of the same person; those that were rich God makes poor. and after awhile makes rich again, as Job; he gave, he takes away, and then gives again, Let not the rich be proud and secure, for God can soon make them poor; let not the poor despond and despair, for God can in due time enrich them again.

3. Empty families are replenished and numerous families diminished and made few. The barren hath borne seven, meaning herself, for, though at present she had but one son, yet that one being a Nazarite, devoted to God and employed in his immediate service, he was to her as good as seven. Or it is the language of her faith. Now that she had one she hoped for more, and was not disappointed.

4. God is the sovereign Lord of life and death (v. 6): The Lord killeth and maketh alive. Nothing is too hard for God to do, no, not the quickening of the dead, and putting life into dry bones.

5. Advancement and abasement are both from him. He brings some low and lifts up others (v. 7), humbles the proud and gives grace and honour to the lowly, lays those in the dust that would vie with the God above them and trample upon all about them (Job xl. 12, 13), but lifts up those with his salvation that humble themselves before him, Jam. iv. 10. Joseph, and Daniel, Moses and David, were thus strangely advanced, from a prison to a palace, from a sheep-hook to a sceptre.

6. A reason is given for all these dispensations which obliges us to acquiesce in them, how surprising soever they are: For the pillars of the earth are the Lord's. (1) If we understand this literally, it intimates God's almighty power, which cannot be controlled. He upholds the whole creation, founded the earth, and still sustains it by the word of his power. What cannot he do in the affairs of families and kingdoms, far beyond our conception and expectation, who hangs the earth upon nothing? Job xxvi. 7. But, (2) If we understand it figuratively, it intimates his incontestable sovereignty, which cannot be disputed. The princes and great ones of the earth, the directors of states and governments, are the pillars of the earth, Ps. lxxv. 3. On these hinges the affairs of the world seem to turn, but they are the Lord's, Ps. xlvii. 9. From him they have their power, and therefore he may advance whom he pleases; and who may say, What doest thou?

III. A prediction of the preservation and advancement of all God's faithful friends, and the destruction of all his and their enemies. Having testified her joyful triumph in what God had done, and is doing, she concludes with joyful hopes of what he would do, v. 9, 10. Pious affections in those days rose many times to the height of prophecy. This prophecy may refer, 1. More immediately to the government of Israel by Samuel, and by David whom he was employed to anoint. Israel (that in the time of the judges had made so small a figure and had much ado to subsist) should now shortly become great and considerable, and give law to all its neighbours. An extraordinary change that was; and the birth of Samuel was, as it were, the dawning of that day. But, 2. We have reason to think that this prophecy looks further, to the kingdom of Christ, and the administration of that kingdom of grace, of which she now comes to speak, having spoken so largely of the kingdom of providence. And here is the first time that we meet with the name Messiah, or his Anointed. The ancient expositors, both Jewish and Christian, make it to look beyond David, to the Son of David. Glorious things are here spoken of the kingdom of the Mediator. Concerning that kingdom we are here assured, (1) That all the loyal subjects of it shall be carefully and powerfully protected (v. 9): He will keep the feet of his saints. If he will keep their feet, much more their head and hearts. Or he will keep their feet, that is, he will secure the ground they stand on, and establish their goings; he will set a guard of grace upon their affections and actions, that their feet may neither wander out of the way nor stumble in the way. (2) That all the powers engaged against it shall not be able to effect the ruin of it. (3) That all the enemies of it will certainly be broken and brought down: The wicked shall be silent in darkness, v. 9. (4) That the conquests of this kingdom shall extend themselves to distant regions: The Lord shall judge the ends of the earth. David's victories and dominions reached far, but the uttermost parts of the earth are promised to the Messiah for his possession (Ps. ii. 8). (5) That the power and honour of Messiah the prince shall grow and increase more and more: He shall give strength unto his king, for the accomplishing of his great undertaking (Ps. lxxxix. 21, and see Luke xxii. 43), strengthen him to go through the difficulties of his humiliation, and in his exaltation he will lift up the head (Ps. cx. 7), lift up the horn, the power and honour, of his anointed, and make him higher than the kings of the earth, Ps. lxxxix. 27.

In these verses we have the good character of Elkanah's family, and the bad character of Eli's family.

I. Let us see how well things went in Elkanah's family and how much better than formerly. 1. Eli dismissed them from the house of the Lord, when they had entered their little son there, with a blessing, v. 20. If Hannah had then had many children, it would not have been such a generous piece of piety to part with one out of many for the service of the tabernacle; but when she had but one, to present him to the Lord was such an act of heroic piety as should by no means lose its reward. As when Abraham had offered Isaac he received the promise of a numerous issue (Gen. xxii. 16, 17), so did Hannah, when she had presented Samuel unto the Lord a living sacrifice. 2. They returned to their own habitation. This is twice mentioned, v. 11, and again v. 20. 3. They kept up their constant attendance at the house of God with their yearly sacrifice, v. 19. They did not think that their son's ministering there would excuse them. We may suppose they went thither to see their child oftener than once a year, for it was not ten miles from Ramah; but their annual visit is taken notice of because then they brought their yearly sacrifice, and then Hannah fitted up her son (and some think oftener than once a year) with a new suit of clothes, a little coat (v. 19) and everything belonging to it. 4. The child Samuel did very well. Four separate times he is mentioned in these verses, and two things we are told of:—(1) The service he did to the Lord. He did well indeed, for he ministered to the Lord (v. 11, 18). Perhaps he attended immediately on Eli's person. He could light a candle, or hold a dish, or run on an errand, or shut a door; and, because he did this with a pious disposition of mind it is called ministering to the Lord. (2) The blessing he received from the Lord. He grew before the Lord, as a tender plant (v. 21), grew on (v. 26) in strength and stature, and especially in wisdom and understanding. He was in favour with the Lord and with man. What is here said of Samuel is said of our blessed Saviour, that great example, Luke ii. 52.

II. Let us now see how ill things went in Eli's family, though seated at the very door of the tabernacle. The nearer the church the further from God.

1. The abominable wickedness of Eli's sons (v. 12): The sons of Eli were sons of Belial. It is emphatically expressed. They knew not the Lord. They were resident at the fountain-head both of magistracy and ministry, and yet they were sons of Belial, and their honour, power, and learning, made them so much the worse. It is hard to say which dishonours God more, idolatry or profaneness, especially the profaneness of the priests.

(1) They profaned the offerings of the Lord, and made a gain to themselves, or rather a gratification of their own luxury, out of them. [1] They robbed the offerers, and seized for themselves some of their part of the sacrifice of the peace-offerings. The priests had for their share the wave-breast and the heave shoulder (Lev. vii. 34), but these did not content them. [2] They stepped in before God himself, and encroached upon his right too. As if it were a small thing to weary men, they wearied my God also, Isa. vii. 13. The effect was, First, That God was displeased: The sin of the young men was very great before the Lord, v. 17. Secondly, That religion suffered by it: Men abhorred the offerings of the Lord. In the midst of this sad story comes in the repeated mention of Samuel's devotion. But Samuel ministered before the Lord, as an instance of the power of God's grace, in preserving him pure and pious in the midst of this wicked crew; and this helped to keep up the sinking credit of the sanctuary in the minds of the people.

(2) They debauched the women that came to worship at the door of the tabernacle, v. 22.

2. The reproof which Eli gave his sons for this their wickedness: Eli was very old (v. 22) and could not himself inspect the service of the tabernacle as he had done, but left all to his sons, who, because of the infirmities of his age, slighted him, and did what they would. It should seem he did not so much as reprove them till he heard of their debauching the women, and then he thought fit to give them a check. Now concerning the reproof he gave them observe,

(1) That it was very just and rational. That which he said was very proper. [1] He tells them that the matter of fact was too plain to be denied and too public to be concealed: "I hear of your evil dealings by all this people," v. 23. [2] He shows them the bad consequences of it, that they not only sinned, but made Israel to sin, and would have the people's sin to answer for as well as their own. [3] He warns them of the danger they brought themselves into by it, v. 25. He intimates to them what God afterwards told him, that the iniquity would not be purged with sacrifice nor offering, ch. iii. 14.

(2) It was too mild and gentle. He should have rebuked them sharply. Their crimes deserved sharpness; their temper needed it; the softness of his dealing with them would but harden them the more. What he said was right, but it was not enough.

3. Their obstinacy against this reproof. They hearkened not to their father, though he was also a judge. Samuel's tractableness is again mentioned (v. 26), to shame their obstinacy: The child Samuel grew. God's grace is his own; he denied it to the sons of the high priest and gave it to the child of an obscure country Levite.

Eli reproved his sons too gently, and did not threaten them as he should, and therefore God sent a prophet to him to reprove him sharply. The message is sent to Eli himself, because God would bring him to repentance and save him; not to his sons, whom he had determined to destroy.

I. He reminds him of the great things God had done for the house of his fathers and for his family. He appeared to Aaron in Egypt (Exod. iv. 27), in the house of bondage, as a token of further favour which he designed for him, v. 27. He advanced him to the priesthood, entailed it upon his family, and thereby dignified it above any of the families of Israel.

II. He exhibits a high charge against him and his family. His children did wickedly, and he connived at it, and thereby involved himself in the guilt; the indictment therefore runs against them all, v. 29. 1. His sons had impiously profaned the holy things of God: "You kick at my sacrifice which I have commanded." 2. Eli had bolstered them up in it, by not punishing their insolence and impiety: "Thou for thy part honourest thy sons above me." 3. They had all shared in the gains of the sacrilege. It is to be feared that Eli himself, though he disliked and reproved the abuses they committed, yet did not forbear to eat of the roast meat they sacrilegiously got, v. 15.

III. He declares the cutting off of the entail of the high priesthood from his family (v. 30): I said, indeed, that thy house, and the house of thy father Ithamar (for from that younger son of Aaron Eli descended), should walk before me for ever. Upon what occasion the dignity of the high priesthood was transferred from the family of Eleazar to that of Ithamar does not appear; but it seems this had been done, and Eli stood fair to have that honour perpetuated to his posterity. But observe, the promise carried its own condition along with it: They shall walk before me for ever, that is, "they shall have the honour, provided they faithfully do the service." Walking before God is the great condition of the covenant, Gen. xvii. 1. Let them set me before their face, and I will set them before my face continually (Ps. xli. 12), otherwise not. But now the Lord says, Be it far from me. "Now that you cast me off you can expect no other than that I should cast you off; you will not walk before me as you should, and therefore you shall not."

IV. He gives a good reason for this revocation, taken from a settled and standing rule of God's government, according to which all must expect to be dealt with (like that by which Cain was tried, Gen. iv. 7): Those that honour me I will honour, and those that despise me shall be lightly esteemed. The way to be truly great is to be truly good. If we humble and deny ourselves in anything to honour God, and have a single eye to him in it, we may depend upon this promise, he will put the best honour upon us. See John xii. 26.

V. He foretells the particular judgments which should come upon his family, to its perpetual ignominy.

1. That their power should be broken (v. 31): I will cut off thy arm, and the arm of thy father's house. They should be stripped of all their authority, should be deposed, and have no influence upon the people as they had had.

2. That their lives should be shortened. It is twice spoken: "There shall not be an old man in thy house for ever"; and again (v. 33), "All the increase of thy house, from generation to generation, shall die in the flower of their age."

3. That all their comforts should be embittered. (1) The comfort they had in the sanctuary, in its wealth and prosperity: Thou shalt see an enemy in my habitation. This was fulfilled in the Philistines' invasions and the mischiefs they did to Israel (ch. xiii. 19). (2) The comfort of their children: "The man of thine whom I shall not cut off by an untimely death" shall live to be a blot and burden to the family. Grief for a dead child is great, but for a bad child often greater.

4. That their substance should be wasted and they should be reduced to extreme poverty (v. 26): "He that is left alive in thy house shall have little joy of his life, for want of a livelihood; he shall come and crouch to the succeeding family for a subsistence." (1) He shall beg for the smallest alms—a piece of silver (and the word signifies the least piece) and a morsel of bread. Want is the just punishment of wantonness. Those who could not be content without dainties and varieties are brought, they or theirs, to want necessaries. (2) He shall beg for the meanest office: Put me into somewhat belonging to the priesthood (as it is in the original); make me as one of the hired servants, the fittest place for a prodigal. Plenty and power are forfeited when they are abused. This, it is probable, was fully accomplished when Abiathar, who was of Eli's race, was deposed by Solomon for treason, and he and his turned out of office in the temple (1 Kings ii. 26, 27).

5. That God would shortly begin to execute these judgments in the death of Hophni and Phinehas, the sad tidings of which Eli himself should live to hear: This shall be a sign to thee, v. 34.

VI. In the midst of all these threatenings against the house of Eli, here is mercy promised to Israel (v. 35): I will raise me up a faithful priest. 1. This was fulfilled in Zadoc, of the family of Eleazar, who came into Abiathar's place in the beginning of Solomon's reign, and was faithful to his trust. If some betray their trust, yet others shall be raised up that will be true to it. God's work shall never fall to the ground for want of hands to carry it on. 2. It has its full accomplishment in the priesthood of Christ.

CHAP. III

In the foregoing chapter we had Samuel a young priest, though by birth a Levite only, for he ministered before the Lord in a linen ephod; in this chapter we have him a young prophet, God revealing himself to him, and in him reviving, if not commencing, prophecy in Israel. I. God's first manifestation of himself in an extraordinary manner to Samuel, ver. 1–10. II. The message he sent by him to Eli, ver. 11–14. III. The faithful delivery of that message to Eli, and his submission to the righteousness of God in it, ver. 15–18. IV. The establishment of Samuel to be a prophet in Israel, ver. 19–21.

We are here told, 1. How industrious Samuel was in serving God. It was an aggravation of the wickedness of Eli's sons that the child Samuel shamed them. They rebelled against the Lord, but Samuel ministered to him; they slighted their father's admonitions, but Samuel was observant of them; he ministered before Eli, under his eye and direction. Those are fittest to rule who have learnt to obey. 2. How scarce a thing prophecy then was, which made the call of Samuel to be the greater surprise to himself and the greater favour to Israel: The word of the Lord was precious in those days. It was precious, for what there was (it seems) was private: There was no open vision. Perhaps the impiety and impurity that prevailed in the tabernacle, and no doubt corrupted the whole nation, had provoked God, as a token of his displeasure, to withdraw the Spirit of prophecy.

The manner of God's revealing himself to Samuel is here related very particularly, for it was uncommon.

I. Eli had retired. Samuel had waited on him to his bed (v. 2): Eli had laid down in his place.

II. Samuel had laid down to sleep, in some closet near to Eli's room, ready within call if the old man should want any thing in the night. When his own sons were a grief to him, his little servitor was his joy. Samuel had laid down ere the lamp of God went out, v. 3.

III. God called him by name, and he took it for Eli's call, and ran to him, v. 4, 5. Here we have an instance, 1. Of Samuel's industry, and readiness to wait on Eli. "Here am I," said he—a good example to servants, to come when they are called; and to the younger, not only to submit to the elder, but to be careful and tender of them. 2. Of his unacquaintedness with the visions of the Almighty, that he took that to be only Eli's call which was really the call of God. Such mistakes as these we make oftener than we think. God calls to us by his word, and we take it to be only the call of the minister, and answer it accordingly; he calls to us by his providences, and we look only at the instruments. Eli assured him he did not call him, but mildly bade him lie down again. So Samuel went and lay down.

IV. The same call was repeated, and the same mistake made, a second and third time, v. 6–9. 1. God continued to call the child yet again (v. 6), and again the third time, v. 8. 2. Samuel was still ignorant that it was the Lord that called him (v. 7): Samuel did not yet know the Lord. The witness of the Spirit in the hearts of the faithful is often thus mistaken, by which means they lose the comfort of it; and the strivings of the Spirit with the consciences of sinners are likewise often mistaken, and so the benefit of their convictions is lost. Samuel went to Eli this second and third time, and he tells Eli, with great assurance, "Thou didst call me (v. 6–8), it could be no one else." But there was a special providence in it, that he should go thus often to Eli; for hereby, at length, Eli perceived that the Lord had called the child, v. 8. This would be a mortification to him, and he would apprehend it to be a step towards his family's being degraded, that when God had something to say he should choose to say it to the child Samuel, his servant that waited on him, and not to him.

V. At length Samuel was put into a posture to receive a message from God. 1. Eli, perceiving that it was the voice of God that Samuel heard, gave him instructions what to say, v. 9. The instruction was, when God called the next time, to say, Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth. We may expect that God will speak to us, when we set ourselves to hearken to what he says, Ps. lxxxv. 8; Hab. ii. 1. When we come to read the word of God, and to attend on the preaching of it, we should come thus disposed, submitting ourselves to the commanding light and power of it: Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth. 2. It should seem that God spoke the fourth time in a way somewhat different from the other; now he stood and called, which intimates that there was now some visible appearance of the divine glory to Samuel. This satisfied him that it was not Eli that called. Now also the call was doubled—Samuel, Samuel, as if God delighted in the mention of his name. 3. Samuel said, as he was taught, Speak, for thy servant heareth. Samuel did not now rise and run as before when he thought Eli called, but lay still and listened. The more sedate and composed our spirits are the better prepared they are for divine discoveries. All must be silent when he speaks. But observe, Samuel left out one word; he did not say, Speak, Lord, but only, Speak, for thy servant heareth, perhaps, as Bishop Patrick suggests, out of uncertainty whether it was God that spoke to him or no.

I. The message which, after all this introduction, God delivered to Samuel concerning Eli's house. The message is short, not nearly so long as that which the man of God brought, ch. ii. 27. But it is a sad message, to ratify the message in the former chapter, and to bind on the sentence there pronounced.

1. Concerning the sin: it is the iniquity that he knoweth, v. 13. The man of God told him of it, and many a time his own conscience had told him of it. His sons made themselves vile, and he restrained them not. Or, as it is in the Hebrew, he frowned not upon them.

2. Concerning the punishment: it is that which I have spoken concerning his house, v. 12 and 13. When that sentence began to be executed it would be very dreadful and amazing to all Israel (v. 11): Both the ears of every one that heareth it shall tingle. Every Israelite would be struck with terror and astonishment to hear of the slaying of Eli's sons, the breaking of Eli's neck, and the dispersion of Eli's family. "The iniquity of Eli's house shall not be purged with sacrifice nor offering for ever. No atonement shall be made for the sin, nor any abatement of the punishment." This was the imperfection of the legal sacrifices, that there were iniquities which they did not reach, which they would not purge; but the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin, and secured all those that by faith are interested in it from that eternal death which is the wages of sin.

II. The delivery of this message to Eli.

1. Samuel's modest concealment of it, v. 15. (1) He lay till the morning, and we may well suppose he lay awake pondering on what he had heard. (2) He opened the doors of the house of the Lord, in the morning, as he used to do, being up first in the tabernacle. That he should do so at other times was an instance of extraordinary towardliness in a child, but that he should do so this morning was an instance of great humility. God had highly honoured him above all the children of his people, yet he was not proud of the honour, but, as cheerfully as ever, went and opened the doors of the tabernacle. (3) He feared to show Eli the vision, because he was afraid to grieve and trouble the good old man.

2. Eli's careful enquiry into it, v. 16, 17. As soon as ever he heard Samuel's stirring he called for him, probably to his bedside. He had reason enough to fear that the message prophesied no good concerning him, but evil; and yet, because it was a message from God, he could not contentedly be ignorant of it. A good man desires to be acquainted with all the will of God, whether it make for him or against him.

3. Samuel's faithful delivery of his message at last (v. 18); He told him every whit.

4. Eli's pious acquiescence in it. He did not question Samuel's integrity, was not cross with him, nor had he any thing to object against the equity of the sentence. It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good. It is the Lord, with whom there is no unrighteousness, who never did nor ever will do any wrong to any of his creatures, nor exact more than their iniquity deserves. "Let him do what seemeth him good. I have nothing to say against his proceedings."

Samuel being thus brought acquainted with the visions of God,

I. God did him honour. Having begun to favour him, he carried on and crowned his own work in him: Samuel grew, for the Lord was with him, v. 19. God honoured Samuel; 1. By further manifestations of himself to him: The Lord revealed himself again to Samuel in Shiloh, v. 21. 2. By fulfilling what he spoke by him: God did let none of his words fall to the ground, v. 19. Whatever Samuel said, as a prophet, it proved true, and was accomplished in its season.

II. Israel did him honour. They all knew and owned that Samuel was established to be a prophet, v. 20. 1. He grew famous. 2. He grew useful and very serviceable to his generation. He that began betimes to be good soon came to do good.

CHAP. IV

The predictions concerning the ruin of Eli's house begin to be fulfilled. I. The disgrace Israel sustained in an encounter with the Philistines, ver. 1, 2. II. Their foolish project to fortify themselves by bringing the ark of God into their camp upon the shoulders of Hophni and Phinehas (ver. 3, 4), which made them secure (ver. 5) and struck a fear into the Philistines, but such a fear as roused them, ver. 6–9. III. The fatal consequences: Israel was beaten, and the ark taken prisoner, ver. 10, 11. IV. The tidings brought to Shiloh, and the sad reception of those tidings. 1. The city was put into confusion, ver. 12, 13. 2. Eli fell, and broke his neck, ver. 14–18. 3. Upon hearing what had occurred his daughter-in-law fell in labour, bore a son, but died immediately, ver. 19–22.

Verses 1–9

I. A war entered into with the Philistines, v. 1. It was an attempt to throw off the yoke of their oppression, and would have succeeded better if they had first repented and reformed, and so begun their work at the right end.

II. The defeat of Israel in that war, v. 2. Israel, who were the aggressors, were smitten, and had 4,000 men killed upon the spot. Sin, the accursed thing, was in the camp, and gave their enemies all the advantage against them they could wish for.

III. The measures they concerted for another engagement. 1. They quarrelled with God for appearing against them (v. 3): Wherefore has the Lord smitten us? They expostulate boldly with God about it, are displeased at what God has done, and dispute the matter with him. 2. They imagined that they could oblige him to appear for them the next time by bringing the ark into their camp. They sent to Shiloh for the ark, and Eli had not courage enough to detain it, but sent his ungodly sons, Hophni and Phinehas, along with it, or at least permitted them to go. See here, (1) The profound veneration the people had for the ark. "O send for that, and it will do wonders for us." The ark was, by institution, a visible token of God's presence. They thought that, by paying a great respect to this sacred chest, they should prove themselves to be Israelites and engage God Almighty to appear in their favour. It is common for those that have estranged themselves from the vitals of religion to discover a great fondness for the rituals and external observances of it. And yet indeed they did but make an idol of the ark, and looked upon it to be as much an image of the God of Israel as those idols which the heathen worshipped were of their gods. (2) Their egregious folly in thinking that the ark, if they had it in their camp, would certainly save them out of the hand of their enemies, and bring victory back to their side. What good would the ark do them, the shell without the kernel? Instead of honouring God by what they did, they really affronted him. If there had been nothing else to invalidate their expectations from the ark, how could they expect it should bring a blessing when Hophni and Phinehas were the men that carried it?

IV. The great joy there was in the camp of Israel when the ark was brought into it (v. 5): They shouted, so that the earth rang again. Now they thought themselves sure of victory.

V. The consternation into which the bringing of the ark into the camp of Israel put the Philistines. The two armies lay so near encamped that the Philistines heard the shout the Israelites gave on this great occasion. They soon understood what it was they triumphed in (v. 6), and were afraid of the consequences. For, 1. It had never been done before in their days: God has come into their camp, and therefore woe unto us (v. 7), and again, woe unto us, v. 8. See what gross notions they had of the divine presence, as if the God of Israel were not as much in the camp before the ark came thither, which may very well be excused in them, since the notions the Israelites themselves had of that presence were no better. 2. When it had been done in the days of old, it had wrought wonders: These are the gods that smote the Egyptians with all the plagues in the wilderness, 4. 8. Here they were as much out in their history as in their divinity: the plagues of Egypt were inflicted before the ark was made and before Israel came into the wilderness. Yet, it should seem, they scarcely believed themselves when they spoke thus formidably of these mighty gods, but only bantered; they stirred up one another to fight so much the more stoutly.

Here is a short account of the issue of this battle.

I. Israel was smitten, the army dispersed and totally routed. 1. Though they had the better cause, were the people of God, yet they failed of success, for their rock had sold them. A good cause often suffers for the sake of the bad men that undertake it. 2. Though they had the greater confidence, and were the more courageous. The ark in the camp will add nothing to its strength when there is an Achan in it.

II. The ark itself was taken by the Philistines; and Hophni and Phinehas were both slain, v. 11. 1. The slaughter of the priests, considering their bad character, was no great loss to Israel, but it was a dreadful judgment upon the house of Eli. The word which God had spoken was fulfilled in it (ch. ii. 34). But, 2. The taking of the ark, was a very great judgment upon Israel, and a certain token of God's hot displeasure against them. Now they are made to see their folly in trusting to their external privileges when they had by their wickedness forfeited them, and fancying that the ark would save them when God had departed from them.

Tidings are here brought to Shiloh of the fatal issue of their battle with the Philistines. Bad news flies fast. Thither therefore an express posted away immediately; it was a man of Benjamin; the Jews fancy it was Saul. He rent his clothes, and put earth upon his head, by these signs to proclaim the sorrowful news. He went straight to Shiloh with it.

I. How the city received it. Eli sat in the gate (v. 13, 18), but the messenger passed him by, and told it in the city, with all the aggravating circumstances; and now both the ears of every one that heard it tingled, as was foretold, ch. iii. 11. Their hearts trembled, and every face gathered blackness. All the city cried out (v. 13), and well they might, for it was a particular loss to Shiloh, and the ruin of that place; for, though the ark was soon rescued out of the hands of the Philistines, yet it never returned to Shiloh again. This abandoning of Shiloh Jerusalem is long afterwards reminded of, and told to take warning by. Jer. vii. 12, "Go see what I did to Shiloh."

II. What a fatal blow it was to old Eli. 1. With what fear he expected the tidings. Though old, and blind, and heavy, yet he could not keep his chamber when he was sensible the glory of Israel lay at stake, but placed himself by the way side, to receive the first intelligence; for his heart trembled for the ark of God, v. 13. He also apprehended imminent danger. Israel had forfeited the ark (his own sons especially) and now the threatening comes to his mind, that he should see an enemy in God's habitation (ch. ii. 32); and perhaps his own heart reproached him for not using his authority to prevent the carrying of the ark into the camp. All good men lay the interests of God's church nearer their hearts than any secular interest or concern of their own. How can we be easy if the ark be not safe? 2. With what grief he received the tidings. Though he could not see, he could hear the tumult and crying of the city, and perceived it to be the voice of lamentation. He is told there is an express come from the army, who relates the story to him very distinctly, having himself been an eye-witness of it, v. 16, 17. The account of the defeat of the army, and the slaughter of a great number of the soldiers, was very grievous to him as a judge; the tidings of the death of his two sons, who, he had reason to fear, died impenitent, touched him in a tender part as a father. He does not interrupt the narrative with any passionate lamentations for his sons, like David for Absalom, but waits for the end of the story, not doubting but that the messenger, being an Israelite, would, without being asked, say something of the ark; and if he could but have said, "Yet the ark of God is safe, and we are bringing that home," his joy for that would have overcome his grief for all the other disasters. When the messenger concludes his story with, The ark of God is taken, he is struck to the heart, and, it should seem, he swooned away, and died immediately. His heart was broken first, and then his neck. Thus were the folly and wickedness of those sons of his, whom he had indulged, his ruin at last. Yet we must observe, to Eli's praise, that it was the loss of the ark that was his death, not the slaughter of his sons.

Another melancholy story, that carries on the desolations of Eli's house, and the sorrowful feeling which the tidings of the ark's captivity excited. It is concerning the wife of Phinehas, one of those ungracious sons of Eli that had brought all this mischief on Israel.

I. She was a woman of a very tender spirit. She was near her time. When she heard of the death of her father-in-law whom she reverenced, and her husband whom, bad as he was, she loved, but especially of the loss of the ark, she travailed, for her pains came thickly upon her (v. 19), and though she had strength to bear the child, she, soon after, fainted and died, being very willing to let life go when she had lost the greatest comforts of her life.

II. She was a woman of a very gracious spirit. Her concern for the death of her husband and father-in-law was an evidence of her natural affection; but her much greater concern for the loss of the ark was an evidence of her pious and devout affection to God and sacred things. She said, The glory has departed from Israel.

1. The women that attended her said unto her, Fear not, now the worst is past, for thou hast borne a son (and perhaps it was her first-born), but she answered not, neither did she regard it. What is it to one that is lamenting the loss of the ark? Small comfort could she have of a child born in Israel, in Shiloh, when the ark is lost, and is a prisoner in the land of the Philistines.

2. This made her give her child a name which should perpetuate the remembrance of the calamity and her sense of it. She orders them to call it I-chabod, that is, Where is the glory? Or, Alas for the glory! or, There is no glory (v. 21), which she thus explains with her dying lips (v. 22): "The glory has departed from Israel; for the ark of God is taken." If God go, the glory goes, and all good goes.

CHAP. V

It is now time to enquire what has become of the ark of God; but we find not any motion made, so little was there of zeal or courage left. "It is gone, and let it go." Unworthy they were of the name of Israelites that could thus tamely part with the glory of Israel. God would therefore take the work into his own hands. I. How the Philistines triumphed over the ark (ver. 1, 2), and II. How the ark triumphed over the Philistines, 1. Over Dagon their god, ver. 3–5. 2. Over the Philistines themselves, who were sorely plagued with emerods, the men of Ashdod first (ver. 6, 7), then the men of Gath (ver. 8, 9), and lastly those of Ekron, which forced them at length upon a resolution to send the ark back to the land of Israel.

I. The Philistines' triumph over the ark, which they were the more pleased to be now masters of because before the battle they were possessed with a great fear of it, ch. iv. 7. When they had it in their hands God restrained them, that they did not offer any violence to it, but carefully carried it to a place of safety. They carried it to Ashdod, one of their five cities, and that in which Dagon's temple was; there they placed the ark of God, by Dagon (v. 2), either, 1. As a sacred thing, which they designed to pay some religious respect to, in conjunction with Dagon; for the gods of the heathen were never looked upon as averse to partners. Though the nations would not change their gods, yet they would multiply them and add to them. But they were mistaken in the God of Israel when, in putting his ark by Dagon's image, they intended to do him honour; for he is not worshipped at all if he is not worshipped alone. Or rather, 2. They placed it there as a trophy of victory, in honour of Dagon their god. (1) God will show of how little account the ark of the covenant is if the covenant itself be broken and neglected; even sacred signs are not things that either he is tied to or we can trust to. (2) For a time, God may have so much the more glory, in reckoning with those that thus affront him, and get him honour upon them. Having punished Israel, that betrayed the ark, by giving it into the hands of the Philistines, he will next deal with those that abused it, and will fetch it out of their hands again.

II. The ark's triumph over Dagon. Once and again Dagon was made to fall before it. The next morning, when the worshippers of Dagon came to pay their devotions to his shrine, they found their triumphing short, Job xx. 5.

1. Dagon had fallen upon his face to the earth before the ark, v. 3. Great care was taken, in setting up the images of their gods, to fix them. The prophet takes notice of it, Isa. xli. 7, He fastened it with nails that it should not be moved; and again, Isa. xlvi. 7. And yet Dagon's fastenings stood him in no stead. The kingdom of Satan will certainly fall before the kingdom of Christ, error before truth, profaneness before godliness, and corruption before grace in the hearts of the faithful. When the interests of religion seem to be run down and ready to sink, yet even then we may be confident that the day of their triumph will come.

2. The priests, finding their idol on the floor, make all the haste they can, before it be known, to set him in his place again. A sorry silly thing it was to make a god of, which, when it was down, wanted help to get up again; and sottish wretches those were that could pray for help from that idol that needed, and in effect implored, their help. How could they attribute their victory to the power of Dagon when Dagon himself could not keep his own ground before the ark? But they are resolved Dagon shall be their god still, and therefore set him in his place.

3. The next night Dagon fell the second time, v. 4. The head and hands were cut off upon the threshold, so that nothing remained but the stump, or, as the margin reads it, the fishy part of Dagon; for (as many learned men conjecture) the upper part of this image was in a human shape, the lower in the shape of a fish, as mermaids are painted. The misshapen monster is by this fall made to appear, (1) Very ridiculous, and worthy to be despised. A pretty figure Dagon made now, when the fall had anatomized him, and shown how the human part and the fishy part were artificially put together. (2) Very impotent, and unworthy to be prayed to or trusted in; for his losing his head and hands proved him utterly destitute both of wisdom and power, and for ever disabled either to advise or act for his worshippers.

4. The threshold of Dagon's temple was ever looked upon as sacred, and not to be trodden on, v. 5. Some think that reference is had to this superstitious usage of Dagon's worshippers in Zeph. i. 9, where God threatens to punish those who, in imitation of them, leaped over the threshold. Instead of despising Dagon, for the threshold's sake that beheaded him, they were almost ready to worship the threshold because it was the block on which he was beheaded.

The downfall of Dagon (if the people had made a good use of it, and had been brought by it to repent of their idolatries and to humble themselves before the God of Israel and seek his face) might have prevented the vengeance which God here proceeds to take upon them for the indignities done to his ark. He destroyed them. At Gath it is called a great destruction (v. 9), a deadly destruction, v. 11. And it is expressly said (v. 12) that those who were smitten with the emerods were the men that died not by the other destruction, which probably was the pestilence. Those that were not destroyed he smote with emerods (v. 6), in their secret parts (v. 9), so grievous that (v. 12) the cry went up to heaven, that is, it might be heard a great way off, and perhaps, in the extremity of their pain and misery, they cried, not to Dagon, but to the God of heaven. The emerods was both a painful and shameful disease. By it God would humble their pride, and put contempt upon them, as they had done upon his ark. The disease was epidemical, and perhaps, among them, a new disease. Ashdod was smitten, and the coasts thereof, the country round. The men of Ashdod were soon aware that it was the hand of God, the God of Israel, v. 7. Thus they were constrained to acknowledge his power and dominion, and confess themselves within his jurisdiction, and yet they would not renounce Dagon and submit to Jehovah; but rather, now that he touched their bone and their flesh, they were ready to curse him to his face, and instead of making their peace with him, and courting the stay of his ark upon better terms, they desired to get clear of it. Carnal hearts, when they smart under the judgments of God, would rather, if it were possible, put him far from them than enter into covenant and communion with him, and make him their friend. Thus the men of Ashdod resolve, The ark of the God of Israel shall not abide with us. It is resolved to change the place of its imprisonment. It was agreed that it should be carried to Gath, v. 8. Some superstitious conceit they had that the fault was in the place, and that the ark would be better pleased with another lodging, further off from Dagon's temple; and therefore, instead of returning it, as they should have done, to its own place, they contrive to send it to another place. Gath is pitched upon, a place famed for a race of giants, but their strength and stature are no fence against the pestilence and the emerods: the men of that city were smitten, both great and small (v. 9), both dwarfs and giants, all alike to God's judgments. They were all at last weary of the ark, and very willing to get rid of it. It was sent from Gath to Ekron, and, coming by order of council, the Ekronites could not refuse it, but were much exasperated against their great men for sending them such a fatal present (v. 10): They have sent it to us to slay us and our people. A general assembly is instantly called, to advise about sending the ark again to its place, v. 11. While they are consulting about it, the hand of God is doing execution; and their contrivances to evade the judgment do but spread it. Many drop down dead among them. Many more are raging ill of the emerods, v. 12. What shall they do?

CHAP. VI

The return of the ark to the land of Israel, I. How the Philistines dismissed it, by the advice of their priests (ver. 1–11), with rich presents to the God of Israel, to make an atonement for their sin (ver. 3–5), and yet with a project to bring it back, unless Providence directed the kine, contrary to their inclination, to go to the land of Israel, ver. 8, 9. II. How the Israelites entertained it. 1. With great joy and sacrifices of praise, ver. 12–18. 2. With an over-bold curiosity to look into it, for which many of them were struck dead, ver. 19–21.

The ark was in the country of the Philistines seven months. So long as they carried it captive, they should find it a curse to them. 1. Seven months Israel was punished with the absence of the ark, that special token of God's presence. A melancholy time no doubt, but they had this to comfort themselves with, that, wherever the ark is, the Lord is in his holy temple, and by faith and prayer we may have access with boldness to him there. We may have God nigh unto us when the ark is at a distance. 2. Seven months the Philistines were punished with the presence of the ark; so long it was a plague to them, because they would not send it home sooner. Note, Sinners lengthen out their own miseries by obstinately refusing to part with their sins. But at length it is determined that the ark must be sent back.

I. The priests and the diviners are consulted about it, v. 2. They were supposed to be best acquainted both with the rules of wisdom and with the rites of worship and atonement, and therefore it was proper to ask them, What shall we do to the ark of Jehovah?

II. They give their advice very fully, and seem to be very unanimous in it. 1. They urge it upon them that it was absolutely necessary to send the ark back, from the example of Pharaoh and the Egyptians, v. 6. 2. They advise that, when they sent it back, they should send a trespass-offering with it, v. 3. They knew the God of Israel was a jealous God, and those with whom he had such a quarrel must in any wise return him a trespass-offering, and they could not expect to be healed upon any other terms. But when they began to contrive what that satisfaction should be, they became wretchedly vain in their imaginations. 3. They direct that this trespass-offering should be an acknowledgment of the punishment of their iniquity. They must make images of the emerods, that is, of the swellings and sores with which they had been afflicted, so making the reproach of that shameful disease perpetual by their own act and deed (Ps. lxxviii. 66), also images of the mice that had marred the land, owning thereby the almighty power of the God of Israel, who could chastise and humble them, even in the day of their triumph, by such small and despicable animals. These images must be made of gold, the most precious metal, to intimate that they would gladly purchase their peace with the God of Israel at any rate. The golden emerods must be, in number, five, according to the number of the lords, who, it is likely, were all afflicted with them, and were content thus to own it; it was advised that the golden mice should be five too. 4. They encourage them to hope that hereby they would take an effectual course to get rid of the plague: You shall be healed, v. 3. "Let them therefore send back the ark, and then," say they, "It shall be known to you why his hand is not removed from you, that is, by this it will appear whether it is for your detaining the ark that you are thus plagued; for, if it be, upon your delivering it up the plague will cease." 5. Yet they put them in a way to make a further trial whether it was the hand of the God of Israel that had smitten them with these plagues or no. They must, in honour of the ark, put it on a new cart or carriage, to be drawn by two milch-cows (v. 7), unused to draw, and inclined to home. They must have no one to lead or drive them, but must take their own way, which, in all reason, one might expect, would be home again; and yet, unless the God of Israel, after all the other miracles he has wrought, will work one more, and by an invisible power lead these cows, contrary to their mutual instinct and inclination, to the land of Israel, and particularly to Beth-shemesh, they will retract their former opinion, and will believe it was not the hand of God that smote them, but it was a chance that happened to them, v. 8, 9.

I. How the Philistines dismissed the ark, v. 10, 11. They were made as glad to part with it as ever they had been to take it. 1. They received no money or price for the ransom of it, as they hoped to do, even beyond a king's ransom. 2. They gave jewels of gold, as the Egyptians did to the Israelites, to be rid of it.

II. How the kine brought it to the land of Israel, v. 12. They took the straight way to Beth-shemesh, the next city of the land of Israel, and a priests' city, and turned not aside. This was a wonderful instance of the power of God over the brute-creatures that cattle unaccustomed to the yoke should go the straight road to Beth-shemesh, a city eight or ten miles off, never miss the way, never turn aside into the fields to feed themselves, nor turn back home to feed their calves.

III. How it was welcomed to the land of Israel: The men of Beth-shemesh were reaping their wheat-harvest, v. 13. They were going on with their worldly business, and were in no care about the ark. God will in his own time effect the deliverance of his church, not only though it be fought against by its enemies, but though it be neglected by its friends. The same invisible hand that directed the kine to the land of Israel brought them into the field of Joshua, for the sake of the great stone in that field, which was convenient to put the ark upon, and which is spoken of, v. 14, 15, 18. 1. When the reapers saw the ark, they rejoiced (v. 13). Though they had not zeal and courage enough to attempt the rescue or ransom of it, yet, when it did come, they bade it heartily welcome. 2. They offered up the kine for a burnt-offering, to the honour of God, and made use of the wood of the cart for fuel, v. 14. Probably the Philistines intended these, when they sent them, to be a part of their trespass-offering, to make atonement, v. 3, 7. 3. They deposited the ark, with a chest of jewels that the Philistines presented, upon the great stone in the open field, a cold lodging for the ark of the Lord and a very mean one; yet better so than in Dagon's temple, or in the hands of the Philistines. As the burning of the cart and cows that brought home the ark might be construed to signify their hopes that it should never be carried away again out of the land of Israel, so the setting of it upon a great stone might signify their hopes that it should be established again upon a firm foundation. The church is built upon a rock. 4. They offered the sacrifices of thanksgiving to God, some think upon the great stone, more probably upon an altar of earth made for the purpose, v. 15. This accidental bringing of the ark hither was an indication of its designed settlement there, in process of time. It was one of those cities which were assigned out of the lot of Judah to the sons of Aaron Josh. xxi. 16. Whither should the ark go but to a priests' city? And it was well they had those of that sacred order ready to take down the ark and to offer the sacrifices. 5. The lords of the Philistines returned to Ekron, much affected, we may suppose, with what they had seen of the glory of God and the zeal of the Israelites, and yet not reclaimed from the worship of Dagon.

1. The sin of the men of Beth-shemesh: They looked into the ark of the Lord, v. 19. We were all ruined by an ambition of forbidden knowledge. That which made this looking into the ark a great sin was that it proceeded from a very low and mean opinion of the ark. It may be they presumed upon the present mean circumstances the ark was in, newly come out of captivity, and unsettled. It is an offence to God if we think meanly of his ordinances because of the meanness of the manner of their administration. Had they looked with an understanding eye upon the ark, and not judged purely by outward appearance, they would have thought that the ark never shone with greater majesty than it did now. 2. Their punishment for this sin: He smote the men of Beth-shemesh, many of them, with a great slaughter. Josephus says only seventy were smitten. 3. The terror that was struck upon the men of Beth-shemesh by this severe stroke. They said, as well they might, Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God? v. 20. To stand before God to worship him (blessed be his name) is not impossible; we are through Christ invited, encouraged, and enabled to do it, but to stand before God to contend with him we are not able. 4. Their desire, hereupon, to be rid of the ark. They asked, To whom shall he go up from us? v. 20. They sent messengers to the elders of Kirjath-jearim, a strong city further up in the country, and begged of them to come and fetch the ark up thither, v. 21. It lay in the way from Beth-shemesh to Shiloh, so that when they sent to them to fetch it, we may suppose, they intended that the elders of Shiloh should fetch it thence, but God intended otherwise. Thus was it sent from town to town, and no care taken of it by the public, a sign that there was no king in Israel.

CHAP. VII

I. The eclipsing of the glory of the ark, by its privacy in Kirjath-jearim for many years, ver. 1, 2. II. The appearing of the glory of Samuel in his public services for the good of Israel, to whom he was raised up to be a judge, and he was the last that bore that character. We have him here active, 1. In the reformation of Israel from their idolatry, ver. 3, 4. 2. In the reviving of religion among them, ver. 5, 6. 3. In praying for them against the invading Philistines (ver. 7–9), over whom God, in answer to his prayer, gave them a glorious victory, ver. 10, 21. 4. In erecting a thankful memorial of that victory, ver. 12, 5. In the improvement of that victory, ver. 13, 14. 6. In the administration of justice, ver. 15–17.

Here we must attend the ark to Kirjath-jearim, to hear not a word more of it except once (ch. xiv. 18), till David fetched it thence, about forty years after, 1 Chron. xiii. 6.

I. The men of Beth-shemesh have by their own folly made that a burden which might have been a blessing.

1. The men of Kirjath-jearim cheerfully bring it among them, v. 1. Their neighbours the Beth-shemites, were not more glad to get rid of it than they were to receive it, knowing very well that what slaughter the ark had made at Beth-shemesh was not an act of arbitrary power, but of necessary justice, and those that suffered by it must blame themselves, not the ark.

2. They carefully provided for its decent entertainment among them, with true affection, with respect and reverence.

(1) They provided a proper place to receive it, in the house of Abinadab, which stood upon the highest ground, and, probably, was the best house in their city. The men of Beth-shemesh left it exposed upon a stone in the open field, but the men of Kirjath-jearim gave it house-room. God will find out a resting-place for his ark; if some thrust it from them, yet the hearts of others shall be inclined to receive it. It is no new thing for God's ark to be thrust into a private house.

(2) They provided a proper person to attend it: They sanctified Eleazar his son to keep it; not the father, because he was aged and infirm. His business was to keep the ark, not only from being seized by malicious Philistines, but from being touched or looked into by too curious Israelites. He was to keep the room clean and decent in which the ark was, that it might not look like a neglected thing. It does not appear that this Eleazar was of the tribe of Levi, much less of the house of Aaron. We may suppose that some devout Israelites would come and pray before the ark, and those that did so he was there ready to attend and assist. For this purpose they set him apart for it in the name of all their citizens. This was irregular, but was excusable because of the present distress.

II. Yet we are very loth to leave it here, wishing it well at Shiloh again, but that is made desolate (Jer. vii. 14), it must lie by the way for want of some public-spirited men to bring it to its proper place. 1. The time of its continuance here was long. Above forty years it lay in a remote, obscure, private place, unfrequented and almost unregarded (v. 2). It was very strange that all the time that Samuel governed, the ark was never brought to its place in the holy of holies, an evidence of the decay of holy zeal among them. God suffered it to be so, to punish them for their neglect when it was in its place. 2. Twenty years of this time had passed before the house of Israel was sensible of the want of the ark. The Septuagint read it somewhat more clearly than we do; and it was twenty years, and (that is, when) the whole house of Israel looked up again after the Lord. While it was absent from the tabernacle, the token of God's special presence was wanting, nor could they keep the day of atonement as it should be kept. They were content with the altars without the ark; so easily can formal professors rest satisfied in a round of external performances, without any tokens of God's presence or acceptance. But at length they bethought themselves, and began to lament after the Lord, stirred up to it, it is probable, by the preaching of Samuel, with which an extraordinary working of the Spirit of God set in. A general disposition to repentance and reformation now appears throughout all Israel. True repentance and conversion begin in lamenting after the Lord. It was better with the Israelites when they wanted the ark, and were lamenting after it, than when they had the ark, and were prying into it, or priding themselves in it.

We may well wonder where Samuel was and what he was doing all this while, but his labours among his people are not mentioned till there appears the fruit of them. When he perceived that they began to lament after the Lord he struck while the iron was hot, and two things he endeavoured to do for them,

I. He endeavoured to separate between them and their idols, for there reformation must begin. He spoke to all the house of Israel (v. 3), going, as it should seem, from place to place, an itinerant preacher (for we find not that they were gathered together till v. 5), and wherever he came this was his exhortation, "If you do indeed return to the Lord, then know, 1. That you must renounce and abandon your idols. Put away Baalim, the strange gods, and Ashtaroth, the strange goddess," for such also they had. Ashtaroth is particularly named because it was the best-beloved idol. True repentance strikes at the darling sin, and will with a peculiar zeal and resolution put away that, the sin which most easily besets us. 2. That you must make a solemn business of returning to God, and do it with a serious consideration and a steadfast resolution, for both are included in preparing the heart, directing, disposing, establishing, the heart unto the Lord. 3. That you must be wholly for God, for him and no other, serve him only, else you do not serve him at all so as to please him. Take this course, and he will deliver you out of the hand of the Philistines. This was the purport of Samuel's preaching, and it had a wonderfully good effect (v. 4): They put away Baalim and Ashtaroth, not only quitted the worship of them, but destroyed their images, demolished their altars, and quite abandoned them.

II. He endeavoured to engage them for ever to God and his service.

1. He summons all Israel, at least by their elders, as their representatives, to meet him at Mizpeh (v. 5), and there he promises to pray for them. When we come together in religious assemblies, we must remember that it is as much our business there to join in public prayers as it is to hear a sermon.

2. They obey his summons, and not only come to the meeting, but conform to the intentions of it, and appear there very well disposed, v. 6.

(1) They drew water and poured it out before the Lord, signifying, [1] Their humiliation and contrition for sin, owning themselves as water spilt upon the ground, which cannot be gathered up again (2 Sam. xiv. 14). The Chaldee reads it, They poured out their hearts in repentance before the Lord. [2] Their earnest prayers and supplications to God for mercy. [3] Their universal reformation; they thus expressed their willingness to part with all their sins, and to retain no more of the relish or savour of them than the vessel does of the water that is poured out of it. [4] Some think it signifies their joy in the hope of God's mercy, which Samuel had assured them of.

(2) They fasted, abstained from food, afflicted their souls, so expressing repentance.

(3) They made a public confession: We have sinned against the Lord, so giving glory to God and taking shame to themselves.

3. Samuel judged them at that time in Mizpeh, that is, he assured them, in God's name, of the pardon of their sins, upon their repentance, and that God was reconciled to them. It was a judgment of absolution. Whereas before he acted only as a prophet, now he began to act as a magistrate, to prevent their relapsing into those sins which now they seemed to have renounced.

Verses 7–12

I. The Philistines invade Israel (v. 7), taking umbrage from that general meeting for repentance and prayer as if it had been a rendezvous for war. 1. How evil sometimes seems to come out of good! The religious meeting of the Israelites at Mizpeh brought trouble upon them from the Philistines. When sinners begin to repent and reform, they must expect that Satan will muster all his force against them, and set his instruments on work to the utmost to oppose and discourage them. But, 2. How good is, at length, brought out of that evil. Israel could never be threatened more seasonably than at this time, when they were repenting and praying, nor could they have been better prepared to receive the enemy.

II. Israel cleaves closely to Samuel, as their best friend, under God, in this distress; though he was no military man, nor ever celebrated as a mighty man of valour, yet, they engaged Samuel's prayers for them: Cease not to cry unto the Lord our God for us, v. 8. They were here unarmed, unprepared for war, come together to fast and pray, not to fight; prayers and tears therefore being all the weapons many of them are now furnished with, to these they have recourse.

III. Samuel intercedes with God for them, and does it by sacrifice, v. 9. Samuel's sacrifice without his prayer would have been an empty shadow, his prayer without the sacrifice would not have been so prevalent, but both together teach us what great things we may expect from God in answer to those prayers which are made with faith in Christ's sacrifice. It was a burnt-offering, which was offered purely for the glory of God. It was but one sucking lamb that he offered; for it is the integrity and intention of the heart that God looks at, more than the bulk or number of the offerings. Samuel was no priest, but he was a Levite and a prophet; the case was extraordinary, and what he did was by special direction, and therefore accepted of God.

IV. God gave a gracious answer to Samuel's prayer (v. 9): The Lord heard him. He was himself a Samuel, asked of God, and many a Samuel, many a mercy in answer to prayer, God gave him. The prayer of Samuel was honoured; for at the very time when he was offering up his sacrifice, and his prayer with it, the battle began, and turned immediately against the Philistines. As in a former engagement with the Philistines God had justly chastised their presumptuous confidence in the presence of the ark, on the shoulders of two profane priests, so now he graciously accepted their humble dependence upon the prayer of faith from the mouth and heart of a pious prophet.

V. Samuel erected a thankful memorial of this victory, to the glory of God and for the encouragement of Israel, v. 12. He set up an Eben-ezer, the stone of help. The place where this memorial was set up was the same where, twenty years before, the Israelites were smitten before the Philistines, for that was beside Eben-ezer, ch. iv. 1. The reason he gives for the name is, Hitherto the Lord hath helped us, in which he speaks thankfully of what was past, and yet he speaks somewhat doubtfully for the future: "Hitherto things have done well, but what God may yet do with us we know not, that we refer to him; but let us praise him for what he has done." Having obtained help from God. I continue hitherto, says blessed Paul, Acts xxvi. 22.

It appears (2 Chron. xxxv. 18) that in the days of Samuel the prophet the people of Israel kept the ordinance of the passover with more than ordinary devotion, notwithstanding the distance of the ark and the desolations of Shiloh. Here we are only told how instrumental he was, 1. In securing the public peace (v. 13): In his days the Philistines came no more into the coast of Israel. Samuel was a protector and deliverer to Israel, not by dint of sword, as Gideon, nor by strength of arm, as Samson, but by the power of prayer to God and carrying on a work of reformation among the people. Religion and piety are the best securities of a nation. 2. In recovering the public rights, v. 14. By his influence Israel had the courage to demand the cities which the Philistines had unjustly taken from them. It is added, There was peace between Israel and the Amorites, that is, the Canaanites, the remains of the natives. 3. In administering public justice (v. 15, 16): He judged Israel. Even after Saul was made king he promised them (ch. xii. 23), I will not cease to teach you the good and the right way. He kept courts at Beth-el, Gilgal, and Mizpeh, all in the tribe of Benjamin; but his constant residence was at Ramah, his father's city, and there he judged Israel. 4. In keeping up the public exercises of religion; for there, where he lived, he built an altar to the Lord, not in contempt of the altar that was at Nob, or Gibeon. He did as the patriarchs did, he built an altar where he lived, both for the use of his own family and for the good of the country that resorted to it.

CHAP. VIII

Israel's good days seldom continue long. I. Samuel decaying, ver. 1. II. His sons degenerating, ver. 2, 3. III. Israel discontented with the present government and anxious to see a change. For. 1. They petition Samuel to set a king over them, ver. 4, 5. 2. Samuel brings the matter to God, ver. 6. 3. God directs him what answer to give them, by way of reproof (ver. 7, 8), setting forth the consequence of a change of the government, and how uneasy they would soon be under it, ver. 9–18. 4. They insist upon their petition, ver. 19, 20. 5. Samuel promises them, from God, that they shall shortly be gratified, ver. 21, 22.

Two sad things we find here, but not strange things:—1. A good and useful man growing old and unfit for service (v. 1): Samuel was old, and could not judge Israel, as he had done. He is not reckoned to be past sixty years of age now, perhaps not so much; but he was a man betimes, was full of thoughts and cares when he was a child. The fruits that are the first ripe keep the worst. He had spent his strength and spirits in the fatigue of public business, and now, if he think to shake himself as at other times, he finds he is mistaken, old age has cut his hair. Those that are in the prime of their time ought to be busy in doing the work of life. 2. The children of a good man turning aside, and not treading in his steps. We have reason to think that Samuel gave them their commissions, not because they were his sons, but because, for aught that yet appeared, they were men very fit for the trust. But, alas! his sons walked not in his ways (v. 3), and, when their character was the reverse of his, their relation to so good a man, which otherwise would have been their honour, was really their disgrace. When Samuel's sons were made judges, and settled at a distance from him, then they discovered themselves. Many that have done well in a state of subjection have been spoiled by preferment and power. Honours change men's minds, and too often for the worse. It does not appear that Samuel's sons were so profane and vicious as Eli's sons; but, whatever they were in other respects, they were corrupt judges, they turned aside after lucre, after the mammon of unrighteousness, so the Chaldee reads it. In determining controversies, they had an eye to the bribe, not to the law, and enquired who bid highest, not who had right on his side.

We have here the starting of a matter perfectly new and surprising, which was the setting up of kingly government in Israel.

I. The address of the elders to Samuel in this matter (v. 4, 5). They came to him to his house at Ramah with their address, which contained,

1. A remonstrance of their grievances: in short, Thou art old, and thy sons walk not in thy ways. (1) It was true that Samuel was old; yet it made him the more wise and experienced, and, upon that account, the fitter to rule. (2) It was true that his sons did not walk in his ways; the more was his grief, but they could not say it was his fault: he had not, like Eli, indulged them in their badness, but was ready to receive complaints against them.

2. A petition for the redress of these grievances, by setting a king over them: Make us a king to judge us like all the nations. Thus far it was well, that they did not rise up in rebellion against Samuel and set up a king for themselves. But it appears by what followed that it was an evil proposal and ill made, and was displeasing to God. They must have a king to judge them with external pomp and power, like all the nations. A poor prophet in a mantle, though conversant in the visions of the Almighty, looked mean in the eyes of those who judged by outward appearance; but a king in a purple robe, with his guards and officers of state, would look great: and such a one they must have.

II. Samuel's resentment of this address, v. 6. 1. It cut him to the heart. Probably it was a surprise to him. It displeased him when they said, Give us a king to judge us, because that reflected upon God and his honour. 2. It drove him to his knees; he gave them no answer for the present, but took time to consider of what they proposed, and prayed unto the Lord for direction what to do.

III. The instruction God gave him concerning this matter. He tells him,

1. That which would be an allay to his displeasure. Samuel was much disturbed at the proposal: but God tells him he must not think it either hard or strange. (1) He must not think it hard that they had put this slight upon him, for they had herein put a slight upon God himself. If God interest himself in the indignities that are done us, we may well afford to bear them patiently. Samuel must not complain that they were weary of his government, for really they were weary of God's government. The government of Israel had hitherto been a Theocracy, a divine government; their judges had their call and commission immediately from God; the affairs of their nation were under his peculiar direction. (2) He must not think it strange for they do as they always have done. They had always been rude to their governors, witness Moses and Aaron.

2. He tells him that which would be an answer to their demand. Samuel would not have known what to say if God had not instructed him, but he gives them, with assurance, the answer God sent them.

(1) He must tell them that they shall have a king. Hearken to the voice of the people, v. 7, and again, v. 9. God bade Samuel humour them in this matter, [1] That they might be beaten with their own rod, and might feel, to their cost, the difference between his government and the government of a king. [2] To prevent something worse. If they were not gratified, they would either rise in rebellion against Samuel or universally revolt from their religion and admit the gods of the nations, that they might have kings like them.

(2) But he must tell them, withal, that when they have a king they will soon have enough of him, and will, when it is too late, repent of their choice.

IV. Samuel's faithful delivery of God's mind to them, v. 10. He told them all the words of the Lord, how ill he resented it, that he construed it a rejecting of him, and compared it with their serving other gods. He lays before them, very particularly, what would be, not the right of a king in general, but the manner of the king that should reign over them, according to the pattern of the nations, v. 11.

1. If they will have such a king as the nations have, let them consider, (1) That a king must have a great retinue, a multitude of attendants. And whence must he have these? "Why, he will take your sons, and will appoint them for himself," v. 11. They must wait upon him, ear his ground, and reap his harvest (v. 12), and count it their preferment too, v. 16. (2) He must keep a great table. (3) He must needs have a standing army, for guards and garrisons. (4) "You may expect that he will have great favourites, whom, having dignified and ennobled, he must enrich out of your inheritances (v. 14). How will you like that?" (5) "He must have great revenues to maintain his grandeur and power. He will take the tenth of the fruits of your ground (v. 15), and your cattle," v. 17.

2. These would be their grievances. When they complained to God he would not hear them, v. 18.

V. The people's obstinacy in their demand, v. 19, 20. "We will have a king over us, whatever God or Samuel say to the contrary; we will have a king, whatever it cost us, and whatever inconvenience we bring upon ourselves or our posterity by it." They were quite deaf to reason and blind to their own interest. They could not stay God's time. God had intimated to them in the law that, in due time, Israel should have a king (Deut. xvii. 14, 15). Could they but have waited ten or twelve years longer they would have had David, a king of God's giving in mercy, and all the calamities that attended the setting up of Saul would have been prevented.

VI. The dismissing of them with an intimation that very shortly they should have what they asked. 1. Samuel rehearsed all their words in the ears of the Lord, v. 21. It bespeaks a holy familiarity, to which God graciously admits his people: they speak in the ears of the Lord, as one friend whispers with another. 2. God gave direction that they should have a king, since they were so inordinately set upon it (v. 22): "Make them a king, and let them make their best of him." So he gave them up to their own hearts' lusts. Samuel sent them home for the present, every man to his city; for the designation of the person must be left to God; they had now no more to do.

CHAP. IX

Most governments began in the ambition of the prince to rule, but Israel's in the ambition of the people to be ruled. God having, in the law, undertaken to choose their king (Deut. xvii. 15), they all sit still, till they hear from heaven, and that they do in this chapter, which begins the story of Saul, their first king, and, by strange steps of Providence, brings him to Samuel to be anointed privately, and so to be prepared for an election by lot, and a public commendation to the people, which follows in the next chapter. Here is, I. A short account of Saul's parentage and person, ver. 1, 2. II. A large and particular account of the bringing of him to Samuel, to whom he had been before altogether a stranger. 1. God, by revelation, had told Samuel to expect him, ver. 15, 16. 2. God, by providence, led him to Samuel. (1) Being sent to seek his father's asses, he was at a loss, ver. 3–5. (2) By the advice of his servant, he determined to consult Samuel, ver. 6–10. (3) By the direction of the young maidens, he found him out, ver. 11–14. (4) Samuel, being informed of God concerning him (ver. 17), treated him with respect, ver. 27.

We are here told, 1. What a good family Saul was of, v. 1. He was of the tribe of Benjamin; so was the New Testament Saul, who also was called Paul, and he mentions it as his honour, for Benjamin was a favourite, Rom. xi. 1; Phil. iii. 5. That tribe, though fewest in number, was first in dignity. His father was Kish, a mighty man of power, or, as the margin reads it, in substance; in spirit bold, in body strong, in estate wealthy. 2. What a good figure Saul made, v. 2. No mention is here made of his wisdom or virtue, his learning or piety, or any of the accomplishments of his mind, but that he was a tall, proper, handsome man, that had a good face, a good shape, and a good presence, graceful and well proportioned: Among all the children of Israel there was not a goodlier person than he. He was taller by the head and shoulders than any of the people. When God chose a king after his own heart he pitched upon one that was not at all remarkable for the height of his stature, nor any thing in his countenance but the innocence and sweetness that appeared there, ch. xvi. 7, 12. But when he chose a king after the people's heart, who aimed at nothing so much as stateliness and grandeur, he pitched upon this huge tall man, who, if he had no other good qualities, yet would look great.

I. A great man rising from small beginnings. It does not appear that Saul had any preferment at all, or was in any post of honour or trust, till he was chosen king of Israel.

II. A great event arising from small occurrences. How low does the history begin! Having to trace Saul to the crown, we find him first employed as meanly as any we meet with called out to preferment.

1. Saul's father sends him with one of his servants to seek some asses that he had lost. Saul and his servants travelled far (probably on foot) in quest of the asses, but in vain: they found them not. He missed what he sought, but he met with the kingdom, of which he never dreamed.

2. When he could not find them, he determined to return to his father (v. 5), in consideration of his father's tender concern for him.

3. His servant proposed that, since they were now at Ramah, they should call on Samuel, and take his advice in this important affair. They were close by the city where Samuel lived, and that put it into their heads to consult him (v. 6). He is a man of God, and an honourable man. This was the honour of Samuel, as a man of God, that all he saith comes surely to pass. They agreed to consult him concerning the way that they should go; peradventure he can show us. Most people would rather be told their fortune than told their duty, how to be rich than how to be saved. If it were the business of the men of God to direct for the recovery of lost asses, they would be consulted much more than they are now that it is their business to direct for the recovery of lost souls. Saul was thoughtful what present they should bring to the man of God. They could not present him with loaves and cakes (1 Kings xiv. 3), for their bread was spent; but the servant bethought himself that he had in his pocket the fourth part of a shekel. "That will do," says Saul; "let us go," v. 10. He came to him as a fortune-teller, rather than as a prophet, and therefore thought the fourth part of a shekel was enough to give him. Most people love a cheap religion, and like it best when they can devolve the expense of it on others. The historian here takes notice of the name then given to the prophets: they called them Seers, or seeing men (v. 9), not but that the name prophet was then used, and applied to such persons, but that of seers was more in use. Those that are prophets must first be seers; those who undertake to speak to others of the things of God must have an insight into those things themselves.

I. Saul, by an ordinary enquiry, is directed to Samuel, v. 11–14. Gibeah of Saul was not twenty miles from Ramah where Samuel dwelt, and was near to Mizpeh where he often judged Israel.

1. The maid-servants of Ramah, whom they met with at the places of drawing water, could give him and his servant intelligence concerning Samuel. (1) That there was a sacrifice that day in the high place. Samuel had built an altar at Ramah (ch. vii. 17), and here we have him making use of that altar. (2) That Samuel came that day to the city. (3) That this was just the time of their meeting to feast before the Lord upon the sacrifice. (4) That the people would not eat till Samuel came, because he must bless the sacrifice. [1] As a common meal. Or, [2] As a religious assembly. When the sacrifice was offered it was requisite that it should in a particular manner be blessed, as is the Christian eucharist.

2. Saul and his servant followed the directions given them, and very opportunely met Samuel going to the high place, the synagogue of the city, v. 14.

II. Samuel, by an extraordinary revelation, is informed concerning Saul. He was a seer, and therefore must see this in a way peculiar to himself.

1. God had told him, the day before, that he would, at this time, send him the man that should serve the people of Israel for such a king as they wished to have. He told him in his ear, that is, privately, by a secret whisper to his mind, or perhaps by a still small voice. The Hebrew phrase is, He uncovered the ear of Samuel. When God will manifest himself to a soul, he uncovers the ear, says, Ephphatha, Be opened; he takes the veil from off the heart, 2 Cor. iii. 16. Though God had, in displeasure, granted their request for a king, yet here he speaks tenderly of Israel. (1) He calls them again and again his people; though a peevish and provoking people, yet mine still. (2) He sends them a man to be captain over them. (3) He does it with a gracious respect to them and to their cry: I have looked upon my people, and their cry has come unto me.

2. When Saul came up towards him in the street God again whispered Samuel in the ear (v. 17): Behold the man whom I spoke to thee of; That he might be fully satisfied, God told him expressly, That is the man that shall restrain (for magistrates are heirs of restraint) my people Israel.

Verses 18–27

Providence having at length brought Samuel and Saul together, we have here an account of what passed between them in the gate, at the feast, and in private.

I. In the gate of the city; passing through that, Saul found him (v. 18), and, asked him the way to Samuel's house. Samuel answered him, "I am the seer, the person you enquire for," v. 19. Samuel knew him before he knew Samuel. 1. Samuel obliges him to stay with him till the next day. Saul had nothing in his mind but to find his asses, but Samuel would take him off from that care, and dispose him to the exercises of piety; and therefore bids him go to the high place. 2. He satisfies him about his asses (v. 20): Set not thy mind on them, be not in further care about them; they are found. By this Saul might perceive that he was a prophet. 3. He surprises him with an intimation of preferment before him: "On whom is all the desire of Israel? Is it not a king that they are set upon, and there is never a man in Israel that will suit them as thou wilt." 4. To this strange intimation Saul returns a very modest answer, v. 21. Samuel, he thought, did but banter him, because he was a tall man, but a very unlikely man to be a king; I am a Benjamite, my family the least, probably a younger house, not in any place of honour, or trust, no, not in their own tribe.

II. At the public feast; thither Samuel took him and his servant. Samuel treats him not as a common person, but a person of quality and distinction, to prepare both him and the people for what was to follow. Two marks of honour he put upon him:— 1. He set him in the best place. 2. He presented him with the best dish. And what should this precious dish be for the king-elect? It was a plain shoulder of mutton (v. 23, 24). The right shoulder of the peace-offerings was to be given to the priests, who were God's receivers (Lev. vii. 32); the next in honour to that was the left shoulder, which probably was always allotted to those that sat at the upper end of the table, and was wont to be Samuel's mess at other times; so that his giving it to Saul now was an implicit resignation of his place to him.

III. What passed between them in private. Both that evening and early the next morning Samuel communed with Saul upon the flat roof of the house, v. 25, 26. We may suppose Samuel now told him the whole story of the people's desire of a king, the grounds of their desire, and God's grant of it. Early in the morning he sent him towards home, brought him part of the way, bade him send his servant before, that they might be private (v. 27), and there, as we find in the beginning of the next chapter, he anointed him, and therein showed him the word of the Lord.

CHAP. X

I. The anointing of Saul then and there, ver. 1. The signs Samuel gave him, ver. 2–6. And instructions, ver. 7–8. II. The accomplishment of those signs to the satisfaction of Saul, ver. 9–13. III. His return to his father's house, ver. 14–16. IV. His public election by lot, and solemn inauguration, ver. 17–25. V. His return to his own city, ver. 26, 27.

Samuel is here executing the office of a prophet, giving Saul full assurance from God that he should be king.

I. He anointed him and kissed him, v. 1. This was not done in a solemn assembly, but it was done by divine appointment, which made up the want of all external solemnities. 1. Samuel, by anointing Saul, assured him that it was God's act to make him king: Is it not because the Lord hath anointed thee? 2. By kissing him, he assured him of his own approbation of the choice, though it abridged his power and eclipsed his glory and the glory of his family. It was likewise a kiss of homage and allegiance; hereby he not only owns him to be king, but his king, and in this sense we are commanded to kiss the Son, Ps. ii. 12. He reminds him, (1) Of the nature of the government to which he is called. He was anointed to be a captain, a commander in war, which bespeaks care, and toil, and danger. (2) Of the origin of it: The Lord hath anointed thee. By him he ruled, and therefore must rule for him, in dependence on him, and with an eye to his glory. (3) Of the end of it. It is over his inheritance, to take care of that, protect it, and order all the affairs of it for the best, as a steward whom a great man sets over his estate.

II. For his further satisfaction he gives him some signs, which should come to pass immediately this very day. 1. He should presently meet with some that would bring him intelligence from home of the care his father's house was in concerning him, v. 2. These he would meet hard by Rachel's sepulchre. Here two men would meet him, and would tell him the asses were found. 2. He should next meet with others going to Bethel, where, it should seem, there was a high place for religious worship, and these men were bringing their sacrifices thither, v. 3, 4. It is supposed that those kids and loaves, and the bottle of wine which the three men had with them, were designed for sacrifice, with the meat-offerings and drink-offerings that were to attend the sacrifice; yet Samuel tells Saul that they will give him two of their loaves, and he must take them. It would be construed a fit present for a prince; and, as such, Saul must receive it the first present that was brought to him, by such as knew not what they did, nor why they did it, but God put it into their hearts, which made it the more fit to be a sign to him. 3. The most remarkable sign of all would be his joining with a company of prophets that he should meet with, under the influence of a spirit of prophecy, which should at that time come upon him. What God works in us by his Spirit serves much more for the confirming of faith than any thing wrought for us by his providence. He here (v. 5, 6) tells him, (1) Where this would happen: At the hill of God, where there was a garrison of the Philistines. After they were subdued in the beginning of his time they got ground again, so far as to force this garrison into that place, and thence God raised up the man that should chastise them. There was a place that was called the hill of God, because of one of the schools of the prophets built upon it; and such respect did even Philistines themselves pay to religion that a garrison of their soldiers suffered a school of God's prophets to live peaceably by them, and did not disturb the public exercises of their devotion. (2) Upon what occasion; he should meet a company of prophets with music before them, prophesying, and with them he should join himself. These prophets employed themselves in the study of the law, in instructing their neighbours, and in the acts of piety, especially in praising God. What a pity was it that Israel should be weary of the government of such a man, who had, as a man of God, settled the schools of the prophets! These prophets had been at the high place, probably offering sacrifice, and now they came back singing psalms. Saul should find himself strongly moved to join with them, and should be turned thereby into another man from what he had been while he lived in a private capacity.

III. He directs him to proceed in the administration of his government as Providence should lead him, and as Samuel should advise him. 1. He must follow Providence in ordinary cases (v. 7): "Do as occasion shall serve thee. Take such measures as thy own prudence shall direct thee." But, 2. In an extraordinary strait that would hereafter befall him at Gilgal, and would be the most critical juncture of all, when he would have special need of divine aids, he must wait for Samuel to come to him, and must tarry seven days in expectation of him, v. 8. How his failing in this matter proved his fall we find afterwards, ch. xiii. 11.

Saul has now taken his leave of Samuel, much amazed.

I. What occurred by the way, v. 9. Those signs which Samuel had given him came to pass very punctually; but that which gave him the greatest satisfaction of all was this, he found immediately that God had given him another heart. A new fire was kindled in his breast. Seeking the asses is quite out of his mind, and he thinks of nothing but fighting the Philistines, redressing the grievances of Israel, making laws, administering justice, and providing for the public safety; these are the things that now fill his head. He has no longer the heart of a husbandman, which is low, and mean, and narrow, and concerned only about his corn and cattle; but the heart of a statesman, a general, a prince. Whom God calls to any service he will make fit for it.

jealousy for the honour of Saul, and their resentment of the indignities done him. The sons of Belial that would not have him to reign over them should be brought forth and slain, v. 12. They had not courage thus to move for the prosecution of those that opposed him when he himself looked mean, but, now that his victory made him look great, nothing would serve but they must be put to death.

II. Saul took this occasion to give further proofs of his clemency, for, without waiting for Samuel's answer, he himself quashed the motion (v. 13): There shall not a man be put to death this day. 1. Because it was a day of joy and triumph: To-day the Lord has wrought salvation in Israel; and, since God has been so good to us all, let us not be harsh to one another. 2. Because he hoped they were by this day's work brought to a better temper, were now convinced that this man, under God, could save them, now honoured him whom before they had despised; and, if they are but reclaimed, he is secured from receiving any disturbance by them, and therefore his point is gained. If an enemy be made a friend, that will be more to our advantage than to have him slain.

III. Samuel took this occasion to call the people together before the Lord in Gilgal, v. 14, 15. 1. That they might publicly give God thanks for their late victory. 2. That they might confirm Saul in the government, more solemnly than had been yet done, that he might not retire again to his obscurity.

CHAP. XII

Samuel's speech when he resigned the government into the hands of Saul, in which, I. He clears himself from all suspicion or imputation of mismanagement, while the administration was in his hands, ver. 1–5. II. He reminds them of the great things God had done for them and for their fathers, ver. 6–13. III. He sets before them good and evil, the blessing and the curse, ver. 14, 15. IV. He awakens them to regard what he said to them, by calling to God for thunder, ver. 16–19. V. He encourages them with hopes that all should be well, ver. 20–25. This is his farewell sermon to that august assembly and Saul's coronation sermon.

I. Samuel gives them a short account of the late revolution, and of the present posture of their government, by way of preface to what he had further to say to them, v. 1, 2 1. For his own part, he had spent his days in their service: "I have walked before you, as a guide to direct you, as a shepherd that leads his flock (Ps. lxxx. 1), from my childhood unto this day." "And now my best days are done: I am old and grey-headed"; therefore they were the more unkind to cast him off, yet therefore he was the more willing to resign. 2. As for his sons, "Behold" (says he), "they are with you", you may, if you please, call them to an account for any thing they have done amiss. 3. As for their new king, Samuel had gratified them in setting him over them (v. 1). Now that you have made yourselves like the nations in your civil government, and have cast off the divine administration in that, take heed lest you make yourselves like the nations in religion and cast off the worship of God.

II. He solemnly appeals to them concerning his own integrity in the administration of the government (v. 3): Witness against me, whose ox have I taken?

1. His design in this appeal. By this he intended, (1) To convince them of the injury they had done him in setting him aside. (2) To preserve his own reputation. Those that heard of Samuel's being rejected as he was, would be ready to suspect that certainly he had done some evil thing, or he would never have been so ill treated. (3) As he designed hereby to leave a good name behind him, so he designed to leave his successor a good example before him; let him write after his copy, and he will write fair.

2. In the appeal itself observe,

(1) What it is that Samuel here acquits himself from. [1] He had never taken that which was not his own, ox or ass, had never distrained their cattle for tribute, fines, or forfeitures, nor used their service without paying for it. [2] He had never defrauded those with whom he dealt, nor oppressed those that were under his power. [3] He had never taken bribes to pervert justice.

(2) How he calls upon those that had slighted him to bear witness concerning his conduct: "Here I am; witness against me.

III. Upon this appeal he is honourably acquitted. All he desired was that they should do him justice, and that they did (v. 4).

IV. This honourable testimony borne to Samuel's integrity is left upon record to his honour (v. 5): "The Lord is witness, who searcheth the heart, and his anointed is witness, who trieth overt acts"; and the people agree to it: "He is witness."

Samuel, having sufficiently secured his own reputation, instead of upbraiding the people upon it with their unkindness to him, sets himself to instruct them in the way of their duty.

I. He reminds them of the great goodness of God to them and to their fathers, gives them an abstract of the history of their nation, that, by the consideration of the great things God had done for them, they might be for ever engaged to love him and serve him. He not only puts them in mind of what God had done for them in their days, but of what he had done of old, in the days of their fathers, because the present age had the benefit of God's former favours. 1. He reminds them of their deliverance out of Egypt. 2. He reminds them of the miseries and calamities which their fathers brought themselves into by forgetting God and serving other gods, v. 9. 3. He reminds them of their fathers' repentance and humiliation before God for their idolatries: They said, We have sinned, v. 10. 4. He reminds them of the glorious deliverances God had wrought for them, the victories he had blessed them with, and their happy settlements, many a time, after days of trouble and distress, v. 11. He specifies some of their judges, Gideon and Jephthah, great conquerors in their time. 5. At last he puts them in mind of God's late favour to the present generation, in gratifying them with a king, when they would prescribe to God by such a one to save them out of the hand of Nahash king of Ammon, v. 12, 13. Now it appears that this was the immediate occasion of their desiring a king: Nahash threatened them; they desired Samuel to nominate a general; he told them that God was commander-in-chief in all their wars and they needed no other, that what was wanting in them should be made up by his power: The Lord is your king. But they insisted on it, Nay, but a king shall reign over us. "And now," said he, "you have a king, a king of your own asking—let that be spoken to your shame; but a king of God's making—let that be spoken to his honour and the glory of his grace."

II. He shows them that they are now upon their good behaviour, they and their king. Let them not think that they had now cut themselves off from all dependence upon God.

1. Their obedience to God would certainly be their happiness, v. 14. If they would not revolt from God to idols, but would persevere in their allegiance to him, then they and their king should certainly be happy. (1) "You shall continue in the way of your duty to God, which will be your honour and comfort." (2) "You shall continue under the divine guidance and protection": You shall be after the Lord, so it is in the original, that is, "he will go before you to lead and prosper you, and make your way plain. The Lord is with you while you are with him."

2. Their disobedience would as certainly be their ruin (v. 15).

Two things Samuel here aims at:—

I. To convince the people of their sin in desiring a king. They were now rejoicing before God in and with their king (ch. xi. 15), and offering to God the sacrifices of praise, which they hoped God would accept; and this perhaps made them think that there was no harm in their asking a king.

1. The expression of God's displeasure against them for asking a king. At Samuel's word, God sent prodigious thunder and rain upon them, at a season of the year when, in that country, the like was never seen or known before, v. 16–18. Thunder and rain have natural causes and sometimes terrible effects. But Samuel made it to appear that this was designed by the almighty power of God on purpose to convince them that they had done very wickedly in asking a king. He spoke to them of it (v. 16, 17): Stand and see this great thing. If what he said in a still small voice did not reach their hearts, nor his doctrine which dropped as the dew, they shall hear God speaking to them in dreadful claps of thunder and the great rain of his strength. Samuel, that son of prayer, was still famous for success in prayer. He intimated to them that how serene and prosperous soever their condition seemed to be now that they had a king, like the weather in wheat-harvest, yet, if God pleased, he could soon change the face of their heavens.

2. The impressions which this made upon the people. It startled them very much, as well it might. (1) They greatly feared the Lord and Samuel. (2) They owned their sin and folly in desiring a king: We have added to all our sins this evil, v. 19. (3) They earnestly begged Samuel's prayers (v. 19): Pray for thy servants, that we die not. They were apprehensive of their danger from the wrath of God, and could not expect that he should hear their prayers for themselves, and therefore they entreat Samuel to pray for them. Now they see their need of him whom awhile ago they slighted.

II. To confirm the people in their religion, and engage them for ever to cleave unto the Lord. The design of his discourse is much the same with Joshua's, ch. xxiii. and xxiv.

1. He would not that the terrors of the Lord should frighten them from him, for they were intended to frighten them to him (v. 20): "Fear not; though you have done all this wickedness, and though God is angry with you for it, yet do not therefore abandon his service, nor turn from following him." Fear not, that is, "despair not, fear not with amazement, the weather will clear up after the storm. Fear not; for, though God will frown upon his people, yet he will not forsake them (v. 22) for his great name's sake; do not you forsake him then."

2. He cautions them against idolatry: "Turn not aside from God and the worship of him" (v. 20 and again v. 21); "for if you turn aside from God, whatever you turn aside to, you will find it is a vain thing, that can never answer your expectations, but will certainly deceive you if you trust to it; it is a broken reed, a broken cistern."

3. He comforts them with an assurance that he would continue his care and concern for them, v. 23. They asked him only to pray for them, but he promised to do more for them, not only to pray for them, but to teach them; though they were not willing to be under his government as a judge, he would not therefore deny them his instructions as a prophet.

4. He concludes with an earnest exhortation to practical religion and serious godliness, v. 24, 25.

CHAP. XIII

While Samuel was joined in commission with Saul things went well, ch. xi. 7. But, now that Saul began to reign alone, all went to decay, and Samuel's words began to be fulfilled: "You shall be consumed, both you and your king". I. Saul appears here a very silly prince. 1. Infatuated in his counsels, ver. 1–3. 2. Invaded by his neighbours, ver. 4, 5. 3. Deserted by his soldiers, ver. 6, 7. 4. Disordered in his own spirit, and sacrificing in confusion, ver. 8–10. 5. Chidden by Samuel, ver. 11–13. 6. Rejected of God from being king, ver. 14. II. The people appear here a very miserable people. 1. Disheartened and dispersed, ver. 6, 7. 2. Diminished, ver. 15, 16. 3. Plundered, ver. 17, 18. 4. Disarmed, ver. 19–23.

The people of Israel offended God else he would not have left them, as here it appears he did; for,

I. Saul was very weak and impolitic, and did not order his affairs with discretion. Saul reigned one year, and nothing happened that was considerable, it was a year of no action; but in his second year he did as follows:—1. He chose a band of 3,000 men, of whom he himself commanded 2,000, and his son Jonathan 1,000, v. 2. The rest of the people he dismissed to their tents. If he intended these only for the guard of his person and his honorary attendants, it was impolitic to have so many, if for a standing army, in apprehension of danger from the Philistines, it was no less impolitic to have so few; and perhaps the confidence he put in this select number, and his disbanding the rest of that brave army with which he had lately beaten the Ammonites (ch. xi. 8–11), was looked upon as an affront to the kingdom, excited general disgust, and was the reason he had so few at his call when he had occasion for them. 2. He ordered his son Jonathan to surprise and destroy the garrison of the Philistines that lay near him in Geba, v. 3. 3. When he had thus exasperated the Philistines, then he began to raise forces, which, if he had acted wisely, he would have done before. As many as thought fit came to Saul to Gilgal, v. 4. But now the generality, we may suppose, drew back (either in dislike of Saul's politics or in dread of the Philistines' power).

II. Never did the Philistines appear in such a formidable body as they did now, upon this provocation which Saul gave them. If Saul had asked counsel of God before he had given the Philistines this provocation, he and his people might the better have borne this threatening trouble which they had now brought on themselves by their own folly.

III. Never were the people of Israel so faint-hearted, so sneaking, so very cowardly, as they were now. Some considerable numbers, it may be, came to Saul to Gilgal; but, hearing of the Philistines' numbers and preparations, their spirits sunk within them, some think because they did not find Samuel there with Saul. Now that they saw the Philistines making war upon them, and Samuel not coming in to help them, they knew not what to do; men's hearts failed them for fear. And, 1. Some absconded. Thousands of degenerate Israelites tremble at the approach of a great crowd of Philistines. Guilt makes men cowards. 2. Others fled (v. 7): They went over Jordan to the land of Gilead, as far as they could from the danger, and to a place where they had lately been victorious over the Ammonites. 3. Those that stayed with Saul followed him trembling, expecting no other than to be cut off, and having their hands and hearts very much weakened by the desertion of so many of their troops.

I. Saul's offence in offering sacrifice before Samuel came. Samuel, when he anointed him, had ordered him to tarry for him seven days in Gilgal, ch. x. 8. Perhaps that order was lately repeated with reference to this particular occasion. This order Saul broke. 1. He presumed to offer sacrifice without Samuel. 2. He determined to engage the Philistines without Samuel's directions. So self-sufficient Saul was that he thought it not worth while to stay for a prophet of the Lord either to pray for him or to advise him. (1) He did not send any messenger to Samuel, to know his mind. (2) When Samuel came he rather seemed to boast of what he had done than to repent of it; for he went forth to salute him, as his brother-sacrificer. He went out to bless him, so the word is, as if he now thought himself a complete priest. (3) He charged Samuel with breach of promise: Thou camest not within the days appointed (v. 11). (4) When he was charged with disobedience he justified himself in what he had done, and gave no sign at all of repentance for it. See what excuses he made, v. 11, 12. He would have this act of disobedience pass, [1] For an instance of his prudence. [2] For an instance of his piety. He would be thought very devout, and in great care not to engage the Philistines till he had by prayer and sacrifice engaged God on his side: "The Philistines," said he, "will come down upon me, before I have made my supplication to the Lord, and then I am undone." And yet, lastly, He owns it went against his conscience to do it: I forced myself and offered a burnt-offering.

II. The sentence passed upon Saul for this offence. 1. He shows him the aggravations of his crime, and charges him with being an enemy to himself, and his interest—Thou hast done foolishly, and a rebel to God and his government—"Thou hast not kept the commandment of the Lord thy God, that commandment wherewith he intended to try thy obedience." Sin is folly, and sinners are the greatest fools. 2. He reads his doom (v. 14): He shows that there is no sin little, because no little god to sin against; but that every sin is a forfeiture of the heavenly kingdom, for which we stood fair. Saul lost his kingdom for want of two or three hours' patience.

1. Samuel departs in displeasure. Saul has set up for himself, and now he is left to himself: Samuel gat him from Gilgal (v. 15). Yet in going up to Gibeah of Benjamin, which was Saul's city, he intimated that he had not quite abandoned him. 2. Saul goes after him to Gibeah, and there musters his army, and finds his whole number to be but 600 men, v. 15, 16. 3. The Philistines ravage the country. The body of their army lay in an advantageous pass at Michmash, but thence they sent out three separate parties or detachments that took several ways, to plunder the country. By these the land of Israel was both terrified and impoverished, and the Philistines were animated and enriched. 4. The Israelites that take the field with Saul are unarmed, having only slings and clubs, not a sword or spear among them all, except what Saul and Jonathan themselves have, v. 19, 22. (1) How politic the Philistines were! They put down all the smiths' shops, transplanted the smiths into their own country, and forbade any Israelite, under severe penalties, to exercise the trade or mystery of working in brass or iron. They must go to some or other of their garrisons, to have all their iron-work done, and no more might an Israelite do than use a file (v. 20, 21). (2) How impolitic Saul was, that did not, in the beginning of his reign, set himself to redress this grievance. (3) How slothful and mean-spirited the Israelites were, that suffered the Philistines thus to impose upon them and had no thought nor spirit to help themselves. If they had not been dispirited, they could not have been disarmed, but it was sin that made them naked to their shame.

CHAP. XIV

I Jonathan (ver. 1–3), with his armour-bearer only, made a brave attack upon the Philistines, encouraging himself in the Lord his God, ver. 4–7. He challenged them (ver. 8–12), and, upon their acceptance of the challenge, charged them with such fury, or rather such faith, that he put them to flight, and set them one against another (ver. 13–15), which gave opportunity to Saul and his forces, with other Israelites, to follow the blow, and gain a victory, ver. 16–23. II. The host of Israel troubled and perplexed by the rashness and folly of Saul, who adjured the people to eat no food till night, which 1. Brought Jonathan to a præmunire, ver. 24–30. 2. Was a temptation to the people, when the time of their fast had expired, to eat with the blood, ver. 31–35. Jonathan's error, through ignorance, had like to have been his death, but the people rescued him, ver. 36–46. III. In the close we have a general account of Saul's exploits (ver. 47, 48) and of his family, ver. 49–52.

I. Of the goodness of God in restraining the Philistines, who had a vast army of valiant men in the field, from falling upon that little handful of timorous trembling people that Saul had with him.

II. Of the weakness of Saul, who seems here to have been quite at a loss, and unable to help himself. 1. He pitched his tent under a tree, and had but 600 men with him, v. 2. He durst not stay in Gibeah, but got into some obscure place, in the uttermost part of the city, under a pomegranate-tree, under Rimmon. 2. Now he sent for a priest, and the ark, a priest from Shiloh, and the ark from Kirjath-jearim, v. 3, 18. Samuel, the Lord's prophet, had forsaken him, but he thinks he can make up that loss by commanding Ahiah, the Lord's priest, to attend him. He will also have the ark brought in hopes that this would make up the deficiency of his forces; one would have supposed that they would never bring the ark into the camp again, since, the last time, it not only did not save them, but did itself fall into the Philistines' hands. But it is common for those that have lost the substance of religion to be most fond of the shadows of it, as here is a deserted prince courting a deserted priest.

III. Of the bravery and piety of Jonathan, the son of Saul, who was much fitter than the father to wear the crown. "A sweet imp (says Bishop Hall) out of a crab-stock."

1. He resolved to go incognito—unknown to any one, into the camp of the Philistines. The way of access to the enemies' camp is described (v. 4, 5) as being peculiarly difficult, and their natural entrenchments impregnable, yet this does not discourage him; the strength and sharpness of the rocks do but harden and whet his resolution. Great and generous souls are animated by opposition and take a pleasure in breaking through it.

2. He encouraged his armour-bearer, a young man that attended him, to go along with him in this daring enterprise, (v. 6): "Come, and let us put our lives in our hands, and go over to the enemies' garrison, and try what we can do to put them into confusion." (1) They are uncircumcised. Fear not, we shall do well enough with them, for they are not under the protection of God's covenant as we are. If such as are enemies to us are also strangers to God, we need not fear them. (2) "God is able to make us two victorious over their unnumbered regiments. There is no restraint in the Lord to save by many or by few." This is a truth easily granted in general, and yet it is not so easy to apply it to a particular case; when we are but few to believe that God can not only save us, but save by us, this is an instance of faith, which, wherever it is, shall obtain a good report. (3) Who knows but he that can use us for his glory will do it? It may be the Lord will work for us. An active faith will venture far in God's cause upon an it may be. Jonathan's armour-bearer, or esquire, as if he had learned to carry, not his arms only, but his heart, promised to stand by him and to follow him whithersoever he went, v. 7.

3. How bold soever his resolution was, he resolved to follow Providence in the execution of it. "Come" (says he to his confidant), "we will discover ourselves to the enemy, as those that are not afraid to look them in the face (v. 8), and then, if they be so cautious as to bid us stand, we will advance no further, taking it for an intimation of Providence that God would have us act defensively (v. 9); but if they challenge us, and the first sentinel we meet bid us march on, we will push forward, and make as brisk an onset, assuredly gathering thence that it is the will of God we should act offensively, and then not doubting but he will stand by us," v. 10. And upon this issue he puts it, firmly believing, (1) That God has the governing of the hearts and tongues of all men. Jonathan knew God could discover his mind to him as surely by the mouth of a Philistine as by the mouth of a priest. (2) That God will, some way or other, direct the steps of those that acknowledge him in all their ways.

4. Providence gave him the sign he expected, and he answered the signal. He and his armour-bearer did not surprise the Philistines when they were asleep, but discovered themselves to them by day light, v. 11. The guards of the Philistines, (1) Disdained them, Behold, the Hebrews come forth out of their holes. (2) They defied them (v. 12): Come, and we will show you a thing. They bantered them. This greatly emboldened Jonathan. With it he encouraged his servant; he had spoken with uncertainty (v. 6): It may be the Lord will work for us; but now he speaks with assurance (v. 12). The Lord has delivered them into the hand of Israel. His faith being thus strengthened, no difficulty can stand before him; he climbs up the rock upon all fours (v. 13), though he has nothing to cover him, nor any but his own servant to second him, nor any human probability of any thing but death before him.

5. The wonderful success of this daring enterprise. The Philistines, instead of falling upon Jonathan, to slay him, or take him prisoner, fell before him (v. 13) unaccountably, upon the first blow he gave. They fall, that is, (1) They were many of them slain by him and his armour-bearer, v. 14. It was God's right hand and his arm that got him this victory. (2) The rest were put to flight, and fell foul upon one another (v. 15): There was trembling in the host. It is called a trembling of God. He that made the heart knows how to make it tremble. To complete the confusion, even the earth quaked, and made them ready to fear that it would sink under them.

I. The Philistines were, by the power of God, set against one another. They melted away like snow before the sun, and went on beating down one another (v. 16), for (v. 20) every man's sword was against his fellow. Now, God showed them the folly of their confidence, by making their own swords and spears the instruments of their destruction, and more fatal in their own hands than if they had been in the hands of Israel.

II. The Israelites were hereby animated against them.

1. Notice was soon taken of it by the watchmen of Saul, those that stood sentinel at Gibeah, v. 16.

2. Saul began to enquire of God, but soon desisted. He called for the ark (v. 18), desiring to know whether it would be safe for him to attack the Philistines, upon the disorder they perceived them to be in. Many will consult God about their safety that would never consult him about their duty. But, perceiving by his scouts that the noise in the enemy's camp increased, he commanded the priest that officiated to break off abruptly: "Withdraw thy hand (v. 19), consult no more, wait no longer for an answer. It is rather a prohibition to his enquiring of the Lord, either, (1) Because now he thought he did not need an answer, the case was plain enough. Or, (2) Because he was in such haste to fight a falling enemy that he would not stay to make an end of his devotions.

3. He, and all the little force he had, made a vigorous attack upon the enemy; and all the people were cried together (so the word is, v. 20), for want of the silver trumpets wherewith God appointed them to sound an alarm in the day of battle, Num. x. 9. They summoned them by shouting, and their number was not so great but that they might soon be got together.

4. Every Hebrew, even those from whom one would least have expected it, now turned his hand against the Philistines. (1) Those that had deserted and gone over to the enemy, and were among them, now fought against them, v. 21. Such as had been taken prisoners by them, were as goads in their sides. (2) Those that had fled their colours, and hid themselves in the mountains, returned to their posts, and joined in with the pursuers (v. 22). It was not much to their praise to appear now, but it would have been more their reproach if they had not appeared. Thus all hands were at work against the Philistines, yet it is said (v. 23), it was the Lord that saved Israel that day. He did it by them, for without him they could do nothing.

An account of the distress of the children of Israel, even in the day of their triumphs.

I. Saul forbade the people, under the penalty of a curse, to taste any food that day, v. 24. He did it with a good intention, lest the people, who perhaps had been kept for some time at short allowance, when they found plenty of victuals in the deserted camp of the Philistines, should fall greedily upon that, and so lose time in pursuing the enemy. And yet his making this severe order was unwise; for, if it gained time, it lost strength, for the pursuit. It was impious to enforce the prohibition with a curse and an oath. Had he no penalty less than an anathema wherewith to support his military discipline?

II. The people observed his order. 1. The soldiers were tantalized; for, in their pursuit of the enemy, it happened that they went through a wood so full of wild honey that it dropped from the trees upon the ground, yet, for fear of the curse, they did not so much as taste the honey, v. 25, 26. 2. Jonathan fell under the curse through ignorance. He heard not of the charge his father had given; for, having bravely forced the lines, he was then following the chase. He, not knowing any peril in it, took up a piece of honey-comb upon the end of his staff, and sucked it (v. 27), and was sensibly refreshed by it. He thought no harm, nor feared any, till one of the people acquainted him with the order, and then he found himself in a snare. Many a good son has been distressed by the rashness of an inconsiderate father. Jonathan, for his part, lost the crown he was heir to by his father's folly. 3. The soldiers were faint, and grew feeble, in the pursuit of the Philistines. Jonathan foresaw this would be the effect of it; their spirits would flag, and their strength would fail, for want of sustenance. 4. The worst effect of all was that at evening, when the restraint was taken off and they returned to their food again, they were so greedy and eager upon it that they ate the flesh with the blood, expressly contrary to the law of God, v. 32. Two hungry meals, we say, make the third a glutton; it was so here. Saul, being informed of it, reproved them for the sin (v. 33). To put a stop to this irregularity, Saul ordered them to set up a great stone before him, and let all that had cattle to kill, for their present use, bring them thither, and kill them under his eye upon that stone (v. 33), and the people did so (v. 34), so easily were they restrained and reformed when their prince took care to do his part.

III. On this occasion Saul built an altar (v. 35), that he might offer sacrifice, either by way of acknowledgment of the victory or by way of atonement for the sin. The same was the first altar that he built. Saul was turning aside from God, and yet now he began to build altars, being most zealous (as many are) for the form of godliness when he was denying the power of it. See Hos. viii. 14, Israel has forgotten his Maker, and buildeth temples.

I. Saul's boasting against the Philistines. He proposed to pursue them all night, and not leave a man of them, v. 36. Here he showed much zeal, but little discretion; for his army, thus fatigued, could as ill spare a night's sleep as a meal's meat. Only the priest thought it convenient to go on with the devotions that were broken off abruptly (v. 19), and to consult the oracle: Let us draw near hither unto God. Princes and great men have need of such about them as will thus be their remembrancers, wherever they go, to take God along with them. And, when the priest proposed it, Saul could not for shame reject the proposal, but asked counsel of God (v. 37).

II. His falling foul on his son Jonathan: for, while he is prosecuted, the Philistines make their escape.

1. God, by giving an intimation of his displeasure, put Saul upon searching for an accursed thing. Saul swears by his Maker that whoever was the Achan that troubled the camp, by eating the forbidden fruit, should certainly die, though it were Jonathan himself. (v. 39).

2. Jonathan was discovered by lot to be the offender. Saul would have lots cast between himself and Jonathan on the one side, and the people on the other, perhaps because he was as confident of Jonathan's innocency in this matter as of his own, v. 40. Jonathan at length was taken (v. 42), Providence designing hereby to countenance and support a lawful authority, reserving another way to bring off one that had done nothing worthy of death.

3. Jonathan ingenuously confesses the fact, and Saul, with an angry curse, passes sentence upon him. Jonathan denies not the truth, only he thinks it hard that he must die for it, v. 43. He might very fairly have pleaded his ignorance of the law, but he submitted to the necessity with a great and generous mind: "God's and my father's will be done". It is as brave to yield in some cases as it is in other cases to fight. Saul is not mollified by his filial submission nor the hardness of his case; but with another imprecation he gives judgment upon Jonathan (v. 44): "God do so and more also to me if I do not execute the law upon thee, for thou shalt surely die, Jonathan." (1) He passed this sentence too hastily, without consulting the oracle. Jonathan had a very good plea in arrest of the judgment. What he had done was not malum in se—bad in itself; and, as for the prohibition of it, he was ignorant of that, so that he could not be charged with rebellion or disobedience. (2) He did it in fury. Had Jonathan been worthy to die, yet it would have become a judge, much more a father, to pass sentence with tenderness and compassion. Justice is debased when it is administered with wrath and bitterness. (3) He backed it with a curse upon himself if he did not see the sentence executed; and this curse did return upon his own head. Jonathan escaped, but God did so to Saul, and more also; for he was rejected of God and made anathema. Let none upon any occasion dare to use such imprecations as these, lest God say Amen to them, and make their own tongues to fall upon them, Ps. lxiv. 8. Yet we have reason to think that Saul's bowels yearned towards Jonathan, so that he really punished himself, and very justly, when he seemed so severe upon Jonathan. By all these vexatious accidents God did likewise correct him for his presumption in offering sacrifice without Samuel.

4. The people rescued Jonathan out of his father's hands, v. 45. Hitherto they had expressed themselves very observant of Saul. What seemed good to him they acquiesced in, v. 36, 40. But, when Jonathan is in danger, Saul's word is no longer a law to them, but with the utmost zeal they oppose the execution of his sentence: "Shall Jonathan die—that blessing, that darling, of his country? Shall that life be sacrificed to a punctilio of law and honour which was so bravely exposed for the public service, and to which we owe our lives and triumphs? No, we will never stand by and see him thus treated whom God delights to honour." It is good to see Israelites zealous for the protection of those whom God has made instruments of public good. "As the Lord liveth there shall not only not his head, but not a hair of his head fall to the ground"; they did not rescue him by violence, but by reason and resolution; and Josephus says they made their prayer to God that he might be loosed from the curse. They plead for him that he has wrought with God this day; that is, "he has owned God's cause, and God has owned his endeavours, and therefore his life is too precious to be thrown away upon a nicety."

5. The design against the Philistines is quashed by this incident (v. 46): Saul went up from following them, and so an opportunity was lost of completing the victory.

Verses 47–52

A general account of Saul's court and camp. 1. Of his court and family, the names of his sons and daughters (v. 49), and of his wife and his cousin-german that was general of his army, v. 50. There is mention of another wife of Saul's (2 Sam. xxi. 8), Rizpah, a secondary wife, and of the children he had by her. 2. Of his camp and military actions. (1) How he levied his army: When he saw any strong valiant man, that was remarkably fit for service, he took him unto him (v. 52), as Samuel had told them the manner of the king would be (ch. viii. 11). (2) How he employed his army. He guarded his country against the insults of its enemies on every side, and prevented their incursions, v. 47, 48. But the enemies he struggled most with were the Philistines, with whom he had sore war all his days, v. 52.

CHAP. XV

The final rejection of Saul from being king, I. The commission God gave him to destroy the Amalekites, with a command to do it utterly, ver. 1–3. II. Saul's preparation for this expedition, ver. 4–6. III. His success, and partial execution of this commission, ver. 7–9. IV. His examination before Samuel, and sentence passed upon him, notwithstanding the many frivolous pleas he made to excuse himself, ver. 10–31. V. The slaying of Agag. ver. 32, 33. VI. Samuel's final farewell to Saul, ver. 34, 35.

Verses 1–9

I. Samuel, in God's name, solemnly requires Saul to be obedient to the command of God, and plainly intimates that he was now about to put him upon a trial, in one particular instance, whether he would be obedient, or no, v. 1. 1. He reminds him of what God had done for him: "The Lord sent me to anoint thee to be a king." God gave thee thy power, and therefore he expects thou shouldst use thy power for him. Men's preferment, instead of releasing them from their obedience to God, obliges them so much the more to it. 2. He tells him, in general, that, in consideration of this, whatever God commanded him to do he was bound to do it: Now therefore hearken to the voice of the Lord.

II. He appoints him a particular piece of service, in which he must now show his obedience to God more than in any thing he had done yet. He also gives him a reason for the command, that the severity he must use might not seem hard: I remember that which Amalek did to Israel, v. 2. God had an ancient quarrel with the Amalekites, for the injuries they did to his people Israel, Exod. xvii. 8, &c., and the crime is aggravated, Deut. xxv. 18. This is the work that Saul is now appointed to do (v. 3): "Go and smite Amalek. Israel is now strong, now go and make a full riddance of that nation."

III. Saul hereupon musters his forces, and makes a descent upon the country of Amalek. Saul numbered them in Telaim, which signifies lambs. He numbered them like lambs (so the vulgar Latin), numbered them by the paschal lambs (so the Chaldee), allowing ten to a lamb, a way of numbering used by the Jews in the later times of their nation. Saul drew all his forces to the city of Amalek.

IV. He gave friendly advice to the Kenites to separate themselves from the Amalekites among whom they dwelt. The Kenites were of the family and kindred of Jethro, Moses's father-in-law, a people that dwelt in tents, which made it easy for them, upon every occasion, to remove to other lands not appropriated. Many of them, at this time, dwelt among the Amalekites, fortified by nature, for they put their nest in a rock, being hardy people that could live any where, and affected fastnesses. Num. xxiv. 21. Saul must not waste them. 1. He acknowledges the kindness of their ancestors to Israel, when they came out of Egypt. Jethro and his family had been very helpful and serviceable to them in their passage through the wilderness, had been to them instead of eyes, and this is remembered to their posterity many ages after. Thus a good man leaves the divine blessing for an inheritance to his children's children; those that come after us may be reaping the benefit of our good works when we are in our graves. 2. He desires them to remove their tents from among the Amalekites.

V. Saul prevailed against the Amalekites, for it was rather an execution of condemned malefactors than a war with contending enemies. They were idolaters, and were guilty of many other sins, for which they deserved to fall under the wrath of God; yet, when God would reckon with them, he fastened upon the sin of their ancestors in abusing his Israel as the ground of his quarrel.

VI. Yet he did his work by halves, v. 9. 1. He spared Agag, because he was a king like himself, and perhaps in hope to get a great ransom for him. 2. He spared the best of the cattle, and destroyed only the refuse, that was good for little. Many of the people, we may suppose, made their escape, and took their effects with them into other countries, and therefore we read of Amalekites after this.

Saul is here called to account by Samuel concerning the execution of his commission against the Amalekites.

I. What passed between God and Samuel, in secret, upon this occasion, v. 10, 11. 1. God determines Saul's rejection, and acquaints Samuel with it: It repenteth me that I have set up Saul to be king. Repentance in God is not, as it is in us, a change of his mind, but a change of his method or dispensation. He does not alter his will, but wills an alteration. The change was in Saul: He has turned back from following me; this construction God put upon the partiality of his obedience, and the prevalency of his covetousness. And hereby he did himself make God his enemy. 2. Samuel laments and deprecates it. It grieved Samuel that Saul had forfeited God's favour, and that God had resolved to cast him off; and he cried unto the Lord all night. The rejection of sinners is the grief of good people; God delights not in their death, nor should we.

II. What passed between Samuel and Saul in public. Samuel, being sent of God to him with these heavy tidings, went, as Ezekiel, in bitterness of soul, to meet him. But Samuel was informed that Saul had set up a triumphal arch, or some monument of his victory, at Carmel, a city in the mountains of Judah, seeking his own honour more than the honour of God, and also that he had marched in great state to Gilgal, for this seems to be intimated in the manner of expression: He has gone about, and passed on, and gone down, with a great deal of pomp and parade. There Samuel gave him the meeting, and,

1. Saul makes his boast to Samuel of his obedience: "Blessed be thou of the Lord, for thou sentest me upon a good errand, in which I have had great success, and I have performed the commandment of the Lord." It is very likely, if his conscience had not charged him with disobedience, he would not have been so forward to proclaim his obedience; for by this he hoped to prevent Samuel's reproving him. Thus sinners think, by justifying themselves, to escape being judged of the Lord; whereas the only way to do that is by judging ourselves.

2. Samuel convicts him by a plain demonstration of his disobedience. "Hast thou performed the commandment of the Lord? What means then the bleating of the sheep?" v. 14. Samuel appeals to them as witnesses against him. The noise the cattle made would be a witness against him.

3. Saul insists upon his own justification against this charge, v. 15. The fact he cannot deny; the sheep and oxen were brought from the Amalekites. But, (1) It was not his fault, for the people spared them; as if they durst have done it without the express orders of Saul, when they knew it was against the express orders of Samuel. Sin is a brat that nobody cares to have laid at his doors. It is the sorry subterfuge of an impenitent heart, that will not confess its guilt, to lay the blame on those that were tempters, or partners, or only followers in it. (2) It was with a good intention: "It was to sacrifice to the Lord thy God." This was a false plea, for both Saul and the people designed their own profit in sparing the cattle. But, if it had been true, it would still have been frivolous, for God hates robbery for burnt-offering.

4. Samuel overrules, or rather overlooks, his plea, and proceeds, in God's name, to give judgment against him. (1) He reminds Saul of the honour God had done him in making him king (v. 17), when he was little in his own sight. Those that are advanced to honour and wealth ought often to remember their mean beginnings, that they may never think highly of themselves, but always study to do great things for the God that has advanced them. (2) He lays before him the plainness of the orders he was to execute (v. 18): The Lord sent thee on a journey; so easy was the service, and so certain the success, that it was rather to be called a journey than a war. Had he denied himself, and set aside the consideration of his own profit so far as to have destroyed all that belonged to Amalek, he would have been no loser by it at last, nor have gone this warfare on his own charges. And therefore, (3) He shows him how inexcusable he was in aiming to make a profit of this expedition, and to enrich himself by it (v. 19): "Wherefore then didst thou fly upon the spoil, and convert that to thy own use which was to have been destroyed for God's honour?" Thou didst not obey the voice of the Lord.

5. Saul repeats his vindication of himself, as that which, in defiance of conviction, he resolved to abide by, v. 20, 21. He denies the charge (v. 20): "Yea, I have obeyed, I have done all I should do"; for he had done all which he thought he needed to do, so much wiser was he in his own eyes than God himself. As to the spoil, he owns it should have been utterly destroyed. But he thought that would be wilful waste; the cattle of the Midianites were taken for a prey in Moses's time (Num. xxxi. 32, &c.), and why not the cattle of the Amalekites now? Better they should be a prey to the Israelites than to the fowls of the air and the wild beasts; and therefore he connived at the people's carrying it away for sacrifice to the Lord here at Gilgal, whither they were now bringing them.

6. Samuel gives a full answer to his apology, since he did insist upon it, v. 22, 23. He appeals to his own conscience: Has the Lord as great delight in sacrifices as in obedience? Here we are plainly told. (1) That humble, sincere, and conscientious obedience to the will of God is more pleasing and acceptable to him than all burnt-offerings and sacrifices. A careful conformity to moral precepts recommends us to God more than all ceremonial observances, Mic. vi. 6–8; Hos. vi. 6. Obedience was the law of innocency, but sacrifice supposes sin come into the world and is but a feeble attempt to take that away which obedience would have prevented. It is much easier to bring a bullock or lamb to be burnt upon the altar than to bring every high thought into obedience to God and the will subject to his will. (2) That nothing is so provoking to God as disobedience, setting up our wills in competition with his. This is here called rebellion and stubbornness, and is said to be as bad as witchcraft and idolatry, v. 23. It is as bad to set up other gods as to live in disobedience to the true God. It was disobedience that made us all sinners (Rom. v. 19), and this is the malignity of sin, that it is the transgression of the law, and consequently it is enmity to God, Rom. viii. 7.

7. He reads his doom: in short, "Because thou hast rejected the word of the Lord, hast despised it (so the Chaldee), hast made nothing of it (so the LXX.), therefore he has rejected thee, despised and made nothing of thee, but cast thee off from being king." Those are unfit and unworthy to rule over men who are not willing that God should rule over them.

Saul is at length brought to put himself into the dress of a penitent; but it is too evident that he only acts the part of a penitent, and is not one in deed.

I. How poorly he expressed his repentance. It was with much ado that he was made sensible of his fault, and not till he was threatened with being deposed. This touched him in a tender part. Then he began to relent, and not till then. 1. He made his application to Samuel only, and seemed most solicitous to stand right in his opinion only to preserve his reputation with the people, because they all knew Samuel to be a prophet, and the man that had been the instrument of his preferment. Thinking it would please Samuel, and be a sort of bribe to him, he puts it into his confession: I have transgressed the commandment of the Lord and thy word; as if he had been in God's stead, v. 24. He also applies to Samuel for forgiveness (v. 25): I pray thee, pardon my sin; as if any could forgive sin but God only. The most charitable construction we can put upon this of Saul is to suppose that he looked upon Samuel as a sort of mediator between him and God, and intended an address to God in his application to him. 2. He excused his fault even in the confession of it, and that is never the fashion of a true penitent (v. 24): I did it because I feared the people, and obeyed their voice. 3. All his care was to save his credit, and preserve his interest in the people, lest they should revolt from him, or at least despise him. Therefore he courts Samuel with so much earnestness (v. 25); he feared that if Samuel forsook him the people would do so too.

II. How little he got by these thin shows of repentance. 1. Samuel repeated the sentence passed upon him, so far was he from giving any hopes of the repeal of it, v. 26, the same with v. 23. 2. He illustrates the sentence by a sign. When Samuel was turning from him he tore his clothes to detain him (v. 27). Samuel put a construction upon this accident which none but a prophet could do. He made it to signify the rending of the kingdom from him (v. 28), and that, like this, was his own doing. "He hath rent it from thee, and given it to a neighbour better than thou," namely, to David, who afterwards, upon occasion, cut off the skirt of Saul's robe (1 Sam. xxiv. 4), upon which Saul said (1 Sam. xxiv. 20), I know that thou shalt surely be king, perhaps remembering this sign, the tearing of the skirt of Samuel's mantle. 3. He ratified it by a solemn declaration of its being irreversible (v. 29): The Strength of Israel will not lie.

Samuel, as a prophet, is here set over kings, Jer. i. 10.

I. He destroys king Agag.

1. How Agag's present vain hopes were frustrated: He came delicately, in a stately manner, to show that he was a king. Having escaped the sword of Saul, that man of war, he thought he was in no danger from Samuel, an old prophet, a man of peace.

2. How his former wicked practices were now punished. Samuel calls him to account, not only for the sins of his ancestors, but his own sins: Thy sword has made women childless, v. 33.

II. He deserts king Saul, takes leave of him (v. 34), and never came any more to see him (v. 35). He looked upon him as rejected of God, and therefore he forsook him. Yet he mourned for Saul, thinking it a very lamentable thing that a man who stood so fair for great things should ruin himself so foolishly.

CHAP. XVI

At this chapter begins the story of David. Here, I. Samuel is appointed and commissioned to anoint a king among the sons of Jesse at Bethlehem, ver. 1–5. II. All his elder sons are passed by and David the youngest is pitched upon and anointed, ver. 6–13. III. Saul growing melancholy, David is pitched upon to relieve him by music, ver. 14–23.

Samuel had retired to his own house in Ramah, with a resolution not to appear any more in public business, but to addict himself wholly to the instructing and training up of the sons of the prophets, over whom he presided, as we find, ch. xix. 20.

I. God reproves him for continuing so long to mourn for the rejection of Saul. "Mourn not for Saul, for I have provided me a king. The people provided themselves a king and he proved bad, now I will provide myself one, a man after my own heart."

II. He sends him to Bethlehem, to anoint one of the sons of Jesse, a person probably not unknown to Samuel. Fill thy horn with oil.

III. Samuel objects the peril of going on this errand (v. 2): If Saul hear it, he will kill me. By this it appears, 1. That Saul had grown very wicked and outrageous since his rejection, else Samuel would not have mentioned this. What impiety would he not be guilty of who durst kill Samuel? 2. That Samuel's faith was not so strong as one would have expected, else he would not have thus feared the rage of Saul.

IV. God orders him to cover his design with a sacrifice: Say, I have come to sacrifice; and it was true he did, and it was proper that he should, when he came to anoint a king, ch. xi. 15. Let him give notice of a sacrifice, and invite Jesse (who, it is probable, was the principal man of the city) and his family to come to the feast upon the sacrifice; and, says God, I will show thee what thou shalt do. Those that go about God's work in God's way shall be directed step by step.

V. Samuel went accordingly to Bethlehem, not in pomp, or with any retinue, only a servant to lead the heifer which he was to sacrifice; yet the elders of Bethlehem trembled at his coming, fearing it was an indication of God's displeasure against them and that he came to denounce some judgment for the iniquities of the place. They asked him, "Comest thou peaceably?" "I come peaceably, for I come to sacrifice, not with a message of wrath against you, but with the methods of peace and reconciliation; and therefore you may bid me welcome and need not fear my coming; therefore sanctify yourselves, and prepare to join with me in the sacrifice, that you may have the benefit of it."

VI. He had a particular regard to Jesse and his sons, for with them his private business lay, with which, it is likely, he acquainted Jesse at his first coming, and took up his lodging at his house. Samuel assisted them in their family preparations for the public sacrifice, and, it is probable, chose out David, and anointed him, at the family-solemnities, before the sacrifice was offered or the holy feast solemnized. Perhaps he offered private sacrifices, like Job, according to the number of them all (Job i. 5), and, under colour of that, called for them all to appear before him.

I. How all the elder sons, who stood fairest for the preferment, were passed by.

1. Eliab, the eldest, was privately presented first to Samuel, probably none being present but Jesse only, and Samuel thought he must needs be the man: Surely this is the Lord's anointed, v. 6. When God would please the people with a king he chose a comely man; but, when he would have one after his own heart, he should not be chosen by the outside. The Lord looks on the heart, that is, (1) He knows it. We can tell how men look, but he can tell what they are. God looks on the heart, and sees the thoughts and intents. (2) He judges men by it. Let us reckon that to be true beauty which is within, and judge of men, as far as we are capable, by their minds, not their mien.

2. When Eliab was set aside, Abinadad and Shammah, and, after them, four more of the sons of Jesse, seven in all, were presented to Samuel, as likely for his purpose; but Samuel, who now attended more carefully than he did at first to the divine direction, rejected them all: The Lord has not chosen these, v. 8, 10.

II. How David at length was pitched upon. He was the youngest of all the sons of Jesse; his name signifies beloved, for he was a type of the beloved Son. Observe, 1 How he was in the fields, keeping the sheep (v. 11), and was left there, though there was a sacrifice and a feast at his father's house. David was taken from following the ewes to feed Jacob (Ps. lxxviii. 71), as Moses from keeping the flock of Jethro. We should think a military life, but God saw a pastoral life (which gives advantage for contemplation and communion with heaven), the best preparative for kingly power, at least for those graces of the Spirit which are necessary to the due discharge of that trust which attends it. 2. How earnest Samuel was to have him sent for: "We will not sit down to meat till he come hither; for, if all the rest be rejected, this must be he." 3. What appearance he made when he did come. No notice is taken of his clothing. No doubt that was according to his employment, mean and coarse, as shepherds' coats commonly are, but he had a very honest look, not stately, as Saul's, but sweet and lovely: He was ruddy, of a beautiful countenance, and goodly to look to (v. 12). Though he was so far from using any art to help his beauty, that his employment exposed it to the sun and wind, his modest blush, when he was brought before Samuel made him look much the handsomer. 4. The anointing of him. The Lord told Samuel in his ear (as he had done, ch. ix. 15) that this was he whom he must anoint, signifying thereby, (1) A divine designation to the government entailed upon him, to come to him in due time. (2) A divine communication of gifts and graces, to fit him for the government, and make him a type of him who was to be the Messiah, the anointed One, who received the Spirit, not by measure, but without measure. He is said to be anointed in the midst of his brethren. Bishop Patrick reads it, He anointed him from the midst of his brethren, that is, he singled him out from the rest, and privately anointed him, but with a charge to keep his own counsel, and not to let his own brethren know it, as by what we find (ch. xvii. 28), it should seem, Eliab did not. Dr. Lightfoot reckons that he was about twenty-five, and that his troubles lasted but five years. 5. The happy effects of this anointing: The Spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward, v. 13. The anointing of him was not an empty ceremony, but a divine power went along with that instituted sign, and he found himself inwardly advanced in wisdom, and courage, and concern for the public, though not at all advanced in his outward circumstances. Some think that his courage, by which he slew the lion and the bear, and his extraordinary skill in music, were the effects and evidences of the Spirit's coming upon him. Samuel, having done this, went to Ramah in safety, and we never read of him again but once (ch. xix. 18), till we read of his death; now he retired to die in peace, since his eyes had seen the sceptre brought into the tribe of Judah.

Saul falling and David rising.

I. Here is Saul made a terror to himself (v. 14): The Spirit of the Lord departed from him. He lost all his good qualities. This was the effect of his rejecting God, and an evidence of his being rejected by him. The consequence of this was that an evil spirit from God troubled him. Those that drive the good Spirit away from them do of course become a prey to the evil spirit. He grew fretful, and peevish, and discontented, timorous and suspicious, ever and anon starting and trembling.

II. Here is David made a physician to Saul, and by this means brought to court, a physician that helped him against the worst of diseases, when none else could. 1. The means they all advised him to for his relief was music (v. 16): "Let us have a cunning player on the harp to attend thee." Saul's servants did not amiss to send for music as a help to cheer up the spirits, if they had but withal sent for a prophet to give him good counsel. 2. One of his servants recommended David to him, as a fit person to be employed in the use of these means, little imagining that he was the man whom Samuel meant when he told Saul of a neighbour of his, better than he, who should have the kingdom, ch. xv. 28. Though David, after he was anointed, returned to his country business, yet the workings of the Spirit signified by the oil could not be hid, but made him shine in obscurity so that all his neighbours observed with wonder the great improvements of his mind on a sudden. David, even in his shepherd's garb, has become an oracle, a champion, and every thing that is great. His fame reached the court soon, for Saul was inquisitive after such young men, ch. xiv. 52. When the Spirit of God comes upon a man he will make his face to shine. 3. David is hereupon sent for to court. (1) His father was very willing to part with him, sent him very readily, and a present with him to Saul, v. 20. The present was, according to the usage of those times, bread and wine (compare, ch. x. 3, 4.) therefore acceptable because expressive of the homage and allegiance of him that sent it. (2) Saul became very kind to him (v. 21), loved him greatly, and designed to make him his armour-bearer, and asked his father's leave to keep him in his service (v. 22): Let David, I pray thee, stand before me. David's music was Saul's physic. Music has a natural tendency to compose and exhilarate the mind, when it is disturbed and saddened. On some it has a greater influence and effect than on others, and, probably, Saul was one of those. It made his spirit sedate, and allayed those tumults by which the devil had advantage against him. Music cannot work upon the devil, but it may shut up the passages by which he had access to the mind. Saul found, even after he had conceived an enmity to David, that no one else could do him the same service (ch. xix. 9, 10).

CHAP. XVII

David is the man whom God now delights to honour, for he is a man after his own heart. In the court he was only Saul's physician; but in the camp Israel's champion; there he fairly fought, and beat Goliath of Gath. I. What a noble figure Goliath made, and how daringly he challenged the armies of Israel, ver. 1–11. II. What a mean figure David made, when Providence brought him to the army, ver. 12–30. III. The unparalleled bravery wherewith David undertook to encounter this Philistine, ver. 31–39. IV. The pious resolution with which he attacked him, ver. 40–47. V. The glorious victory he obtained over him with a sling and a stone, and the advantage which the Israelites thereby gained against the Philistines, ver. 48–54. VI. The great notice which was hereupon taken of David at court, ver. 55–58.

It was not long ago that the Philistines were soundly beaten, but here we have them making head again.

I. How they defied Israel with their armies, v. 1. They made a descent upon the Israelites' country, and possessed themselves, as it should seem, of some part of it, for they encamped in a place which belonged to Judah. The Philistines (it is probable) had heard that Samuel had fallen out with Saul and forsaken him, and that Saul had grown melancholy and unfit. Saul mustered his forces, and faced them, v. 2, 3. The evil spirit, for the present, had left Saul, ch. xvi. 23. David's harp having given him some relief, perhaps the alarms and affairs of the war prevented the return of the distemper. Business is a good antidote against melancholy. David had returned to Bethlehem to keep his father's sheep; this was a rare instance, in a young man that stood so fair for preferment, of humility and affection to his parents.

II. How they defied Israel with their champion Goliath, hoping by him to recover their reputation and dominion. Perhaps the army of the Israelites was superior in number and strength to that of the Philistines, which made the Philistines decline a battle, and stand at bay with them, desiring rather to put the issue upon a single combat, in which, having such a champion, they hoped to gain the victory. Now concerning this champion,

1. His prodigious size. He was of the sons of Anak, who at Gath kept their ground in Joshua's time (Josh. xi. 22). He was in height six cubits and a span, v. 4. The learned Bishop Cumberland has made it out that the scripture-cubit was above twenty-one inches and a span was half a cubit, by which computation Goliath wanted but eight inches of four yards in height, eleven feet and four inches, a monstrous stature.

2. His armour. A helmet of brass on his head, a coat of mail, made of brass plates laid over one another, like the scales of a fish; and, because his legs would lie most within the reach of an ordinary man, he wore brass boots, and had a large corselet of brass about his neck. The coat is said to weigh 5,000 shekels. But some think it should be translated, not the weight of the coat, but the value of it, was 5,000 shekels. His offensive weapons were extraordinary, of which his spear only is here described, v. 7. It was like a weaver's beam. His arm could manage that which an ordinary man could scarcely heave. His shield only, was carried before him by his esquire, probably for state; for he that was clad in brass little needed a shield.

3. His challenge. The Philistines having chosen him for their champion, to save themselves from the hazard of a battle, he here throws down the gauntlet, and bids defiance to the armies of Israel, v. 8–10. He came into the valley that lay between the camps, and, his voice probably being as much stronger than other people's as his arm was, he cried so as to make them all hear him, Give me a man, that we may fight together. He looked upon Israel with disdain and defies them to find a man among them bold enough to enter the list with him. (1) He upbraids them with their folly in drawing an army together. (2) He offers to put the war entirely upon the issue of the duel he proposes: "If your champion kill me, we will be your servants; if I kill him, you shall be ours." This, says Bishop Patrick, was only a bravado. The Chaldee paraphrase brings him in boasting that he was the man that had killed Hophni and Phinehas and taken the ark prisoner.

4. The terror this struck upon Israel: Saul and all his army were greatly afraid, v. 11. The people would not have been dismayed but that they observed Saul's courage failed him; and it is not to be expected that, if the leader be a coward, the followers should be bold. Jonathan must sit still, because the honour of engaging Goliath is reserved for David.

Forty days the two armies lay encamped facing one another, and perhaps there were frequent skirmishes between small detached parties. All this while, morning and evening, did the insulting champion appear in the field and repeat his challenge. All this while David is keeping his father's sheep, but at the end of forty days Providence brings him to the field to win and wear the laurel which no other Israelite dares venture for.

I. The state of his family. His father was old (v. 12). David's three elder brethren, who perhaps envied his place at the court, got their father to send for him home, and let them go to the camp, where they hoped to signalize themselves and eclipse him (v. 13, 14), while David himself returned to the care, and toil, and (as it proved, v. 34) the peril, of keeping his father's sheep.

II. The orders his father gave him to go and visit his brethren in the camp. He must carry some bread and cheese to his brethren, ten loaves with some parched corn for themselves (v. 17) and ten cheeses for a present to their colonel, v. 18. David must still be the drudge of the family, though he was to be the greatest ornament of it. He had not so much as an ass at command to carry his load, but must take it on his back, and yet run to the camp. He must observe how his brethren fared, whether they were not reduced to short allowance, whom they associate with, and what sort of life they lead.

III. David's dutiful obedience, so well had he learnt to obey before he pretended to command. God's providence brought him to the camp very seasonably, when both sides had set the battle in array, v. 21. Both sides were now preparing to fight.

1. How brisk and lively David was, v. 22. Though he had come a long journey with a great load, he ran into the army, to see what was doing there, and to pay his respects to his brethren.

2. How bold and daring the Philistine was, v. 23. Now that the armies were drawn out into a line of battle he appeared first to renew his challenge.

3. How timorous and faint-hearted the men of Israel were. Upon his approach, they fled from him and were greatly afraid, v. 24.

4. How high Saul bid for a champion. Whoever will do it shall have as good preferment as he can give him, v. 25.

5. How much concerned David was to assert the honour of God and Israel against the impudent challenges of this champion. Two considerations, it seems, fired David with a holy indignation:—(1) That the challenger was one that was uncircumcised, a stranger to God and out of covenant with him. (2) That the challenged were the armies of the living God, devoted to him, employed by him and for him, so that the affronts offered to them reflected upon the living God himself, and that he could not bear. When therefore some had told him what was the reward proposed for killing the Philistine (v. 27) he asked others (v. 30), with the same resentment, which he expected would at length come to Saul's ear.

6. How he was browbeaten and discouraged by his eldest brother Eliab, v. 28. (1) As the fruit of Eliab's jealousy. He was the eldest brother, and David the youngest. Eliab was now vexed that his younger brother should speak those bold words against the Philistine which he himself durst not say. He would rather that Goliath should triumph over Israel than that David should be the man that should triumph over him. Eliab intended, in what he said, to represent him to those about him as an idle proud lad. He gives them to understand that his business was only to keep sheep, and falsely insinuates that he was a careless unfaithful shepherd. David could not escape this hard character from his own brother. (2) As a trial of David's meekness, patience, and constancy. A short trial it was, and he approved himself well in it; for, [1] He bore the provocation with admirable temper (v. 29): "What have I now done?" He had right and reason on his side, and knew it, and therefore with a soft answer turned away his brother's wrath. This conquest of his own passion was in some respects more honourable than his conquest of Goliath. [2] He broke through the discouragement with admirable resolution. He would not be driven off from his thoughts of engaging the Philistine by the ill-will of his brother.

David is at length presented to Saul for his champion (v. 31) and he bravely undertakes to fight the Philistine (v. 32). A little shepherd, come but this morning from keeping sheep, has more courage than all the mighty men of Israel, and encourages them. Two things David had to do with Saul:—

I. To get clear of the objection Saul made against his undertaking. "Alas!" says Saul, "thou hast a good heart to it, but art by no means an equal match for this Philistine." David, in reasoning with him, argues from experience; though he was but a youth, and never in the wars, yet perhaps he had done as much as the killing of Goliath came to, for he had had, by divine assistance, spirit enough to subdue a lion once and another time a bear that robbed him of his lambs, v. 34–36. To these he compares this uncircumcised Philistine, looks upon him to be as much a ravenous beast as either of them, and therefore doubts not but to deal as easily with him; and hereby he gives Saul to understand that he was not so inexperienced in hazardous combats as he took him to be.

1. He tells his story like a man of spirit. When David kept sheep, (1) He approved himself very careful and tender of his flock. He could not see a lamb in distress but he would venture his life to rescue it. This temper made him fit to be a king, to whom the lives of subjects should be dear and their blood precious (Ps. lxxii. 14), and fit to be a type of Christ, the good Shepherd, who gathers the lambs in his arms and carries them in his bosom (Isa. xl. 11), and who not only ventured, but laid down his life for his sheep. (2) He approved himself very bold and brave in the defence of his flock. "Thy servant slew both the lion and the bear."

2. He applies his story like a man of faith. He owns (v. 37) it was the Lord that delivered him from the lion and the bear; to him he gives the praise of that great achievement, and thence he infers, He will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine. Thus David took off Saul's objection against his undertaking, and gained a commission to fight the Philistine.

II. To get clear of the armour wherewith Saul would, by all means, have him dressed up when he went upon this great action (v. 38). David, being not yet resolved which way to attack his enemy, girded on his sword, but he found the armour would but encumber him, and would be rather his burden than his defence, and therefore he desires leave of Saul to put them off again. "I have never been accustomed to such accoutrements as these."

I. The preparations made on both sides for the encounter. The Philistine was already fixed, as he had been daily for the last forty days. Well might he go with his armour, for he had sufficiently proved it. But what arms and ammunition is David furnished with? Truly none but what he brought with him as a shepherd; no breastplate, nor corselet, but his plain shepherd's coat; no spear, but his staff; no sword nor bow, but his sling; no quiver, but his scrip; nor any arrows, but, instead of them, five smooth stones picked up out of the brook, v. 40. By this it appeared that his confidence was purely in the power of God.

II. The conference which precedes the encounter,

1. How very proud Goliath was, (1) With what scorn he looked upon his adversary, v. 42. He took notice of his person, that he was but a youth, not come to his strength, ruddy and of a fair countenance, fitter to accompany the virgins of Israel in their dances than to lead on the men of Israel in their battles. He took notice of his array with great indignation (v. 43), "Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves?" (2) With what confidence he presumed upon his success. He cursed David by his gods. "Come unto me, and I will give thy flesh to the fowls of the air, it will be a tender and delicate feast for them."

2. How very pious David was. His speech savours nothing of ostentation, but God is all in all in it, v. 45–47. (1) He derives his authority from God: "I come to thee in the name of the Lord, by the special grace of his covenant," the God of the armies of Israel. The name of God David relied on, as Goliath did on his sword and spear. (2) He depends for success upon God, v. 46. David speaks with as much assurance as Goliath had done, but upon better ground; it is his faith that says, "This day will the Lord deliver thee into my hand, and not only thy carcase, but the carcases of the host of the Philistines, shall be given to the birds and beasts of prey." (3) He devotes the praise and glory of all to God. [1] All the world should be made to know that there is a God, and that the God of Israel is the one only living and true God, and all other pretended deities are vanity and a lie. [2] All Israel shall know that the Lord saveth not with sword and spear (v. 47), but can, when he pleases, save without either and against both, Ps. xlvi. 9. David addresses himself to this combat rather as a priest that was going to offer a sacrifice to the justice of God than as a soldier that was going to engage an enemy of his country.

1. The engagement between the two champions, v. 48. To this engagement the Philistine advanced with a great deal of state and gravity; if he must encounter a pigmy, yet it shall be like a stalking mountain, overlaid with brass and iron, to meet David. David advanced with no less activity and cheerfulness, as one that aimed more to do execution than to make a figure: He hasted, and ran, being lightly clad, to meet the Philistine. We may imagine with what tenderness and compassion the Israelites saw such a pleasing youth as this throwing himself into the mouth of destruction, but he knew whom he had believed and for whom he acted. 2. The fall of Goliath in this engagement. He was in no haste, because in no fear, but confident that he should soon at one stroke cleave his adversary's head; but, while he was preparing to do it solemnly, David did his business effectually, without any parade: he slang a stone which hit him in the forehead, and, in the twinkling of an eye, fetched him to the ground, v. 49. Goliath knew there were famous slingers in Israel (Judges xx. 16), yet was either so forgetful or presumptuous as to go with the beaver of his helmet open. To complete the execution, David drew Goliath's own sword, a two-handed weapon for David, and with it cut off his head, v. 51. David's victory over Goliath was typical of the triumphs of the son of David over Satan and all the powers of darkness, whom he spoiled, and made a show of them openly (Col. ii. 15), and we through him are more than conquerors. 3. The defeat of the Philistines' army hereupon. They relied wholly upon the strength of their champion, and therefore, when they saw him slain, they did not, as Goliath had offered, throw down their arms and surrender themselves servants to Israel (v. 9), but took to their heels, being wholly dispirited, and thinking it to no purpose to oppose one before whom such a mighty man had fallen: They fled (v. 51), and this put life into the Israelites, who shouted and pursued them. They seized all the baggage, plundered the tents (v. 53), and enriched themselves with the spoil. 4. David's disposal of his trophies, v. 54. He brought the head of the Philistine to Jerusalem, to be a terror to the Jebusites, who held the strong-hold of Sion. His armour he laid up in his tent; only the sword was preserved behind the ephod in the tabernacle, as consecrated to God, ch. xxi. 9. 5. The notice that was taken of David. Saul had forgotten him, being melancholy and mindless, and little thinking that his musician would have spirit enough to be his champion. Abner was a stranger to him, but brought him to Saul (v. 57), and he gave a modest account of himself, v. 58. And now he was introduced to the court with much greater advantages than before, in which he owned God's hand performing all things for him.

CHAP. XVIII

I. The improvement of his triumphs; he soon became, 1. Saul's constant attendant, ver. 2. 2. Jonathan's covenant friend, ver. 1, 3, 4. 3. The darling of his country, ver. 5, 7, 16. II. The allays of his triumphs. 1. Saul hated him, and sought to kill him himself, ver. 8–11. 2. He feared him, and contrived how he might have some mischief done him, ver. 12–17. He proposed to marry his daughter to him; but, (1) Cheated him of the eldest to provoke him (ver. 19), and, (2) Gave him the younger, upon conditions which would endanger his life, ver. 20–25. But David performed his conditions bravely (ver. 26, 27), and grew to be more and more esteemed, ver. 28–30.

David was anointed to the crown to take it out of Saul's hand, and over Jonathan's head, and yet here we find,

I. That Saul, who was now in possession of the crown, reposed a confidence in him, God so ordering it, that he might by his preferment at court be prepared for future service. Saul now took David home with him, and would not suffer him to return again to his retirement, v. 2. Saul set him over the men of war (v. 5), not that he made him general (Abner was in that post), but perhaps captain of the lifeguard. He employed him in the affairs of government; and David went out whithersoever Saul sent him. Those that hope to rule must first learn to obey.

II. That Jonathan, who was heir to the crown, entered into covenant with him, God so ordering it, that David's way might be the clearer when his rival was his friend. 1. Jonathan conceived an extraordinary kindness and affection for him (v. 1): The soul of Jonathan was immediately knit unto the soul of David. Jonathan had formerly set upon a Philistine army with the same faith and bravery with which David had now attacked a Philistine giant; so that there was between them a very near resemblance. None had so much reason to dislike David as Jonathan had, because he was to put him by the crown, yet none regards him more. 2. He testified his love to David by a generous present he made him, v. 4. He takes care to put him speedily into the habit of a courtier (for he gave him a robe) and of a soldier, for he gave him, instead of his staff and sling, a sword and bow, and, instead of his shepherd's scrip, a girdle, either a belt or a sash; the same that he himself had worn and he stripped himself of them to dress David in them. Saul's would not fit him, but Jonathan's did. Their bodies were of a size, a circumstance which well agreed with the suitableness of their minds. David is seen in Jonathan's clothes, that all may take notice he is a Jonathan's second self. Our Lord Jesus has thus shown his love to us, that he stripped himself to clothe us, emptied himself to enrich us; nay, he did more than Jonathan, he clothed himself with our rags, whereas Jonathan did not put on David's. 3. He endeavoured to perpetuate this friendship. They made a covenant with each other, v. 3.

III. That both court and country agree to bless him. And it was certainly a great instance of the power of God's grace in David that he was able to bear all this respect and honour flowing in upon him on a sudden without being lifted up above measure. Those that climb so fast have need of good heads and good hearts.

Now begin David's troubles, and they not only tread on the heels of his triumphs, but take rise from them.

I. He was too much magnified by the common people. Some time after the victory Saul went on a triumphant progress through the cities of Israel. And, when he made his public entry into any place, the women had got a song which they sang, the burden of which was, Saul has slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands.

II. This mightily displeased Saul, and made him envy David, v. 8, 9. He ought to have considered that they referred only to this late action, and intended not to diminish any of Saul's former exploits. David, in killing Goliath, did in effect slay all the Philistines that were slain that day and defeated the whole army; so that they did but give David his due. But Saul was very wroth, and presently suspected some treasonable design at the bottom of it, What can he have more but the kingdom?

III. In his fury he aimed to kill David, v. 10, 11. 1. His fits of frenzy returned upon him. Those that indulge themselves in envy and uncharitableness give place to the devil, and prepare for the re-entry of the unclean spirit, with seven others more wicked. Saul pretended a religious ecstasy: He prophesied in the midst of the house, that is, he had the gestures and motions of a prophet, and humoured the thing well enough to decoy David, that he might be off his guard; and perhaps designing, if he could but kill him, to impute it to a divine impulse but really it was a hellish fury that actuated him. 2. David returns to his harp: He played with his hand as at other times. 3. He took this opportunity to aim at the death of David. He had a javelin or dart in his hand, which he projected, endeavouring to slay David, not in a sudden passion, but deliberately. One would think he should have allowed himself to consider the kindness David was now doing him, in relieving him, as no one else could, against the worst of troubles. Compare David, with his harp in his hand, aiming to serve Saul, and Saul, with his javelin in his hand, aiming to slay David; and observe the meekness and usefulness of God's persecuted people and the brutishness and barbarity of their persecutors. 4. David happily avoided the blow twice. He did not throw the javelin at Saul again, though he had both strength and courage enough, and colour of right, to make resistance, yet he did no more than secure himself, by getting out of the way of it.

Verses 12–30

Saul began in open hostility when he threw the javelin at him. His enmity proceeded, and David received the attacks.

I. How Saul expressed his malice against David. 1. He was afraid of him, v. 12. He really stood in awe of him, as Herod feared John, Mark vi. 20. Saul was sensible that he had lost the favourable presence of God himself, and that David had it, and for this reason he feared him. The way to be both feared and loved, feared by those to whom we would wish to be a terror and loved by those to whom we would wish to be a delight, is to behave ourselves wisely. 2. He removed him from court, and gave him a regiment in the country, v. 13, that he might not secure the interest of the courtiers. Yet herein he did impoliticly; for it gave David an opportunity of ingratiating himself with the people, who therefore loved him (v. 16) because he went out and came in before them. 3. He stirred him up to take all occasions of quarrelling with the Philistines (v. 17), insinuating to him that he would do good service to his prince and good service to his God, and would qualify himself for the honour he designed him, which was to marry his eldest daughter to him. 4. He did what he could to provoke him by breaking his promise with him, and giving his daughter to another. 5. When he was disappointed in this, he proffered him his other daughter. (1) Perhaps he hoped that she would, even after her marriage to David, take part with her father against her husband. (2) The conditions of the marriage must be that he killed 100 Philistines, and, as proofs that those he had slain were uncircumcised, he must bring in their foreskins. David, in doing this, would make them seek to be revenged on him, which was the thing that Saul desired and designed. For Saul thought to make David fall by the Philistines, v. 25. [1] Saul's conscience would not suffer him to aim at David's life himself, but he thought that to expose him designedly to the Philistines had nothing bad in it (Let not my hand be upon him, but the hand of the Philistines). [2] Saul pretended extraordinary kindness for David even when he aimed at his ruin: Thou shalt be my son-in-law, says he (v. 21).

II. How David conducted himself when the tide of Saul's displeasure ran thus high against him.

1. He behaved himself wisely in all his ways. He did not complain of hard measure nor make himself the head of a party, but managed all the affairs he was entrusted with as one that made it his business to do real service to his king and country. And then the Lord was with him to give him success in all his undertakings.

2. When it was proposed to him to be son-in-law to the king he once and again received the proposal with all possible modesty and humility. (1) How highly he speaks of the honour offered him: To be son-in-law to the king. Religion is so far from teaching us to be rude and unmannerly that it does not allow us to be so. We must render honour to whom honour is due. (2) How humbly he speaks of himself: Who am I? Who am I, a poor man, and lightly esteemed? It well becomes us, however God has advanced us, always to have low thoughts of ourselves.

3. When the slaying of 100 Philistines was made the condition of David's marrying Saul's daughter he readily closed with it (v. 26). He would not seem to suspect that Saul designed his hurt by it. He knew God was with him, and therefore, whatever Saul hoped, David did not fear falling by the Philistines, though he must needs expose himself much by such an undertaking as this.

Even after he was married he continued his good services to Israel. When the princes of the Philistines began to move towards another war David was ready to oppose them, and behaved himself more wisely than all the servants of Saul, v. 30. The law dispensed with men from going to war the first year after they were married (Deut. xxiv. 5), but David loved his country too well to make use of that dispensation.

III. How God brought good to David out of Saul's project against him. 1. Saul gave him his daughter to be a snare to him, but in this respect that marriage was a kindness to him. 2. Saul thought, by putting him upon dangerous services, to have him taken off, but the more he did against the Philistines the better they loved him, so that his name was much set by (v. 30), which would make his coming to the crown the more easy.

CHAP. XIX

Immediately after David's marriage, his death was vowed. Four fair escapes of his from the hurtful sword of Saul, the first by the prudent mediation of Jonathan (ver. 1–7), the second by his own quickness (ver. 8–10), the third by Michal's fidelity (ver. 11–17), the fourth by Samuel's protection, and a change, for the present, wrought upon Saul, ver. 18–24.

Saul and Jonathan appear here in their different characters, with reference to David.

I. Never was enemy so unreasonably cruel as Saul. His projects to take him off had failed, and therefore he proclaims him an outlaw, and charges all about him, upon their allegiance, to take the first opportunity to kill David. It was strange that he who knew how well Jonathan loved him should expect him to kill him; but he thought that because he was heir to the crown he must needs be as envious at David as himself was.

II. Never was friend so surprisingly kind as Jonathan. He not only continued to delight much in him, though David's glory eclipsed his, but bravely appeared for him now that the stream ran so strongly against him.

1. He took care for his present security by letting him know his danger (v. 2).

2. He took pains to pacify his father and reconcile him to David. The next morning he ventured to commune with him concerning David (v. 3).

(1) His intercession for David was very prudent. He pleads, [1] The good services David had done to the public, and particularly to Saul. Witness the relief he had given him against his distemper with his harp, and his bold encounter with Goliath, that memorable action, which did, in effect, save Saul's life and kingdom. [2] He pleads his innocency. If he be slain, it is without cause. Jonathan could not entail anything upon his family more pernicious than the guilt of innocent blood.

(2) His intercession, being thus prudent, was prevalent. God inclined the heart of Saul to hearken to the voice of Jonathan. [1] He recalled the bloody warrant for his execution (v. 6): As the Lord liveth, he shall not be slain. We suppose that he spoke as he thought for the present, but the convictions soon wore off and his corruptions prevailed and triumphed over them. [2] He renewed the grant of his place at court. Jonathan brought him to Saul, and he was in his presence as in times past (v. 7), hoping that now the storm was over.

I. David continues his good services to his king and country. 1. As bold as ever in using his sword for the service of his country, v. 8. The war broke out again with the Philistines, which gave David occasion again to signalize himself. 2. As cheerful as ever in using his harp for the service of the prince. When Saul was disturbed with his former fits of melancholy David played with his hand, v. 9. He had learned to render good for evil, and to trust God with his safety in the way of his duty.

II. Saul continues his malice against David. He that but the other day had sworn by his Maker that David should not be slain now endeavours to slay him himself. Saul's fear and jealousy made him a torment to himself, so that he could not sit in his house without a javelin in his hand, pretending it was for his preservation, but designing it for David's destruction; for he endeavoured to nail him to the wall, running at him so violently that he struck the javelin into the wall (v. 10).

III. God continues his care of David and still watches over him for good. Saul missed his blow. David was too quick for him and fled, and by a kind providence escaped that night. To these preservations among others, David often refers in his Psalms, when he speaks of God's being his shield and buckler, his rock and fortress, and delivering his soul from death.

I. Saul's further design of mischief to David. When David had escaped the javelin, Saul sent some of his guards after him to lay wait at the door of his house, and to assassinate him in the morning as soon as he stirred out, v. 11.

II. David's wonderful deliverance out of this danger. Michal was the instrument of it, whom Saul gave him to be a snare to him, but she proved his protector and helper. She, knowing her father's great indignation at David, soon suspected the design, and bestirred herself for her husband's safety. 1. She got David out of the danger. She told him how imminent the peril was (v. 11): Tomorrow thou wilt be slain. David himself was better versed in the art of fighting than of flying, but Michal let him down through a window (v. 2), and so he fled and escaped. 2. She practised a deception upon Saul and those whom he employed to be the instruments of his cruelty. When the doors of the house were opened in the morning, and David did not appear, the messengers would search the house for him, and did so. But Michal told them he was sick in bed (v. 14), and, if they would not believe her, they might see, for (v. 13) she had put a wooden image in the bed, and wrapped it up close and warm as if it had been David asleep, not in a condition to be spoken to; the goats' hair about the image was to resemble David's hair, the better to impose upon them. Saul, when he heard it, gave positive orders: Bring him to me in the bed, that I may slay him, v. 15. When the messengers were sent again, the cheat was discovered, v. 16. But by this time David was safe, and Michal was not then much concerned at the discovery. Saul chid her for helping David to escape (v. 17).

I. David's place of refuge. Having got away in the night from his own house, he fled not to Bethlehem but ran straight to Samuel and told him all that Saul had done to him, v. 18. 1. Because Samuel was the man that had given him assurance of the crown. In flying to Samuel he made God his refuge, trusting in the shadow of his wings; where else can a good man think himself safe? 2. Because Samuel, as a prophet, was best able to advise him what to do in this day of his distress. 3. Because with Samuel there was a college of prophets with whom he might join in praising God, and this would be the greatest relief imaginable to him in his present distress. He met with little rest or satisfaction in Saul's court, and therefore went to seek it in Samuel's church.

II. David's protection in this place: He and Samuel went and dwelt (or lodged) in Naioth, where the school of the prophets was, in Ramath. But Saul, having notice of it by some of his spies (v. 19), sent officers to seize David, v. 20. When they did not bring him he sent more; when they returned not he sent the third time (v. 21), and, hearing no tidings of these, he went himself, v. 22. How was David delivered, now that he was just ready to fall (like his own lamb formerly) into the mouth of the lions? Not as he delivered his lamb, by slaying the lion, or, as Elijah was delivered, by consuming the messengers with fire from heaven, but by turning the lions for the present into lambs.

1. When the messengers came into the congregation where David was among the prophets the Spirit of God came upon them, and they joined with the priest in praising God. Instead of seizing David, they themselves were seized. And thus, (1) God secured David; for either they were put into such an ecstasy by the spirit of prophecy, that they could not think of anything else, and so forgot their errand and never minded David, or they were by it put, for the present, into so good a frame that they could not entertain the thought of doing so bad a thing. (2) He put an honour upon the sons of the prophets and the communion of saints, and showed how he can strike an awe upon the worst of men, by the tokens of his presence in the assemblies. See also the benefit of religious societies. (3) He magnified his power over the spirits of men.

2. Saul himself was likewise seized with the spirit of prophecy. One would have thought that so bad a man as he was in no danger of being turned into a prophet, yet he prophesies, as his messengers did, v. 23. He stripped off his royal robe and warlike habiliments, because they were either too fine or too heavy for this service, and fell into a trance as it should seem, or into a rapture, which continued all that day and night. Now the proverb recurs, Is Saul among the prophets? See ch. x. 12.

David, having several times narrowly escaped Saul's fury, begins to consider at last whether it may not be necessary for him to retire into the country and to take up arms in his own defence. But he will not do so daring a thing without consulting his faithful friend Jonathan. I. David complains to Jonathan of his present distress, and engages him to be his friend, ver. 1–8. II. Jonathan faithfully promises to get and give him intelligence how his father stood affected to him, and renews the covenant of friendship with him, ver. 9–23. III. Jonathan, upon trial, finds, to his grief, that his father was implacably enraged against David, ver. 24–34. IV. He gives David notice of this, according to the appointment between them, ver. 35–42.

I. While Saul lay bound by his trance at Naioth David escaped to the court, and got to speak with Jonathan. It was happy for him that he had such a friend at court, when he had such an enemy on the throne. If there be those that hate and despise us, let us not be disturbed at that, for there are those also that love and respect us. 1. David appeals to Jonathan himself concerning his innocency, What have I done? v. 1. 2. He endeavours to convince him that, notwithstanding his innocency, Saul sought his life. Jonathan, as became a dutiful son, endeavoured to cover his father's shame, as far as was consistent with justice and fidelity to David. David therefore gives him the assurance of an oath concerning his own danger, "As the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth, there is but a step between me and death," v. 3.

II. Jonathan generously offers him his service (v. 4): Whatsoever thou desirest I will even do it for thee.

III. David only desires him to satisfy himself, and then to satisfy him whether Saul did really design his death or no. 1. The method of trial he proposed was very natural. The two next days Saul was to dine publicly, upon occasion of the solemnities of the new moon, when extraordinary sacrifices were offered and feasts made upon the sacrifices. At these solemn feasts Saul had either all his children to sit with him, and David had a seat as one of them, or all his great officers, and David had a seat as one of them. However it was, David resolved his seat should be empty. If Saul admitted an excuse for his absence, he would conclude he had changed his mind and was reconciled to him; but if he resented it, and was put into a passion by it, it was easy to conclude he designed him a mischief. 2. The excuse he desired Jonathan to make for his absence, was that he was invited by his elder brother to Bethlehem, his own city, to celebrate with his relations there, because, they had now a yearly sacrifice, and a holy feast upon it, for all the family, v. 6. They kept a day of thanksgiving in their family for the comforts they enjoyed, and of prayer for the continuance of them. 3. The arguments he used with Jonathan to persuade him to do this kindness for him were very pressing, v. 8. (1) That he had entered into a league of friendship with him. (2) That he would by no means urge him to espouse his cause if he was not sure that it was a righteous cause. No honest man will urge his friend to do a dishonest thing for his sake.

I. Jonathan protests his fidelity to David in his distress. He faithfully promised him that he would let him know how, upon trial, he found his father affected towards him, "If there be good towards thee, I will show it thee, that thou mayest be easy (v. 12), if evil, I will send thee away, that thou mayest be safe" (v. 13); and thus he would help to deliver him from the evil if it were real and from the fear of evil if it were but imaginary. Jonathan adds to his protestations his hearty prayers: "The Lord be with thee, to protect and prosper thee, as he has been formerly with my father, though now he has withdrawn."

II. He provides for the entail of the covenant of friendship with David upon his posterity, v. 14–16. He engages David to be a friend to his family when he was gone (v. 15). The house of David must likewise be bound to the house of Jonathan from generation to generation; he made a covenant (v. 16) with the house of David. This kindness, 1. He calls the kindness of the Lord, because it is such kindness as God shows. 2. He secures it by an imprecation (v. 16): The Lord require it at the hand of David's seed if they prove so far David's enemies as to deal wrongfully with the posterity of Jonathan, David's friend. Having himself sworn to David, he caused David to swear to him, which David consented to swear by his love to him, which he looked upon as a sacred thing. Jonathan's heart was so much upon it that, when they parted this time, he concluded with a solemn appeal to God: The Lord be between me and thee for ever (v. 23). It was in remembrance of this covenant that David was kind to Mephibosheth, 2 Sam. ix. 7; xxi. 7.

III. He settled by what signs and tokens he would give him notice how his father stood affected towards him. David would be missed and would be enquired after, v. 18. On the third day, by which time he would have returned from Bethlehem, he must be at such a place (v. 19), and Jonathan would come towards that place with his bow and arrows to shoot for diversion (v. 20), would send his lad to fetch his arrows, and, if they were shot short of the lad, David must take it for a signal of safety, and not be afraid to show his head (v. 21); but, if he shot beyond the lad, it was a signal of danger, and he must shift for his safety, v. 22.

Jonathan is here effectually convinced of that which he was so loth to believe, that his father had an implacable enmity to David, and would certainly be the death of him if it were in his power.

I. David is missed from the feast on the first day, but nothing is said of him. The king sat upon his seat as at other times (v. 25), and yet had his heart full of envy and malice against David. When the king came to take his seat Jonathan arose, in reverence to him both as a father and as his sovereign; everyone knew his place, but David's was empty. But that day Saul took no notice that he missed David, but said within himself, "Surely he is not clean, v. 26. Some ceremonial pollution has befallen him."

II. He is enquired for the second day, v. 27. Saul asked Jonathan, who he knew was his confidant, Wherefore cometh not the son of Jesse to meat?

III. Jonathan makes his excuse, v. 28, 29. 1. That he was keeping the feast in another place, and that he had gone to pay his respects to his relations. He pleads, 2. That he did not go without leave humbly asked and obtained from Jonathan, as his superior officer.

IV. Saul hereupon breaks out into a most extravagant passion, and rages like a lion disappointed of his prey. David was out of his reach, but he falls upon Jonathan for his sake (v. 30, 31). He does in effect call him, 1. A bastard: Thou son of the perverse rebellious woman. 2. A traitor: Thou son of perverse rebellion (so the word is), that is, "thou perverse rebel." 3. A fool: Thou hast chosen the son of Jesse for thy friend to thy own confusion, for while he lives thou shalt never be established.

V. Jonathan is sorely grieved and put into disorder by his father's barbarous passion, and the more because he had hoped better things, v. 2. His father's reflections upon himself he made no return to. When thou art the anvil lie thou still. But his dooming David to die he could not bear: to that he replied with some heart (v. 32), Wherefore shall he be slain? What has he done? Generous spirits can much more easily bear to be abused themselves than to hear their friends abused. Saul was now so outrageous that he threw his javelin at Jonathan, v. 33. Jonathan rose from table, thinking it high time when his life was struck at, and would eat no meat.

1. He went at the time and to the place appointed (v. 35), within sight of which he knew David lay hid, sent his footboy to fetch his arrows, which he would shoot at random (v. 36), and gave David the fatal signal by shooting an arrow beyond the lad (v. 37). Finding the coast clear and no danger of a discovery, he presumed upon one minute's personal conversation with David after he had bidden him flee for his life. 2. The most sorrowful parting of these two friends, who, for aught that appears, never came together again but once, and that was by stealth in a wood, ch. xxiii. 16. They took leave of each other with the greatest affection imaginable, with kisses and tears. The separation of two such faithful friends was equally grievous to them both, but David's case was the more deplorable; for, when Jonathan was returning to his family and friends, David was leaving all his comforts, even those of God's sanctuary.

CHAP. XXI

David has now quite taken leave of Saul's court, and henceforward to the end of this book he is looked upon and treated as an outlaw and proclaimed a traitor. His troubles are a key to the Psalms. We find David in his flight, I. Imposing upon Ahimelech the priest, to get from him both victuals and arms, ver. 1–9. II. Imposing upon Achish, king of Gath, by feigning himself mad, ver. 10–15. Justly are troubles called temptations, for many are by them drawn into sin.

Verses 1 9

I. David, in distress, flies to the tabernacle of God, now pitched at Nob, supposed to be a city in the tribe of Benjamin. Since Shiloh was forsaken, the tabernacle was often removed, though the ark still remained at Kirjath-jearim. Hither David came in his flight from Saul's fury (v. 1), and applied to Ahimelech the the priest. Samuel the prophet could not protect him, Jonathan the prince could not. He therefore has recourse next to Ahimelech the priest. He foresees he must not be an exile, and therefore comes to the tabernacle, 1. To take an affecting leave of it, for he knows now when he shall see it again. 2. To enquire of the Lord there, and to beg direction from him in the way both of duty and safety.

II. Ahimelech the priest, having heard that he had fallen into disgrace at court, looked shy upon him, as most are apt to do upon their friends when the world frowns upon them. He was afraid of incurring Saul's displeasure by entertaining him. Why art thou alone? He that was suddenly advanced from the solitude of a shepherd's life to the crowds and hurries of the camp is now as soon reduced to the desolate condition of an exile.

III. David, under pretence of being sent by Saul upon public services, solicits Ahimelech to supply his present wants, v. 2, 3.

1. David did not behave like himself. He told Ahimelech a gross untruth, that Saul had ordered him business to despatch, that his attendants were dismissed to such a place, and that he was charged to observe secrecy. This was all false. It was ill done, and proved of bad consequence; for it occasioned the death of the priests of the Lord, as David reflected upon it afterwards with regret, ch. xxii. 22. David was a man of great faith and courage, and yet now both failed him, and he fell thus foully through fear and cowardice, and both owing to the weakness of his faith.

2. Two things David begged of Ahimelech, bread and a sword.

(1) He wanted bread: Five loaves, v. 3. The priest objected that he had none but hallowed bread, show-bread, which had stood a week on the golden table in the sanctuary, and was taken thence for the use of the priests and their families, v. 4. David pleads that he and those that were with him, in this case of necessity, might lawfully eat of the hallowed bread, for they were not only able to answer his terms of keeping from women for three days past, but the vessels (that is, the bodies) of the young men were holy, being possessed in sanctification and honour at all times. He pleads that the bread is in a manner common now that what was primarily the religious use of it is over; especially (as our margin reads it) when there is other bread (hot, v. 6) sanctified this day in the vessel, and put in the room of it upon the table. This was David's plea, and the Son of David approves it, and shows from it that mercy is to be preferred to sacrifice, that ritual observances must give way to moral duties, and that that may be done in a case of an urgent providential necessity which may not otherwise be done. He brings it to justify his disciples in plucking the ears of corn on the sabbath day, for which the Pharisees censured them, Matt. xii. 3, 4. Ahimelech hereupon supplies him: He gave him hallowed bread (v. 6). The show-bread was but twelve loaves in all, yet out of these he gave David five (v. 3), though they had no more in the house; but he trusted Providence.

(2) He wanted a sword. It happened that he had now no weapons with him, the reason of which he pretends to be because he came away in haste, v. 8. There was not a sword to be found about the tabernacle but the sword of Goliath, which was laid up behind the ephod. Probably David had an eye to that when he asked the priest to help him with a sword; for, that being mentioned, O! says he, there is none like that, give it to me, v. 9. Two things we may observe concerning this sword: Whenever he looked upon it, it would be a great support to his faith, by bringing to mind that great instance of the particular care and countenance of the divine providence respecting him. Experiences are great encouragements. He had gratefully given it back to God, dedicating it to him and to his honour as a token of his thankfulness; and now in his distress it stood him greatly in stead.

Thus was David well furnished with arms and victuals; but it fell out very unhappily that there was one of Saul's servants then attending before the Lord, Doeg by name, that proved a base traitor both to David and to Ahimelech. He was by birth an Edomite (v. 7), and though proselyted to the Jewish religion under Saul, yet he retained the ancient and hereditary enmity of Edom to Israel. He was master of the herds. Some occasion or other he had at this time to wait on the priest, it is said, he was detained before the Lord. He would rather have been any where else than before the Lord, and therefore, instead of minding the business he came about, was plotting to do David a mischief and to be revenged on Ahimelech for detaining him.

David, though king elect, is here an exile. Thus do God's providences sometimes seem to run counter to his promises. 1. David's flight into the land of the Philistines, where he hoped to remain undiscovered in the camp of Achish king of Gath, v. 10. To him David now went directly, as to one he could confide in, as afterwards (ch. xxvii. 2, 3). God's persecuted people have often found better usage from Philistines than from Israelites, in the Gentile theatres than in the Jewish synagogues. The king of Judah imprisoned Jeremiah, and the king of Babylon set him at liberty. 2. The disgust which the servants of Achish took at his being there, and their complaint of it to Achish (v. 11): "Is not this David? Is not this he that has triumphed over the Philistines?" As such, he must be an enemy to our country; and is it safe or honourable for us to protect or entertain such a man? Achish perhaps had intimated to them that it would be policy to entertain David, because he was now an enemy to Saul, and he might be hereafter a friend to them. It is common for the outlaws of a nation to be sheltered by the enemies of that nation. 3. The fright which this put David into. Though he had some reason to put confidence in Achish, yet, when he perceived the servants of Achish jealous of him, he began to be afraid that Achish would be obliged to deliver him up to them, and he was sorely afraid (v. 12). 4. The course he took to get out of their hands: He feigned himself mad, v. 13. It may in some degree be excused, for it was like a stratagem in war, by which he imposed upon his enemies for the preservation of his own life. 5. His escape by this means, v. 14, 15. I am apt to think Achish was aware that the delirium was but counterfeit, but, being desirous to protect David (as we find afterwards he was very kind to him, even when the lords of the Philistines favoured him not, ch. xxviii. 1, 2; xxix. 6), he pretended to his servants that he really thought he was mad. "I will show him no kindness, but then you shall do him no hurt, for, if he be a madman, he is to be pitied." He therefore drove him away, as it is in the title of Ps. xxxiv.

CHAP. XXII

David, being driven from Achish, returns into the land of Israel to be hunted by Saul. I. David sets up his standard in the cave of Adullam, entertains his relations (ver. 1), enlists soldiers (ver 2), but removes his aged parents to a more quiet settlement (ver. 3, 4), and has the prophet Gad for his counsellor, ver. 5. Saul resolves to pursue him and find him out, complains of his servants and Jonathan (ver. 6–8), and, finding by Doeg's information that Ahimelech had been kind to David, he ordered him and all the priests that were with him, eighty-five in all, to be put to death, and all that belonged to them destroyed (ver. 9–19) from the barbarous execution of which sentence Abiathar escaped to David, ver. 20–23.

Verses 1–5

I. David shelters himself in the cave of Adullam, v. 1. Whether it was a natural or artificial fastness does not appear; it is probable that the access to it was so difficult that David thought himself able, with Goliath's sword, to keep it against all the forces of Saul, while he was waiting to see (as he says here, v. 3) what God would do with him. The promise of the kingdom implied a promise of preservation to it, and yet David used proper means for his own safety, otherwise he would have tempted God. He did not do anything that aimed to destroy Saul, but only to secure himself. It was at this time that David penned Psalm cxlii, which is entitled, A prayer when David was in the cave.

II. Thither his relations flocked to him, his brethren and all his father's house, to be protected by him, to give assistance to him, and to take their lot with him. Now Joab, and Abishai, and the rest of his relations, came to him, to suffer and venture with him.

III. Here he began to raise forces in his own defence, v. 2. He found by the late experiments he had made that he could not save himself by flight, and therefore was necessitated to do it by force, wherein he never acted offensively, never offered any violence to his prince nor gave any disturbance to the peace of the kingdom but only used his forces as a guard to his own person. The regiment he had was made up not of great men, nor rich men, nor stout men, no, nor good men, but men in distress, in debt, and discontented, men of broken fortunes and restless spirits, that were put to their shifts, and knew not well what to do with themselves. When David had fixed his headquarters in the cave of Adullam, they came and enlisted themselves under him to the number of about 400.

IV. He took care to settle his parents in a place of safety. No such place could he find in all the land of Israel while Saul was so bitterly enraged against him and all that belonged to him for his sake; he therefore goes with them to the king of Moab, and puts them under his protection, v. 3, 4. The first thing he does is to find them a quiet habitation, whatever became of himself. With what a humble faith he expects the issue of his present distresses: Till I know what God will do for me.

V. He had the advice and assistance of the prophet Gad, who probably was one of the sons of the prophets that were brought up under Samuel, and was by him recommended to David for his chaplain or spiritual guide. He advised him to go into the land of Judah (v. 5), as one that was confident of his own innocency, and was well assured of the divine protection, and was desirous, even in his present hard circumstances, to do some service to his tribe and country.

The progress of Saul's wickedness. He seems to have laid aside the thoughts of all other business and to have devoted himself wholly to the pursuit of David. He heard at length, by the common fame of the country, that David was discovered. Hereupon he called all his servants about him, and sat down under a tree, or grove, in the high place at Gibeah, with his spear in his hand for a sceptre, intimating the present temper of his spirit, or its distemper rather, which was to kill all that stood in his way. In this bloody court of inquisition,

I. Saul seeks for information against David and Jonathan, v. 7, 8. Two things he was willing to suspect. 1. That his servant David did lie in wait for him and seek his life, which was utterly false. He really sought David's life. 2. That his son Jonathan stirred him up to do so, and was confederate with him in compassing and imagining the death of the king. This also was notoriously false. Saul took it for granted that Jonathan and David were in a plot against him, his crown and dignity and was displeased with his servants that they did not give him information of it, and told them, (1) That they were very unwise, for David would never be able to give them such rewards as he had for them. (2) That they were unfaithful: You have conspired against me. (3) That they were very unkind. He thought to work upon their good nature with that word: There is none of you that is so much as sorry for me, or solicitous for me, as some read it.

II. Though he could not learn anything from his servants against David or Jonathan, yet he got information from Doeg against Ahimelech the priest.

1. An indictment is brought against Ahimelech by Doeg, and he himself is evidence against him, v. 9, 10, and therefore tells Saul what kindness Ahimelech had shown to David. He had enquired of God for him (which the priest used not to do but for public persons and about public affairs) and he had furnished him with bread and a sword. All this was true; but it was not the whole truth. He ought to have told Saul further that David had made Ahimelech believe he was then going upon the king's business; so that what service he did to David, however it proved, was designed in honour to Saul, and this would have cleared Ahimelech.

2. Ahimelech is summoned to appear before the king, and upon this indictment he is arraigned. The king sent for him and all the priests who then attended the sanctuary, whom he supposed to be aiding and abetting. Saul arraigns Ahimelech himself with the utmost disdain and indignation (v. 12): Hear now, thou son of Ahitub; not so much as calling him by his name, much less giving him his title of distinction. Ahimelech holds up his hand at the bar in these words: "Here I am, my lord, ready to hear my charge, knowing I have done no wrong."

3. His indictment is read to him (v. 13), that he, as a false traitor, had joined himself with the son of Jesse in a plot to depose and murder the king. "His design" (says Saul) "was to rise up against me, and thou didst assist him with victuals and arms." See what bad constructions the most innocent actions are liable to, how unsafe those are that live under a tyrannical government, and what reason we have to be thankful for the happy constitution and administration of the government we are under.

4. To this indictment he pleads, Not guilty, v. 14, 15. He owns the fact, but denies that he did it traitorously or maliciously, or with any design against the king. He insists upon the settled reputation David had, as the most faithful of all the servants of Saul, the honour the king had put upon him in marrying his daughter to him, the use the king had often made of him, and the trust he had reposed in him. He pleads that he had been wont to enquire of God for him when he was sent by Saul upon any expedition, and did it now as innocently as ever he had done it.

5. Saul himself gives judgment against him (v. 16): Thou shalt surely die, Ahimelech, as a rebel, thou and all thy father's house. What could be more unjust? (1) It was unjust that Saul should himself, himself alone, give judgment in his own cause. (2) That so fair a plea should be overruled and rejected without any reason given. (3) That sentence should be passed so hastily. (4) That the sentences should be passed not only on Ahimelech himself, who was the only person accused by Doeg, but on all his father's house, against whom nothing was alleged. (5) That the sentence should be pronounced not for the support of justice, but for the gratification of his brutish rage.

6. He issues a warrant for the immediate execution of this bloody sentence.

(1) He ordered his footmen to be the executioners of this sentence, but they refused, v. 17. [1] Never was the command of a prince more barbarously given: Turn and slay the priests of the Lord. He seems well pleased with this opportunity of being revenged on the priests of the Lord, since God himself was out of his reach. [2] Never was the command of a prince more honourably disobeyed. The footmen had more sense and grace than their master. They would not offer to fall upon the priests of the Lord, such a reverence had they for their office, and such a conviction of their innocence.

(2) He ordered Doeg (the accuser) to be the executioner, and he obeyed. The most bloody tyrants have found out instruments of their cruelty as barbarous as themselves. Doeg is no sooner commanded to fall upon the priests than he does it willingly enough, and, meeting with no resistance, slays with his own hand (for aught that appears) on that same day eighty-five priests that were of the age of ministration, between twenty and fifty, for they wore a linen ephod (v. 18), and perhaps appeared at this time before Saul in their habits, and were slain in them. Doeg, by Saul's order no doubt, having murdered the priests, went to their city Nob, and put all to the sword there (v. 19), men, women, and children, and the cattle too. How deplorable was the state of religion at this time in Israel! To see their priests weltering in their own blood, and the heirs of the priesthood too, and the city of the priests made a desolation, so that the altar of God must needs be neglected for want of attendants, and this by the unjust and cruel order of their own king to satisfy his brutish rage—this could not but go to the heart of all pious Israelites, and make them wish a thousand times they had been satisfied with the government of Samuel and his sons.

1. The escape of Abiathar, the son of Ahimelech, out of the desolations of the priests' city. Probably when his father went to appear, upon Saul's summons, he was left at home to attend the altar, by which means he escaped the first execution, and, before Doeg and his bloodhounds came to Nob, he had intelligence of the danger, and had time to shift for his own safety. And whither should he go but to David? v. 20. 2. David's resentment of the melancholy tidings he brought. David greatly lamented the calamity itself, but especially his being accessory to it: I have occasioned the death of all the persons of thy father's house, v. 22. 3. The protection he granted to Abiathar. With me thou shalt be in safeguard, v. 23. David, having now time to recollect himself, speaks with assurance of his own safety, and promises that Abiathar shall have the full benefit of his protection. David had now not only a prophet, but a priest, a high-priest, with him, to whom he was a blessing and they to him, and both a happy omen of his success. Yet it appears (by ch. xxviii. 6) that Saul had a high priest too, for he preferred Ahitub the father of Zadok, of the family of Eleazar (1 Chron. vi. 8), even those that hate the power of godliness yet will not be without the form.

CHAP. XXIII

Saul, having made himself drunk with the blood of the priests of the Lord, is here, in this chapter, seeking David's life, who appears doing good, and suffering ill. I. The good service he did to his king and country, in rescuing the city of Keilah out of the hands of the Philistines, ver. 1–6. II. The danger he was thereby brought into and his deliverance, by divine direction, from that danger, ver. 7–13. III. David in a wood, and his friend Jonathan visiting him there and encouraging him, ver. 14–18. IV. The information which the Ziphites brought to Saul of David's haunts, and the expedition Saul made, in pursuit of him, ver. 19–25. The narrow escape David had of falling into his hands, ver. 26–29.

The prophet Gad ordered David to go into the land of Judah, ch. xxii. 5. Since Saul neglected the public safety, he might take care of it, notwithstanding the ill treatment that was given him.

I. Tidings are brought to David that the Philistines had made a descent upon the city of Keilah and plundered the country thereabouts, v. 1. The way for any country to be quiet is to let God's church be quiet in it. If Saul fight against David, the Philistines shall fight against his country.

II. David is forward enough to come in for their relief. 1. David's generosity and public-spiritedness. He was concerned for the safety of his country and could not sit still to see that ravaged: though Saul, whose business it was to guard the borders of his land, hated him and sought his life. 2. David's piety and regard to God. He enquired of the Lord by the prophet Gad: Shall I go and smite these Philistines?

III. God appointed him once and again to go against the Philistines, and promised him success: Go, and smite the Philistines, v. 2. His men opposed it, v. 3. To satisfy them, therefore, he enquired of the Lord again, and now received, not only a full commission, which would warrant him to fight though he had no orders from Saul (Arise, go down to Keilah), but also a full assurance of victory: I will deliver the Philistines into thy hand, v. 4.

IV. He went accordingly against the Philistines, routed them, and rescued Keilah, (v. 5), and it should seem he made a sally into the country of the Philistines, for he carried off their cattle by way of reprisal for the wrong they did to the men of Keilah in robbing their threshing-floors.

I. Saul contriving within himself the destruction of David (v. 7, 8). Was it not told him that he had bravely relieved Keilah and delivered it out of the hands of the Philistines? This should have put Saul upon considering what honour should be done to David. But, instead of that, he catches at it as an opportunity of doing David a mischief. 1. How Saul abused the God of Israel. God hath delivered him into my hand; as if he who was rejected of God were in this instance favoured by him. He impiously connects God with his cause, because he thought he had gained one point. 2. How Saul abused the Israel of God, in making them the servants of his malice against David. He called all the people together to march to Keilah, pretending to oppose the Philistines, but intending to besiege David and his men.

II. David consulting with God concerning his own preservation. No sooner is the ephod brought to him than he makes use of it: Bring hither the ephod. We have the scriptures, those lively oracles, in our hands; let us take advice from them in doubtful cases. "Bring hither the Bible."

1. David's address to God upon this occasion is, (1) Very solemn and reverent. Twice he calls God the Lord God of Israel, and thrice calls himself his servant, v. 10, 11. "Lord, direct me in this matter, about which I am now at a loss." If he had asked the men (the magistrates or elders) of Keilah themselves what they would do in that case, they could not have told him, not knowing their own minds, or they might have told him they would protect him, and yet afterwards have betrayed him; but God could tell him infallibly: "When Saul besieges their city, and demands of them that they surrender thee into his hands, they will deliver thee up rather than stand the shock of Saul's fury."

2. David, having thus far notice given him of his danger, quitted Keilah, v. 13. His followers had now increased in number to 600; with these he went out, not knowing whither he went, but resolving to follow Providence. This broke Saul's measures. He thought God had delivered David into his hand, but it proved that God delivered him out of his hand, as a bird out of the snare of the fowler.

Verses 14–18

I. David abode in a wilderness, in a mountain (v. 14), in a wood, v. 15. He did not draw up his forces against Saul, surprise him by some stratagem or other, and so avenge his own quarrel and put an end to the calamities of the country under Saul's tyrannical government. He keeps God's way, waits God's time, and is content to secure himself in woods and wilderness. What shall we say to this? Let it reconcile even great and active men to privacy and restraint, and let it make us long for that kingdom where goodness shall for ever be in glory and holiness in honour.

II. Saul hunting him, as his implacable enemy. He sought him every day, so restless was his malice, v. 14.

III. God defending him, as his powerful protector. God delivered him not into Saul's hand, as Saul hoped (v. 7).

IV. Jonathan comforting him as his faithful and constant friend. True friendship will not shrink from danger, but can easily venture, will not shrink from condescension, but can easily stoop, and exchange a palace for a wood, to serve a friend. The very sight of Jonathan was reviving to David. 1. As a pious friend he strengthened his hand in God. David, though a strong believer, needed the help of his friends for the perfecting of what was lacking in his faith; and herein Jonathan was helpful to him, by reminding him of the promise of God. Jonathan was not in a capacity of doing anything to strengthen him, but he assured him God would. 2. As a self-denying friend, he took a pleasure in the prospect of David's advancement to that honour which was his own birthright, v. 17. "Thou shalt live to be king, and I shall think it preferment enough to be next thee, near thee, though under thee, and will never pretend to be a rival with thee." 3. As a constant friend, he renewed his league of friendship with him, v. 18. True love takes delight in repeating its engagements. Our covenant with God should be often renewed, and therein our communion with him kept up. David and Jonathan now parted, and never came together again in this world.

1. The Ziphites offer their service to Saul, to betray David to him, v. 19, 20. He was sheltering himself in the wilderness of Ziph (v. 14, 15), putting the more confidence in the people of that country because they were of his own tribe. But, to ingratiate themselves with Saul, they went to him, and not only informed him where David quartered (v. 19), but invited him to come into their country and promised to deliver him into his hand, v. 20. 2. Saul thankfully receives their information, and gladly lays hold of the opportunity of hunting David in their wilderness. He likewise insinuates the little concern that the generality of his people showed for him. "You have compassion on me, which others have not." It was strange that Saul did not go down with them immediately, but the Ziphites had laid their spies upon all the places where he was likely to be discovered, and therefore Saul thought himself sure of his prey. 3. The imminent peril that David was now brought into. Upon intelligence that the Ziphites had betrayed him, he retired from the hill of Hachilah to the wilderness of Maon (v. 24), and at this time he penned the 54th Psalm, as appears by the title, wherein he calls the Ziphites strangers, though they were Israelites, because they used him barbarously; but he puts himself under the divine protection: "Behold, God is my helper, and then all shall be well." Saul pursued him closely (v. 25), till he came so near him that there was but a mountain between them (v. 26), David and his men on one side of the mountain flying and Saul and his men on the other side pursuing. But this mountain was an emblem of the divine Providence coming between David and the destroyer, like the pillar of cloud between the Israelites and the Egyptians. David was concealed by this mountain and Saul confounded by it. Saul hoped with his numerous forces to enclose David, but the ground did not prove convenient for his design, and so it failed. A new name was given to the place in remembrance of this (v. 28): Selah-hammahlekoth—the rock of division, because it divided between Saul and David. 4. The deliverance of David out of this danger. Providence gave Saul a diversion, when he was just ready to lay hold of David; notice was brought him that the Philistines were invading the land (v. 27). He found himself under a necessity of going against the Philistines (v. 28), and by this means David was delivered. As this Saul was diverted, so another Saul was converted, just then when he was breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the saints of the Lord, Acts. ix. 1. 5. David having thus escaped, took shelter in some natural fortresses, which he found in the wilderness of En-gedi, v. 29.

CHAP. XXIV

David had a fair opportunity to destroy Saul, and, to his honour, he did not make use of it; and his sparing Saul's life was as great an instance of God's grace in him as the preserving of his own life was of God's providence over him. I. How maliciously Saul sought David's life, ver. 1, 2. II. How generously David saved

Saul's life (when he had him at an advantage) and only cut off the skirt of his robe, ver. 3–8. III. How pathetically he reasoned with Saul, upon this, to bring him to a better temper towards him, ver. 9–15. IV. The good impression this made upon Saul for the present, ver. 16–22.

I. Saul renews his pursuit of David, v. 1, 2. Hearing that he is in the wilderness of En-gedi, he draws out 3,000 choice men, and goes in pursuit of him upon the rocks of the wild goats.

II. Providence brings Saul alone into the same cave wherein David and his men had hidden themselves, v. 3. In those countries there were very large caves in the sides of the rocks or mountains, partly natural, but probably much enlarged by art for the sheltering of sheep from the heat of the sun; hence we read of places where the flocks did rest at noon (Cant. i. 7), and this cave seems to be spoken of as one of the sheep-cotes. Saul, passing by, turned in himself alone. He turned aside to cover his feet, that is, to sleep awhile.

III. David's servants stir him up to kill Saul now that he has so fair an opportunity to do it, v. 4. Saul now lay at his mercy. How apt we are to misunderstand, 1. The promises of God. God had assured David that he would deliver him from Saul, and his men interpret this as a warrant to destroy Saul. 2. The providences of God. Because it was now in his power to kill him, they concluded he might lawfully do it.

IV. David cut off the skirt of his robe, but soon repented that he had done this because it was an affront to Saul's royal dignity.

V. He reasons strongly both with himself and with his servants against doing Saul any hurt. 1. He reasons with himself (v. 6): The Lord forbid that I should do this thing. He considered Saul now, not as his enemy but as God's anointed (that is, the person whom God had appointed to reign as long as he lived, and who, as such, was under the particular protection of the divine law). 2. He reasons with his servants: He suffered them not to rise against Saul, v. 7. Thus did he render good for evil and was herein both a type of Christ, who saved his persecutors, and an example to all Christians.

VI. He followed Saul out of the cave, and, though he would not take the opportunity to slay him, yet he wisely took the opportunity, if possible, to slay his enmity, by convincing him that he was not such a man as he took him for. 1. Even in showing his head now he testified that he had an honourable opinion of Saul. 2. His behaviour was very respectful: He stooped with his face to the earth, and bowed himself.

David's warm and pathetic speech to Saul to persuade him to be reconciled.

I. He calls him father (v. 11), for he was not only, as king, the father of his country, but he was, in particular, his father-in-law.

II. He lays the blame of his rage against him upon his evil counsellors: Wherefore hearest thou men's words? v. 9.

III. He solemnly protests his own innocence, and that he is far from designing any hurt or mischief to Saul: "There is neither evil nor transgression in my hand, v. 11. Perhaps it was about this time that David penned the seventh psalm, concerning the affair of Cush the Benjamite (that is, Saul, as some think).

IV. He produces undeniable evidence to prove the falsehood of the suggestion upon which Saul's malice against him was grounded. David was charged with seeking Saul's hurt: "See," says he, "yea, see the skirt of thy robe, v. 11. Had that been true of which I am accused, I should now have had thy head in my hand." The Lord delivered thee, very surprisingly, to-day into my hand. Some bade me kill thee. It was upon a good principle that he refused to do it; by the fear of God he was restrained from it. Such a happy command he had of himself that his nature, in the midst of the greatest provocation, was not suffered to rebel against his principles.

V. He declares it to be his fixed resolution never to be his own avenger: "The Lord avenge me of thee, that is, deliver me out of thy hand; but, whatever comes of it, my hand shall not be upon thee" (v. 12). Bad men will do bad things; according as men's principles and dispositions are, so will their actions be.

VI. He endeavours to convince Saul that as it was a bad thing, so it was a mean thing, for him to give chase to such an inconsiderable person as he was (v. 14): Whom does the king of Israel pursue with all this care and force? A dead dog; a flea; one flea, so it is in the Hebrew. It is below so great a king to enter the lists with one that is so unequal a match for him, one of his own servants, bred a poor shepherd, now an exile, neither able nor willing to make any resistance. What credit would it be to Saul to trample upon a dead dog? What pleasure could it be to him to hunt a flea, a single flea, which (as some have observed), if it be sought, is not easily found, if it be found, is not easily caught, and, if it be caught, is a poor prize, especially for a prince.

VII. He once and again appeals to God as the righteous Judge (v. 12 and v. 15): The Lord judge between me and thee.

I. Saul's penitent reply to David's speech. 1. He melted into tears. He speaks as one quite overcome with David's kindness: Is this thy voice, my son David? He lifted up his voice and wept, v. 16. 2. He ingenuously acknowledges David's integrity and his own iniquity (v. 17): Thou art more righteous than I. This fair confession was enough to prove David innocent (even his enemy himself being judge), but not enough to prove Saul himself a true penitent. 3. He prays God to recompense David for this his generous kindness to him. The Lord reward thee good, v. 19. 4. He prophesies his advancement to the throne (v. 20): I know well that thou shalt surely be king. He knew it before, by the promise Samuel had made him of it compared with the excellent spirit that appeared in David, which highly aggravated his sin and folly in persecuting him as he did. This acknowledgment which Saul made of David's incontestable title to the crown was a great encouragement to David himself and a support to his faith and hope. 5. He binds David with an oath hereafter to show the same tenderness of his seed and of his name as he had now shown of his person, v. 21. This oath he afterwards religiously observed: he supported Mephibosheth, and executed those as traitors that slew Ish-bosheth.

II. Their parting in peace. 1. Saul, for the present, desisted from the persecution. He went home convinced, but not converted; ashamed of his envy of David, yet retaining in his breast that root of bitterness; vexed that, when at last he had found David, he could not at that time find in his heart to destroy him, as he had designed. 2. David continued to shift for his own safety. He knew Saul too well to trust him, and therefore got him up into the hold.

CHAP. XXV

The troubles of David. I. Tidings of the death of Samuel could not but trouble him, ver. 1. But, II. The abuse he received from Nabal is more largely recorded in this chapter. 1. The character of Nabal, ver. 2, 3. 2. The humble request sent to him, ver. 4–9. 3. His churlish answer, ver. 10–12. 4. David's angry resentment of it, ver. 13, 21, 22. 5. Abigail's prudent care to prevent the mischief it was likely to bring upon her family, ver. 14–20.

6. Her address to David to pacify him, ver. 23–31. 7. David's favourable reception of her, ver. 32–35. 8. The death of Nabal, ver. 36–38. 9 Abigail's marriage to David, ver. 39–44.

Verse 1

A short account of Samuel's death and burial. 1. Though he was a great man he spent the latter end of his days in retirement and obscurity because Israel had rejected him, for which God thus justly chastised them. 2. Though he was a firm friend to David, for which Saul hated him, yet he died in peace even in the worst of the days of the tyranny of Saul. Though Saul loved him not, yet he feared him, as Herod did John, and feared the people, for all knew him to be a prophet. 3. All Israel lamented him. His personal merits commanded this honour to be done him at his death. His former services to the public, when he judged Israel, made this respect to his name and memory a just debt. The sons of the prophets had lost the founder of their colleges. But Samuel was a constant intercessor for Israel, ch. xii. 23. If he go, they part with the best friend they have. 4. They buried him, not in the school of the prophets at Naioth, but in his own house at Ramah, where he was born. 5. David, hereupon, went down to the wilderness of Paran, retiring perhaps to mourn for the death of Samuel. Now that he had lost so good a friend, he apprehended his danger to be greater than ever, and therefore withdrew to a wilderness out of the limits of the land of Israel; and now it was that he dwelt in the tents of Kedar, Ps. cxx 5.

The story of Nabal.

I. A short account of a man we should never have heard of if there had not happened some communication between him and David. 1. His name: Nabal—a fool; so it signifies. 2. His family: He was of the house of Caleb and inherited Caleb's estate; for Maon and Carmel lay near Hebron, which was given to Caleb (Josh. xv. 54, 55; xiv. 14), but he was far from inheriting his virtues. The LXX, and some other ancient versions, read it: He was a dogged man, of a currish disposition, surly and snappish, and always snarling. 3. His wealth: He was very great, that is, very rich (for riches make men look great in the eye of the world), otherwise, to one that takes his measures aright, he really looked very mean. 4. His wife—Abigail, a woman of great understanding. Her name signifies, the joy of her father; yet he could not promise himself much joy of her when he married her to such a husband, enquiring more after his wealth than after his wisdom. Many a child is thrown away upon a heap of worldly wealth, married to that, and to nothing else that is desirable. Many an Abigail is tied to a Nabal. 5. His character. He had no sense either of honour or honesty; not of honour, for he was churlish, cross, and ill-humoured; not of honesty, for he was evil in his doings, hard and oppressive.

II. David's humble request to him, that he would send him some victuals for himself and his men.

1. David, it seems, was in such distress that he would be glad to be beholden to him, and did in effect come a begging to his door.

2. He chose a good time to send to Nabal, when he had many hands employed about him in shearing his sheep, for whom he was to make a plentiful entertainment, so that good cheer was stirring. It was usual to make feasts at their sheep-shearings, as appears by Absalom's feast on that occasion (2 Sam. xiii. 24).

3. David ordered his men to deliver their message to him with a great deal of courtesy and respect: "Go to Nabal, and greet him in my name", v. 5. Thus shall you say to him that liveth: "Peace be to thee, all good both to soul and body. Peace be to thy house and to all that thou hast." He bids them call him his son David (v. 8), intimating that David honoured him as a father.

4. He pleaded the kindness which Nabal's shepherds had received from David and his men. (1) They did not hurt them themselves, were not a terror to them, nor took any of the lambs out of the flock. Yet, considering the character of David's men, men in distress, and debt, and discontented, and the scarcity of provisions in his camp, it was not without a great deal of care and good management that they were kept from plundering. (2) They protected them from being hurt by others. Nabal's servants, to whom he appealed, went further (v. 16): They were a wall unto us, both by night and day. David's soldiers were a guard to Nabal's shepherds when the bands of the Philistines robbed the threshing-floors (ch. xxiii. 1) and would have robbed the sheepfolds. From those plunderers Nabal's flocks were protected by David's care, and therefore he says, Let us find favour in thy eyes.

5. He was very modest in his request. "Give whatsoever comes to thy hand, and we will be thankful for it." David demands not what he wanted as a debt, either by way of tribute as he was a king, or by way of contribution as he was a general, but asks it as a boon to a friend, that was his humble servant.

III. Nabal's churlish answer to this modest petition, v. 10, 11. Nabal not only denied him, but abused him. 1. He speaks scornfully of David as an insignificant man, not worth taking notice of. The Philistines could say of him, This is David the king of the land, that slew his ten thousands (ch. xxi. 11), yet Nabal his near neighbour, and one of the same tribe, affects not to know him, or not to know him to be a man of any merit or distinction: Who is David? And who is the son of Jesse? 2. He upbraids him with his present distress, and takes occasion from it to represent him as a bad man, that was fitter to be set in the stocks for a vagrant than to have any kindness shown him. How naturally does he speak the churlish clownish language of those that hate to give alms! David was reduced to this distress, not by any fault but purely by the good services he had done to his country and the honours which his God had put upon him; and yet he was represented as a fugitive and runagate. 3. He insists much upon the property he had in the provisions of his table, and will by no means admit anybody to share in them. We mistake if we think we are absolute lords of what we have and may do what we please with it. No, we are but stewards, and must use it as we are directed, remembering it is not our own, but his that entrusted us with it.

I. The report made to David of the abuse Nabal had given to his messengers (v. 12): They turned their way. They showed their displeasure by breaking off abruptly from such a churl. Christ's servants, when they are thus abused, must leave it to him to plead his own cause and wait till he appear in it.

II. David's hasty resolution hereupon. He girded on his sword, and ordered his men to do so too. 1. He repented of the kindness he had done to Nabal, and looked upon it as thrown away upon him. He said, "Surely in vain have I kept all that this fellow hath in the wilderness." 2. He determined to destroy Nabal and all that belonged to him, v. 22. Here David did not act like himself. His resolution was bloody, to cut off all the males of Nabal's house. The ratification of his resolution was passionate: So, and more also do God to the enemies of David. Is this thy voice, O David? Is this he who but the other day spared him who sought his life, and yet now will not spare anything that belongs to him who has only put an affront upon his messengers? He who at other times used to be calm and considerate is now put into such a heat by a few hard words that nothing will atone for them but the blood of a whole family. What are the best of men, when God leaves them to themselves? From Nabal he expected kindness, and therefore the affront he gave him was a surprise to him, found him off his guard, and, by a sudden and unexpected attack, put him for the present into disorder. What need have we to pray, Lord, lead us not into temptation!

III. The account given of this matter to Abigail by one of the servants, who was more considerate than the rest, v. 14. Abigail, being a woman of good understanding, took cognizance of the matter, even from her servant, who, 1. Did David justice in commending him and his men for their civility to Nabal's shepherds, v. 15, 16. "The men were very good to us, and, though they were themselves exposed, yet they protected us and were a wall unto us." 2. He did Nabal no wrong in condemning him for his rudeness to David's messengers: He railed on them (v. 14), he flew upon them (so the word is) with an intolerable rage; "for," say they, "it is his usual practice," v. 17. 3. He did Abigail and the whole family a kindness in making her sensible what was likely to be the consequence. Something therefore must be done to pacify David.

An account of Abigail's prudent management for the preserving of her husband and family from the destruction that was just coming upon them. Wisdom in such a case as this was better than weapons of war. 1. It was her wisdom that what she did she did quickly, and without delay. Those that desire conditions of peace must send when the enemy is yet a great way off, Luke xiv. 32. 2. It was her wisdom that what she did she did herself, being a woman of great prudence and very happy address.

Abigail must endeavour to atone for Nabal's faults.

I. By a most generous present, Abigail atones for his denial of their request. Abigail prepares the very best the house afforded and abundance of it (v. 18), not only bread and flesh, but raisins and figs. Nabal grudged them water, but she took two bottles (casks or rundlets) of wine, loaded her asses with these provisions, and sent them before. Abigail not only lawfully, but laudably, disposed of all these goods of her husband's without his knowledge, because it was for the necessary defence of him and his family, which otherwise would have been inevitably ruined. Husbands and wives, for their common good and benefit, have a joint-interest in their worldly possessions; but if either waste, or unduly spend in any way, it is a robbing of the other.

II. By a most obliging demeanour, and charming speech, she atones for the abusive language which Nabal had given them. She met David upon the march, big with resentment, and meditating the destruction of Nabal (v. 20); but with all possible expressions of complaisance and respect she humbly begs his favour, and solicits him to pass by the offence.

1. She speaks to him all along with deference and respect. She does not upbraid him with the heat of his passion, but endeavours to bring him to a better temper.

2. She takes the blame of the ill-treatment of his messengers upon herself: "Upon me, my lord, upon me, let this iniquity be," v. 24. Abigail here discovered the sincerity and strength of her conjugal affection and concern for her family: whatever Nabal was, he was her husband.

3. She excuses her husband's fault by imputing it to his natural weakness and want of understanding (v. 25). He is simple, but not spiteful. Forgive him, for he knows not what he does.

4. She pleads her own ignorance of the matter: "I saw not the young men, else they should have had a better answer."

The very mentioning of what he was about to do, to shed blood and to avenge himself, was enough to work upon such a tender gracious spirit as David had; and it should seem, by his reply (v. 33), that it affected him. She applauds David for the good services he had done against the common enemies of his country. "My lord fighteth the battles of the Lord against the Philistines, and therefore he will leave it to God to fight his battles against those that affront him," v. 28. She foretells the glorious issue of his present troubles. She speaks with assurance, (1) That God would keep him safe: The soul of my lord shall be bound in the bundle of life with the Lord thy God, that is, God shall hold thy soul in life (as the expression is, Ps. lxvi. 9) as we hold those things which are bundled up or which are precious to us, Ps. cxvi. 15. The Jews understand this not only of the life that now is, but of that which is to come, and therefore use it commonly as an inscription on their gravestones. "Here we have laid the body, but trust that the soul is bound up in the bundle of life, with the Lord our God." (2) That God would make him victorious over his enemies. "The Lord will certainly make my lord a sure house, therefore forgive this trespass." She is confident that if he pass by the offence it will afterwards be no grief to him; but, on the contrary, it would yield him unspeakable satisfaction that his wisdom and grace had got the better of his passion.

Verses 32–35

As an ear-ring of gold, and an ornament of fine gold, so is a wise reprover upon an obedient ear, Prov. xxv. 12. Abigail was a wise reprover of David's passion, and he gave an obedient ear to the reproof, according to his own principle (Ps. cxli. 5): Let the righteous smite me, it shall be a kindness.

I. David gives God thanks for sending him this happy check to a sinful way (v. 32): Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, who sent thee this day to meet me. God is to be acknowledged in all the kindnesses that our friends do us either for soul or body.

II. He gives Abigail thanks for interposing so opportunely between him and the mischief he was about to do: Blessed be thy advice, and blessed be thou, v. 33.

III. He seems very apprehensive of the great danger he was in, which magnified the mercy of his deliverance. He speaks of the sin as very great. He was coming to shed blood, a sin of which when in his right mind he had a great horror, witness his prayer, Deliver me from blood-guiltiness.

IV. He dismissed her with an answer of peace, v. 35. He does, in effect, own himself overcome by her eloquence: "I have hearkened to thy voice, and will not prosecute the intended revenge, for I have accepted thy person, am well pleased with thee and what thou hast said."

We are now to attend Nabal's funeral and Abigail's wedding.

I. Nabal's funeral.

1. Nabal dead drunk, v. 36. Abigail came home, and, it should seem, he had so many people and so much plenty about him that he neither missed her nor the provisions she took to David. He was very drunk, a sign he was Nabal, a fool, that could not use his plenty without abusing it, could not be pleasant with his friends without making a beast of himself. There is not a surer sign that a man has but little wisdom, not a surer way to ruin the little he has, than drinking to excess. Nabal, that never thought he could bestow too little in charity, never thought he could bestow too much in luxury.

2. Nabal again dead with melancholy, v. 37. Next morning, when he had come to himself a little, his wife told him how near to destruction he had brought himself and his family by his own rudeness, and with what difficulty she had interposed to prevent it; and, upon this his heart died within him and he became as a stone. He grew sullen, and said little, ashamed of his own folly.

3. Nabal, at last, dead indeed: About ten days after, when he had been kept so long under this pressure and pain, the Lord smote him that he died (v. 38).

II. Abigail's wedding. David was charmed with the beauty of her person, and the uncommon prudence of her conduct and address. He courted by proxy, his affairs, perhaps, not permitting him to come himself. She received the address with great modesty and humility (v. 41), reckoning herself unworthy of the honour. She agreed to the proposal, went with his messengers, took a retinue with her agreeable to her quality, and she became his wife, v. 42. She married him in faith, not questioning but that, though now he had not a house of his own, yet God's promise to him would at length be fulfilled.

Lastly, On this occasion we have some account of David's wives. 1. One that he had lost before he married Abigail, Michal, Saul's daughter, his first, and the wife of his youth, to whom he would have been constant if she would have been so to him, but Saul had given her to another (v. 44), in token of his displeasure against him and disclaiming the relation of a father-in-law to him. 2. Another that he married besides Abigail (v. 43), and, as should seem, before her, for she is named first, ch. xxvii. 3. David was carried away by the corrupt custom of those times. When David could not keep his first wife he thought that would excuse him if he did not keep to his second. But we deceive ourselves if we think to make others' faults a cloak for our own.

CHAP. XXVI

David's troubles from Saul here begin again. I. The Ziphites informed him where David was (ver. 1), and thereupon he marched out with a considerable force in quest of him, ver. 2, 3. II. David gained intelligence of his motions (ver. 4), and took a view of his camp, ver. 5. III. He and one of his men ventured into his camp in the night and found him and all his guards fast asleep, ver. 6, 7. IV. David, though much urged to it by his companions, would not take away Saul's life, but only carried off his spear and his cruse of water, ver. 8–12. V. He produced these as a further witness for him that he did not design any ill to Saul, and reasoned with him upon his conduct, ver. 13–20. VI. Saul was hereby convinced of his error, and once more desisted from persecuting David, ver. 21–25.

Verses 1–5

1. Saul gets information of David's movements and acts offensively. The Ziphites came to him and told him where David now was, in the same place where he was when they formerly betrayed him, ch. xxiii. 19. For aught we know, Saul would have continued in the same good mind that he was in (ch. xxiv. 17), and would not have given David this fresh trouble, if the Ziphites had not put him on. Saul readily caught at the information, and went down with an army to the place where David hid himself, v. 2.

2. David gets information of Saul's movements and acts defensively. He sought only his own safety, not Saul's ruin; therefore he abode in the wilderness (v. 3), curbing the bravery of his own spirit by a silent retirement, showing more true valour than he could have done by an irregular resistance. (1) He had spies who informed him of Saul's descent, for he would not believe that Saul would deal so basely with him till he had the utmost evidence of it. (2) He observed with his own eyes how Saul was encamped, v. 5.

I. David's bold adventure into Saul's camp in the night, accompanied only by his kinsman, Abishai, the son of Zeruiah. Like Gideon, he ventured through the guards, with a special assurance of the divine protection.

II. The posture he found the camp in: Saul lay sleeping in the trench, or, as some read it, in his chariot, and in the midst of his carriages, with his spear stuck in the ground by him, and all the soldiers, even those that were appointed to stand sentinel, were fast asleep, v. 12. Something extraordinary there was in it that they should all be asleep together, and so fast asleep that David and Abishai walked and talked among them, and yet none of them stirred. How helpless do Saul and all his forces lie, all, in effect, disarmed and chained! and yet nothing is done to them; they are only rocked asleep.

III. Abishai's request to David for a commission to dispatch Saul with the spear that stuck at his bolster. It was a special providence which gave him this opportunity; he ought not therefore to let it slip.

IV. David's generous refusal to suffer any harm to be done to Saul, and in it a resolute adherence to his principles of loyalty, v. 9. No man could do it and be guiltless. The thing he feared was guilt and his concern respected his innocence more than his safety. He resolved to wait till God shall think fit to avenge him on Saul, and he will by no means avenge himself (v. 10). Thus bravely does he prefer his conscience to his interest and trusts God with the issue.

He and Abishai carried away the spear and cruse of water which Saul had by his bedside (v 12).

David having got safely from Saul's camp himself, and having brought with him proofs sufficient that he had been there, posts himself conveniently, so that they might hear him and yet not reach him (v. 13), and then begins to reason with them upon what had passed.

I. He reasons ironically with Abner, and keenly banters him. Abner got up and enquired who called, and disturbed the king's repose. "It is I," said David, and then he upbraids him with his sleeping when he should have been upon his guard. David, to put him into confusion, told him, 1. That he had lost his honour (v. 15). 2. That he deserved to lose his head (v. 16): "You are all worthy to die, by martial law, for being off your guard, when you had the king himself asleep in the midst of you. Ecce signum—Behold this token. See where the king's spear is, in the hand of him whom the king himself is pleased to count his enemy. Those that took away this might as easily and safely have taken away his life. Now see who are the king's best friends, you that neglected him and left him exposed or I that protected him when he was exposed.

II. He reasons seriously and affectionately with Saul. By this time he was so well awake as to hear what was said, and to discern who said it (v. 17): Is this thy voice, my son David? He had given his wife to another and yet calls him son, thirsted after his blood and yet is glad to hear his voice. And now David has as fair an opportunity of reaching Saul's conscience as he had just now of taking away his life.

1. He complains of the very melancholy condition he was brought into by the enmity of Saul against him. Two things he laments: —(1) That he was driven from his master and from his business: "My lord pursues after his servant, v. 18. Instead of being owned as a servant, I am pursued as a rebel. (2) That he was driven from his God and from his religion; he was constrained to live among the worshippers of strange gods and was thereby thrust into temptation to join with them in their idolatrous worship. If David had not been a man of extraordinary grace, and firmness to his religion, the ill usage he met with from his own prince and people, who were Israelites and worshippers of the true God, would have prejudiced him against the religion they professed and have driven him to communicate with idolators.

2. He insists upon his own innocency: What have I done or what evil is in my hand? v. 18.

3. He endeavours to convince Saul that his pursuit of him is not only wrong, but mean, and much below him. He compares himself to a partridge, a very innocent harmless bird, which, when attempts are made upon its life, flies if it can, but makes no resistance. And would Saul bring the flower of his army into the field only to hunt one poor partridge? "Let us join in making our peace with God, reconciling ourselves to him, which may be done, by sacrifice; and then I hope the sin will be pardoned, whatever it is, and the trouble, which is so great a vexation both to thee and me, will come to an end." See the right method of peace-making; let us first make God our friend by Christ the great Sacrifice, and then all other enmities shall be slain, Eph. ii. 16; Prov. xvi. 7. He decently lays the blame upon the evil counsellors who advised the king to that which was dishonourable and dishonest, and insists upon it that they be removed from about him and forbidden his presence, as men cursed before the Lord.

I. Saul's penitent confession of his fault and folly in persecuting David and his promise to do so no more. He acknowledges he has done very wrong to persecute him, that he has therein acted against God's law (I have sinned), and against his own interest (I have played the fool), in pursuing him as an enemy who would have been one of his best friends. He invites him to court again: Return, my son David. He promises him that he will not persecute him as he has done, but protect him: I will no more do thee harm.

II. David's improvement of Saul's convictions and confessions and the evidence he had to produce of his own sincerity. He desired that one of the footmen might fetch the spear (v. 22), and then (v. 23), 1. He appeals to God as judge of the controversy: The Lord render to every man his righteousness. 2. He reminds Saul again of the proof he had now given of his respect to him from a principle of loyalty: I would not stretch forth my hand against the Lord's anointed, intimating to Saul that the anointing oil was his protection, for which he was indebted to the Lord and ought to express his gratitude to him. 3. Not relying much upon Saul's promises, he puts himself under God's protection, and begs his favour (v. 24): "Let my life be much set by in the eyes of the Lord, how light soever thou makest of it."

III. Saul's prediction of David's advancement. He commends him (v. 25): Blessed be thou, my son David. He foretells his victories, and his elevation at last: Thou shalt do great things. The princely qualities which appeared in David—his generosity in sparing Saul, his military authority in reprimanding Abner for sleeping, his care of the public good, and the signal tokens of God's presence with him—convinced Saul that he would certainly be advanced to the throne at last, according to the prophecies concerning him.

Lastly, A palliative cure being thus made of the wound, they parted friends. Saul returned to Gibeah. David went on his way. And, after this parting, it does not appear that ever Saul and David saw one another again.

CHAP. XXVII

David was a man after God's own heart, and yet he had his faults, which are recorded, not for our imitation, but for our admonition. 1. We find, to his praise, that he prudently took care of his own safety and his family's (ver. 2–4) and valiantly fought Israel's battles against the Canaanites (ver. 8–9), yet, II. We find to his dishonour, 1. That he began to despair of his deliverance, ver. 1. 2. That he deserted his own country, and went to dwell in the land of the Philistines, ver. 1, 5–7. 3. That he imposed upon Achish with an equivocation, if not a lie, concerning his expedition, ver. 10–12.

Verses 1–7

I. The prevalence of David's fear, which was the effect of the weakness of his faith (v. 1). In a melancholy mood, he draws this dark conclusion: I shall one day perish by the hand of Saul. But, O thou of little faith: wherefore dost thou doubt? Though he had no reason to trust Saul's promises, had he not all the reason in the world to trust the promises of God? Unbelief is a sin that easily besets even good men. Lord, increase our faith.

II. The resolution he came to hereupon. Now that Saul had, for this time, returned to his place, he determined to take this opportunity of retiring into the Philistines' country. David was no friend to himself in taking this course. God had appointed him to set up his standard in the land of Judah, ch. xxii. 5. How could he expect the protection of the God of Israel if he went out of the borders of the land of Israel?

III. The kind reception he had at Gath. Achish bade him welcome, partly out of generosity, being proud of entertaining so brave a man, partly out of policy, hoping to engage him for ever to his service, and that his example would invite many more to desert and come over to him. No doubt he gave David a solemn promise of protection, which he could rely upon when he could not trust Saul's promises.

IV. Saul's desisting from the further prosecution of him (v. 4). Saul sought no more for him, contenting himself with his banishment.

V. David's removal from Gath to Ziklag.

1. David's request for leave to remove was prudent and very modest, v. 5. (1) It was really prudent. David knew what it was to be envied in the court of Saul, and had much more reason to fear in the court of Achish, and therefore declines preferment there. In a town of his own he might have the more free exercise of his religion, and keep his men better to it, and not have his righteous soul vexed, as it was at Gath, with the idolatries of the Philistines. (2) As it was presented to Achish it was very modest. He does not prescribe to him what place he should assign him. "Why should thy servant dwell in the royal city, to crowd thee, and disoblige those about thee?"

2. The grant which Achish made to him, upon that request, was very generous and kind (v. 6, 7): Achish gave him Ziklag. Hereby, (1) Israel recovered their ancient right; for Ziklag was in the lot of the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 31), and afterwards, out of that lot, was assigned, with some other cities, to Simeon, Josh. xix. 5. But either it was never subdued, or the Philistines had, in some struggle with Israel, made themselves masters of it. (2) David gained a commodious settlement, not only at a distance from Gath, but bordering upon Israel. Though we do not find that he augmented his forces at all while Saul lived (for, ch. xxx. 10, he had but his six hundred men), yet, immediately after Saul's death, that was the rendezvous of his friends.

An account of David's actions while he was in the land of the Philistines, a fierce attack he made, his success in it, and the representation he gave of it to Achish. 1. We may acquit him of injustice and cruelty in this action because those people whom he cut off were such as heaven had long since doomed to destruction. The Amalekites were to be all cut off. Probably the Geshurites and Gezrites were branches of Amalek. Saul was rejected for sparing them, David makes up the deficiency of his obedience before he succeeds him. 2. Yet we cannot acquit him of dissimulation with Achish in the account he gave him of this expedition. (1) David, it seems, was not willing that he should know the truth, and therefore spared none to carry tidings to Gath (v. 11), not because he was ashamed of what he had done as a bad thing, but because he was afraid, if the Philistines knew it, they would be apprehensive of danger to themselves or their allies by harbouring him among them and would expel him from their coasts. (2) He hid it from Achish with an equivocation not at all becoming his character. Being asked which way he had made his sally, he answered, Against the south of Judah, v. 13. It was true he had invaded those countries that lay south of Judah, but he made Achish believe he had invaded those that lay south in Judah, the Ziphites for example, that had once and again betrayed him; so Achish understood him, and thence inferred that he had made his people Israel to abhor him, and so rivetted himself in the interest of Achish.

CHAP. XXVIII

Preparations are herein making for that war which will put an end to the life and reign of Saul, and so make way for David to the throne. In this war, 1. The Philistines are the aggressors and Achish their king makes David his confidant, ver. 1, 2. II. The Israelites prepare to receive them, and Saul their king makes the devil his privy counsellor, and thereby fills the measure of his iniquity. I. The despairing condition which Saul was in, ver. 3–6. 2. The application he made to a witch, to bring him up Samuel, ver. 7–14. 3. His discourse with the apparition, ver. 15–19. The damp it struck upon him, ver. 20–25.

I. The design of the Philistines against Israel. They resolved to fight them.

II. The expectation Achish had of assistance from David in this war. "If I protect thee, I may demand service from thee"; and he will think himself happy if he may have such a man as David on his side. David gave him an ambiguous answer: "We will see what will be done; it will be time enough to talk of that hereafter; but surely thou shalt know what thy servant can do" (v. 2). Thus he keeps himself free from a promise to serve him and yet keeps up his expectation of it.

III. The drawing of the armies, on both sides, into the field (v. 4): The Philistines pitched in Shunem, which was in the tribe of Issachar, a great way north from their country. On some of the adjacent mountains of Gilboa Saul mustered his forces, and prepared to engage the Philistines.

IV. The terror Saul was in: He saw the host of the Philistines, more numerous, better armed, and in better heart, than his own were. Had he kept close to God, he needed not have been afraid at the sight of an army of Philistines; now his interest failed, his armies dwindled and looked mean, and, which was worse, his spirits failed him. Now he remembered the guilty blood of the Amalekites which he had spared, and the innocent blood of the priests which he had spilt. His sins were set in order before his eyes, which robbed him of all his courage. In this distress Saul enquired of the Lord, v. 6. He enquired in such a manner that it was as if he had not enquired at all. Therefore it is said (1 Chron. x. 14), He enquired not of the Lord; for he did it faintly and coldly, and with a secret design, if God did not answer him, to consult the devil. He did not enquire in faith, but with a double unstable mind. Could he that hated and persecuted Samuel and David, who were both prophets, expect to be answered by prophets? Could he that had slain the high priest, expect to be answered by Urim? Or could he that had sinned away the Spirit of grace, expect to be answered by dreams?

V. The mention of some things that had happened a good while ago, to introduce the following story, v. 3. 1. The death of Samuel. Samuel was dead, which made the Philistines the more bold and Saul the more afraid. 2. Saul's edict against witchcraft. He had put the laws in execution against those that had familiar spirits, who must not be suffered to live, Exod. xxii. 18. Some think that he did this while he was under Samuel's influence. Perhaps when Saul was himself troubled with an evil spirit he suspected that he was bewitched, and, for that reason, cut off all that had familiar spirits. Many seem zealous against sin, when they themselves are any way hurt by it (they will inform against swearers if they swear at them, or against drunkards if in their drink they abuse them), who otherwise have no concern for the glory of God, nor any dislike of sin as sin.

I. Saul seeks for a witch, v. 7. When God answered him not, if he had humbled himself by repentance and persevered in seeking God, who knows but that at length he might have been entreated for him? but, since he can discern no comfort either from heaven or earth (Isa. viii. 21, 22), he resolves to knock at the gates of hell, and to see if any there will befriend him and give him advice: Seek me a woman that has a familiar spirit, v. 7. His servants presently recommended one to him at Endor. To her he resolves to apply. Herein he is chargeable, 1. With contempt of the God of Israel. 2. With contradiction to himself.

II. He hastens to her, but goes by night, and in disguise, only with two servants, and probably on foot, v. 8. Those that are led captive by Satan are forced, 1. To disparage themselves. Never did Saul look so mean as when he went sneaking to a sorry witch to know his fortune. 2. To dissemble. Such is the power of natural conscience that even those who do evil blush and are ashamed to do it.

III. He tells her his errand and promises her impunity. 1. All he desires of her is to bring up one from the dead. It was necromancy, or divination by the dead, that he hoped to serve his purpose by. This was expressly forbidden by the law (Deut. xviii. 11). Bring me up him whom I shall name, v. 8. It was generally taken for granted that souls exist after death, and that great knowledge was attributed to separate souls. But to think that any good souls would come up at the beck of an evil spirit, or that God would suffer him to reap any real advantage by a cursed diabolical invention, was very absurd. 2. She signifies her fear of the law, and her suspicion that this stranger came to draw her into a snare (v. 9): Thou knowest what Saul has done. How sensible she is of danger from the edict of Saul, and what care she is in to guard against it; but not at all apprehensive of the obligations of God's law and the terrors of his wrath. She considered what Saul had done, not what God had done, against such practices, and feared a snare laid for her life more than a snare laid for her soul. 3. Saul promises with an oath not to betray her, v. 10. But he promised more than he could perform when he said, There shall no punishment happen to thee; for he that could not secure himself could much less secure her from divine vengeance.

IV. Samuel, who was lately dead, is the person whom Saul desired to have some talk with. 1. As soon as Saul had given the witch the assurance she desired she applied to her witchcrafts, and asked, Whom shall I bring up to thee? v. 11. 2. Saul desires to speak with Samuel: Bring me up Samuel. Samuel had anointed him to the kingdom and had formerly been his faithful friend and counsellor. While Samuel was living at Ramah, not far from Gibeah of Saul, and presided there in the school of the prophets, we never read of Saul's going to him to consult him (it would have been well for him if he had)! Saul said, Bring me up Samuel, and the very next words are, When the woman saw Samuel (v. 12). The witch, upon sight of the apparition, was aware that her client was Saul (v. 12): "Why hast thou deceived me with a disguise; for thou art Saul, the very man that I am afraid of above any man?" Had she believed that it was really Samuel whom she saw, she would have had more reason to be afraid of him, who was a good prophet, than of Saul, who was a wicked king. Saul bade her not to be afraid of him and enquired what she saw? v. 13. O, says the woman, I saw gods (that is, a spirit) ascending out of the earth. Poor gods that ascend out of the earth; But she speaks the language of the heathen, who had their infernal deities and had them in veneration. If Saul had thought it necessary to his conversation with Samuel that the body of Samuel should be called out of the grave, he would have taken the witch with him to Ramah, where his sepulchre was; but the design was wholly upon his soul, which yet, if it became visible, was expected to appear in the usual resemblance of the body; and God permitted the devil, to answer the design that those who would not receive the love of the truth might be given up to strong delusions and believe a lie. Saul, it seems, was not permitted to see any manner of similitude himself, but he must take the woman's word for it, that she saw an old man covered with a mantle, or robe, the habit of a judge, which Samuel had sometimes worn. Saul, perceiving, by the woman's description, that it was Samuel, stooped with his face to the ground in reverence to Samuel, though he saw him not.

Verses 15–19.

The conference between Saul and Satan. Saul came in disguise (v. 8), but Satan soon discovered him, v. 12. Satan comes in disguise, in the disguise of Samuel's mantle, and Saul cannot discover him. Such is the disadvantage we labour under, in wrestling with the rulers of the darkness of this world, that they know us, while we are ignorant of their wiles and devices.

I. The spectre, or apparition, personating Samuel, asks why he is sent for (v. 15): Why hast thou disquieted me to bring me up?

II. Saul makes his complaint to this counterfeit Samuel, mistaking him for the true; and a most doleful complaint it is: "I am sorely distressed, and know not what to do, for the Philistines make war against me. But, alas! God has departed from me." He does not, like a penitent, own the righteousness of God in this; but, like a man enraged, flies out against God as unkind and flies off from him: Therefore I have called thee; as if Samuel, a servant of God, would favour those whom God frowned upon, or as if a dead prophet could do him more service than the living ones.

III. It is cold comfort which this evil spirit in Samuel's mantle gives to Saul, and is manifestly intended to drive him to despair and self-murder. Had it been the true Samuel he would have told him to repent and make his peace with God, and recall David from his banishment, that he might hope in this way to find mercy with God; but, instead of that, he represents his case as helpless and hopeless, serving him as he did Judas, to whom he was first a tempter and then a tormentor, persuading him first to sell his master and then to hang himself. 1. He upbraids him with his present distress (v. 16). 2. He upbraids him with the anointing of David to the kingdom, v. 17. Yet, to make him believe that he was Samuel, the apparition affirmed that it was God who spoke by him. The devil knows how to speak with an air of religion, and can teach false apostles to transform themselves into the apostles of Christ and imitate their language. 3. He upbraids him with his disobedience to the command of God in not destroying the Amalekites, v. 18. Satan had helped him to palliate and excuse that sin when Samuel was dealing with him to bring him to repentance, but now he aggravates it, to make him despair of God's mercy.

4. He foretells his approaching ruin, v. 19. (1) That his army should be routed by the Philistines. (2) That he and his sons should be slain in the battle: Tomorrow thou and thy sons shall be with me, that is, in the state of the dead, separate from the body.

How Saul received this terrible message from the ghost he consulted. He desired to be told what he should do (v. 15), but was only told what he had not done and what should be done to him.

I. How he sunk under the load, v. 20. He was indeed unfit to bear it, having eaten nothing all the day before, nor that night. He came fasting from the camp, and continued fasting; not for want of food, but for want of an appetite. He fell all along on the earth, as if the archers of the Philistines had already hit him, and there was no strength in him to bear up against these heavy tidings. Now he had enough of consulting witches, and found them miserable comforters.

II. With what difficulty he was persuaded to take so much relief as was necessary to carry him back to his post in the camp. The witch was very importunate with him to take some refreshment, that he might be able to get clear from her house, fearing that if he should be ill, especially if he should die there, she should be punished for it as a traitor, though she had escaped punishment as a witch. 1. She showed herself very importunate with him to take some refreshment. She had a fat calf at hand (and the word signifies one that was made use of in treading out the corn, and therefore could the worse be spared); this she prepared for his entertainment, v. 24. 2. He showed himself very averse to it: He refused, and said, I will not eat (v. 23). Had he laboured only under a defect of animal spirits, food might have helped him; but, alas! his case was out of the reach of such succours. What are dainty meats to a wounded conscience? 3. The woman at length, with the help of his servants, overpersuaded him, against his inclination and resolution, to take some refreshment. Saul was somewhat revived so that he and his servants rose up and went away before it was light (v. 25), that they might hasten to their business. Josephus here much admires the bravery and magnanimity of Saul, that, though he was assured he should lose both his life and honour, yet he would not desert his army, but resolutely returned to the camp, and stood ready for an engagement.

CHAP. XXIX

In this chapter we find how David, who kept close to God, when he was in a strait was extricated and brought off by the providence of God, without any contrivance of his own. We have him, I. Marching with the Philistines, ver. 1, 2. II. Excepted against by the lords of the Philistines, ver. 3–5. III. Happily dismissed by Achish from that service which did so ill become him, and which yet he knew not how to decline, ver. 6–11.

Verses 1–5

I. The great strait that David was in. The two armies of the Philistines and the Israelites were encamped and ready to engage, v. 1. Achish, who had been kind to David, had obliged him to come himself and bring the forces he had into his service. David came accordingly, and, upon a review of the army, was found with Achish, in the post assigned him in the rear, v. 2. 1. If, when the armies engaged, he should retire, he would fall under the indelible reproach, not only of cowardice and treachery, but of base ingratitude to Achish. 2. If he should, as was expected from him, fight for the Philistines against Israel, he would incur the imputation of being an enemy to the Israel of God and a traitor to his country, would make his own people hate him, and unanimously oppose his coming to the crown. If Saul should be killed (as it proved he was) in this engagement, the fault would be laid at David's door, as if he had killed him. So that on each side there seemed to be both sin and scandal. Into this strait he brought himself by his own unadvisedness, in quitting the land of Judah. Therefore, though God might justly have left him in this difficulty, to chastise him for his folly, yet, because his heart was upright with him, he would not suffer him to be tempted above what he was able, but with the temptation made a way for him to escape, 1 Cor. x. 13.

II. A door opened for his deliverance out of this strait. God inclined the hearts of the princes of the Philistines to oppose his being employed in the battle, and to insist upon his being dismissed. 1. It was a proper question which they asked, upon the mustering of the forces, "What do these Hebrews here? v. 3. It was an honourable testimony which Achish, on this occasion gave to David. He looked upon him as a refugee, that fled from a wrongful prosecution in his own country, and had put himself under his protection, whom therefore he was obliged, in justice, to take care of, and thought he might in prudence employ. 2. Yet the princes are peremptory in it, that he must be sent home. (1) Because he had been an old enemy to the Philistines; witness what was sung in honour of his triumphs over them: Saul slew his thousands, and David his ten thousands, v. 5. (2) Because he might be a most dangerous enemy to them, and do them more mischief than all Saul's army could (v. 4): "He may in the battle be an adversary to us, and surprise us with an attack in the rear."

Achish was but one of five, though the chief, and the only one that had the title of king; accordingly, in a council of war held on this occasion, he was over-voted, and obliged to dismiss David, though he was extremely fond of him.

I. The discharge Achish gives him is very honourable, and not a final discharge, but only from the present service. 1. He signifies the great pleasure and satisfaction he had taken in him and in his conversation: Thou art good in my sight as an angel of God, v. 9. 2. He gives him a testimonial of his good behaviour, v. 6. It is very full and in obliging terms: "Thou hast been upright, and thy whole conduct has been good in my sight, and I have not found evil in thee." 3. He lays all the blame of his dismission upon the princes, who would by no means suffer him to continue in the camp. 4. He orders him to be gone early, as soon as it was light (v. 10).

II. His reception of this discourse is very complimental; but, I fear, not without some degree of dissimulation. He seemed anxious to serve him when he was at this juncture really anxious to leave him.

III. God's providence ordered it wisely and graciously for him. For, besides that the snare was broken it proved a happy hastening of him to the relief of his own city, which sorely wanted him, though he did not know it. Thus the disgrace which the lords of the Philistines put upon him proved, in more ways than one, an advantage to him. The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord, and he delighteth in his way. What he does with us we know not now, but we shall know hereafter, and shall see it was all for good.

CHAP. XXX

When David was dismissed from the army of the Philistines he did not go over to the camp of Israel, but, being expelled by Saul, observed an exact neutrality, and silently retired to his own city Ziklag, leaving the armies ready to engage. I. What a melancholy posture he found the city in, all laid waste by the Amalekites, and what distress it occasioned him and his men, ver. 1–6. II. He enquired of God, and took out a commission from him (ver. 7, 8), pursued the enemy (ver. 9, 10), gained intelligence from a straggler (ver. 11–15), attacked and routed the plunderers (ver. 16, 17), and recovered all that they had carried off, ver. 18–20. III. What method he observed in the distribution of the spoil, ver. 21–31.

I. The descent which the Amalekites made upon Ziklag in David's absence. They surprised the city when it was left unguarded, plundered it, burnt it, and carried all the women and children captives, v. 1, 2. They intended, by this, to revenge the like havoc that David had lately made of them and their country, ch. xxvii. 8. 1. How wonderfully God inclined the hearts of these Amalekites to carry the women and children away captives, and not to kill them.

II. The confusion and consternation that David and his men were in when they found their houses in ashes and their wives and children gone into captivity. Three days' march they had from the camp of the Philistines to Ziklag, and now that they came thither weary, but hoping to find rest in their houses and joy in their families, behold a black and dismal scene was presented to them (v. 3), which made them all weep (David himself not excepted), though they were men of war, till they had no more power to weep, v. 4.

III. The mutiny and murmuring of David's men against him (v. 6): David was greatly distressed, for, in the midst of all his losses, his own people spoke of stoning him. 1. Because they looked upon him as the occasion of their calamities, by the provocation he had given the Amalekites, and his indiscretion in leaving Ziklag without a garrison in it. 2. Because now they began to despair of that preferment which they had promised themselves in following David. They hoped ere this to have been all princes; and now find themselves all beggars. Saul had driven him from his country, the Philistines had driven him from their camp, the Amalekites had plundered his city, his wives were taken prisoners, and now, to complete his woe, his own familiar friends, in whom he trusted, whom he had sheltered, and who did eat of his bread, instead of sympathising with him, lifted up the heel against him, and threatened to stone him. Great faith must expect such severe exercises. Things are sometimes at the worst with the church and people of God just before they begin to mend.

IV. David's pious dependence upon the divine providence and grace in this distress: But David encouraged himself in the Lord his God. His men fretted at their loss. The soul of the people was bitter, so the word is. Their own discontent and impatience added wormwood and gall to the affliction and misery, and made their case doubly grievous. But David bore in better, though he had more reason than any of them to lament it; they gave liberty to their passions, but he set his graces on work, and by encouraging himself in God, while they dispirited each other, he kept his spirit calm and sedate. It was David's practice, and he had the comfort of it, What time I am afraid I will trust in thee. When he was at his wits' end he was not at his faith's end.

I. He enquired of the Lord both concerning his duty—Shall I pursue after this troop? and concerning the event—Shall I overtake them? v. 8. David had no room to doubt but that his war against these Amalekites was just, and he had an inclination strong enough to set upon them when it was for the recovery of that which was dearest to him in this world; and yet he would not go about it without asking counsel of God, thereby owning his dependence upon God and submission to him.

II. He went himself in person, and took with him all the force he had in pursuit of the Amalekites, v. 9, 10. See how quickly the mutiny among the soldiers was quelled by his patience and faith. When they spoke of stoning him (v. 6), if he had spoken of hanging them, or had ordered that the ringleaders of the faction should immediately have their heads struck off, though it would have been just, yet it might have been of pernicious consequence to his interest in this critical juncture. All his men were willing to go along with him in pursuit of the Amalekites, and he needed them all; but he was forced to drop a third part of them by the way; 200 out of 600 were so fatigued with their long march, that they could not pass the brook Besor. 1. A great trial of David's faith, whether he could go on, in dependence upon the word of God, when so many of his men failed him. When we are disappointed and discouraged in our expectations from second causes, then to go on with cheerfulness, confiding in the divine power, this is giving glory to God, by believing against hope, in hope. 2. A great instance of David's tenderness to his men, that he would by no means urge them beyond their strength, though the case itself was so very urgent. The son of David thus considers the frame of his followers, who are not all alike strong and vigorous in their spiritual pursuits and conflicts; but, where we are weak, there he is kind; nay, more, there he is strong, 2 Cor. xii. 9, 10.

III. Providence threw one in their way that gave them intelligence of the enemy's motions, and guided theirs; a poor Egyptian lad, scarcely alive. 1. His master's cruelty to him. He had got out of him all the service he could, and when the lad fell sick he barbarously left him to perish in the field. Justly did Providence make this poor servant, that was thus basely abused, instrumental towards the destruction of a whole army of Amalekites and his master among the rest. 2. David's compassion to him. Though he had reason to think he was one of those that had helped to destroy Ziklag, yet, finding him in distress, be generously relieved him, not only with bread and water (v. 11), but with figs and raisins, v. 12. Though the Israelites were in haste, and had no great plenty for themselves, yet they would not forbear to deliver one that was drawn unto death, nor say, Behold, we knew it not, Prov. xxiv. 11, 12. 3. The intelligence David received from this poor Egyptian when he had come to himself. He gave an account concerning his party. (1) What they had done (v. 14): We made an invasion, &c. (2) Whither they had gone, v. 15. This he promised David to inform him of upon condition he would spare his life and protect him from his master, who, if he could hear of him again (he thought), would add cruelty to cruelty. Such an opinion this poor Egyptian had of the obligation of an oath that he desired no greater security for his life than this: Swear unto me by God, not by the gods of Egypt or Amalek, but by the one supreme God.

IV. David, being directed to the place where they lay, securely celebrating their triumphs, fell upon them, and, as he used to pray, saw his desire upon his enemies. 1. The spoilers were cut off. The Amalekites, finding the booty was rich were making themselves very merry with it, v. 16. In this posture David surprised them, which made the conquest of them, and the blow he gave them, the more easy. 2. The spoil was recovered and brought off, and nothing was lost, but a great deal gotten. (1) They retrieved all their own (v. 18, 19): David rescued his two wives this is mentioned particularly, because this pleased David more than all the rest of his achievements. (2) They took all that belonged to the Amalekites besides (v. 20): Flocks and herds. Those who lately spoke of stoning him now cried him up, because they got by him more than they had then lost. Thus are the world and its sentiments governed by interest.

An account of the distribution of the spoil which was taken from the Amalekites. David disposed of the spoil as one that knew that justice and charity must govern us in the use we make of whatever we have in this world.

1. David was just and kind to those who abode by the stuff. He saluted them; he asked them of peace (so the word is), bade them be of good cheer, they should lose nothing by staying behind; for of this they seemed afraid, as perhaps David saw by their countenances.

1. There were those that opposed their coming in to share in the spoil; some of David's soldiers, probably the same that spoke of stoning him, spoke now of defrauding their brethren; they are called wicked men and men of Belial, v. 22. These made a motion that the 200 men who abode by the stuff should only have their wives and children given them, but none of their goods.

2. David would by no means admit this, but ordered that those who tarried behind should come in for an equal share in the spoils with those that went to the battle, v. 23, 24. God's mercy to us should make us merciful to one another. It was true they tarried behind; but, [1] It was not for want of goodwill to the cause or to their brethren, but because they had not strength to keep up with them. [2] Though they tarried behind now, they had formerly engaged many times in battle and done their part as well as the best of their brethren. [3] Even now they did good service, for they abode by the stuff, to guard that which somebody must take care of, else that might have fallen into the hands of some other enemy. Every post of service is not alike a post of honour, yet those that are in any way serviceable to the common interest, though in a meaner station, ought to share in the common advantages, as in the natural body every member has its use and therefore has its share of the nourishment. Thus he settled the matter for the time to come, made it a statute of his kingdom (a statute of distributions, primo Davidus—in the first year of David's reign), an ordinance of war (v. 25), that as his part is that goes down to the battle, and hazards his life in the high places of the field, so shall his be that guards the carriages.

II. David was generous and kind to all his friends. When he had given every one his own with interest there was a considerable overplus; probably the spoil of the tents of the Amalekites consisted much in plate and jewels (Judges viii. 24, 26), and these he thought fit to make presents of to his friends, even the elders of Judah, v. 26. Several places are here named to which he sent of these presents, all of them in or near the tribe of Judah. The first place named is Bethel. Thither David sent the first and best, to those that attended there, for his sake who is the first and best. Hebron is named last (v. 31), the largest share, having an eye upon that place as fittest for his headquarters, 2 Sam. ii. 1. In David's sending these presents observe, 1. His generosity. He aimed not to enrich himself, but to serve his country. It becomes gracious souls to be generous. 2. His gratitude. He sent presents to all the places where he and his men were wont to haunt (v. 31), that is, to all that he had received kindness from, that had sheltered him and sent him intelligence or provisions. 3. His piety. He calls his present a blessing; for no present we give to our friends will be a comfort to them but as it is made so by the blessing of God: it intimates that his prayers for them accompanied his present. 4. His policy. He sent these presents among his countrymen to engage them to be ready to appear for him upon his accession to the throne, which he now saw at hand.

CHAP. XXXI

In this chapter we have Saul conquered and worse than a captive. The very same day, perhaps, that David was triumphing over the Amalekites, were the Philistines triumphing over Saul. One is set over against the other, that men may see what comes of trusting in God and what comes of forsaking him. We left Saul ready to engage the Philistines, with a shaking hand and an aching heart, having had his doom read him from hell, which he would not regard when it was read him from heaven. I. His army routed, ver. 1. II. His three sons slain, ver. 2. III. Himself wounded (ver. 3), and slain by his own hand, ver. 4. The death of his armour-bearer (ver. 5) and all his men, ver. 6. IV. His country possessed by the Philistines, ver. 7. His camp plundered, and his dead body deserted, ver. 8. His fall triumphed in, ver. 9. His body publicly exposed (ver. 10) and with difficulty rescued by the men of Jabesh-Gilead, ver. 11–13. Thus fell the man that was rejected of God.

Verses 1–7

The day of recompense has now come, in which Saul should descend into battle and perish, ch. xxvi. 10.

I. He sees his soldiers fall about him, v. 1. The best of the troops were put into disorder, and multitudes slain.

II. He sees his sons fall before him. The victorious Philistines pressed most forcibly upon the king of Israel and those about him. His sons were next him, and they were all three slain before his face. Jonathan, that wise, valiant, good man, who was as much David's friend as Saul was his enemy, yet falls with the rest. Duty to his father would not permit him to stay at home, or to retire when the armies engaged. If the family must fall, Jonathan, that is one of it, must fall with it. He would hereby make David's way to the crown the more clear and open. For, though Jonathan himself would have cheerfully resigned all his title yet it is very probable that many of the people would have made use of his name for the support of the house of Saul, or at least would have come in but slowly to David. If Ish-bosheth (who was now left at home as one unfit for action, and so escaped) had so many friends, what would Jonathan have had, who had been the darling of the people and had never forfeited their favour? This would have embarrassed David.

III. Saul is sorely wounded by the Philistines and then slain by his own hand. The archers hit him (v. 3), so that he could neither fight nor fly, and therefore must inevitably fall into their hands. 1. He was desirous to die by the hand of his own servant rather than by the hand of the Philistines, lest they should abuse him as they had abused Samson. As he lived, so he died, proud and jealous, and a terror to himself and all about him. Those are in a deplorable condition indeed who leap into a hell before them, to escape a hell within them. 2. When he could not obtain that favour he became his own executioner. His armour-bearer would not run him through, for, having a profound reverence for the king his master, he could not do him any hurt.

IV. His armour-bearer who refused to kill him refused not to die with him, but fell likewise upon his sword, v. 5. The Jews say that Saul's armour-bearer was Doeg.

V. The country was put into such confusion by the rout of Saul's army that the inhabitants of the neighbouring cities (on that side Jordan, as it might be read) quitted them, and the Philistines, for a time, had possession of them, till things were settled in Israel (v. 7).

The scripture makes no mention of the souls of Saul and his sons, but of their bodies only.

I. How they were basely abused by the Philistines. The day after the battle, when they had recovered their fatigue, they came to strip the slain, and, among the rest, found the bodies of Saul and his three sons, v. 8. Saul might have saved himself the fatal thrust and have made his escape; for the pursuers (in fear of whom he slew himself) came not to the place where he was till the next day. Finding Saul's body, 1. They cut off his head. They intended it in general, for a reproach to Israel, who promised themselves that a crowned and an anointed head would save them from the Philistines, and a particular reproach to Saul, who was taller by the head than other men (which perhaps he was wont to boast of), but was now shorter by the head. 2. They stripped him of his armour (v. 9), and sent that to be set up as a trophy of their victory, in the house of Ashtaroth their goddess (v. 10); and we are told, 1 Chron. x. 10, that they fastened his head in the temple of Dagon. 3. They sent expresses throughout their country, and ordered public notice to be given in the houses of their gods of the victory they had obtained (v. 9), that public rejoicings might be made and thanks given to their gods. 4. They fastened his body and the bodies of his sons (as appears, v. 12) to the wall of Beth-shan, a city that lay not far from Gilboa and very near to the river Jordan. Hither the dead bodies were dragged and here hung up in chains, to be devoured by the birds of prey.

II. How they were bravely rescued by the men of Jabesh-Gilead. Little more than the river Jordan lay between Beth-shan and Jabesh-Gilead, and Jordan was in that place passable by its fords; a bold adventure was therefore made by the valiant men of that city, who in the night passed the river, took down the dead bodies, and gave them decent burial, v. 11, 13. This they did, 1. Out of a common concern for the honour of Israel, or the land of Israel, which ought not to be defiled by the exposing of any dead bodies, and especially of the crown of Israel, which was thus profaned by the uncircumcised. 2. Out of a particular sense of gratitude to Saul, for his zeal and forwardness to rescue them from the Ammonites when he first came to the throne, ch. xi. They buried the bodies, when, by burning over them, they had sweetened them (or, if they burnt them, they buried the bones and ashes), under a tree, which serves for a gravestone and monument. They fasted seven days; thus they lamented the death of Saul and the present distracted state of Israel, and perhaps joined prayers with their fasting for the re-establishment of their shattered state.

This book began with the birth of Samuel, but now it ends with the burial of Saul, the comparing of which two together will teach us to prefer the honour that comes from God before any of the honours which this world pretends to have the disposal of.

THE SECOND BOOK OF SAMUEL

This book is the history of the reign of king David. We had in the foregoing book an account of his designation to the government, and his struggles with Saul, which ended at length in the death of his persecutor. This book begins with his accession to the throne, and is entirely taken up with the affairs of the government during the forty years he reigned, and therefore is entitled by the LXX. The Third Book of the Kings. It gives us an account of David's triumphs and his troubles. I. His triumphs over the house of Saul (ch. i.–iv.), over the Jebusites and Philistines (ch. v.), at the bringing up of the ark (ch. vi. and vii), over the neighbouring nations that opposed him (ch. viii.–x.); and so far the history is what we might expect from David's character. But his cloud has a dark side. II. We have his troubles, the causes of them, his sin in the matter of Uriah (ch. xi. and xii.), the troubles themselves from the sin of Amnon (ch. xiii.), the rebellion of Absalom (ch. xiv.–xix.), and of Sheba (ch. xx.), and the plague in Israel for his numbering the people (ch. xxiv.), besides the famine of the Gibeonites, ch. xxi. His song we have (ch. xxii.), and his words and worthies, ch. xxiii. Many things in his history are very instructive but for the hero it must be confessed that his honour shines brighter in his Psalms than in his Annals.

CHAP. I

We are now to look towards the rising sun, and to enquire where David is, and what he is doing. In this chapter we have, I. Tidings brought him to Ziklag of the death of Saul and Jonathan, by an Amalekite, who undertook to give him a particular narrative of it, ver. 1–10. II. David's sorrowful reception of these tidings, ver. 11, 12. III. Justice done upon the messenger, who boasted that he had helped Saul to dispatch himself, ver. 13–16. IV. An elegy which David penned upon this occasion, ver. 17–27.

Verses 1–10

I. David settling again in Ziklag, his own city, after he had rescued his family and friends out of the hands of the Amalekites (v. 1): He abode in Ziklag. There he was ready to receive those that came into his interests; not men in distress and debt, as his first followers were, but persons of quality in their country, mighty men, men of war, and captains of thousands (as we find, 1 Chron. xii. 1, 8, 20); such came day by day to him.

II. Intelligence brought him thither of the death of Saul. It was strange that he did not leave some spies about the camp, to bring him early notice of the issue of the engagement, a sign that he desired not Saul's woeful day, nor was impatient to come to the throne. 1. The messenger presents himself to David as an express, in the posture of a mourner for the deceased prince and a subject to the succeeding one. He came with his clothes rent, and made obeisance to David (v. 2), pleasing himself with the fancy that he had the honour to be the first that did him homage as his sovereign, but it proved he was the first that received from him sentence of death as his judge. 2. He gives him a general account of the issue of the battle and he told him very distinctly that the army of Israel was routed, many slain, and, among the rest, Saul and Jonathan, v. 4. He named only Saul and Jonathan, because he knew David would be most solicitous to know their fate; for Saul was the man whom he most feared and Jonathan the man whom he most loved. 3. He gives him a more particular account of the death of Saul. He therefore asks, How knowest thou that Saul and Jonathan are dead? in answer to which the young man tells him a very ready story, putting it past doubt that Saul was dead, for he himself had been not only an eye-witness of his death, but an instrument of it. He says nothing, in his narrative, of the death of Jonathan, but accounts only for Saul, thinking (as David understood it well enough, ch. iv. 10) that he should be welcome for that, and rewarded as one that brought good tidings. The account he gives of this matter is, (1) Very particular. That he happened to go to the place where Saul was (v. 6), that he found Saul endeavouring to run himself through with his own spear, none of his attendants being willing to do it for him. He therefore called this stranger to him (v. 7). Understanding that he was an Amalekite (neither one of his subjects nor one of his enemies), he begs this favour from him (v. 9): Stand upon me, and slay me. "Hereupon," saith our young man, "I stood upon him, and slew him" (v. 10) at which word, perhaps, he observed David look upon him with some show of displeasure, and therefore he excuses himself in the next words: "For I was sure he could not live." (2) It is doubtful whether this story be true. But most interpreters think that it was false, and that, though he might happen to be present, yet he was not assisting in the death of Saul, but told David so in expectation that he would reward him for it, as having done him a piece of good service. (3) However he produced that which was proof sufficient of the death of Saul, the crown that was upon his head and the bracelet that was on his arm. These fell into the hands of this Amalekite. The tradition of the Jews is that this Amalekite was the son of Doeg, and that Doeg, who they suppose was Saul's armour-bearer, before he slew himself gave Saul's crown and bracelet (the ensigns of his royalty) to his son, and bade him carry them to David, to curry favour with him.

Verses 11–16

I. David's reception of these tidings. So far was he from falling into a transport of joy, as the Amalekite expected, that he fell into a passion of weeping, rent his clothes (v. 11), mourned and fasted (v. 12), not only for his people Israel and Jonathan his friend, but for Saul his enemy. This he did, not only as a man of honour, but as a good man and a man of conscience, that had forgiven the injuries Saul had done him and bore him no malice. He knew it, before his son wrote it (Prov. xxiv. 17, 18), that if we rejoice when our enemy falls the Lord sees it, and it displeases him; and that he who is glad at calamities shall not go unpunished, Prov. xvii. 5. By what he did when he heard of Saul's death, we may perceive that his natural temper was very tender, and that he was kindly affected even to those that hated him.

II. The reward he gave to him that brought him the tidings. Instead of preferring him, he put him to death, judged him out of his own mouth, as a murderer of his prince, and ordered him to be forthwith executed for the same. David herein did not do unjustly. The man was an Amalekite. This, lest he should have mistaken it in his narrative, he made him own a second time, v. 13. He did himself confess the crime, so that the evidence was, by the consent of all laws, sufficient to convict him; for every man is presumed to make the best of himself. If he did as he said, he deserved to die for treason (v. 14), doing that which, it is probable, he heard Saul's own armour-bearer refuse to do; if not, yet by boasting of it to David, he showed what opinion he had of him, that he would rejoice in it, as one altogether like himself, which was an intolerable affront to him who had himself once and again refused to stretch forth his hand against the Lord's anointed.

When David had rent his clothes, mourned, and wept, and fasted, for the death of Saul, one would think he had made full payment of the debt of honour he owed to his memory; yet this is not all: we have here a poem he wrote on that occasion. By this elegy he designed both to express his own sorrow for this great calamity and to impress the like on the minds of others, who ought to lay it to heart. Those might gain information by poems that would not read history.

I. The orders David gave with this elegy (v. 18): He bade them teach the children of Judah the use of the bow, either, 1. The bow used in war. David hereby showed his authority over and concern for the armies of Israel, and set himself to rectify the errors of the former reign. But we find that the companies which had now come to David to Ziklag were armed with bows (1 Chron. xii. 2); therefore, 2. Some understand it either of some musical instrument called a bow (to which he would have the mournful ditties sung) or of the elegy itself. He bade them teach the children of Judah Kesheth, the bow, that is, this song, which was so entitled for the sake of Jonathan's bow, the achievements of which are here celebrated. It is written in the book of Jasher, there it was kept upon record, and thence transcribed into this history. That book was probably a collection of state-poems; what is said to be written in that book (Josh. x. 13) is also poetical, a fragment of an historical poem.

II. The elegy itself. It is not a divine hymn, nor given by inspiration of God to be used in divine service, nor is there any mention of God in it; but it is a human composition, and therefore was inserted, not in the book of Psalms but in the book of Jasher, which, being only a collection of common poems, is long since lost. This elegy proves David to have been,

1. A man of an excellent spirit, in four things:—

(1) He was very generous to Saul, his sworn enemy. [1] He conceals his faults; and, though there was no preventing their appearance in his history, yet they should not appear in this elegy. Charity teaches us to make the best we can of everybody and to say nothing of those of whom we can say no good, especially when they are gone. De mortuis nil nisi bonum—Say nothing but good concerning the dead. [2] He celebrates that which was praiseworthy in him. That he was anointed with oil (v. 21), the sacred oil, which signified his elevation to, and qualification for, the government. That he was a man of war, a mighty man (v. 19–21), that he had often been victorious over the enemies of Israel and vexed them whithersoever he turned, 1 Sam. xiv. 47. Though his sun set under a cloud, time was when it shone brightly. That take him with Jonathan he was a man of a very agreeable temper, that recommended himself to the affections of his subjects (v. 23): Saul and Jonathan were lovely and pleasant. Jonathan was always so, and Saul was so as long as he concurred with him. Take them together, and in the pursuit of the enemy, never were men more bold, more brave; they were swifter than eagles and stronger than lions. They were lovely and pleasant one to another, Jonathan a dutiful son, Saul an affectionate father; and therefore dear to each other in their lives, and in their death they were not divided, but kept close together in the stand they made against the Philistines, and fell together in the same cause.

(2) He was very grateful to Jonathan. He lamented him for what he had been: "Very pleasant hast thou been unto me; but that pleasantness is now over, and I am distressed for thee." He had reason to say that Jonathan's love to him was wonderful; surely never was the like, for a man to love one who he knew was to take the crown over his head, and to be so faithful to his rival. [1] That nothing is more delightful in this world than a true friend, that is wise and good, that kindly receives and returns our affection, and is faithful to us in all our true interests. [2] That nothing is more distressful than the loss of such a friend; it is parting with a piece of one's self. The more we love the more we grieve.

(3) He was deeply concerned for the honour of God; for this is what he has an eye to when he fears lest the daughters of the uncircumcised, that are out of covenant with God, should triumph over Israel, and the God of Israel, v. 20. Good men are touched in a very sensible part by the reproaches of those that reproach God.

(4) He was deeply concerned for the public welfare. It was the beauty of Israel that was slain (v. 19) and the honour of the public that was disgraced. David hoped God would make him instrumental to repair those losses and yet laments them.

2. A man of a fine imagination, as well as a wise and holy man. (1) The embargo he would fain lay upon fame is elegant (v. 20): Tell it not in Gath. It grieved him to the heart to think that it would be proclaimed in the cities of the Philistines. (2) The curse he entails on the mountains of Gilboa, the theatre on which this tragedy was acted: Let there be no dew upon you, nor fields of offerings, v. 21. This is the reproach David fastens upon the mountains of Gilboa, which, having been stained with royal blood, thereby forfeited celestial dews.

CHAP. II

Saul is dead, now therefore David arises. I. By direction from God he went up to Hebron, and was there anointed king, ver. 1–4. II. He returned thanks to the men of Jabesh-Gilead for burying Saul, ver. 5–7. III. Ish-bosheth, the son of Saul, is set up in opposition to him, ver. 8–11. IV. A warm encounter happens between David's party and Ish-bosheth's, in which, 1. Twelve of each side engaged hand to hand and were all slain, ver. 12–16. 2. Saul's party was beaten, ver. 17. 3. Asahel, on David's side, was slain by Abner, ver. 18–23. 4. Joab, at Abner's request, sounds a retreat, ver. 24–28. 5. Abner makes the best of his way (ver. 29), and the loss on both sides is computed, ver. 30–32. So that here we have an account of a civil war in Israel, which, in process of time, ended in the complete settlement of David on the throne.

Verses 1–7

When Saul and Jonathan were dead, though David knew himself anointed to be king, yet he did not immediately send messengers through all the coasts of Israel to summon all people to come in and swear allegiance to him. Many had come in to his assistance from several tribes while he continued at Ziklag, as we find (1 Chron. xii. 1–22), and with such a force he might have come in by conquest. But he that will rule with meekness will not rise with violence.

I. The direction he sought and had from God in this critical juncture, v. 1. He doubted not of success, yet he used proper means, both divine and human. 1. David, according to the precept, acknowledged

God in his way. He enquired of the Lord by the breastplate of judgment, which Abiathar brought to him. We must apply to God not only when we are in distress, but even when the world smiles upon us and second causes work in favour of us. His enquiry was, Shall I go up to any of the cities of Judah? Though Ziklag be in ruins, he will not quit it without direction from God. "If I stir hence, Shall I go to one of the cities of Judah?" 2. God, according to the promise, directed his path, bade him go up, told him whither, unto Hebron, a priests' city, one of the cities of refuge, so it was to David, and an intimation that God himself would be to him a little sanctuary.

II. The care he took of his family and friends in his removal to Hebron. 1. He took his wives with him (v. 2), that, as they had been companions with him in tribulation, they might be so in the kingdom. It does not appear that as yet he had any children; his first was born in Hebron, ch. iii. 2. 2. He took his friends and followers with him, v. 3. They had accompanied him in his wanderings, and therefore, when he gained a settlement, they settled with him.

III. The honour done him by the men of Judah: They anointed him king over the house of Judah, v. 4. The tribe of Judah had often stood by itself more than any other of the tribes. In Saul's time it was numbered by itself as a distinct body (1 Sam. xv. 4) and those of this tribe had been accustomed to act separately. They did so now; yet they did it for themselves only; they did not pretend to anoint him king over all Israel (as Judg. ix. 22), but only over the house of Judah. He was first anointed king in reversion, then in possession of one tribe only, and at last of all the tribes. Thus the kingdom of the Messiah, the Son of David, is set up by degrees; he is Lord of all by divine designation, but we see not yet all things put under him, Heb. ii. 8.

IV. The respectful message he sent to the men of Jabesh-Gilead, to return them thanks for their kindness to Saul. Still he studies to honour the memory of his predecessor, and thereby to show that he was far from aiming at the crown from any principle of ambition or enmity to Saul, but purely because he was called of God to it. "Saul was your lord," says David, "and therefore you did well to show him this kindness and do him this honour." He prays to God to bless them for it, and to recompense it to them: Blessed are you. The Lord show kindness and truth to you (v. 6). He promises to make them amends for it: I also will requite you. He does not turn them over to God for a recompense that he may excuse himself from rewarding them. Good wishes are good things, and instances of gratitude, but they are too cheap to be rested in where there is an ability to do more.

Verses 8–17

I. A rivalship between two kings—David, whom God made king, and Ish-bosheth, whom Abner made king. One would have thought David would come to the throne without any opposition, since all Israel knew how manifestly God had designated him to it; but such a spirit of contradiction is there, in the devices of men, to the counsels of God, that such a weak and silly thing as Ish-bosheth, who was not thought fit to go with his father to the battle, shall yet be thought fit to succeed him in the government, rather than David shall come peaceably to it. 1. Abner was the person who set up Ish-bosheth in competition with David, perhaps in his zeal for the lineal succession, or rather in his affection to his own family and relations (for he was Saul's uncle), and because he had no other way to secure to himself the post of honour he was in, as captain of the host. Ish-bosheth would never have set up himself if Abner had not set him up, and made a tool of him to serve his own purposes. 2. Mahanaim, the place where he first made his claim, was on the other side Jordan, where it was thought David had the least interest, and being at a distance from his forces they might have time to strengthen themselves. But, having set up his standard there, the unthinking people of all the tribes of Israel (that is, the generality of them) submitted to him (v. 9), and Judah only was entirely for David.

II. An encounter between their two armies.

1. It does not appear that either side brought their whole force into the field, for the slaughter was but small, v. 30, 31. It is likely, David would not suffer them to act offensively, choosing rather to wait till the thing would do itself or rather till God would do it for him, without the effusion of Israelitish blood. The men of Israel stand neuter, and sit down tamely under Ish-bosheth, for so many years. Wise men, mighty men, men of valour, expert in war, and not of double heart, and yet for seven years together, most of them seemed indifferent in whose hand the public administration was.

2. In this battle Abner was the aggressor. David sat still to see how the matter would fall, but the house of Saul, and Abner at the head of it, gave the challenge.

The seat of the war was Gibeon. Abner chose it because it was in the lot of Benjamin, where Saul had the most friends; yet, since he offered battle, Joab, David's general, would not decline it, but there joined issue with him, and met him by the pool of Gibeon, v. 13. David's cause, being built upon God's promise, feared not the disadvantages of the ground. The pool between gave both sides time to deliberate. The engagement was at first proposed by Abner, and accepted by Joab, to be between twelve and twelve of a side. (1) It should seem this trial of skill began in sport. Abner made the motion (v. 14): Let the young men arise and play before us, as gladiators. He meant, "Let them fight before us," when he said, "Let them play before us." Joab, having been bred up under David, had so much wisdom as not to make such a proposal, yet had not resolution enough to resist and gainsay it when another made it; for he stood upon a point of honour, and thought it a blemish to his reputation to refuse a challenge, and therefore said, Let them arise. Twelve of each side were accordingly called out as champions to enter the lists, a double jury of life and death, and the champions on Abner's side seem to have been most forward, for they took the field first (v. 15). But, (2) However it began, it ended in blood (v. 16): They thrust every man his sword into his fellow's side (spurred on by honour, not by enmity); so they fell down together, that is, all the twenty-four were slain. The wonderful obstinacy of both sides was remembered in the name given to the place: Helkath-hazzurim—the field of rocky men, men that were not only strong in body, but of firm and unshaken constancy, that stirred not at the sight of death. The whole army at length engaged, and Abner's forces were routed, v. 17.

The contest between Abner and Asahel. Asahel, the brother of Joab and cousin-german to David, was one of the principal commanders of David's forces, and was famous for swiftness in running: he was as light of foot as a wild roe (v. 18); this he got the name of by swift pursuing, not swift flying. He was not comparable to Abner as a skilful experienced soldier.

I. How rash he was in aiming to make Abner his prisoner. He pursued after him, and no other, v. 19. Proud of his relation to David and Joab, his own swiftness, and the success of his party, no less a trophy of victory would now serve the young warrior than Abner himself, either slain or bound, which he thought would put an end to the war and effectually open David's way to the throne.

II. How generous Abner was in giving him notice of the danger he exposed himself to, and advising him not to meddle to his own hurt, 2 Chron. xxv. 19. 1. He bade him content himself with a less prey (v. 21). 2. He begged of him not to put him upon the necessity of slaying him in his own defence, which he was very loth to do, but must do rather than be slain by him, v. 22.

III. How fatal Asahel's rashness was to him. He refused to turn aside, thinking that Abner spoke so courteously because he feared him; but what came of it? Abner, as soon as he came up to him, gave him his death's wound with a back stroke (v. 23): He smote him with the hinder end of his spear, from which he feared no danger. Joab and Abishai, instead of being disheartened were exasperated by it, pursued Abner with so much the more fury (v. 24), and overtook him at last about sunset, when the approaching night would oblige them to retire.

Verses 25–32

I. Abner, being conquered, meanly begs for a cessation of arms. He rallied the remains of his forces on the top of a hill (v. 25), as if he would have made head again, but becomes a humble supplicant to Joab for a little breathing-time, v. 26. He that was most forward to fight was the first that had enough of it. He that made a jest of bloodshed (Let the young men arise and play before us, v. 14) is now shocked at it, when he finds himself on the losing side. Then it was but playing with the sword; now, Shall the sword devour for ever? Now he can appeal to Joab himself concerning the miserable consequences of a civil war: Knowest thou not that it will be bitterness in the latter end? Now he begs of Joab to sound a retreat, and pleads that they were brethren, who ought not thus to bite and devour one another. How easy it is for men to use reason when it makes for them who would not use it if it made against them. If Abner had been the conqueror, we should not have had him complaining of the voraciousness of the sword and the miseries of a civil war, nor pleading that both sides were brethren.

II. Joab, though a conqueror, generously grants it, and sounds a retreat, knowing very well his master's mind and how averse he was to the shedding of blood.

III. The armies being separated, both retired to the places whence they came, and both marched in the night, Abner to Mahanaim, on the other side Jordan (v. 29), and Joab to Hebron, where David was, v. 32. Asahel's funeral is here mentioned; the rest they buried in the field of battle, but he was carried to Bethlehem, and buried in the sepulchre of his father, v. 32.

CHAP. III

I. The gradual advance of David's interest, ver. 1. II. The building up of his family, ver. 2–5. II Abner's quarrel with Ish-bosheth, and his treaty with David, ver. 6–12. IV. The preliminaries settled, ver. 13–16. V. Abner's undertaking and attempt to bring Israel over to David, ver. 17–21. VI. The treacherous murder of Abner by Joab, when he was carrying on this matter, ver. 22–27. VII. David's great concern and trouble for the death of Abner, ver. 28–39.

I. The struggle that David had with the house of Saul before his settlement in the throne was completed, v. 1. The length of this war tried the faith and patience of David. The house of Saul waxed weaker and weaker, lost places, lost men, sunk in its reputation, and was foiled in every engagement. But the house of David grew stronger. Many deserted the declining cause of Saul's house. The contest between grace and corruption in the hearts of believers, who are sanctified but in part, may fitly be compared to this recorded here. There is a long war between them, the flesh lusting against the spirit and the spirit against the flesh; but, as the work of sanctification is carried on, corruption, like the house of Saul, grows weaker and weaker; while grace, like the house of David, grows stronger and stronger, till it come to a perfect man, and judgment be brought forth unto victory.

II. The increase of his own house. Here is an account of six sons he had by six several wives, in the seven years he reigned in Hebron. It was David's fault thus to multiply wives, contrary to the law (Deut. xvii. 17), and it was a bad example to his successors. We read not that any of these sons came to be famous (three of them were infamous, Amnon, Absalom, and Adonijah). His son by Abigail is called Chileab (v. 3), whereas (1 Chron. iii. 1) he is called Daniel. His first name was Daniel—God has judged me (namely, against Nabal), but David's enemies reproached him, and said, "It is Nabal's son, and not David's," as he grew up, he became, in his countenance and features, extremely like David, upon which he gave him the name of Chileab, which signifies, like his father, or the father's picture. Absalom's mother is said to be the daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur, a heathen prince. Perhaps David thereby hoped to strengthen his interest, but the issue of the marriage was one that proved his grief and shame. The last is called David's wife, which therefore, some think, was Michal, his first and most rightful wife, called here by another name: and, though she had no child after she mocked David, she might have had before.

I. Abner breaks with Ish-bosheth, upon a little provocation which Ish-bosheth unadvisedly gave him. 1. Ish-bosheth accused Abner of no less a crime than debauching one of his father's concubines, v. 7. 2. Abner resented the charge very strongly. He lets Ish-bosheth know, (1) That he scorned to be reproached with it by him, and would not take reproof at his hands. Proud men will not bear to be reproved, especially by those whom they think they have obliged. (2) That he would certainly be revenged on him, v. 9, 10. With the utmost degree of arrogance and insolence he lets him know that, as he had raised him up, so he could pull him down again and would do it. Abner's ambition made him zealous for Ish-bosheth, and now his revenge made him as zealous for David. If he had sincerely regarded God's promise to David, and acted with an eye to that, he would have been steady and uniform in his counsels. If Ish-bosheth had had the spirit of a man, especially of a prince, he might have answered him that his merits were the aggravation of his crimes, that he would not be served by so base a man. But he was conscious to himself of his own weakness, and therefore said not a word.

II. Abner treats with David. We must suppose that he began to grow weary of Ish-bosheth's cause, and sought an opportunity to desert it. He sent messengers to David, to tell him that he was at his service. Note, God can find out ways to make those serviceable to the kingdom of Christ who yet have no sincere affection for it and who have vigorously set themselves against it. Enemies are sometimes made a footstool, not only to be trodden upon, but to ascend by. The earth helped the woman.

III. David enters into a treaty with Abner, but upon condition that he shall procure him the restitution of Michal his wife, v. 13. 1. David showed the sincerity of his conjugal affection to his first and most rightful wife; neither her marrying another, nor his, had alienated him from her. Many waters could not quench that love. 2. He testified his respect to the house of Saul. He cannot be pleased with the honours of the throne unless he have Michal, Saul's daughter, to share with him in them, so far is he from bearing any malice to the family of his enemy. Abner sent him word that he must apply to Ish-bosheth, which he did (v. 14), pleading that he had purchased her at a dear rate, and she was wrongfully taken from him. Ish-bosheth durst not deny his demand, but took her from Phaltiel, to whom Saul had married her (v. 15), and Abner conducted her to David, not doubting but that then he should be doubly welcome when he brought him a wife in one hand and a crown in the other. Her latter husband was loth to part with her, but there was no remedy: he must thank himself: for when he took her he knew that another had a right to her. If any disagreement has separated husband and wife, as they expect the blessing of God let them be reconciled, and come together again; let all former quarrels be forgotten, and let them live together in love, according to God's holy ordinance.

IV. Abner uses his interest with the elders of Israel to bring them over to David, knowing that whichever way they went the common people would follow of course. No man can pretend to greater personal merit than David nor to less than Ish-bosheth. You have tried them both, Detir digniori—Give the crown to him that best deserves it. Let David be your king. God, having promised, by David's hand, to save Israel, it is both your duty, in compliance with God's will, and your interest, in order to your victories over your enemies, to submit to him; and it is the greatest folly in the world to oppose him.

V. David concludes the treaty with Abner. Abner reported to David the sense of the people and the success of his communications with them, v. 19. He came now with a retinue of twenty men, and David entertained them with a feast (v. 20) in token of reconciliation and joy and as a pledge of the agreement between them: it was a feast upon a covenant, like that, Gen. xxvi. 30.

The murder of Abner by Joab, and David's deep resentment of it.

I. Joab very insolently fell foul upon David for treating with Abner. He was informed that Abner was just gone (v. 22, 23), and that a great many kind things had passed between David and him. He chides David, and reproaches him to his face (v. 24, 25): What hast thou done? As if David were accountable to him for what he did: "Why hast thou sent him away, when thou mightest have made him a prisoner? He came as a spy, and will certainly betray thee." We find no answer that David gave him, not because he feared him, as Ish-bosheth did Abner (v. 11), but because he despised him.

II. Joab very treacherously sent for Abner back, and, under colour of a private conference with him, barbarously killed him with his own hand. That he made use of David's name, under pretence of giving him some further instructions, is intimated in that, but David knew it not, v. 26. Abner very innocently returned to Hebron, and, when he found Joab waiting for him at the gate, turned aside with him to speak with him, and there Joab murdered him (v. 27), and it is intimated (v. 30) that Abishai was privy to the design, and was aiding and abetting. Abner had maliciously, and against the convictions of his conscience, opposed David. He had now basely deserted Ish-bosheth and betrayed him, under pretence of regard to God and Israel, but really from a principle of pride, and revenge, and impatience of control. It is as certain that Joab was unrighteous, and, in what he did, did wickedly. Abner had indeed slain his brother Asahel, and Joab and Abishai pretended herein to be the avengers of his blood (v. 27, 30); but Abner slew Asahel in an open war. He did it likewise, in his own defence, and not till he had given him fair warning but Joab here shed the blood of war in peace, 1 Kings ii. 5. That which was at the bottom of Joab's enmity to Abner made it much worse. Joab was now general of David's forces; but, if Abner should come into his interest, he would possibly be preferred before him, being a senior officer, and more experienced in the art of war. He did it treacherously, and under pretence of speaking peaceably to him, Deut. xxvii. 24. Had he challenged him, he would have done like a soldier; but to assassinate him was done villainously and like a coward. Abner was now actually in his master's service, so that, through his side, he struck at David himself. It was a great aggravation of the murder that he did it in the gate, openly and avowedly, as one that was not ashamed.

III. David laid deeply to heart and in many ways expressed his detestation of this execrable villainy.

1. He washed his hands from the guilt of Abner's blood. I and my kingdom are guiltless before the Lord for ever, v. 28.

2. He entailed the curse for it upon Joab and his family (v. 29): "Let it rest on the head of Joab." A resolute punishment of the murderer himself would better have become David than this passionate imprecation of God's judgments upon his posterity.

3. He called upon all about him, even Joab himself, to lament the death of Abner (v. 31). When he could not call him a saint or a good man, he said nothing of that, but what was true he gave him the praise of, though he had been his enemy, that he was a prince and a great man. (1) Let them all lament it. A public loss must be every man's grief, for every man shares in it. Thus David took care that honour should be done to the memory of a man of merit, to animate others. (2) Let Joab, in a particular manner, lament it, which he has less heart but more reason to do than any of them.

4. David himself followed the corpse as chief mourner, and made a funeral oration at the grave. He attended the bier (v. 31) and wept at the grave, v. 32. Because he had been a man of bravery in the field, and might have done great service in the public counsels at this critical juncture, all former quarrels are forgotten and David is a true mourner for his fall. What he said over the grave fetched tears from the eyes of all that were present: Died Abner as a fool dieth? (1) He speaks as one vexed that Abner was fooled out of his life, imposed upon by a colour of friendship, slain by surprise. The wisest and stoutest of men have no fence against treachery. To see Abner, who thought himself the main hinge on which the great affairs of Israel turned, made a fool of by a base rival, and falling on a sudden a sacrifice to his ambition and jealousy—this stains the pride of all glory, and should put one out of conceit with worldly grandeur. Or, (2) He speaks as one boasting that Abner did not fool himself out of his life: "Died Abner as a fool dies? No, he did not, not as a criminal, a traitor or felon." Died Abner as Nabal died? so the LXX read it. Nabal died as he lived, like himself, like a sot: but Abner's fate was such as might have been the fate of the wisest and best man in the world.

5. He fasted all that day, and would by no means be persuaded to eat any thing till night, v. 34.

6. He bewailed it that he could not with safety do justice on the murderers, v. 30. He was weak, his kingdom was newly planted, and a little shake would overthrow it. Joab's family had a great interest, were bold and daring, and to make them his enemies now might be of bad consequence. David contents himself as a private person, to leave them to the judgment of God: The Lord shall reward the doer of evil according to his wickedness. Now this is a diminution, (1) To David's greatness. (2) To David's goodness. He ought to have done his duty, and trusted God with the issue. Fiat justitia, ruat coelum—Let justice be done, though the heavens should fall asunder. If the law had had its course against Joab, perhaps the murder of Ish-bosheth, Amnon, and others, would have been prevented. It was carnal policy and cruel pity that spared Joab.

CHAP. IV

The removal of Ish-bosheth. I. Two of his own servants slew him, and brought his head to David, ver. 1–8. II. David, instead of rewarding them, put them to death for what they had done, ver. 9–12.

Verses 1–8

I. The weakness of Saul's house. 1. As for Ish-bosheth, his hands were feeble, v. 1. All the strength they ever had was from Abner's support, and now that he was dead he had no spirit left in him. He sees himself forsaken by his friends and at the mercy of his enemies. 2. As for Mephibosheth, who in the right of his father Jonathan had a prior title, his feet were lame, and he was unfit for any service, v. 4. He was but five years old when his father and grandfather were killed. His nurse, hearing of the Philistines' victory, was apprehensive that they would immediately aim at her young master, who was now next heir to the crown. She fled with the child in her arms, and, making more haste than good speed, she fell with the child, and by the fall some bone was broken or put out, and not well set, so that he was lame of it as long as he lived.

II. The murder of Saul's son.

1. Who were the murderers: Baanah and Rechab, v. 2, 3. They were brothers, Ish-bosheth's own servants, employed under him, so much the more base and treacherous was it in them to do him a mischief. They were Benjamites, of his own tribe. They were of the city of Beeroth; the inhabitants, upon some occasion or other, perhaps upon the death of Saul, retired to Gittaim. There the Beerothites were when this was written.

2. How the murder was committed, v. 5–7. Ish-bosheth was a sluggish man, loved his ease and hated business: and when he should have been, at this critical juncture, at the head of his forces in the field, or at the head of his counsels in a treaty with David, he was lying upon his bed and sleeping, for his hands were feeble (v. 1), and so were his head and heart. The treachery of Baanah and Rechab. They came into the house, under pretence of fetching wheat for the victualling of their regiments. The king's corn-chamber and his bed-chamber lay near together, which gave them an opportunity, when they were fetching wheat, to murder him as he lay on the bed.

3. The murderers triumphed in what they had done. As if they had performed some very glorious action they made a present of Ish-bosheth's head to David (v. 8). Not that they had any regard either to God or to David's honour; they aimed at nothing but to make their own fortunes and to get preferment in David's court.

Justice done upon the murderers of Ish-bosheth.

I. Sentence passed upon them. There needed no evidence, their own tongues witnessed against them; they were so far from denying the fact that they gloried in it. David therefore shows them the heinousness of the crime. Ish-bosheth was a righteous person, he had done them no wrong, nor designed them any. David owns Ish-bosheth an honest man, though he had created him a great deal of trouble unjustly. The manner of it much aggravated the crime. To slay him in his own house and upon his bed, when he was in no capacity of making any opposition, this is treacherous and barbarous. He quotes a precedent (v. 10): he had put him to death who had brought him the tidings of the death of Saul, because he thought it would be good tidings to David. He ratifies the sentence with an oath (v. 9): As the Lord liveth, who hath redeemed my soul out of all adversity. He expresses himself thus resolutely, to prevent the making of any intercession for the criminals by those about him, and thus piously to intimate that his dependence was upon God for the putting of him in possession of the promised throne, and that he would not be beholden to any man to help him to it by any indirect or unlawful practices. Hereupon he signs a warrant for the execution of these men, v. 12. If wicked men smite Ish-bosheth, they deserve to die for taking God's work out of his hand.

II. Execution done. The murderers were put to death according to law, to be monuments of David's justice. But what a confusion was this to the two murderers! What a horrid disappointment! And such those will meet with who think to serve the interests of the Son of David by any immoral practices, by war and persecution, fraud and rapine, who, under colour of religion, murder princes, break solemn contracts, lay countries waste, hate their brethren, and cast them out, and say, Let the Lord he glorified, kill them, and think they do God good service. However men may canonize such methods of serving the church and the catholic cause, Christ will let them know, another day, that Christianity was not intended to destroy humanity; and those who thus think to merit heaven shall not escape the damnation of hell.

CHAP. V

In this chapter, I. David anointed king by all the tribes, ver. 1–5. II. Making himself master of the stronghold of Zion, ver. 6–10. III. Building himself a house and strengthening himself in his kingdom, ver. 11, 12. IV. His children that were born after this, ver. 13–16. V. His victories over the Philistines, ver. 17–25.

Verses 1–5

I. The humble address of all the tribes to David, beseeching him to take upon him the government and owning him for their king. Judah had submitted to David as their king above seven years ago, and their ease and happiness, under his administration, encouraged the rest of the tribes to make their court to him. What numbers came from each tribe, with what zeal and sincerity they came, and how they were entertained for three days at Hebron, when they were all of one heart to make David king, we have a full account, 1 Chron. xii. 23–40. Here we have the grounds they went upon in making David king. 1. Their relation to him was some inducement: "We are thy bone and thy flesh" (v. 1), not only thou art our bone and our flesh, not a stranger, unqualified by the law to be king (Deut. xvii. 15), but we are thine. Thou wilt be as glad as we shall be to put an end to this long civil war; and thou wilt take pity on us, protect us, and do thy utmost for our welfare." Those who take Christ for their king may thus plead with him: We are thy bone and thy flesh, thou hast made thyself in all things like unto thy brethren (Heb. ii. 17); therefore be thou our ruler, and let this ruin be under thy hand," Isa. iii. 6. 2. His former good services to the public were a further inducement (v. 2). 3. The divine appointment was the greatest inducement of all.

II. The public and solemn inauguration of David, v. 3. A convention of the states was called; all the elders of Israel came to him; the contract was settled, the pacta conventa—covenants, sworn to, and subscribed on both sides. He obliged himself to protect them as their judge in peace and captain in war; and they obliged themselves to obey him. He made a league with them to which God was a witness: it was before the Lord. Hereupon he was, for the third time, anointed king. His advances were gradual, that his faith might be tried and that he might gain experience. And thus his kingdom typified that of the Messiah, which was to come to its height by degrees; for we see not yet all things put under him (Heb. ii. 8), but we shall see it, 1 Cor. xv. 25.

III. A general account of his reign and age. He was thirty years old when he began to reign, upon the death of Saul, v. 4. At that age the Levites were at first appointed to begin their administration, Num. iv. 3. About that age the Son of David entered upon his public ministry, Luke iii. 23. Then men come to their full maturity of strength and judgment. He reigned, in all, forty years and six months, of which seven years and a half in Hebron and thirty-three years in Jerusalem, v. 5. Hebron had been famous, Josh. xiv. 15. It was a priest's city. But Jerusalem was to be more so, and to be the holy city.

If Salem, the place of which Melchizedec was king, was Jerusalem (as seems probable from Ps. lxxvi. 2), it was famous in Abraham's time. Joshua, in his time, found it the chief city of the south part of Canaan, Joshua x. 1–3. It fell to Benjamin's lot (Joshua xviii. 28), but joined close to Judah's, Joshua xv. 8. The children of Judah had taken it (Judges i. 8), but the children of Benjamin suffered the Jebusites to dwell among them (Judges i. 21), and they grew so upon them that it became a city of Jebusites, Judges xix. 11. Now the very first exploit David did, after he was anointed king over all Israel, was to gain Jerusalem out of the hand of the Jebusites, which, because it belonged to Benjamin, he could not well attempt till that tribe, which long adhered to Saul's house (1 Chron. xii. 29), submitted to him.

I. The Jebusites' defiance of David and his forces. They said, Except thou take away the blind and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither, v. 6. They sent David this provoking message, because they could not believe that ever an enemy would enter into the gates of Jerusalem, Lam. iv. 12. They confided either, 1. In the protection of their gods, which David, in contempt, had called the blind and the lame, for they have eyes and see not, feet and walk not. Or, 2. In the strength of their fortifications, which they thought were made so impregnable by nature or art, or both, that the blind and the lame were sufficient to defend them against the most powerful assailant. The stronghold of Zion they especially depended on, as that which could not be forced.

II. David's success against the Jebusites. Their pride and insolence, instead of daunting him, animated him, and when he made a general assault he gave this order to his men: "He that smiteth the Jebusites, let him also throw down into the ditch, or gutter, the lame and the blind, which are set upon the wall to affront us and our God." David, having gained the fort, said that these images, which could not protect their worshippers, should never have any place there more.

III. His fixing his royal seat in Sion. He himself dwelt in the fort and he built houses round about for his attendants and guards (v. 9) from Millo (the townhall, or state-house) and inward. He proceeded and prospered in all he set his hand to, grew great in honour, strength, and wealth, more and more honourable in the eyes of his subjects and formidable in the eyes of his enemies; for the Lord God of hosts was with him..

I. David's house built, a royal palace, fit for the reception of the court he kept and the homage that was paid to him, v. 11. Hiram, king of Tyre, a wealthy prince, when he sent to congratulate David on his accession to the throne, offered him workmen to build him a house. David thankfully accepted the offer, and Hiram's workmen built David a house to his mind. Many have excelled in arts and sciences who were strangers to the covenants of promise. Yet David's house was never the worse, nor the less fit to be dedicated to God, for being built by the sons of the stranger. It is prophesied of the gospel church, The sons of the strangers shall build up thy walls, and their kings shall minister unto thee, Isa. lx. 10.

II. David's government settled and built up, v. 12. 1. His kingdom was established, there was nothing to shake it. He that made him king established him, because he was to be a type of Christ, with whom God's hand should be established. 2. It was exalted in the eyes both of its friends and enemies. Never had the nation of Israel looked so great or made such a figure as it began now to do. God did not make Israel his subjects for his sake, that he might be great, and rich, and absolute: but he made him their king for their sake, that he might lead, and guide, and protect them.

III. David's family multiplied and increased. All the sons that were born to him after he came to Jerusalem are here mentioned together, eleven in all, besides the six that were born to him before in Hebron, ch. iii. 2, 5. It is said that he took more concubines and wives, v. 13. Shall we praise him for this? We praise him not; we justify him not; nor can we scarcely excuse him. The bad example of the patriarchs might make him think there was no harm in it, and he might hope it would strengthen his interest, by multiplying his alliances, and increasing the royal family. But one vine by the side of the house, with the blessing of God, may send boughs to the sea and branches to the rivers. David had many wives, and yet that did not keep him from coveting his neighbour's wife and defiling her; for men that have once broken the fence will wander endlessly.

The particular service for which David was raised up was to save Israel out of the hand of the Philistines, ch. iii. 18. Two great victories obtained over the Philistines we have here an account of, by which David not only balanced the disgrace and retrieved the loss Israel had sustained in the battle wherein Saul was slain, but went far towards the total subduing of those vexatious neighbours.

I. In both these actions the Philistines were the aggressors. 1. In the former they came up to seek David (v. 17), because they heard that he was anointed king over Israel. They therefore try to crush his government in its infancy, before it was well settled. They took counsel together, but were broken in pieces, Isa. viii. 9, 10. 2. In the latter they came up yet again, hoping to recover what they had lost in the former engagement, their hearts being hardened to their destruction, v. 22. 3. In both they spread themselves in the valley of Rephaim, which lay very near Jerusalem. That city they hoped to make themselves masters of before David had completed the fortifications. Their spreading themselves intimates that they were very numerous.

II. In both, David, though forward enough to go forth against them yet entered not upon action till he had enquired of the Lord by the breast-plate of judgment, v. 19, and again, v. 23. His enquiry was twofold:—1. Concerning his duty: "Shall I go up?" Achish had been kind to him in his distress, and had protected him. "Now," says David, "ought not

I, in remembrance of that, rather to make peace with them than to make war with them?" "No," says God, "they are Israel's enemies, go up." 2. Concerning his success. His conscience asked the former question, Shall I go up? His prudence asked this, Wilt thou deliver them into my hand? Hereby he owns his dependence on God for victory. Yea, says God, I will doubtless do it. If God send us, he will bear us out and stand by us. The assurance God has given us of victory over our spiritual enemies, that he will tread Satan under our feet shortly, should animate us in our spiritual conflicts. David had now a great army at command and in good heart, yet he relied more on God's promise than his own force.

III. In the former of these engagements David routed the army of the Philistines by dint of sword (v. 20): he smote them; and when he had done, 1. He gave his God the glory. He called the place Baal-perazim, the master of the breaches, because, God having broken in upon their forces, he soon had the mastery of them. 2. He put their gods to shame. They brought the images of their gods into the field as their protectors, in imitation of the Israelites bringing the ark into their camp; but, being put to flight, they could not stay to carry off their images, for they were a burden to the weary beasts (Isa. xlvi. 1), and therefore they left them to fall with the rest of their baggage into the hands of the conqueror. David and his men converted to their own use the rest of the plunder, but the images they burnt, as God had appointed (Deut. vii. 5). Bishop Patrick well observes here that when the ark fell into the Philistines' hands it consumed them, but when these images fell into the hands of Israel, they could not save themselves from being consumed.

IV. In the latter of these engagements God gave David some sensible tokens of his presence with him, bade him not fall upon them directly, as he had done before, but fetch a compass behind them, v. 23. 1. God appoints him to draw back, as Israel stood still to see the salvation of the Lord. 2. He promised him to charge the enemy himself, by an invisible host of angels, v. 24. "Thou shalt hear the sound of a going, like the march of an army in the air, upon the tops of the mulberry trees." God's grace must quicken our endeavours. The sound of the going was, (1) A signal to David when to move; it is comfortable going out when God goes before us. And, (2) Perhaps it was an alarm to the enemy, and put them into confusion. Hearing the march of an army against their front, they retreated with precipitation, and fell into David's army which lay behind them in their rear. (3) The success of this is briefly set down, v. 25. David observed his orders, waited till God moved, and stirred then, but not till then. He smote the Philistines, even to the borders of their own country. When the kingdom of the Messiah was to be set up, the apostles that were to beat down the devil's kingdom must not attempt anything till they received the promise of the Spirit, who came with a sound from heaven as of a rushing mighty wind (Acts ii. 2), which was typified by this sound of the going on the tops of the mulberry trees; and, when they heard that, they must bestir themselves, and did so; they went forth conquering and to conquer.

CHAP. VI

David, having humbled the Philistines, is here bringing up the ark to his own city, that it might be near him, and be an ornament and strength to his new foundation. I. An attempt to do it, which failed and miscarried. The design was well laid, ver. 1, 2. But, 1. They were guilty of an error in carrying it in a cart, ver. 3–5. 2. They were punished for that error by the sudden death of Uzzah (ver. 6, 7), which was a great terror to David (ver. 8, 9) and put a stop to his proceedings, ver. 10, 11. II. The great joy and satisfaction with which it was at last done, ver. 12–15. And, 1. The good understanding between David and his people, ver. 17–19. 2. The uneasiness between David and his wife upon that occasion, ver. 16, 20–23. And, when we consider that the ark was both the token of God's presence and a type of Christ, we shall see that this story is very instructive.

Verses 1–5

The ark was lodged in Kirjath-jearim, immediately after its return out of its captivity among the Philistines (1 Sam. vii. 1, 2). Once Saul called for it, 1 Sam. xiv. 18. That which in former days had made so great a figure is as a neglected thing for many years. Perpetual visibility is no mark of the true church. God is graciously present with the souls of his people even when they want the external tokens of his presence. But now that David is settled in the throne the honour of the ark begins to revive.

I. Here is honourable mention made of the ark. Because it had not been spoken of a great while, now it is described (v. 2): the ark of God whose name is called by the name of the Lord of hosts that dwelleth between the cherubim. Let us learn hence, 1. To think and speak highly of God. He is the name above every name, the Lord of hosts, that has all the creatures in heaven and earth, at his command, and yet is pleased to dwell between the cherubim, over the propitiatory or mercy-seat, graciously manifesting himself to his people, reconciled in a Mediator, and ready to do them good. 2. To think and speak honourably of holy ordinances, which are to us, as the ark was to Israel, the token of God's presence (Matt. xxviii. 20), and the means of our communion with him, Ps. xxvii. 4. Christ is our ark.

II. Here is an honourable attendance given to the ark upon the removal of it. David made the motion (1 Chron. xiii. 1–3). All the chosen men of Israel are called together to grace the solemnity, to pay their respect to the ark, and to testify their joy in its restoration. This would help to inspire the young people of the nation, who perhaps had scarcely heard of the ark, with a great veneration for it.

III. Here are great expressions of joy upon the removal of the ark, v. 5. As secret worship is better the more secret it is, so public worship is better the more public it is; and we have reason to rejoice when restraints are taken off, and the ark of God finds welcome in the city of David, and has not only the protection and support, but the countenance and encouragement, of the civil powers; for joy of this they played before the Lord. Dr. Lightfoot supposes that, upon this occasion, David penned the 68th Psalm, because it begins with that ancient prayer of Moses at the removing of the ark, Let God arise, and let his enemies be scattered; and notice is taken there (v. 25) of the singers and players on instruments that attended, and (v. 27) of the princes of several of the tribes; and perhaps those words in the last verse, O God, thou art terrible out of thy holy places, were added upon occasion of the death of Uzzah.

IV. Here is an error that they were guilty of in this matter, that they carried the ark in a cart or carriage, whereas the priests should have carried it upon their shoulders, v. 3. The Kohathites that had the charge of the ark had no waggons assigned them, because their service was to bear it upon their shoulders, Num. vii. 9. The ark was no such heavy burden but that they might, among them, have carried it as far as Mount Sion upon their shoulders, they needed not to put it in a cart like a common thing. It was no excuse for them that the Philistines had done so and were not punished for it; they knew no better. Philistines may cart the ark with impunity; but, if Israelites do so, they do it at their peril. And it mended the matter very little that it was a new cart; old or new, it was not what God had appointed.

Uzzah struck dead for touching the ark, when it was upon its journey towards the city of David, a sad providence, which damped their mirth, stopped the progress of the ark, and, for the present, dispersed this great assembly, which had come together to attend it, and sent them home in a fright.

I. Uzzah's offence seems very small. He and his brother Ahio, the sons of Abinadab, in whose house the ark had long been lodged, having been used to attend it, undertook to drive the cart in which the ark was carried, this being perhaps the last service they were likely to do it; for others would be employed about it when it came to the city of David. Ahio went before, to clear the way, and, if need were, to lead the oxen. Uzzah followed close to the side of the cart. It happened that the oxen shook it, v. 6. The critics are not agreed about the signification of the original word: They stumbled (so our margin); they kicked (so some), perhaps against the goad with which Uzzah drove them; they stuck in the mire, so some. By some accident or other the ark was in danger of being overthrown. Uzzah thereupon laid hold of it, to save it from falling. Uzzah was a Levite, but priests only might touch the ark. The law was express concerning the Kohathites, that, though they were to carry the ark by the staves, yet they must not touch any holy thing, lest they die, Num. iv. 15.

II. His punishment for this offence seems very great (v. 7). There he sinned, and there he died, by the ark of God; even the mercy-seat would not save him. Why was God thus severe with him? 1. The touching of the ark was forbidden to the Levites expressly under pain of death—lest they die. 2. God saw the presumption and irreverence of Uzzah's heart. Perhaps he affected to show, before this great assembly, how bold he could make with the ark, having been so long acquainted with it. 3. David afterwards owned that Uzzah died for an error they were all guilty of, which was carrying the ark in a cart. But Uzzah was singled out to be made an example, perhaps because he had been most forward in advising that way of conveyance. 4. God would hereby strike an awe upon the thousands of Israel, would convince them that the ark was never the less venerable for its having been so long in mean circumstances, and thus he would teach them to rejoice with trembling, and always to treat holy things with reverence and holy fear.

III. David's feelings on the infliction of this stroke were keen, and perhaps not altogether as they should have been. 1. He was displeased. David's anger was kindled. It is the same word that is used for God's displeasure, v. 7. Because God was angry, David was angry and out of humour. The death of Uzzah was indeed an eclipse to the glory of a solemnity, but he ought nevertheless to have subscribed to the righteousness and wisdom of God in it, and not to have been displeased at it. When we lie under God's anger we must keep under our own. 2. He was afraid, v. 9. It should seem he was afraid with amazement; for he said, How shall the ark of the Lord come to me? As if God was so extremely tender of his ark that there was no dealing with it; and therefore better for him to keep it at a distance. He should rather have said, "Let the ark come to me, and I will take warning by this to treat it with more reverence." David therefore will not bring the ark into his own city (v. 10) till he is better prepared for its reception. 3. He took care to perpetuate the remembrance of this stroke by a new name he gave to the place: Perez-uzzah, the breach of Uzzah, v. 8. He had been lately triumphing in the breach made upon his enemies, and called the place Baal-perazim, a place of breaches. But here is a breach upon his friends. The memorial of this stroke would be a warning to posterity to take heed of all rashness and irreverence in dealing about holy things. 4. He lodged the ark in a good house, the house of Obed-edom a Levite, which happened to be near the place where this disaster happened, and there, (1) It was kindly entertained and welcomed, and continued there three months, v. 10, 11. Obed-edom knew what slaughter the ark had made among the Philistines and the Bethshemites. He saw Uzzah struck dead for touching it, and perceived that David himself was afraid of meddling with it; yet he opens his doors to it without fear, knowing it was a savour of death unto death only to those that treated it ill. (2) It paid well for its entertainment: The Lord blessed Obed-edom and all his household. The same hand that punished Uzzah's proud presumption rewarded Obed-edom's humble boldness, and made the ark to him a savour of life unto life. The ark is a guest which none shall lose by that bid it welcome. It is good living in a family that entertains the ark, for all about it will fare the better for it.

The second attempt to bring the ark home to the city of David; and this succeeded, though the former miscarried.

I. The blessing with which the house of Obed-edom was blessed was an evidence that God was reconciled to them, and his anger was turned away. If God be at peace with them, they can cheerfully go on with their design. 1. It was an evidence that the ark was not such a burdensome stone as it was taken to be, but, on the contrary, happy was the man that had it near him. Christ is indeed a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence, to those that are disobedient; but to those who believe he is a corner-stone, elect, precious, 1 Pet. ii. 6–8.

II. How David managed the matter now. 1. He ordered those whose business it was to carry it on their shoulders. This is implied here (v. 13) and expressed 1 Chron. xv. 15. 2. At their first setting out he offered sacrifices to God (v. 13) by way of atonement for their former errors. 3. He himself attended the solemnity with the highest expressions of joy that could be (v. 14): He danced before the Lord with all his might; he leaped for joy. His dancing was not artificial, by any certain rule or measure, but was a natural expression of his great joy and exultation of mind. 4. All the people triumphed in this advancement of the ark (v. 15): They brought it up into the royal city with shouting, and with sound of trumpet. 5. The ark was safely brought to, and honourably deposited in, the place prepared for it, v. 17. They set it in the midst of the tabernacle, or tent, which David had pitched for it. As soon as ever it was lodged, he offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, in thankfulness to God and in supplication to God for the continuance of his favour. 6. The people were then dismissed with great satisfaction. He sent them away, (1) With a gracious prayer: He blessed them in the name of the Lord of hosts (v. 18). He testified his desire for their welfare by this prayer, and let them know they had a king that loved them. (2) With a generous treat; for so it was, rather than a distribution of alms.

David, having dismissed the congregation with a blessing, returned to bless his household (v. 20), to offer up his family thanksgiving for this national mercy.

Never did David return to his house with so much pleasure and satisfaction as he did now that he had got the ark into his neighbourhood; and yet even this joyful day concluded with some uneasiness, occasioned by his wife. Michal was not pleased with his dancing before the ark. When he came home she scolded him. She thought he degraded himself in dancing before the ark.

I. When she saw David in the street dancing before the Lord she despised him in her heart, v. 16. She thought this mighty zeal of his for the ark of God, and the transport of joy he was in upon its coming home, was unbecoming so great a soldier, and statesman, and monarch.

II. When he came home in the very best disposition she went out to meet him with her reproaches.

1. How she taunted him (v. 20): "How glorious was the king of Israel to-day. What a figure didst thou make to-day in the midst of the mob!" That which displeased her was his affection to the ark, but she basely represents his conduct, in dancing before the ark, as lewd and immodest. We have no reason to think that this was true in fact. David, no doubt, observed decorum, and governed his zeal with discretion. To disparage one who had shown such affection for her that he would not accept a crown unless he might have her restored to him (ch. iii. 13), was a most base and wicked thing, and showed her to have more of Saul's daughter in her than of David's wife or Jonathan's sister.

2. How he replied to her reproach.

(1) He designed to honour God (v. 21): It was before the Lord, and with an eye to him. Whatever invidious construction she was pleased to put upon it, he had the testimony of his conscience for him that he sincerely aimed at the glory of God. Here he reminds her indeed of the setting aside of her father's house, to make way for him to the throne, that she might not think herself the most proper judge of propriety: "God chose me before thy father, and appointed me to be ruler over Israel, and, if the expressions of a warm devotion to God were looked upon as mean and unfashionable in thy father's court, yet I will play before the Lord, and thereby bring them into reputation again. [1] If we can approve ourselves to God in what we do in religion, and do it as before the Lord, we need not value the censures and reproaches of men. [2] The more we are vilified for well-doing the more resolute we should be in it, and hold our religion the faster.

(2) He designed thereby to humble himself: "I will be base in my own sight, and will think nothing too mean to stoop to for the honour of God."

(3) He doubted not but even this would turn to his reputation among those whose reproach Michal pretended to fear: Of the maid-servants shall I be had in honour. She unjustly reproached David for his devotion. Those that honour God he will honour; but those that despise him, and his servants and service, shall be lightly esteemed.

CHAP. VII

The ark is David's care as well as his joy. I. His consultation with Nathan about building a house for it; he signifies his purpose to do it (ver. 1, 2), and Nathan approves his purpose, ver. 3. II. His communion with God about it. 1. A gracious message God sent him about it, ver. 4–17. 2. A very humble prayer which David offered up to God in return to that gracious message, thankfully accepting God's promises to him, and earnestly praying for the performance of them, ver. 18–29.

I. David at rest. He sat in his house (v. 1), quiet and undisturbed, having no occasion to take the field. He had not been long at rest, nor was it long before he was again engaged in war; but at present he enjoyed a calm, and he was in his element when he was sitting in his house, meditating in the law of God.

II. David's thought of building a temple for the honour of God. He had built a palace for himself and a city for his servants; and now he thinks of building a habitation for the ark. 1. Thus he would make a grateful return for the honours God put upon him. What shall I render unto the Lord? 2. Thus he would improve the present calm, and make a good use of the rest God had given him. David considered (v. 2) the stateliness of his own habitation (I dwell in a house of cedar), and compared with that the meanness of the habitation of the ark (the ark dwells within curtains), and thought this incongruous, that he should dwell in a palace and the ark in a tent. David had been uneasy till he found out a place for the ark (Ps. cxxxii. 4, 5), and now he is uneasy till he finds out a better place. Gracious grateful souls cannot enjoy their own accommodations while they see the church of God in distress and under a cloud. David can take little pleasure in a house of cedar for himself, unless the ark have one.

III. His communicating this thought to Nathan the prophet. David told him, that by him he might know the mind of God. It was certainly a good work, but it was uncertain whether it was the will of God that David should have the doing of it.

IV. Nathan's approbation of it: Go, do all that is in thy heart; for the Lord is with thee, v. 3. Nathan easily gathered what was in his heart, and bade him go on and prosper. We ought to do all we can to encourage and promote the good purposes and designs of others, and put in a good word, as we have opportunity, to forward a good work. Nathan spoke this, not in God's name, but as from himself; not as a prophet, but as a wise and good man.

A full revelation of God's favour to David, the notices and assurances of which God sent him by Nathan the prophet. The design of it is to take him off from his purpose of building the temple and it was therefore sent, 1. By the same hand that had given him encouragement to do it, lest, if it had been sent by any other, Nathan should be despised and insulted and David should be perplexed. 2. The same night, that Nathan might not continue long in an error nor David have his head any further filled with thoughts of that which he must never bring to pass.

1. David's purpose to build God a house is superseded. God took notice of that purpose, for he knows what is in man; and he was well pleased with it, as appears 1 Kings viii. 18, Thou didst well that it was in thy heart; yet he forbade him to go on with his purpose (v. 5): "Shalt thou build me a house? No, thou shalt not (as it is explained in the parallel place, 1 Chron. xvii. 4); there is other work appointed for thee to do, which must be done first." David is a man of war, and he must enlarge the borders of Israel, by carrying on their conquests. David is a sweet psalmist, and he must prepare psalms for the use of the temple when it is built, and settle the courses of the Levites; but his son's genius will better suit for building the house, and he will have a better treasure to bear the charge of it, and therefore let it be reserved for him to do. As every man hath received the gift, so let him minister. The building of a temple was to be a work of time, and preparation made for it; but it was a thing that had never been spoken of till now. God tells him, 1. That hitherto he had never had a house built for him (v. 6), a tabernacle had served hitherto, and it might serve awhile longer. God regards not outward pomp in his service; his presence was as surely with his people when the ark was in a tent as when it was in a temple. Christ, like the ark, when here on earth walked in a tent or tabernacle, for he went about doing good, and dwelt not in any house of his own, till he ascended on high, to the mansions above, in his Father's house, and there he sat down. The church, like the ark, in this world is ambulatory, dwells in a tent, because its present state is both pastoral and military; its continuing city is to come. David, in his psalms, often calls the tabernacle a temple (as Ps. v. 7; xxvii. 4; xxix. 9; lxv. 4; cxxxviii. 2), because it answered the intention of a temple, though it was made but of curtains. 2. That he had never given any orders or directions, or the least intimation, to any of the sceptres of Israel, that is, to any of the judges, 1 Chron. xvii. 6 (for rulers are called sceptres, Ezek. xix. 14, the great Ruler is called so, Num. xxiv. 17), concerning the building of the temple, v. 7.

II. David is reminded of the great things God had done for him. 1. He had raised him from a very mean and low condition: He took him from the sheep-cote. 2. He had given him success and victory over his enemies (v. 9): "I was with thee whithersoever thou wentest, to protect thee when pursued, to prosper thee when pursuing." 3. He had crowned him not only with power and dominion in Israel, but with honour and reputation among the nations about: I have made thee a great name.

III. A happy establishment is promised to God's Israel, v. 10, 11. This comes in in a parenthesis, before the promises made to David himself, to let him understand that what God designed to do for him was for Israel's sake, that they might be happy under his administration, and to give him the satisfaction of foreseeing peace upon Israel, when it was promised him that he should see his children's children, Ps. cxxviii. 6. Two things are promised:—1. A quiet place: Canaan should be clearly their own without any ejection or molestation. 2. A quiet enjoyment of that place: The children of wickedness (meaning especially the Philistines, who had been so long a plague to them) shall not afflict them any more.

IV. Blessings are entailed upon the family and posterity of David. David had purposed to build God a house, and, in requital, God promises to build him a house, v. 11.

1. Some of these promises relate to Solomon, his immediate successor, and to the royal line of Judah. (1) That God would advance him to the throne. (2) That he would settle him in the throne: I will establish his kingdom (v. 12), the throne of his kingdom, v. 13. (3) That he would employ him in that good work of building the temple, which David had only the satisfaction of designing: He shall build a house for my name, v. 13. (4) That he would take him into the covenant of adoption (v. 14, 15): I will be his father, and he shall be my son. We need no more to make us and ours happy than to have God to be a Father to us and them. The promise here speaks as unto sons. [1] That his Father would correct him when there was occasion; for what son is he whom the Father chasteneth not? Not a stroke, or wound, but a gentle touch. [2] That yet he would not disinherit him (v. 15): The revolt of the ten tribes from the house of David was their correction for iniquity, but the constant adherence of the other two to that family, perpetuated the mercy of God to the seed of David, though that family was cut short, yet it was not cut off, as the house of Saul was.

2. Others of them relate to Christ, who is often called David and the Son of David, that Son of David to whom these promises pointed and in whom they had their full accomplishment. He was of the seed of David, Acts. xiii. 23. That promise, I will be his Father, and he shall be my Son, is expressly applied to Christ by the apostle, Heb. i. 5. But the establishing of his house, and his throne, and his kingdom, for ever (v. 13, and again, and a third time, v. 16, for ever), can be applied to no other than Christ and his kingdom. David's house and kingdom have long since come to an end; it is only the Messiah's kingdom that is everlasting, and of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end. Now, (1) This message Nathan faithfully delivered to David (v. 17); though, in forbidding him to build the temple, he contradicted his own words. (2) These promises God faithfully performed to David and his seed in due time.

Verses 18–29

The solemn address David made to God, in answer to the gracious message God had sent him.

I. The place he retired to: He went in before the Lord, that is, into the tabernacle where the ark was, which was the token of God's presence; before that he presented himself.

II. The posture he put himself into: He sat before the Lord. 1. It denotes the posture of his body. Kneeling or standing is certainly the most proper gesture to be used in prayer. David went in, and took his place before the Lord, so it may be read; but, when he prayed, he stood up as the manner was. Or he went in and continued before the Lord, stayed some time silently meditating, before he began his prayer, and then remained longer than usual in the tabernacle. Or, 2. It may denote the frame of his spirit at this time.

III. The prayer itself, which is full of the breathings of pious and devout affection towards God.

1. He speaks very humbly of himself and his own merits. So he begins as one astonished: Who am I, O Lord God; and what is my house? v. 18. He had low thoughts, (1) Of his personal merits: Who am I? He was upon all accounts a very considerable and valuable man. His endowments both of body and mind were extraordinary. Yet, when he comes to speak of himself before God, he says, "Who am I? A man not worth taking notice of." (2) Of the merits of his family: What is my house? His house was of the royal tribe, and descended from the prince of that tribe; and yet, like Gideon, he thinks his family poor in Judah and himself the least in his father's house, Judges vi. 15. All our attainments must be looked upon as God's vouchsafements.

2. He speaks very highly and honourably of God's favours to him. (1) In what he had done for him: "Thou hast brought me hitherto, to this great dignity and dominion. Hitherto thou hast helped me." (2) In what he had yet further promised him. God had done great things for him already, and yet, as if those had been nothing, he had promised to do much more, v. 19. We must own, as David here, [1] That it is far beyond what we could expect: Is this the manner of men? that is, First, Can man expect to be so dealt with by his Maker? He is brought near to God, purchased at a high rate, taken into covenant and communion with God; could this ever have been thought of? Secondly, Do men usually deal thus with one another? No, the way of our God is far above the manner of men. Though he be high, he has respect to the lowly; and is this the manner of men? Though he is offended by us, he beseeches us to be reconciled, waits to be gracious, multiplies his pardons: and is this the manner of men? [2] That beyond this there is nothing we can desire: "And what can David say more unto thee? v. 20. What can I ask or wish for more? Thou, Lord, knowest thy servant, knowest what will make me happy, and what thou hast promised is enough to do so." The promise of Christ includes all. What can we say more for ourselves in our prayers than he has said for us in his promises?

3. He ascribes all to the free grace of God (v. 21), both the great things he had done for him and the great things he had made known to him.

4. He adores the greatness and glory of God (v. 22): Thou art great, O Lord God! for there is none like thee. God's gracious condescension to him, and the honour he had put upon him, did not at all abate his awful veneration for the divine Majesty; for the nearer any are brought to God the more they see of his glory, and the dearer we are in his eyes the greater he should be in ours.

5. He expresses a great esteem for the Israel of God, v. 23, 24. As there was none among the gods to be compared with Jehovah, so none among the nations to be compared with Israel, considering,

(1) The works he had done for them. He went to redeem them, applied himself to it as a great work, went about it with solemnity. The redemption of Israel, as described here, was typical of our redemption by Christ in that, [1] They were redeemed from the nations and their gods; so are we from all iniquity and all conformity to this present world. Christ came to save his people from their sins. [2] They were redeemed to be a peculiar people unto God, purified and appropriated to himself, that he might make himself a great name and do for them great things.

(2) The covenant he had made with them, v. 24. It was, [1] Mutual: "They to be a people to thee, and thou to be a God to them; all their interests consecrated to thee, and all thy attributes engaged for them." [2] Immutable: "Thou hast confirmed them." He that makes the covenant makes it sure and will make it good.

6. He concludes with humble petitions to God. (1) He grounds his petitions upon the message which God had sent him (v. 27): "Thou hast of thy own good will given me the promise that thou wilt build me a house, else I could never have found in my heart to pray such a prayer as this," too great for me to beg, but not too great for thee to give. (2) He builds his faith and hopes to speed upon the fidelity of God's promise (v. 25): "Thou art that God (thou art he, even that God, the Lord of hosts, and God of Israel, or that God whose words are true, that God whom one may depend upon); and thou hast promised this goodness unto thy servant, which I am therefore bold to pray for." (3) Thence he fetches the matter of his prayer, and refers to that as the guide of his prayers. [1] He prays for the performance of God's promise (v. 25): "I desire no more, and I expect no less." Thus we must turn God's promises into prayers, and then they shall be turned into performances; for, with God, saying and doing are not two things, as they often are with men. [2] He prays for the glorifying of God's name (v. 26): Let thy name be magnified for ever. This ought to be the summary and centre of all our prayers, the Alpha and the Omega of them. Begin with Hallowed be thy name, and end with Thine is the glory for ever. "Whether I be magnified or no, let thy name be magnified." [3] He prays for his house, for to that the promise has special reference, First, That it might be happy (v. 29): Let it please thee to bless the house of thy servant. Secondly, That the happiness of it might remain: "Let it be established before thee (v. 26); let it continue for ever before thee," v. 29. He longs 1. That none of his might ever forfeit it, but that they might walk before God, which would be their establishment. 2. That his kingdom might have its perfection and perpetuity in the kingdom of the Messiah. When Christ for ever sat down on the right hand of God (Heb. x. 12), and received all possible assurance that his seed and throne shall be as the days of heaven, this prayer of David the son of Jesse for his seed was abundantly answered, that it might continue before God for ever.

CHAP. VIII

David having sought first the kingdom of God, settled the ark as soon as he was himself well settled. Here is an account, I. Of his conquests. He triumphed, 1. Over the Philistines, ver. 1. 2. Over the Moabites, ver. 2. 3. Over the king of Zobah, ver. 3, 4. 4. Over the Syrians, ver 5–8, 13. 5. Over the Edomites, ver. 14. II. Of the presents that were brought him and the wealth he got from the nations he subdued, which he dedicated to God, ver. 9–12. III. Of his court, the administration of his government (ver. 15), and his chief officers, ver. 16–18. This gives us a general idea of the prosperity of David's reign.

Verses 1–8

David has now commission given him to make war for the avenging of Israel's quarrels and the recovery of their rights; for as yet they were not in full possession of that country to which by the promise of God they were entitled.

I. He quite subdued the Philistines, v. 1. They had long been vexatious and oppressive to Israel. Saul got no ground against them; but David completed Israel's deliverance out of their hands, which Samson had begun long before, Judges xiii. 5. Metheg-ammah was Gath (the chief and royal city of the Philistines) and the towns belonging to it, among which there was a constant garrison kept by the Philistines on the hill Ammah (2 Sam. ii. 24), which was Metheg, a bridle (so it signifies) or curb upon the people of Israel; this David took out of their hand and used it as a curb upon them.

II. He smote the Moabites, and made them tributaries to Israel, v. 2. He divided the country into three parts, two of which he destroyed, the third part he spared, to till the ground and be servants to Israel. Now Balaam's prophecy was fulfilled, A sceptre shall arise out of Israel, and shall smite the corners of Moab. The Moabites continued tributaries to Israel till after the death of Ahab, 2 Kings iii. 4, 5. Then they rebelled and were never reduced.

III. He smote the Syrians or Aramites. Of them there were two distinct kingdoms, as we find them spoken of in the title of the 60th Psalm: Aram Naharaim,—Syria of the rivers, whose head city was Damascus (famed for its rivers, 2 Kings v. 12), and Aram Zobah, which joined to it, but extended to Euphrates. These were the two northern crowns. 1. David began with the Syrians of Zobah, v. 3, 4. As he went to settle his border at the river Euphrates (for so far the land conveyed by the divine grant to Abraham and his seed did extend, Gen. xv. 18), the king of Zobah opposed him, being himself possessed of those countries which belonged to Israel; but David routed his forces, and took his chariots and horsemen.

IV. In all these wars, 1. David was protected: The Lord preserved him whithersoever he went. 2. He was enriched. He took the shields of gold which the servants of Hadadezer had in their custody (v. 7) and much brass from several cities of Syria (v. 8), which he was entitled to by the ancient entail of these countries on the seed of Abraham.

1. The court made to David by the king of Hamath, who, it seems was at this time at war with the king of Zobah. He, hearing of David's success against his enemy, sent his own son ambassador to him (v. 9, 10) to beg his friendship. And David lost nothing by taking this little prince under his protection; for the wealth he had from the countries he conquered by way of spoil he had from this by way of present or gratuity: Vessels of silver and gold. Better get by composition than by compulsion. 2. The offering David made to God of the spoils of the nations. He dedicated all to the Lord, v. 11, 12. This crowned all his victories, and made them far to outshine Alexander's or Cæsar's, that they sought their own glory, but he aimed at the glory of God. All the precious things he was master of were dedicated things, that is, they were designed for the building of the temple. Their gods of gold David burnt (2 Sam. v. 21), but their vessels of gold he dedicated. Thus in the conquest of a soul, by the grace of the Son of David, what stands in opposition to God must be destroyed, every lust mortified and crucified, but what may glorify him must be dedicated and the property of it altered. 3. The reputation he got, in a particular manner, by his victory over the Syrians and their allies the Edomites. He got himself a name. Something extraordinary there was in that action, which turned very much to his honour, yet he is careful to transfer the honour to God. 4. His success against the Edomites. They all became David's servants, v. 13. The Edomites continued long tributary to the kings of Judah, as the Moabites were to the kings of Israel, till, in Joram's time, they revolted (2 Chron. xxi. 8) as Isaac had there foretold that Esau should, in process of time, break the yoke from off his neck. Thus David by his conquests, (1) Secured peace to his son, that he might have time to build the temple. And, (2) Procured wealth for his son, that he might have wherewith to build it. God employs his servants variously, some in the spiritual battles, others in the spiritual buildings; and one prepares work for the other, that God may have the glory of all. All David's victories were typical of the success of the gospel against the kingdom of Satan, in which the Son of David rode forth, conquering and to conquer.

Verses 15–18

David was not so engaged in his wars abroad as to neglect the administration of the government at home.

I. His care extended itself to all the parts of his dominion: He reigned over all Israel (v. 15).

II. He did justice with an unbiassed unshaken hand: He executed judgment unto all his people. This intimates, 1. His industry and close application to business, his easiness of access and readiness to admit all addresses and appeals made to him. 2. His impartiality and the equity of his proceedings, in administering justice. See Ps. lxxii. 1, 2.

III. He kept good order and good officers in his court. David being the first king that had an established government (for Saul's reign was short and unsettled) he had the modelling of the administration. In Saul's time we read of no other great officer than Abner, that was captain of the host. But David appointed more officers. 1. Two military officers: Joab that was general of the forces in the field, and Banaiah that was over the Cherethites and Pelethites, who were either the city train-bands (archers and slingers, so the Chaldee), or rather the life-guards, or standing force, that attended the king's person, the prætorian band, the militia. They were ready to do service at home, to assist in the administering of justice, and to preserve the public peace. 2. Two ecclesiastical officers: Zadok and Ahimelech were priests, that is, they were most employed in the priests' work under Abiathar, the high priest. 3. Two civil officers: one that was recorder, or remembrancer, to put the king in mind of business in its season (he was prime minister of state, yet not entrusted with the custody of the king's conscience, as they say of our lord chancellor, but only of the king's memory); another that was scribe, or secretary of state, that drew up public orders and despatches, and recorded judgments given. 4. David's sons, as they grew up to be fit for business, were made chief rulers. They were chief about the king (so it is explained, 1 Chron. xviii. 17), employed near him, that they might be under his eye. David made his sons chief rulers; but all believers, Christ's spiritual seed, are better preferred, for they are made to our God kings and priests, Rev. i. 6.

CHAP. IX

The kindness David showed to Jonathan's seed for his sake. I. The kind of enquiry he made after the remains of the house of Saul, and his discovery of Mephibosheth, ver. 1–4. II. The kind reception he gave to Mephibosheth, when he was brought to him, ver. 5–8. III. The kind provision he made for him and his, ver. 9–13.

Verses 1–8

I. David's enquiry after the remains of the ruined house of Saul, v. 1. This was a great while after his accession to the throne, for it should seem that Mephibosheth, who was but five years old when Saul died, had now a son born, v. 12. David had too long forgotten his obligations to Jonathan, but now, at length, they are brought to his mind.

1. He sought an opportunity to do good. Is there any yet left of the house of Saul, that I may show him kindness? v. 3. "Is there any, not only to whom I may do justice (Num. v. 8), but to whom I may show kindness?" The most necessitous are the least clamorous.

2. Those he enquired after were the remains of the house of Saul, to whom he would show kindness for Jonathan's sake. He was desirous to show kindness to the house of Saul, not only because he trusted in God and feared not what they could do unto him, but because he was of a charitable disposition, and forgave what they had done to him. We must not be backward to do any office of love and goodwill to those that have done us many an injury. 1 Pet. iii. 9,—but, contrariwise, blessing. This is the way to overcome evil, and to find mercy for ourselves and ours, when we or they need it. Jonathan was David's sworn friend, and therefore he would show kindness to his house. The kindness we have promised we must conscientiously perform, though it should not be claimed. God is faithful to us; let us not be unfaithful to one another. Though there be not a solemn league of friendship tying us to this constancy of love, yet there is a sacred law of friendship no less obliging, that to him that is in misery pity should be shown by his friend, Job. vi. 14. A brother is born for adversity. Friendship obliges us to take cognizance of the families and surviving relations of those we have loved.

3. The kindness he promised to show them he calls the kindness of God; not only great kindness, but, (1) Kindness in pursuance of the covenant that was between him and Jonathan, to which God was a witness. See 1 Sam. xx. 42. (2) Kindness after God's example; for we must be merciful as he is. Jonathan's request to David was (1 Sam. xx. 14, 15), "Show me the kindness of the Lord, that I die not, and the same to my seed."

II. Information given him concerning Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan. Ziba was an old retainer to Saul's family, and knew the state of it. He informed the king that Jonathan's son was living, but lame (how he came to be so we read before, ch. iv. 4), and that he lived in obscurity, probably among his mother's relations in Lo-debar, in Gilead, on the other side Jordan, where he was forgotten, as a dead man out of mind.

III. The bringing of him to court. The king sent (Ziba, it is likely) to bring him up to Jerusalem with all convenient speed, v. 5. Thus he eased Machir of his trouble, and perhaps recompensed him for what he had laid out on Mephibosheth's account. This Machir appears to have been a very generous free-hearted man, and to have entertained Mephibosheth, not out of any disaffection to David or his government, but in compassion to the reduced son of a prince, for afterwards we find him kind to David himself when he fled from Absalom. He is named (ch. xvii. 27) among those that furnished the king with what he wanted at Mahanaim.

1. Mephibosheth presented himself to David. Lame as he was, he fell on his face, and did homage, v. 6. David had thus made his honours to Mephibosheth's father, Jonathan, when he was next to the throne (1 Sam. xx. 41, he bowed himself to him three times), and now Mephibosheth, in like manner, addresses him, when affairs are so completely reversed.

2. David received him with all the kindness that could be. (1) He spoke to him as one surprised, but pleased to see him. (2) He bade him not be afraid: Fear not, v. 7. He assures him that he sent for him, not with any bad design upon him, but to show him kindness. (3) He gives him, by grant from the crown, all the land of Saul his father, that is, his paternal estate, which was forfeited by Ish-bosheth's rebellion and added to his own revenue. True friendship will be generous. (4) Though he had thus given him a good estate, sufficient to maintain him, yet for Jonathan's sake (whom perhaps he saw some resemblance of in Mephibosheth's face), he will take him to be a constant guest at his own table, where he will be comfortably fed. Though Mephibosheth was lame and unsightly, and does not appear to have had any great fitness for business, yet, for his good father's sake, David took him to be one of his family.

3. Mephibosheth accepts this kindness with great humility and self-abasement. How does he magnify David's kindness! It would have been easy to lessen it if he had been so disposed.

The matter is here settled concerning Mephibosheth. 1. This grant of his father's estate is confirmed to him, and Ziba called to be a witness to it (v. 9); and, it should seem, Saul had a very good estate, fields and vineyards to bestow, 1 Sam. xxii. 7. Be it ever so much, Mephibosheth is now master of it all. 2. The management of the estate is committed to Ziba. How unfaithful Ziba was to him we shall find afterwards, ch. xvi. 3. Now because David was a type of Christ, his Lord and son, his root and offspring, let his kindness to Mephibosheth serve to illustrate the kindness and love of God our Saviour towards fallen man, which yet he was under no obligation to, as David was to Jonathan. Man was convicted of rebellion against God, and, like Saul's house, under a sentence of rejection from him, was not only brought low and impoverished, but lame and impotent, made so by the fall. The Son of God enquires after this degenerate race, and comes to seek and save them. To those of them that humble themselves before him, and commit themselves to him, he restores the forfeited inheritance, he entitles them to a better paradise than that which Adam lost, and takes them into communion with himself, sets them with his children at his table, and feasts them with the dainties of heaven.

CHAP. X

A war David had with the Ammonites and the Syrians their allies. I. David sent a friendly embassy to Hanun king of the Ammonites, ver. 1, 2. II. He, upon a base surmise that it was ill intended, abused David's ambassadors, ver. 3, 4. III. David resenting it (ver. 5), the Ammonites prepared for war against him, ver. 6. IV. David carried the war into their country, sent against them Joab and Abishai, who addressed themselves to the battle with a great deal of conduct and bravery, ver. 7–12. V. The Ammonites, and the Syrians their allies, were totally routed, ver. 13, 14. VI. The forces of the Syrians, which rallied again, were a second time defeated, ver. 15–19.

Verses 1–5

I. The great respect David paid to his neighbour, the king of the Ammonites, v. 1, 2. 1. The inducement to it was some kindness he had formerly received from Nahash the deceased king. He showed kindness to me, says David (v. 2). If David received kindness, he resolves gratefully to return it. 2. The particular instance was sending an embassy to condole with him on his father's death. David sent to comfort him. It is a comfort to children, when their parents are dead, to find that their parents' friends are theirs, and that they intend to keep up an acquaintance with them.

II. The great affront which Hanun the king of the Ammonites put upon David in his ambassadors. 1. He hearkened to the spiteful suggestions of his princes, who insinuated that David's ambassadors, under pretence of being comforters, were sent as spies, v. 3. False men are ready to think others as false as themselves. Bishop Patrick's note on this is that "there is nothing so well meant but it may be ill interpreted, and is wont to be so by men who love nobody but themselves." 2. Entertaining this vile suggestion, he basely abused David's ambassadors, like a man of a sordid villainous spirit, that was fitter to rake a kennel than to wear a crown. They and their reputation were under the special protection of the law of nations; they put a confidence in the Ammonites, and came among them unarmed; yet Hanun used them like rogues and vagabonds, and worse, shaved off the one half of their beards, and cut off their garments in the midst, to expose them to the contempt and ridicule of his servants.

III. David's tender concern for his servants that were thus abused. He sent to meet them and directed them to stay at Jericho, a private place, where they would not have occasion to come into company, till that half of their beards which was shaved off had grown to such a length that the other half might be decently cut to it, v. 5. The Jews wore their beards long, reckoning it an honour to appear aged and grave. Let us learn not to lay too much to heart unjust reproaches; after awhile they will wear off themselves, and turn only to the shame of their authors, while the injured reputation in a little time grows again, as these beards did. God will bring forth thy righteousness as the light, therefore wait patiently for him, Ps. xxxvii. 6, 7.

I. The preparation which the Ammonites made for war, v. 6. They found themselves an unequal match, and were forced to hire forces of other nations into their service.

II. The speedy descent which David's forces made upon them, v. 7. When David heard of their military preparations, he sent Joab with a great army to attack them, v. 7. It was David's prudence to carry the war into their country, and fight them at the entering in of the gate of their capital city, Rabbah, as some think, or Medeba, a city in their borders, before which they pitched to guard their coast, 1 Chron. xix. 7.

III. Preparations made on both sides for an engagement. 1. The enemy disposed themselves into two bodies, one of Ammonites, which, being their own, were posted at the gate of the city; the other of Syrians, whom they had taken into their pay, and who were therefore posted at a distance in the field, to charge the forces of Israel in the flank or rear, while the Ammonites charged them in the front, v. 8. 2. Joab, like a wise general, accordingly divided his forces: the choicest men he took under his own command, to fight the Syrians. The rest of the forces he put under the command of Abishai his brother, to engage the Ammonites, v. 10.

IV. Joab's speech before the battle, v. 11, 12. 1. He prudently concerts the matter with Abishai his brother. He supposes the worst, that one of them should be obliged to give back; and in that case, upon a signal given, the other should send a detachment to receive it. Christ's soldiers should thus strengthen one another's hands in their spiritual warfare. The strong must succour and help the weak. Those that through grace are conquerors over temptation must counsel, and comfort, and pray for, those that are tempted. When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren, Luke xxii. 32. 2. He bravely encourages himself, and his brother, and the rest of the officers and soldiers. When Joab saw the front of the battle was against him, both before and behind, instead of giving orders to make an honourable retreat, he animated his men to charge so much more furiously: Be of good courage and let us play the men, not for pay and preferment, for honour and fame, but for our people, and for the cities of our God, for the public safety and welfare, in which the glory of God is so much interested. God and our country was the word. 3. He piously leaves the issue with God. When we make conscience of doing our duty we may, with the greatest satisfaction, leave the event with God.

V. The victory Joab obtained over the confederate forces of Syria and Ammon, v. 13, 14. The Syrians were first routed by Joab, and then the Ammonites by Abishai; the Ammonites seem not to have fought at all, but, upon the retreat of the Syrians, to have fled into the city.

1. A new attempt of the Syrians to recover their lost honour and to check the progress of David's victorious arms. 2. The defeat of this attempt by the vigilance and valour of David, who, in a pitched battle, routed the Syrians (v. 18). Their general was killed in the battle, and David came home in triumph. 3. The consequence of this victory over the Syrians. (1) David gained several tributaries, v. 19. The kings, or petty princes, that had been subject to Hadarezer, when they saw how powerful David was, very wisely made peace with Israel, whom they found they could not make war with, and served them, since they were able to give them protection. Thus the promise made to Abraham (Gen. xv. 18), and repeated to Joshua (ch. i. 4), that the borders of Israel should extend to the river Euphrates, was performed, at length. (2) The Ammonites lost their old allies: The Syrians feared to help the children of Ammon.

CHAP. XI

The scripture is faithful in relating the faults even of those whom it most applauds, which is an instance of the sincerity of the penmen, and an evidence that it was not written to serve any party: and even such stories as these "were written for our learning", that "he that thinks he stands may take heed lest he fall," and that others' harms may be our warning. Those are very great sins, and greatly aggravated, which here we find David guilty of. I. He committed adultery with Bath-sheba, the wife of Uriah, ver. 1–5. II. He endeavoured to father the spurious brood upon Uriah, ver. 6–13. III. When that project failed, he plotted the death of Uriah by the sword of the children of Ammon, and effected it, ver. 14–25. IV. He married Bath-sheba, ver. 26, 27. Is this David? Let him that readeth understand what the best of men are when God leaves them to themselves.

Verses 1–5

I. David's glory, in pursuing the war against the Ammonites, v. 1. Rabbah, their metropolis, made a stand, and held out a great while. To this city Joab laid close siege, and it was at the time of this siege that David fell into sin.

II. David's shame, in being himself conquered, and led captive by his own lust. The sin he was guilty of was adultery, against the letter of the seventh commandment.

1. Observe the occasions which led to this sin. (1) Neglect of his business. When he should have been abroad with his army in the field, fighting the battles of the Lord, he devolved the care upon others, and he himself tarried still at Jerusalem, v. 1. Had he been now at his post at the head of his forces, he would have been out of the way of this temptation. When we are out of the way of our duty we are in the way of temptation. (2) Love of ease, and the indulgence of a slothful temper: He came off his bed at evening-tide, v. 2. Idleness gives great advantage to the tempter. Standing waters gather filth. The bed of sloth often proves the bed of lust. (3) A wandering eye: He saw a woman washing herself, probably from some ceremonial pollution, according to the law.

2. The steps of the sin. When he saw her, lust immediately conceived, and, (1) He enquired who she was (v. 3), perhaps intending only, if she were unmarried, to take her to wife. (2) The corrupt desire growing more violent, though he was told she was a wife, and whose wife she was, yet he sent messengers for her, and then, it may be, intended only to please himself with her company and conversation. But, (3) When she came he lay with her, she too easily consenting, because he was a great man, and famed for his goodness too.

3. The aggravations of the sin. (1) He was now in years, fifty at least. (2) He had many wives and concubines of his own. (3) Uriah, whom he wronged, was one of his own worthies, hazarding his life in the high places of the field for the honour and safety of him and his kingdom, where he himself should have been. (4) Bath-sheba, whom he debauched, was a lady of good reputation. The adulterer not only wrongs and ruins his own soul, but, as much as he can, another's soul too. (5) David was a king, whom God had entrusted with the sword of justice and the execution of the law upon other criminals, particularly upon adulterers. I can think but of one excuse for it, which is that it was done but once; it was far from being his practice; it was by the surprise of a temptation that he was drawn into it. He was not one of those of whom the prophet complains that they were as fed horses, neighing every one after his neighbour's wife (Jer. v. 8); but this once God left him to himself. But by this instance we are taught what need we have to pray every day, Father, in heaven, lead us not into temptation, and to watch, that we enter not into it.

Uriah, we may suppose, had now been absent from his wife some weeks. The situation of his wife would bring to light the hidden works of darkness; and when Uriah, at his return, should find how he had been abused, and by whom, it might well be expected, 1. That he would prosecute his wife, according to law, and have her stoned to death. This Bath-sheba was apprehensive of when she sent to let David know she was with child, intimating that he was concerned to protect her. 2. It might also be expected that since he could not prosecute David by law for an offence of this nature he would take his revenge another way, and raise a rebellion against him. To prevent this double mischief, David endeavours to father the child which should be born upon Uriah himself, and therefore sends for him home to stay a night or two with his wife.

I. How the plot was laid. Uriah must come home from the army under pretence of bringing David an account how the war prospered, and how they went on with the siege of Rabbah, v. 7. David, having had as much conference with Uriah as he thought requisite to cover the design, sent him to his house. When that project failed the first night, and Uriah, being weary of his journey and more desirous of sleep than meat, lay all night in the guard-chamber, the next night he made him drunk (v. 13). It is a very wicked thing, upon any design whatsoever, to make a person drunk. Robbing a man of his reason is worse than robbing him of his money.

II. How this plot was defeated by Uriah's firm resolution not to lie in his own bed. "Joab, and all the mighty men of Israel, lie hard and uneasy, and much exposed to the weather and to the enemy; and shall I go and take my ease and pleasure at my own house?" No, he protests he will not do it. Now, (1) This was in itself a generous resolution, and showed Uriah to be a man of a public spirit, bold and hardy, and mortified to the delights of sense. (2) It might have been of use to awaken David's conscience, and make his heart to smite him for what he had done.

Verses 14–27

When David's project of fathering the child upon Uriah himself failed, so that, in process of time, Uriah would certainly know the wrong that had been done him, the devil put it into David's heart to take him off. That innocent, valiant, gallant man, who was ready to die for his prince's honour, must die by his prince's hand. See how fleshly lusts war against the soul, and what devastations they make in that war; how they blind the eyes, harden the heart, sear the conscience, and deprive men of all sense of honour and justice. The devil, having, as a poisonous serpent, put it into David's heart to murder Uriah, as a subtle serpent he puts it into his head how to do it.

I. Orders are sent to Joab to set Uriah in the front of the hottest battle, and then to desert him, and abandon him to the enemy, v. 14, 15. 1. It was deliberate. 2. He sent the letter by Uriah himself, than which nothing could be more base and barbarous, to make him accessory to his own death. 3. Advantage must be taken of Uriah's own courage and zeal for his king and country, which deserve the greatest praise and recompence, to betray him the more easily to his fate. 4. Many must be involved in the guilt. Joab, the general, and all that retire from Uriah when they ought in conscience to support and second him, became guilty of his death. 5. Uriah cannot thus die alone: the party he commands is in danger of being cut off with him. 6. It will be the triumph and joy of the Ammonites, the sworn enemies of God and Israel.

II. Joab executes these orders. In the next assault that is made upon the city Uriah has the most dangerous post assigned him, and he is slain in it, v. 16, 17. It was strange that Joab would do such a thing merely upon a letter, without knowing the reason. But, 1. Perhaps he supposed Uriah had been guilty of some great crime. 2. Joab had been guilty of blood, and we may suppose it pleased him very well to see David himself falling into the same guilt.

III. He sends an account of it to David. An express is despatched away immediately with a report of this last disgrace and loss which they had sustained, v. 18. He slyly orders the messenger to soothe it with telling him that Uriah the Hittite was dead also. The messenger delivered this message agreeably to orders, v. 22–24. He makes the besieged to sally out first upon the besiegers (they came out unto us into the field), represents the besiegers as doing their part with great bravery (we were upon them even to the entering of the gate—we forced them to retire into the city with precipitation), and so concludes with a slight mention of the slaughter made among them by some shot from the wall: Some of the king's servants are dead, and particularly Uriah the Hittite, an officer of note, stood first in the list of the slain.

IV. David receives the account with a secret satisfaction, v. 25.

V. He marries the widow in a little time. She submitted to the ceremony of mourning for her husband as short a time as custom would admit (v. 26), and then David took her to his house as his wife, and she bore him a son. The whole matter of Uriah (as it is called, 1 Kings xv. 5), the adultery, falsehood, murder, and this marriage at last, it was all displeasing to the Lord. God sees and hates sin in his own people. Nay, the nearer any are to God in profession the more displeasing to him their sins are. Let none therefore encourage themselves in sin by the example of David; for those that sin as he did will fall under the displeasure of God as he did.

CHAP. XII

The foregoing chapter gave us the account of David's sin; this gives us the account of his repentance. Though he fell, he was not utterly cast down, but, by the grace of God, recovered himself, and found mercy with God. I. His conviction, by a message Nathan brought him from God, which was a parable that obliged him to condemn himself (ver. 1–6), and the application of the parable, in which Nathan charged him with the sin (ver. 7–9) and pronounced sentence upon him, ver. 10–12. II. His repentance and remission, with a proviso, ver. 13, 14. III. The sickness and death of the child, and his behaviour while it was sick and when it was dead (ver. 15–23), in both which David gave evidence of his repentance. IV. The birth of Solomon, and God's gracious message concerning him, in which God gave an evidence of his reconciliation to David, ver. 24, 25. V. The taking of Rabbah (ver. 26–31), which is mentioned as a further instance that God did not deal with David according to his sins.

It seems to have been a great while after David had been guilty of adultery with Bath-sheba before he was brought to repentance for it. For, when Nathan was sent to him, the child was born (v. 14). What shall we think of David's state all this while? We may well suppose his comforts and the exercises of his graces suspended, and his communion with God interrupted; during all that time, it is certain, he penned no psalms, his harp was out of tune, and his soul like a tree in winter, that has life in the root only.

I. The messenger God sent to him. He sent a prophet — Nathan, his faithful friend and confidant, to instruct and counsel him, v. 1. Though God may suffer his people to fall into sin, he will not suffer them to lie still in it. He sends after us before we seek after him, else we should certainly be lost. Nathan was the prophet by whom God had sent him notice of his kind intentions towards him (ch. vii. 4), and now, by the same hand, he sends him this message of wrath.

II. The message Nathan delivered to him.

1. He fetched a compass with a parable, which seemed to David as a complaint made to him against one of his subjects that had wronged his poor neighbour. (1) Nathan represented to David a grievous injury which a rich man had done to an honest neighbour that was not able to contend with him: The rich man had many flocks and herds (v. 2); the poor man had one lamb only. This poor man had but one lamb, a ewe-lamb, a little ewe-lamb, having not wherewithal to buy or keep more. But it was a cade-lamb (as we call it); it grew up with his children, v. 3. He was fond of it, and it was familiar with him at all times. The rich man, having occasion for a lamb to entertain a friend with, took the poor man's lamb from him by violence and made use of that (v. 4), either out of covetousness, because he grudged to make use of his own, or rather out of luxury, because he fancied the lamb that was thus tenderly kept, and ate and drank like a child, must needs be more delicate food than any of his own and have a better relish. (2) In this he showed him the evil of the sin he had been guilty of in defiling Bath-sheba. He had many wives and concubines, whom he kept at a distance, as rich men keep their flocks in their fields. Marriage is a remedy against fornication, but marrying many is not; for, when once the law of unity is transgressed, the indulged lust will hardly stint itself. Observe that this evil disposition is called a traveller, for in the beginning it is only so, but, in time, it becomes a guest, and, in conclusion, is master of the house. (3) By this parable he drew from David a sentence against himself. For David supposing it to be a case in fact, and not doubting the truth of it when he had it from Nathan himself, gave judgment immediately against the offender, and confirmed it with an oath, v. 5, 6. [1] That, for his injustice in taking away the lamb, he should restore fourfold, according to the law (Exod. xxii. 1), four sheep for a sheep. [2] That for his tyranny and cruelty, and the pleasure he took in abusing a poor man, he should be put to death.

2. He closed in with him, at length, in the application of the parable. In plain terms, "Thou art the man who hast done this wrong, and a much greater, to thy neighbour." Did he deserve to die who took his neighbour's lamb? and dost not thou who hast taken thy neighbour's wife? Now he speaks immediately from God, not as a petitioner for a poor man, but as an ambassador from the great God, with whom is no respect of persons.

(1) God, by Nathan, reminds David of the great things he had done and designed for him, anointing him to be king, and preserving him to the kingdom (v. 7). He had given him the house of Israel and Judah. The wealth of the kingdom was at his service and everybody was willing to oblige him.

(2) He charges him with a high contempt of the divine authority, in the sins he had been guilty of: Wherefore hast thou (presuming upon thy royal dignity and power) despised the commandment of the Lord? v. 9. [1] The murder of Uriah is twice mentioned: "Thou hast killed Uriah with the sword. Thou hast slain him with the sword of the children of Ammon, those uncircumcised enemies of God and Israel." [2] The marrying of Bath-sheba is likewise twice mentioned, because he thought there was no harm in that (v. 9): Thou hast taken his wife to be thy wife, and again, v. 10. To marry her whom he had before defiled, and whose husband he had slain, was an affront upon the ordinance of marriage, making that not only to palliate, but in a manner to consecrate, such villainies.

(3) He threatens an entail of judgments upon his family for this sin (v. 10): "The sword shall never depart from thy house, not in thy time nor afterwards, but, for the most part, thou and thy posterity shall be engaged in war." Can the mercy and the sword consist with each other? Yes, those may lie under great and long afflictions who yet shall not be excluded from the grace of the covenant. The reason given is, Because thou hast despised me. It is particularly threatened, [1] That his children should be his grief: I will raise up evil against thee out of thy own house. [2] That his wives should be his shame, that by an unparalleled piece of villainy they should be publicly debauched before all Israel, v. 11, 12.

3. David's penitent confession of his sin hereupon. I have sinned against the Lord, v. 13.

4. His pardon declared, upon this penitent confession, but with a proviso. When David said I have sinned, and Nathan perceived that he was a true penitent,

(1) He did, in God's name, assure him that his sin was forgiven: "The Lord also has put away thy sin out of the sight of his avenging eye; thou shalt not die," that is, "not die eternally, nor be for ever put away from God, as thou wouldest have been if he had not put away the sin." "The sword shall not depart from thy house, but, [1] It shall not cut thee off, thou shalt come to thy grave in peace." [2] "Though thou shalt all thy days be chastened of the Lord, yet thou shalt not be condemned with the world."

(2) Yet he pronounces a sentence of death upon the child, v. 14. Behold the sovereignty of God! The guilty parent lives, and the guiltless infant dies. [1] David had, by his sin, wronged God in his honour; he had given occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme. There is this great evil in the scandalous sins of those that profess religion, and relation to God, that they furnish the enemies of God and religion with matter for reproach and blasphemy, Rom. ii. 24. [2] God will therefore vindicate his honour by showing his displeasure against David for this sin, and letting the world see that though he loves David he hates his sin; and he chooses to do it by the death of the child.

Nathan, having delivered his message, stayed not at court, but went home, probably to pray for David, to whom he had been preaching. David named one of his sons by Bath-sheba Nathan, in honour of this prophet (1 Chron. iii. 5), and it was that son of whom Christ, the great prophet, lineally descended, Luke iii. 31. When Nathan retired, David, it is probable, retired likewise, and penned the 51st Psalm, in which (though he had been assured that his sin was pardoned) he prays earnestly for pardon, and greatly laments his sin; for then will true penitents be ashamed of what they have done when God is pacified towards them, Ezek. xvi. 63.

I. The child's illness: The Lord struck it, and it was very sick.

II. David's humiliation under this token of God's displeasure, and the intercession he made with God for the life of the child (v. 16, 17): He fasted, and lay all night upon the earth. This was an evidence of the truth of his repentance. For, 1. Hereby it appeared that he was willing to bear the shame of his sin, for this child would be a continual memorandum of it, therefore he was so far from desiring its death, as most in such circumstances do, that he prayed earnestly for its life. 2. A very tender compassionate spirit appeared in this towards little children, even their own; and this was another sign of a broken contrite spirit. Those that are penitent will be pitiful. 3. He discovered, in this, a great concern for another world, which is an evidence of repentance. Nathan had told him that certainly the child should die; yet, while it is in the reach of prayer, he earnestly intercedes with God for it, chiefly (as we may suppose) that its soul might be safe and happy in another world, and that his sin might not come against the child, and that it might not fare the worse for that in the future state.

III. The death of the child: It died on the seventh day (v. 18), when it was seven days old, and therefore not circumcised, which David might perhaps interpret as a further token of God's displeasure, that it died before it was brought under the seal of the covenant; yet he does not therefore doubt of its being happy, for the benefits of the covenant do not depend upon the seals.

IV. David's wonderful calmness and composure of mind when he understood the child was dead.

1. What he did. (1) He laid aside the expressions of his sorrow, washed and anointed himself, and called for clean linen, that he might decently appear before God in his house. (2) He went up to the tabernacle and worshipped, like Job when he heard of the death of his children. (3) Then he went to his own house and refreshed himself, as one who found benefit by his religion in the day of his affliction.

2. The reason he gave for what he did. His servants thought it strange that he should afflict himself so for the sickness of the child and yet take the death of it so easily, and asked him the reason of it (v. 21), in answer to which he gives this plain account of his conduct, (1) That while the child was alive he thought it his duty to importune the divine favour towards it, v. 22. When our relations and friends have fallen sick, the prayer of faith has prevailed much; while there is life there is hope, and, while there is hope, there is room for prayer. (2) That now the child was dead he thought it as much his duty to be satisfied in the divine disposal concerning it (v. 23): Now, wherefore should I fast? Two things checked his grief:—[1] I cannot bring him back again; and again, He shall not return to me. Those that are dead are out of the reach of prayer; nor can our tears profit them. [2] I shall go to him. First, To him to the grave. Note, The consideration of our own death should moderate our sorrow at the death of our relations. Secondly, To him to heaven, to a state of blessedness, which even the Old Testament saints had some expectation of. This may comfort us when our children are removed from us by death, they are better provided for, both in work and wealth, than they could have been in this world. We shall be with them shortly, to part no more.

V. The birth of Solomon. Though David's marrying Bath-sheba had displeased the Lord, yet he was not therefore commanded to divorce her. Bath-sheba, no doubt, was greatly afflicted with the sense of her sin, and the tokens of God's displeasure. But, God having restored to David the joys of his salvation, he comforted her with the same comforts with which he himself was comforted of God (v. 24). 1. Inasmuch as, by his providence, he gave them a son. They called him Solomon—peaceful, because his birth was a token of God's being at peace with them, because of the prosperity which was entailed upon him, and because he was to be a type of Christ, the prince of peace. David had very patiently submitted to the will of God in the death of the other child, and now God made up the loss of that, abundantly to his advantage, in the birth of this. 2. Inasmuch as, by his grace, he particularly owned and favoured that son: The Lord loved him (v. 24 and 25), ordered him, by the prophet Nathan, to be called Jedidiah—Beloved of the Lord.

Verses 26–31

An account of the conquest of Rabbah, and other cities of the Ammonites. Though this comes in here after the birth of David's child, yet it is most probable that it was effected a good while before, and soon after the death of Uriah, perhaps during the days of Bath-sheba's mourning for him. Observe, 1. That God was very gracious in giving David this great success against his enemies. Justly might he have made his sword, thenceforward, a plague to David and his kingdom; yet he breaks it and makes David's sword victorious, even before he repents, that this goodness of God might lead him to repentance. 2. That Joab acted very honestly and honourably; for when he had taken the city of waters, the royal city, where the palace was, and from which the rest of the city was supplied with water (and therefore, upon the cutting off of that, would be obliged speedily to surrender), he sent to David to come in person to complete this great action, that he might have the praise of it, v. 26–28. 3. That David was both too haughty and too severe upon this occasion, and neither so humble nor so tender as he should have been. (1) He seems to have been too fond of the crown of the king of Ammon, v. 30. Because it was of extraordinary value, by reason of the precious stones with which it was set, David would have it set upon his head, though it would have been better to have cast it at God's feet, and at this time to have put his own mouth in the dust, under guilt. (2) He seems to have been too harsh with his prisoners of war, v. 31. Taking the city by storm, after it had obstinately held out against a long and expensive siege, if he had put all whom he found in arms to the sword in the heat of battle, it would have been severe enough; but to kill them afterwards in cold blood, and by cruel tortures, with saws and harrows, tearing them to pieces, did not become him who, when he entered upon the government, promised to sing of mercy as well as judgment, Ps. ci. 1.

CHAP. XIII

The righteous God had lately told David, by Nathan the prophet, that, to chastise him for his sin in the matter of Uriah, he would "raise up evil against him out of his own house", ch. xii. 11. And here, we find the evil beginning to rise; henceforward he was followed with one trouble after another. Adultery and murder were David's sins, and those sins among his children (Amnon defiling his sister Tamar, and Absalom murdering his brother Amnon) were the beginnings of his punishment. In this chapter we have, I. Amnon ravishing Tamar, assisted in his plot to do it by Jonadab his kinsman, and villainously executing it, ver. 1–20. II. Absalom murdering Amnon for it, ver. 21–39. Both were great griefs to David, and the more because he was unwittingly made accessory to both, by sending Tamar to Amnon and Amnon to Absalom.

A particular account of the abominable wickedness of Amnon in ravishing his sister. Amnon's character, we have reason to think, was bad in other things; if he had not forsaken God, he would never have been given up to these vile affections.

I. The devil, as an unclean spirit, put it into his heart to lust after his sister Tamar. Beauty is a snare to many; it was so to her. Amnon's lust was, 1. Unnatural in itself. Such a spirit of contradiction there is in man's corrupt nature that still it desires forbidden fruit, and the more strongly it is forbidden the more greedily it is desired. 2. It was very uneasy to him. He was so vexed that he could not gain an opportunity to solicit her chastity that he fell sick, v. 2.

II. The devil, as a subtle serpent, put it into his head how to compass this wicked design. Amnon had a friend, a subtle man, cunning to carry on an intrigue of this nature, v. 3.

1. He took notice that Amnon looked ill, and, being a subtle man, concluded that he was love-sick (v. 4). Being the king's son, "Thou hast the power of a prince to command what thou wantest and wishest for: use that power, therefore, and gratify thyself."

2. Amnon having the impudence to own his wicked lust, miscalling it love (I love Tamar), Jonadab put him in a way to compass his design, v. 5. Amnon is already sick, but goes about; he must take upon him to be so ill as not to be able to get up. The best dish from the king's table cannot please him; but, if he can eat anything, it must be from his sister Tamar's fair hand.

3. Amnon followed these directions, and thus got Tamar within his reach. David was always fond of his children, and concerned if anything ailed them; he no sooner hears that Amnon is sick than he comes himself to visit him. At parting, the indulgent father asks, "Is there anything thou hast a mind to, that I can procure for thee?" "Yes, Sir," says the dissembling son, "my stomach is weak, and I know not of any thing I can eat, unless it be a cake of my sister Tamar's making, and I cannot be satisfied that it is so unless I see her make it, and it will do me the more good if I eat it at her hand." David saw no reason to suspect any mischief intended. He therefore immediately orders Tamar to go and attend her sick brother, v. 7.

4. Having got her to him, he contrives to have her alone. Tamar has not the least thought of that which his polluted breast is full of; and therefore she makes no scruple of being alone with him in the inner chamber, v. 10. And now the mask is thrown off, the meat is thrown by, and the wicked wretch calls her sister, and yet impudently courts her to come and lie with him, v. 11.

III. The devil, as a strong tempter, deafens his ear to all the reasonings with which she resisted his assaults and would have persuaded him to desist. 1. She calls him brother, reminding him of the nearness of the relation, which made it unlawful for him to marry her, much less to debauch her. It was expressly forbidden (Lev. xviii. 9) under a severe penalty, Lev. xx. 17. 2. She entreats him not to force her, which intimates that she would never consent to it in any degree. 3. She lays before him the great wickedness of it. 4. She represents to him the shame of it. 5. To divert him from his wicked purpose she intimates to him that probably the king, rather than he should die for love of her, would dispense with the divine law and let him marry her: not as if she thought he had such a dispensing power, or would pretend to it; but she was confident that, upon notice given to the king by himself of this wicked desire, he would take an effectual course to protect her from him. But all her arts and all her arguments availed not. His proud spirit cannot bear a denial; but her honour, and all that was dear to her, must be sacrificed to his outrageous lust, v. 14. It is to be feared that Amnon, though young, had long lived a lewd life, for a man could not of a sudden arrive at such a pitch of wickedness.

IV. The devil, as a tormentor and betrayer, immediately turns his love of her into hatred (v. 15).

1. He basely turned her out of doors by force. To dismiss her thus as if she had done some wicked thing, obliged her, in her own defence, to proclaim the wrong. We may learn from it the mischievous consequences of sin (at last, it bites like a serpent); sins, sweet in the commission, afterwards become odious and painful, and the sinner's own conscience makes them so to himself. But to hate the person he had abused showed that his conscience was terrified, but his heart not at all humbled.

2. What becomes of the poor victim? (1) She bitterly lamented the injury she had received, as it was a stain to her honour, though no real blemish to her virtue. She tore her fine clothes in token of her grief, and put ashes upon her head, loathing her own beauty and ornaments, because they had occasioned Amnon's unlawful love; and she went on crying for another's sin, v. 19. (2) She retired to her brother Absalom's house, because he was her own brother, and there she lived in solitude and sorrow, in token of her modesty and detestation of uncleanness. Absalom spoke kindly to her, bade her pass by the injury for the present, designing himself to revenge it, v. 20.

What Solomon says of the beginning of strife is as true of the beginning of all sin, it is as the letting forth of water. One mischief begets another.

I. How David resented the tidings of Amnon's sin. But was it enough for him to be angry? He ought to have punished his son for it, and have put him to open shame.

II. How Absalom resented it. He resolves already to do the part of a judge in Israel; and, since his father will not punish Amnon, he will, from a principle, not of justice or zeal for virtue, but of revenge, because he reckons himself affronted in the abuse done to his sister.

1. The design conceived: Absalom hated Amnon (v. 22). Absalom's hatred of his brother's crime would have been commendable, and he might justly have prosecuted him for it by a due course of law, for example to others, and the making of some compensation to his injured sister; but to hate his person, and design his death by assassination, was to put a great affront upon God, by offering to repair the breach of his seventh commandment by the violation of his sixth, as if they were not all alike sacred. But he that said, Do not commit adultery, said also, Do not kill, James ii. 11.

2. The design concealed. He said nothing to Amnon. If Absalom had reasoned the matter with Amnon, he might have convinced him of his sin and brought him to repentance. Two full years Absalom nursed this root of bitterness, v. 24. It may be, at first, he did not intend to kill his brother, and only waited for an occasion to disgrace him or do him some other mischief; but in time his hatred ripened to this, that he would be no less than the death of him.

3. The design laid. (1) Absalom has a feast at his house in the country, as Nabal had, on occasion of his sheep-shearing, v. 23. (2) To this feast he invites the king his father, and all the princes of the blood (v. 24), that he might make himself the more respected among his neighbours. The king would not go himself, because he would not put him to the expense of his entertainment, v. 25. Absalom got leave for Amnon, and all the rest of the king's sons, to come and grace his table in the country, v. 26, 27. Absalom had so effectually concealed his enmity to Amnon that David saw no reason to suspect any design upon him in that particular invitation.

4. The design executed, v. 28, 29. (1) Absalom's entertainment was very plentiful; for he resolves that they shall all be merry with wine. But, (2) The orders he gave to his servants concerning Amnon, that they should mingle his blood with his wine, were very barbarous. He would have Amnon slain when his heart was merry with wine, not giving him time to say, Lord, have mercy upon me. His servants must be employed to do it, and so be involved in the guilt. He was to give the word of command—Smite Amnon; and then they must kill him. He did it in the presence of all the king's sons, of whom it is said (ch. viii. 18) that they were chief rulers; so that it was an affront to public justice and to the king his father, whom they represented. There is reason to suspect that Absalom did this, not only to revenge his sister's quarrel, but to make way for himself to the throne, which he was ambitious of, and which he would stand fair for if Amnon the eldest son was taken off. When the word of command was given Absalom's servants failed not to execute it, being buoyed up with an opinion that their master, being now next heir to the crown, would save them from harm. Now the threatened sword is drawn in David's house which should not depart from it. First, His eldest son falls by it. Secondly, All his sons flee from it, and come home in terror, not knowing how far their brother Absalom's bloody design might extend.

I. The fright that David was put into by a false report brought to Jerusalem that Absalom had slain all the king's sons, v. 30. This false news gave as much affliction to David, for the present, as if it had been true, v. 31.

II. The rectifying of the mistake in two ways:— 1. By the sly suggestions of Jonadab, David's nephew, who could tell him, Amnon only is dead, and not all the king's sons (v. 32, 33), and could tell him too that it was done by the appointment of Absalom, and designed from the day Amnon forced his sister Tamar. It is well if Jonadab was not as guilty of Amnon's death as he was of his sin; such friends do those prove who are hearkened to as counsellors to do wickedly: he that would not be so kind as to prevent Amnon's sin would not be so kind as to prevent his ruin, when, it should seem, he might have done both. 2. By the safe return of all the king's sons except Amnon. They bring the certain sad news that Absalom had murdered their brother Amnon. That Amnon was dead, and slain by his own brother in such a treacherous barbarous manner, was enough to put the king and court, the king and kingdom, into real mourning. Sorrow is never more reasonable than when there is sin in the case.

III. Absalom's flight from justice. He was now as much afraid of the king's sons as they were of him; they fled from his malice, he from their justice. No part of the land of Israel would shelter him. He therefore made the best of his way to his mother's relations, and was entertained by his grandfather Talmai, king of Geshur (v. 37), and there he was protected three years (v. 38).

IV. David's uneasiness for his absence. He mourned for Amnon a good while (v. 37), but time wore off his detestation of Absalom's sin; instead of loathing him as a murderer, he longs to go forth to him, v. 39.

CHAP. XIV

How Absalom threw himself out of his royal father's protection and favour we read in the foregoing chapter. In this chapter we have the arts that were used to bring him and his father together again, here recorded to show the folly of David in sparing him and indulging him in his wickedness, for which he was soon after severely corrected by his unnatural rebellion. I. Joab, by bringing a feigned issue to be tried before him, in the case of a poor widow of Tekoah, gains from him a judgment in general, That the case might be so as that the putting of a murderer to death ought to be dispensed with, ver. 1–20. II. Upon the application of this, he gains from him an order to bring Absalom back to Jerusalem, while yet he was forbidden the court, ver. 21–24. III. At length he was introduced by Joab into the king's presence, and the king was thoroughly reconciled to him, ver. 25–33.

1. Joab's design to get Absalom recalled out of banishment, v. 1. 1. As a courtier. Joab, finding how David stood affected, undertook this good office. 2. As a friend to Absalom. He plainly foresaw that his father would at length be reconciled to him, and therefore thought he should make both his friends if he were instrumental to bring it about. 3. As a statesman, and one concerned for the public welfare. He knew how much Absalom was the darling of the people, and, if David should die while he was in banishment, it might occasion a civil war, for it is probable that though all Israel loved his person, yet they were much divided upon his case. 4. As one who was himself a delinquent, by the murder of Abner. Whatever favour he could procure to be shown to Absalom would corroborate his reprieve.

II. His contrivance to do it by laying somewhat of a parallel case before the king so dexterously that the king took it for a real case, and gave judgment upon it, as he had done upon Nathan's parable.

1. The person he employed is not named, but she is said to be a woman of Tekoah. It is said, She was a wise woman, one that had a quicker wit and a readier tongue than most of her neighbours, v. 2. The truth of the story would be the less suspected when it came, as was supposed, from the person's own mouth.

2. The character she put on was that of a disconsolate widow, v. 2. Joab knew such a one would have an easy access to the king, who was always ready to comfort the mourners.

3. It was a case of compassion which she had to represent to the king, the judgment of all the inferior courts being against her. She tells the king that she had buried her husband (v. 5),—that she had two sons that were the support and comfort of her widowed state,—that these two fell out and fought, and one of them unhappily killed the other (v. 6),—that, for her part, she was desirous to protect the manslayer, yet the other relations insisted upon it that the surviving brother should be put to death according to law, that, by destroying the heir the inheritance might be theirs: and thus they would cut off, (1) Her comfort: "They shall quench my coal, deprive me of the only support of my old age, and put a period to all my joy in this world, which is reduced to this one coal." (2) Her husband's memory: "His family will be quite extinct, and they will leave him neither name nor remainder," v. 7.

4. The king promised her his favour and a protection for her son. (1) Upon the representation of her case he promised to consider of it and to give orders about it, v. 8. (2) The woman was not content with this, but begged that he would immediately give judgment in her favour. (3) Being thus pressed, he made a further promise that she should not be injured nor insulted by her adversaries, but he would protect her from all molestation, v. 10. (4) Yet this does not content her, unless she can get her son's pardon, and protection for him too. Parents are not easy, unless their children be safe, safe for both worlds: "Let not the avenger of blood destroy my son (v. 11), for I am undone if I lose him; as good take my life as his." "Remember how the Lord thy God spared Cain, forgave thee the blood of Uriah, and let the king, that has found mercy, show mercy." (5) This importunate widow, by pressing the matter thus closely, obtains at last a full pardon for her son, ratified with an oath as she desired. Whether David did well thus to undertake the protection of a murderer, whom the cities of refuge would not protect, I cannot say. But there was room enough for a favourable judgment: he had slain his brother, but he hated him not in time past; it was upon a sudden provocation, and, for aught that appeared, it might be done in his own defence.

5. The case being thus adjudged in favour of her son, it is now time to apply it to the king's son, Absalom. The mask here begins to be thrown off, and another scene opened. The king is surprised, but not at all displeased, to find his humble petitioner become an advocate for the prince his son. She begs his pardon, and his patience, for what she had further to say (v. 12). (1) She supposes Absalom's case to be, in effect, the same with that which she had put as her son's; and therefore, if the king would protect her son, though he had slain his brother, much more ought he to protect his own, and to fetch home his banished, v. 13. It is true, Absalom's case differed very much from that which she had put. Absalom did not slay his brother upon a hasty passion. Absalom was not an only son, as hers was; David had many more. But David was himself too well affected to the cause to be critical, and was more desirous than she could be to bring that favourable judgment to his own son which he had given concerning hers. (2) She reasons with the king, to persuade him to recall Absalom out of banishment, give him his pardon, and take him into his favour again. [1] She pleads the interest which the people of Israel had in him. [2] She pleads man's mortality (v. 14): "We must needs die. Amnon must have died, some time, if Absalom had not killed him; and, if Absalom be now put to death for killing him, that will not bring him to life again." [3] She pleads God's mercy and his clemency towards poor guilty sinners, v. 14. Here are two great instances of the mercy of God to sinners: First, The patience he exercises towards them. His law is broken, yet he does not immediately take away the life of those that break it. Secondly, The provision he has made for their restoration to his favour, that though by sin they have banished themselves from him, yet they might not be expelled, or cast off, for ever. Poor banished sinners are likely to be for ever expelled from God if some course be not taken to prevent it. It is against the mind of God that they should be so, for he is not willing that any should perish.

6. She concludes her address with high compliments to the king, and strong expressions of her assurance that he would do what was just and kind both in the one case and in the other (v. 15–17). (1) She would not have troubled the king thus, but that the people made her afraid. Understanding it of Absalom's case, she gives the king to understand, what he did not know before, that the nation was disgusted at his severity towards Absalom to such a degree that she was really afraid it would occasion a general mutiny or insurrection. (2) She applied to him with a great confidence in his wisdom and clemency. What this woman says by way of compliment the prophet says by way of promise (Zech. xii. 8), that, when the weak shall be as David, the house of David shall be as the angel of the Lord.

7. The hand of Joab is suspected by the king, and acknowledged by the woman, to be in all this, v. 18–20. (1) The king soon suspected it. (2) The woman very honestly owned it: "Thy servant Joab bade me. She speaks the truth as it was, and gives us an example to do likewise, and never to tell a lie for the concealing of a well-managed scheme. Dare to be true; nothing can need a lie.

I. Orders given for the bringing back of Absalom. Joab, having received these orders, 1. Returns thanks to the king for doing him the honour to employ him in an affair so universally grateful, v. 22. 2. Delays not to execute David's orders; he brought Absalom to Jerusalem, v. 23. I see not how David can be justified in suspending the execution of the ancient law (Gen. ix. 6), Whoso sheds man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed. God's laws were never designed to be like cobwebs, which catch the little flies, but suffer the great ones to break through. But, though he allowed him to return to his own house, he forbade him the court, and would not see him himself, v. 24. He put him under this interdict, (1) For his own honour, that he might not seem to forgive him too easily. (2) For Absalom's greater humiliation.

II. Occasion taken hence to give an account of Absalom. Nothing is said of his wisdom and piety, nothing of his devotion. All that is here said of him is, 1. That he was a very handsome man (v. 25), a poor commendation for a man that had nothing else in him valuable. Handsome are those that handsome do. Many a polluted deformed soul dwells in a fair and comely body; witness Absalom's, that was polluted with blood, and deformed with unnatural disaffection to his father and prince. In his body there was no blemish, but in his mind nothing but wounds and bruises. 2. That he had a very fine head of hair, not as the hair of a Nazarite (he was far from that strictness), but as the hair of a beau. He let it grow till it was a burden to him, and was heavy on him, nor would he cut it as long as ever he could bear it; as pride feels no cold, so it feels no heat, and that which feeds and gratifies it is not complained of, though very uneasy. He did poll it at certain times, that it might be seen how much it excelled other men's, and it weighed 200 shekels, which some reckon to be three pounds and two ounces of our weight; and with the oil and powder, especially if powdered (as Josephus says the fashion then was) with gold dust, it is not at all incredible that it should weigh so much. This fine hair proved his halter, ch. xviii. 9. 3. That his family began to be built up. It is probable that it was a good while before he had a child; and then it was that, despairing of having one, he set up that pillar which is mentioned, ch. xviii. 18, to bear up his name; but afterwards he had three sons and one daughter, v. 27.

Three years Absalom had been an exile from his father-in-law, and now two years a prisoner at large in his own house, and, in both, better dealt with than he deserved; yet his spirit was still unhumbled. He thinks himself sorely wronged that he is not restored to all his places at court. He longed to see the king's face, pretending it was because he loved him, but really because he wanted an opportunity to supplant him. He cannot do his father a mischief till he is reconciled to him; this therefore is the first branch of his plot; this snake cannot sting again till he be warmed in his father's bosom. He gained this point, not by promises of reformation, but by insults and injuries. 1. By his insolent carriage towards Joab, he brought him to mediate for him. A person in Absalom's circumstances should have sent to Joab a kindly message, but instead of this, he bids his servants set Joab's cornfields on fire (v. 30). Strange that Absalom should think, by doing Joab a mischief, to prevail with him to do him a kindness. Yet by this means he brings Joab to him, v. 31. And now Joab (perhaps frightened at the surprising boldness and fury of Absalom, and apprehensive that he had made an interest in the people strong enough to bear him out, not only puts up with this injury, but goes on his errand to the king. 2. By his insolent message to the king, he recovered his place at court, to see the king's face, that is, to become a privy counsellor, Esther i. 14. (1) His message was haughty and imperious, and very unbecoming either a son or a subject, v. 32. He undervalued the favour that had been shown him in recalling him from banishment, and restoring him to his own house, and that in Jerusalem. He defies the king's justice: "Let him kill me, if he can find it in his heart." (2) Yet with this message he carried his point, v. 33. David's strong affection for him construed all this to be the language of a great respect to his father, and an earnest desire of his favour, when, alas! it was far otherwise. Absalom, by the posture of his body, testified his submission to his father: He bowed himself on his face to the ground; and David, with a kiss, sealed his pardon.

CHAP. XV

Absalom's name signifies "the peace of his father," yet he proves his greatest trouble. The sword entailed upon David's house had hitherto been among his children, but now it begins to be drawn against himself; had he done justice upon the murderer, he would have prevented the traitor. The story of Absalom's rebellion begins with this chapter. I. The arts Absalom used to insinuate himself into the people's affections, ver. 1–6. II. His open avowal of his pretensions to the crown at Hebron, whither he went under colour of a vow, and the strong party that appeared for him there, ver. 7–12. III. The notice brought of this to David, and his flight from Jerusalem thereupon, ver. 13–18. In his flight we are told, 1. What passed between him and Ittai, ver. 19–22. 2. The concern of the country for him, ver. 23. 3. His conference with Zadok, ver. 24–29. 4. His tears and prayers upon this occasion, ver. 30, 31. 5. Matters concerted by him with Hushai, ver. 32–37.

Absalom is no sooner restored to his place at court than he aims to be on the throne. If he had had any sense of gratitude, he would have studied how to oblige his father, and make him easy; but, on the contrary, he meditates how to undermine him, by stealing the hearts of the people from him. Two things recommend a man to popular esteem—greatness and goodness.

I. Absalom looks great, v. 1. He had learned of the king of Geshur (what was not allowed to the kings of Israel) to multiply horses, which made him look desirable, while his father, on his mule, looked despicable. The people desired a king like the nations. Samuel had foretold that this would be the manner of the king: He shall have chariots and horsemen, and some shall run before his chariots (1 Sam. viii. 11); and this is Absalom's manner. Fifty footmen running before him would highly gratify his pride and the people's foolish fancy. David thinks that this parade is designed only to grace his court, and connives at it.

II. Absalom will seem very good too, but with a very bad design. Had he proved himself a good son and a good subject he would have shown himself worthy of future honours, after his father's death. Those that know how to obey well know how to rule. Those are good indeed that are good in their own place, not that pretend how good they would be in other people's places.

1. He wishes that he were a judge in Israel, v. 4. He that should himself have been judged to death for murder has the impudence to aim at being a judge of others. We read not of Absalom's wisdom, virtue, or learning in the laws, yet he wishes he were judge. Those are commonly most ambitious of preferment that are least fit for it; the best qualified are the most modest and self-diffident.

2. He takes a very bad course for the accomplishing of his wish. He wants to be such a judge that every man who has any cause shall come to him: in all causes he must preside. To gain the power he aims at, he endeavours to instil into the people's minds,

(1) A bad opinion of the present administration, as if the affairs of the kingdom were altogether neglected, and no care taken about them. "There is no man deputed of the king to hear thee. The king is himself old, and past business, or so taken up with his devotions that he never minds business; his sons are so addicted to their pleasures that, though they have the name of chief rulers, they take no care of the affairs committed to them." Every appellant shall be made to believe that he will never have justice done him, unless Absalom be viceroy or lord-justice. It is the way of turbulent, factious, aspiring men, to reproach the government they are under.

(2) A good opinion of his own fitness to rule. That the people might say, "O that Absalom were a judge!" he recommends himself to them, [1] As very diligent. [2] As very inquisitive and prying, and desirous to be acquainted with everyone's case. [3] As very familiar and humble. If any Israelite offered to do obeisance to him he took him and embraced him as a friend. No man's conduct could be more condescending, while his heart was as proud as Lucifer's.

The breaking out of Absalom's rebellion, which he had long been contriving. The same restless spirit was still working, and still they were given to change: as fond now of a new man as then of a new model. Absalom's plot being now ripe for execution,

I. The place he chose for the rendezvous of his party was Hebron, where he was born, and where his father began his reign and continued it several years. Everyone knew Hebron to be a royal city; and it lay in the heart of Judah's lot, in which tribe, probably, he thought his interest strong.

II. The pretence he had both to go thither and to invite his friends to him there was to offer a sacrifice to God, in performance of a vow he had made during his banishment, v. 7, 8. Under this pretence, 1. He got leave of his father to go to Hebron. David would be well pleased to hear that his son, being brought back, remembered his vow, and resolved to perform it. David was overjoyed to hear that Absalom inclined to serve the Lord, and therefore readily gave him leave to go to Hebron, and to go thither with solemnity. 2. He got a good number of sober substantial citizens to go along with him, v. 11. He knew that it was to no purpose to tempt them into his plot: they were inviolably firm to David. But he drew them in to accompany him, that the common people might think that they were in his interest, and that David was deserted by some of his best friends. When religion is made a stalking-horse, and sacrifice a shoeing-horn, to sedition and usurpation it is not to be wondered at if some that were well affected to religion, as these followers of Absalom here, are imposed upon by the fallacy, and drawn in to give countenance to that, with their names, which in their heart they abhor, not having known the depths of Satan.

III. The project he laid was to get himself proclaimed king throughout all the tribes of Israel upon a signal given, v. 10. Spies were sent abroad, to be ready in every country to receive the notice with satisfaction and acclamations of joy. Some would conclude that David was dead, others that he had resigned: many, if they had rightly understood the matter, would have abhorred the thought of it.

IV. The person he especially courted and relied upon in this affair was Ahithophel, a politic thinking man that had been David's counsellor. But, upon some disgust of David's against him, or his against David, he was banished and lived privately in the country. A fitter tool Absalom could not find in all the kingdom than one that was so great a statesman, and yet was disaffected to the present ministry. While Absalom was offering his sacrifices, in performance of his pretended vow, he sent for this man.

V. The party that joined with him proved at last very considerable. The people increased continually with Absalom, which made the conspiracy strong and formidable. Everyone whom he had complimented and caressed not only came himself, but made all the interest he could for him, so that he wanted not for numbers.

I. The notice brought to David of Absalom's rebellion, v. 13. The matter was bad enough, and yet it seems to have been made worse to him, for he was told that the hearts of the men of Israel (that is, the generality of them, at least the leading men) were after Absalom. It is the wisdom of princes to make sure of the hearts of their subjects; for, if they have them, they have their purses, and arms, and all, at their service.

II. The alarm this gave to David, and the resolutions he came to thereupon. We may well imagine him thunderstruck, when he heard that the son he loved so dearly, was so unnaturally and ungratefully in arms against him. David did not call a council, but, consulting only with God and his own heart, determined immediately to quit Jerusalem, v. 14. He took up this strange resolve, either, 1. As a penitent submitting to the rod, and lying down under God's correcting hand. Or, 2. As a politician. Jerusalem was a great city, but not tenable. It was too large to be garrisoned by so small a force as David had now with him. He had reason to fear that the generality of the inhabitants were too well affected to Absalom to be true to him. And he had such a kindness for Jerusalem that he was loth to make it the seat of war, and expose it to the calamities of a siege.

III. His hasty flight from Jerusalem. 1. He went out of Jerusalem himself on foot, while his son Absalom had chariots and horses. 2. He took his household with him, his wives and children, that he might protect them in this day of danger, and that they might be a comfort to him in this day of grief. 3. He took his life-guard with him, the Cherethites and Pelethites, who were under the command of Benaiah, and the Gittites, who were under the command of Ittai, v. 18. These Gittites seem to have been, by birth, Philistines, in David's service, having known him at Gath, and being greatly in love with him for his virtue and piety, and having embraced the Jews' religion. David made them his bodyguard, and they adhered to him in his distress. 4. As many as would, of the people of Jerusalem, he took with him, and made a halt at some distance from the city, to draw them up, v. 17. He compelled none. Christ enlists none but volunteers.

IV. His discourse with Ittai the Gittite, who commanded the Philistine-proselytes.

1. David dissuaded him from going along with him, v. 19, 20. (1) He would try whether he was hearty for him, and not inclined to Absalom. He therefore bids him return to his post in Jerusalem, and serve the new king. (2) If he was faithful to David, yet David would not have him exposed to the perils he now counted upon. "Should I make thee go up and down with us? No, return with thy brethren." Generous souls are more concerned at the share others have in their troubles than at their own. Ittai shall therefore be dismissed with a blessing: Mercy and truth be with thee. David's dependence was upon the mercy and truth of God for comfort and happiness, both for himself and his friends; see Ps. lxi. 7.

2. Ittai bravely resolved not to leave him, v. 21. Where David is, whether in life or death, safe or in peril, there will this faithful friend of his be; and he confirms this resolution with an oath, that he might not be tempted to break it. Thus should we cleave to the Son of David with full purpose of heart that neither life nor death shall separate us from his love.

V. The common people's sympathy with David in his affliction. When he and his attendants passed over the brook Kidron (the very same brook that Christ passed over when he entered upon his sufferings, John xviii. 1), towards the way of the wilderness, which lay between Jerusalem and Jericho, all the country wept with a loud voice, v. 23. To see a prince thus reduced, forced from his palace and in fear of his life, with a small retinue seeking shelter in a desert, to see the city of David, which he himself won, built, and fortified, made an unsafe abode for David himself.

I. The fidelity of the priests and Levites and their firm adherence to David and his interest. Zadok and Abiathar, and all the Levites, if he go, will accompany him, and take the ark with them, that, by it, they may ask counsel of God for him, v. 24.

II. David's dismission of them back into the city, v. 25, 26. Abiathar was high priest (1 Kings ii. 35), but Zadok was his assistant, and attended the ark most closely, while Abiathar was active in public business, v. 24. Therefore David directs his speech to Zadok. 1. He is very solicitous for the safety of the ark: "By all means carry the ark back into the city, surely Absalom, bad as he is, will do that no harm." 2. He is very desirous to return to the enjoyment of the privileges of God's house. 3. He is very submissive to the holy will of God concerning the issue of this dark dispensation. See him here patiently awaiting the event: "Behold, here am I, as a servant expecting orders"; and see him willing to commit himself to God concerning it: "Let him do to me as seemeth good to him. I have nothing to object. All is well that God does. Let him do what he will." That we may not complain of what is, let us see God's hand in all events; and, that we may not be afraid of what shall be, let us see all events in God's hand.

III. The confidence David put in the priests that they would serve his interest to the utmost of their power in his absence. He calls Zadok a seer (v. 27). One friend that is a seer, in such an exigency as this, was worth twenty that were not so quick-sighted. 1. Whom they should send to him—their two sons, Ahimaaz and Jonathan. 2. Whither they should send. He would encamp in the plain of the wilderness till he heard from them (v. 28), and then would move according to the information and advice they should send him.

IV. The melancholy posture that David and his men put themselves into, when, at the beginning of their march, they went up the mount of Olives, v. 30.

1. David himself went bare-foot, as a prisoner or a slave, for mortification, and went weeping. He could not but weep to think that one who came out of his bowels, and had so often lain in his arms, should thus lift up the heel against him. There was much of the displeasure of his God in it. His sin was ever before him (Ps. li. 3), but never so plain nor ever appearing so black as now. He never wept thus when Saul hunted him: but a wounded conscience makes troubles lie heavily, Ps. xxxviii. 4.

2. When David wept all his company wept likewise, being much affected with his grief and willing to share in it.

Nothing, it seems, appeared to David more threatening in Absalom's plot than that Ahithophel was in it; for one good head, in such a design, is worth a thousand good hands. Absalom was himself no politician, but he had got one entirely in his interest that was. If therefore he can be baffled, Absalom is as good as routed and the head of the conspiracy cut off. This David endeavours to do.

I. By prayer. When he heard that Ahithophel was in the plot he lifted up his heart to God in this short prayer: Lord, turn the counsel of Ahithophel into foolishness, v. 31. David prayed not against Ahithophel's person, but against his counsel.

II. By policy. We must second our prayer with our endeavours, else we tempt God. Now he penned the third Psalm, as appears by the title; and some think that his singing this was the worship he now paid to God. Just now Providence brought Hushai, the person that should be instrumental to befool Ahithophel. He came to condole with David on his present trouble, with his coat rent and earth upon his head; but David resolved to employ him as a spy upon Absalom, and sent him to Jerusalem, to wait for Absalom's arrival, as a deserter from David, and to offer him his service, v. 34. How this gross dissimulation, which David put Hushai upon, can be justified, as a stratagem in war, I do not see. The best that can be made of it is that Absalom, if he rebel against his father, must stand upon his guard against all mankind, and, if he will be deceived, let him be deceived. David recommended Hushai to Zadok, and Hushai, thus instructed, came to Jerusalem (v. 37), whither also Absalom soon after came with his forces.

CHAP. XVI

I. We are to follow David in his melancholy flight; and there we find him, 1. Cheated by Ziba, ver. 1–4. 2. Cursed by Shimei, ver. 5–14. II. We meet Absalom in his triumphant entry; and there we find him, 1 Cheated by Hushai, ver. 15–19. 2. Counselled by Ahithophel to go in unto his father's concubines, ver. 20–23.

We read before how kind David was to Mephibosheth the son of Jonathan, how he prudently entrusted his servant Ziba with the management of his estate, while he generously entertained him at his own table, ch. ix. 10, but, it seems, Ziba is not content to be manager, he longs to be master, of Mephibosheth's estate. Now, he thinks, is his time to make himself so; if he can procure a grant of it from the crown, whether David or Absalom get the better it is all one to him, he hopes he shall secure his prey. 1. He made David a handsome present of provisions, which was the more welcome because it came seasonably (v. 1). David inferred from this that Ziba was a very discreet and generous man, and well affected to him, when, in all, he designed nothing but to make his own market and to get Mephibosheth's estate settled upon himself. Whatever Ziba intended in this present, God's providence sent it to David for his support very graciously. God makes use of bad men for good purposes to his people, and sends them meat by ravens. 2. Having by his present insinuated himself into David's affection, the next thing is to incense him against Mephibosheth, which he does by a false accusation, representing him as ungratefully designing to recover the crown to his own head, now that David and his son were contending for it. David enquires for him as one of his family, which gives Ziba occasion to tell this false story of him, v. 3. David gives credit to the calumny, without further enquiry, convicts Mephibosheth of treason, seizes his lands as forfeited, and grants them to Ziba, a rash judgment, and which afterwards he was ashamed of, when the truth came to light, ch. xix. 29. Having by his wiles gained his point, Ziba secretly laughed at the king's credulity.

David bore Shimei's curses much better than he had borne Ziba's flatteries. By the latter he was brought to pass a wrong judgment on another, by the former to pass a right judgment on himself. The world's smiles are more dangerous than its frowns.

I. How insolent and furious Shimei was, and how his malice took occasion from David's present distress to be so much the more outrageous. David, in his flight, had come to Bahurim, a city of Benjamin in or near which this Shimei lived, who, being of the house of Saul (with the fall of which all his hopes of preferment fell), had an implacable enmity to David, unjustly looking upon him as the ruin of Saul and his family only because, by the divine appointment, he succeeded Saul, v. 5.

1. Why he took this opportunity to give vent to his malice. (1) Because now he thought he might do it safely. (2) Because now it would be most grievous to David, would add affliction to his grief, and pour vinegar into his wounds. (3) Because now he thought that Providence justified his reproaches, and that David's present afflictions proved him to be as bad a man as he was willing to represent him. Job's friends condemned him upon this false principle.

2. How his malice was expressed. (1) He cast stones at David (v. 6), as if his king had been a dog. He cast dust (v. 13), which, probably, would blow into his own eyes, like the curses he threw, which, being causeless, would return upon his own head. Thus, while his malice made him odious, the impotency of it made him ridiculous and contemptible. (2) What he said. With the stones he shot his arrows, even bitter words (v. 7, 8). What was done long since to the house of Saul was the only thing which he could recollect, and with this he upbraided David because it was the thing that he himself was a loser by. No man could be more innocent of the blood of the house of Saul than David was. Once and again he spared Saul's life, while Saul sought him. The blood of the house of Saul is here most unjustly charged upon David, [1] As that which gave him his character, and denominated him a bloody man and a man of Belial, v. 7. [2] As that which brought the present trouble upon him: The Lord has returned upon thee the blood of the house of Saul. See how forward malicious men are to press God's judgments into the service of their own passion and revenge. [3] As that which would now be his utter ruin; for he endeavours to make him despair of ever recovering his throne again.

II. See how patient and submissive David was under this abuse. The sons of Zeruiah, Abishai particularly, resented the affront keenly, as well they might: Why should this dead dog be suffered to curse the king? v. 9. If David will but give them leave, they will put these lying cursing lips to silence, and take off his head. But the king would by no means suffer it: What have I to do with you? So let him curse. Thus Christ rebuked the disciples who, in zeal for his honour, would have commanded fire from heaven on the town that affronted him, Luke ix. 55. Let us see with what considerations David quieted himself. 1. The chief thing that silenced him was that he had deserved this affliction. 2. He observes the hand of God in it: The Lord hath said unto him, Curse David (v. 10), and again, So let him curse, for the Lord hath bidden him, v. 11. As it was Shimei's sin, it was not from God, but from the devil and his own wicked heart. David looked above the instrument of his trouble to the supreme director, as Job, when the plunderers had stripped him, acknowledged, The Lord hath taken away. Nothing more proper to quiet a gracious soul under affliction than an eye to the hand of God in it. 3. He quiets himself under the less affliction with the consideration of the greater (v. 11): My son seeks my life, much more may this Benjamite. 4. He comforts himself with hopes that God would, in some way or other, bring good to him out of his affliction: The Lord will requite me good for his cursing. We may depend upon God as our paymaster, not only for our services, but for our sufferings. David, at length, is housed at Bahurim (v. 14), where he meets with refreshment and is hidden from this strife of tongues.

Absalom had notice sent him speedily by some of his friends at Jerusalem that David had withdrawn, and with what a small retinue he had gone; Absalom might take possession of Jerusalem when he pleased. Accordingly he came without delay (v. 15), extremely elevated, no doubt, with this success at first. The most celebrated politicians of that age were Ahithophel and Hushai. The former Absalom brings with him to Jerusalem (v. 15), the other meets him there (v. 16), so that he cannot but think himself sure of success. But miserable counsellors were they both; for,

I. Hushai would never counsel him to do wisely. He was really his enemy, and designed to betray him. 1. Hushai complimented him upon his accession to the throne, as if he had been abundantly satisfied in his title, and well pleased that he had come to the possession, v. 16. 2. Absalom was surprised to find him who was known to be David's intimate friend and confidant. 3. Hushai confirmed him in the belief that he was hearty for him. It was true, he loved his father; but he had had his day, and it was over; and why should he not love his successor as well? Thus he pretended to give reasons for a resolution he abhorred.

II. Ahithophel counselled him to do wickedly, and so did as effectually betray him as he did who was designedly false to him; for those that advise men to sin certainly advise them to their hurt; and that government which is founded in sin is founded in the sand.

1. It seems, Ahithophel was noted as a deep politician; his counsel was as if a man had enquired at the oracle of God, v. 23. Let us observe from this account of Ahithophel's fame for policy, (1) That many excel in worldly wisdom who are utterly destitute of heavenly grace, because those who set up for oracles themselves are apt to despise the oracles of God. (2) That frequently the greatest politicians act most foolishly for themselves.

2. His policy in this case defeated its own aim

(1) The wicked counsel Ahithophel gave [illegible] salom. Finding that David had left his [illegible] to keep the house, he advised him to [illegible] (v. 21), because it would give assura[illegible]

[1] That he was in good earnest in his pretensions. No doubt he resolved to make himself master of all that belonged to his predecessor when he began with his concubines. [2] That he was resolved never to make peace with his father upon any terms. Having drawn the sword, he did, by this provocation, throw away the scabbard, which would strengthen the hands of his party and keep them firmly to him. This was Ahithophel's cursed policy, which bespoke him rather an oracle of the devil than of God.

(2) Absalom's compliance with this counsel. It entirely suited his lewd and wicked mind, and he delayed not to put it in execution, v. 22. Yet, in this, the word of God was fulfilled in the letter of it: God had threatened, by Nathan, that, for defiling Bath-sheba, David should have his own wives publicly debauched (ch. xii. 11, 12), and some think that Ahithophel, in advising it, designed to be revenged on David for the injury done to Bath-sheba, who was his grand-daughter: for she was the daughter of Eliam (ch. xi. 3), who was the son of Ahithophel, ch. xxiii. 34.

CHAP. XVII

The contest between David and Absalom is now hastening towards a crisis. It must be determined by the sword. I. Absalom calls a council of war, in which Ahithophel urges despatch (ver. 1–4), but Hushai recommends deliberation (ver. 5–13); and Hushai's counsel is agreed to (ver. 14), for vexation at which Ahithophel hangs himself, ver. 23. II. Secret intelligence is sent to David (but with much difficulty) of their proceedings, ver. 15–21. III. David marches to the other side Jordan (ver. 22–24), and there his camp is victualled by some of his friends in that country, ver. 27–29. IV. Absalom and his forces march after him into the land of Gilead on the other side Jordan, ver. 25, 26.

Absalom is now in peaceable possession of Jerusalem; the palace-royal is his own. His good father reigned in Hebron, and only over the tribe of Judah, above seven years, and was not hasty to destroy his rival; his government was built upon a divine promise, and therefore he waited patiently in the meantime. But the young man, Absalom, not only hastens from Hebron to Jerusalem, but is impatient there till he has destroyed his father, and cannot be content with his throne till he has his life.

David and all that adhered to him must be cut off. None durst mention his personal merits, and the great services done to his country. None durst propose that his banishment should suffice. It is past dispute that David must be destroyed; all the question is how he may be destroyed.

I. Ahithophel advises that he be pursued immediately, this very night, with a flying army, that the king only be smitten and his forces dispersed, and then the people that were now for him would fall in with Absalom. Nothing could be more fatal to David than the taking of these measures. It was probable enough that upon a fierce attack, especially in the night, the small force he had would be put into confusion and disorder, and it would be an easy thing to smite the king only. Compare with this the plot of Caiaphas (that second Ahithophel) against the Son of David to crush his interest by destroying him. Let that one man die for the people, John xi. 50.

II. Hushai advises that they be not too hasty in pursuing David, but take time to draw up all their force against him, and to overpower him with numbers, as Ahithophel had advised to take him by surprise. Now Hushai, in giving this counsel, really intended to serve David and his interest, that he might have time to send him notice of his proceedings, and that David might gain time to gather an army and to remove into those countries beyond Jordan, in which, lying more remote, Absalom had probably least interest.

1. Absalom gave Hushai a fair invitation to advise him. All the elders of Israel approved of Ahithophel's counsel, yet God overruled the heart of Absalom not to proceed upon it, till he had consulted Hushai (v. 5): Let us hear what he saith.

2. Hushai gave very plausible reasons for what he said.

(1) He argued against Ahithophel's counsel, and undertook to show the danger of following his advice. [1] He insisted much upon it that David was a great soldier, a man of great conduct, courage, and experience, and not so weary and weak-handed as Ahithophel imagines. His retiring from Jerusalem must be imputed, not to his cowardice, but his prudence. [2] His attendants, though few, were mighty men (v. 8), valiant men (v. 10), men of celebrated bravery and versed in all the arts of war. [3] They were all exasperated against Absalom, who was the author of all this mischief, were chafed in their minds, and would fight with the utmost fury; there would be no standing before them, especially for such raw soldiers as Absalom's generally were. [4] He suggested that probably David and some of his men would lie in ambush, in some pit, or other close place, and fall upon Absalom's soldiers, and the defeat, though but of a small party, would dispirit all the rest, especially their own consciences at the same time accusing them of treason against one that, they were sure, was not only God's anointed, but a man after his own heart, v. 9.

(2) He offered his own advice, and gave his reasons; and, [1] He counselled that which he knew would gratify Absalom's proud vainglorious humour, though it would not be really serviceable to his interest. First, He advised that all Israel should be gathered together, that is, the militia of all the tribes. Secondly, He advised that Absalom go to battle in his own person, as if he looked upon him to be a better soldier than Ahithophel. [2] He counselled that which seemed to secure the success, at last, infallibly without running any hazard. For, if they could raise such vast numbers as they promised themselves, wherever they found David they could not fail to crush him. First, If in the field, they should cut off all his men with him, v. 12. Perhaps Absalom was better pleased with the design, of cutting off all the men that were with him, having a particular antipathy to some of David's friends. Thus Hushai gained his point by humouring his revenge, as well as his pride. Secondly, If in a city, they need not fear conquering him, for they should have hands enough, if occasion were, to draw the city itself into its river with ropes, v. 13.

(3) By all these arts, Hushai gained not only Absalom's approbation of his advice, but the unanimous concurrence of this great council of war; they all agreed that the counsel of Hushai was better than the counsel of Ahithophel, v. 14.

Hushai tells the priests what had passed in council, v. 15. But, it should seem, he was not sure but that yet Ahithophel's counsel might be followed, and was therefore jealous lest, if he made not the best of his way, the king would be swallowed up, and all the people that were with him, v. 16. Such strict guards did Absalom set upon all the avenues to Jerusalem that they had much ado to get this necessary intelligence to David. 1. The young priests that were to be the messengers were forced to retire secretly out of the city, by En-rogel. 2. Instructions were sent to them by a poor simple young woman, who probably went to that well under pretence of fetching water, v. 17. 3. Yet, by the vigilance of Absalom's spies, they were discovered, and information was brought to Absalom of their motions: A lad saw them and told him, v. 18. 4. They, being aware that they were discovered, sheltered themselves in a friend's house in Bahurim, where David had refreshed himself but just before, ch. xvi. 14. There they were happily hidden in a well, which now, in summer time, perhaps was dry, v. 18. The woman of the house very ingeniously covered the mouth of the well with a cloth, on which she spread corn to dry, so that the pursuers were not aware that there was a well; else they would have searched it, v. 19. Being thus preserved, they brought their intelligence very faithfully to David (v. 21), with this advice of his friends, that he should not delay to pass over Jordan, near to which, it seems, he now was.

I. The transporting of David and his forces over Jordan. He, and all that were with him, went over in the night, but none deserted him. Having got over Jordan, he marched many miles forward to Mahanaim, a Levites' city in the tribe of Gad. This city, which Ish-bosheth had made his royal city (ch. ii. 8), David now made his headquarters, v. 24. And now he had time to raise an army wherewith to oppose the rebels and give them a warm reception.

II. The death of Ahithophel, v. 23. He died by his own hands, felo de se—a suicide. He hanged himself for vexation that his counsel was not followed; for thereby, 1. He thought himself slighted, and an intolerable slur cast upon his reputation for wisdom. 2. He thought himself endangered and his life exposed. He concluded that, because his counsel was not followed, Absalom's cause would certainly miscarry, and then, whoever would find David's mercy, he concluded that he, who was the greatest criminal, and had particularly advised him to lie with his father's concubines, must be sacrificed to his justice. Now, as David had prayed, Ahithophel's counsel was turned into foolishness to himself.

III. Absalom's pursuit of his father. Not content that he had driven his good father to the utmost corner of his kingdom, he resolved to chase him out of the world. Absalom made one Amasa his general (v. 25), whose father was by birth Jether, an Ishmaelite (1 Chron. ii. 17), but by religion Ithra (as he is here called), an Israelite. Amasa was in the same relation to David that Joab was.

IV. The friends David met with in this distant country. Even Shobi, a younger brother of the royal family of the Ammonites, was kind to him, v. 27. We should, as we have opportunity, do good to all men, for he that watereth shall be watered also himself, when there is occasion. Machir, the son of Ammiel, was he that maintained Mephibosheth (ch. ix. 4), till David eased him of that charge, and is now repaid for it by that generous man, who, it seems, was the common patron of distressed princes. Barzillai we shall hear of again. These, compassionating David and his men, now that they were weary with a long march, brought him furniture for his house, beds and basins, and provision for his table, wheat and barley, &c., v. 28, 29. In token of their dutiful affection to him they brought in plenty of all that which he had occasion for. Let us learn hence to be generous and open-handed, according as our ability is, to all in distress. God sometimes makes up to his people that comfort from strangers which they are disappointed of in their own families.

CHAP. XVIII

This chapter puts a period to Absalom's rebellion and life, and so makes way for David to his throne again. I. David's preparations to engage the rebels, ver. 1–5. II. The total defeat of Absalom's party, ver. 6–8. III. The death of Absalom, and his burial, ver. 9–18. IV. The bringing of the tidings to David, who tarried at Mahanaim, ver. 19–32. V. His bitter lamentation for Absalom, ver. 33.

Verses 1–8

David raised an army here, and reinforcements were sent him from all the coasts of Israel, at least from the neighbouring tribes.

I. His army numbered and marshalled, v. 1, 2. Josephus says they were, in all, about 4,000. These he divided into regiments and companies, to each of which he appointed proper officers, and then disposed them, as is usual, into the right wing, the left wing, and the centre, two of which he committed to his two old experienced generals, Joab and Abishai, and the third to his new friend Ittai. Good order and good conduct may sometimes be as serviceable in an army as great numbers.

II. Himself over-persuaded not to go in person to the battle. David's true friends would not let him go, remembering what they had been told of Ahithophel's design to smite the king only. David showed his affection to them by being willing to venture with them (v. 2), and they showed theirs to him by opposing it. He might be more serviceable to them by tarrying in the city, with a reserve of his forces there, whence he might send them recruits. That may be a post of real service which yet is not a post of danger.

III. The charge he gave concerning Absalom, v. 5. When the army was drawn out, rank and file, Josephus says, he encouraged them, and prayed for them, but withal bade them all take heed of doing Absalom any hurt. Absalom would have David only smitten. David would have Absalom only spared. Each did his utmost, and showed how bad it is possible for a child to be to the best of fathers and how good it is possible for a father to be to the worst of children; as if it were designed to be a resemblance of man's wickedness towards God and God's mercy towards man. Deal gently with a traitor? Of all traitors, with a son? Must the cause of the quarrel be the motive of mercy? But was not this done in type of that immeasurable mercy of the true King and Redeemer of Israel, who prayed for his persecutors, for his murderers, Father, forgive them. Deal gently with them for my sake. When God sends an affliction to correct his children, it is with this charge, "Deal gently with them for my sake"; for he knows our frame.

IV. A complete victory gained over Absalom's forces. The battle was fought in the wood of Ephraim (v. 6), so called from some memorable action of the Ephraimites there, though it lay in the tribe of Gad. David thought fit to meet the enemy with his forces at some distance, before they came up to Mahanaim, lest he should bring that city into trouble which had so kindly sheltered him. The cause shall be decided by a pitched battle. Josephus represents the fight as very obstinate, but the rebels were at length totally routed and 20,000 of them slain, v. 7. Now they see what it is to take counsel against the Lord and his anointed, and to think of breaking his bands asunder. And that they might see that God fought against them, 1. They are conquered by a few, an army, in all probability, much inferior to theirs in number. 2. By that flight with which they hoped to save themselves they destroyed themselves. The pits and bogs, the stumps and thickets, and, as the Chaldee paraphrast understands it, the wild beasts of the wood, were probably the death of multitudes of the dispersed distracted Israelites.

Here is Absalom quite at a loss, at his wit's end first, and then at his life's end. Though they were forbidden to meddle with him, he durst not look them in the face; but, finding they were near him, he clapped spurs to his mule and made the best of his way, through thick and thin, and so rode headlong upon his own destruction.

I. He is hanged by the neck. Riding furiously, neck or nothing, under the thick boughs of a great oak which hung low and had never been cropped, either the twisted branches, or some one forked bough of the oak, caught hold of his head by his long hair, which had been so much his pride, and was now justly made a halter for him, and there he hung. His mule went away from under him, as if glad to get clear of such a burden. He hung between heaven and earth, as unworthy of either, as abandoned of both.

II. He is caught alive by one of the servants of David, who goes directly and tells Joab in what posture he found that arch-rebel, v. 10. Joab chides the man for not dispatching him (v. 11), the man, though zealous enough against Absalom, justified himself in not doing it. Those that love the treason hate the traitor. Joab could not deny this, nor blame the man for his caution.

III. He is so pitifully mangled as he hangs there, and receives his death in such a manner as to see all its terrors and feel all its pain. 1. Joab throws three darts into his body; while he broke the order of a too indulgent father, he did real service both to his king and country, and would have endangered the welfare of both if he had not done it. 2. Joab's young men, ten of them, smite him, before he is dispatched, v. 15. Joab hereupon sounds a retreat, v. 15. The danger is over, now that Absalom is slain; the people will soon return to their allegiance to David; and therefore no more blood shall be spilt.

IV. His body is disposed of disgracefully (v. 17, 18): They cast it into a great pit in the wood; they would not bring it to his father (for that circumstance would but have added to his grief), nor would they preserve it to be buried, but threw it into the next pit with indignation. Now where is the beauty he had been so proud of and for which he had been so much admired? Where are his aspiring projects, and the castles he had built in the air? His thoughts perish, and he with them. To aggravate the ignominy of Absalom's burial, the historian takes notice of a pillar he had erected in the valley of Kidron, near Jerusalem, to be a monument for himself (v. 18), at the foot of which, it is probable, he designed to be buried, What care do many people take about the disposal of their bodies, when they are dead, that have no care at all what shall become of their precious souls! Absalom had three sons (ch. xiv. 27), but, it seems, now he had none. His care was to have his name kept in remembrance, and it is so, to his everlasting dishonour.

I. How David was informed of it. He stayed behind at the city of Mahanaim. Absalom's scattered forces all made homeward towards Jordan, which was the contrary way from Mahanaim, so that his watchmen could not perceive how the battle went, till an express came on purpose to bring advice of the issue, which the king sat in the gate expecting to hear, v. 24.

1. Cushi was the man Joab ordered to carry the tidings (v. 21), an Ethiopian, so his name signifies, and some think that he was a black that waited on Joab.

2. Ahimaaz, the young priest (one of those who brought David intelligence of Absalom's motions, ch. xvii. 17), was very forward to be the messenger of these tidings. Thus he desired that he might have the pleasure and satisfaction of bringing the king, whom he loved, this good news. Joab knew David better than Ahimaaz did, and that the tidings of Absalom's death would spoil the acceptableness of all the rest; and he loves Ahimaaz too well to let him be the messenger of those tidings (v. 20). However, when Cushi was gone, Ahimaaz begged hard for leave to run after him, and with great importunity obtained it, v. 22, 23. Perhaps it was in tenderness to the king that he desired it. He knew he could get there before Cushi, and therefore was willing to prepare the king, by a vague and general report, for the plain truth which Cushi was ordered to tell him. If bad news must come, it is best that it come gradually, and will be the better borne.

3. They are both discovered by the watchman on the gate of Mahanaim, Ahimaaz first (v. 24), for, though Cushi had the lead, Ahimaaz soon outran him; but presently after Cushi appeared, v. 26. When he hears it is Ahimaaz he concludes he brings good news, v. 27. Ahimaaz, it seems, was so famous for running that he was known by it at a distance, and so eminently good that it is taken for granted, if he be the messenger, the news must needs be good.

4. Ahimaaz cries at a distance, "Peace, there is peace." And, when he comes near, he tells him the news more particularly, "They are all cut off that lifted up their hand against the king"; and, as became a priest, while he gives the king the joy of it, he gives God the glory of it. "Blessed be the Lord thy God, that has done this for thee, as thy God, pursuant to the promises made to uphold thy throne," ch. vii. 16. When he said this, he fell down upon his face, not only in reverence to the king, but in humble adoration of God, whose name he praised for this success. By directing David thus to give God thanks for his victory, he prepared him. The more our hearts are fixed and enlarged in thanksgiving to God for our mercies the better disposed we shall be to bear the afflictions mixed with them. Poor David is so much a father that he forgets he is a king, and therefore cannot rejoice in the news of a victory, till he know whether the young man Absalom be safe. Ahimaaz soon discerned, what Joab intimated to him, that the death of the king's son would make the tidings of the day very unwelcome. "When Joab sent the king's servant (namely, Cushi) and me thy servant, to bring the news, I saw a great tumult, but I have nothing to say about it. Cushi is better able to inform you than I am. I will not be the messenger of evil tidings; nor will I pretend to know that which I cannot give a perfect account of."

5. Cushi, the slow post, proves the sure one, and besides the confirmation of the news of the victory which Ahimaaz had brought—The Lord has avenged thee of all those that rose up against thee (v. 31)—he satisfied the king's enquiry concerning Absalom, v. 32. Is he safe? says David. "Yes," says Cushi, "he is safe in his grave"; but he tells the news so discreetly that, how unwelcome soever the message is, the messenger can have no blame. "The enemies of my lord the king, whoever they are, and all that rise against thee to do thee hurt, be as that young man is."

II. How David received the intelligence. He forgets all the joy of his deliverance, and is quite overwhelmed with the sorrowful tidings of Absalom's death, v. 33. "O my son Absalom! my son, my son Absalom! Would God I had died for thee. O Absalom! my son, my son!"

CHAP. XIX

We left David's army in triumph and yet David himself in tears: now here we have, I. His return to himself, by the persuasion of Joab, ver. 1–8. II. His return to his kingdom from his present banishment. 1. The men of Israel were forward of themselves to bring him back, ver. 9, 10. 2. The men of Judah were dealt with by David's agents to do it (ver. 11–14) and did it, ver. 15. III. At the king's coming over Jordan, Shimei's treason is pardoned (ver. 16–23), Mephibosheth's failure is excused (ver. 24–30), and Barzillai's kindness is thankfully owned, and recompensed to his son, ver. 31–39. IV. The men of Israel quarrelled with the men of Judah, for not calling them to the ceremony of the king's restoration.

Verses 1–8

Soon after the messengers had brought the news Joab and his victorious army followed.

I. What a disappointment it was to them to find the king in tears for Absalom's death, which they construed as a token of his displeasure against them for what they had done, whereas they expected him to have met them with joy and thanks for their good services: It was told Joab, v. 1. The report of it ran through the army (v. 2), how the king was grieved for his son. They were loth to blame the king, for whatever he did used to please them (ch. iii. 36), but they took it as a great mortification to them. Their victory was turned into mourning, v. 2. They stole into the city as men ashamed, v. 3. In compliment to their sovereign, they would not rejoice in that which they perceived so afflictive to him.

II. How plainly and vehemently Joab reproved David for this indiscreet management of himself in this critical juncture. David never more needed the hearts of his subjects than now. Joab magnifies the services of David's soldiers: "This day they have saved thy life. Thou hast shamed their faces." What can be more absurd than to love thy enemies and to hate thy friends? He advises him to present himself immediately at the head of his troops, to smile upon them, welcome them home, congratulate their success, and return them thanks for their services.

III. How prudently and mildly David took the reproof and counsel given him, v. 8. He shook off his grief, anointed his head, and washed his face, that he might not appear unto men to mourn, and then made his appearance in public in the gate, which was as the guildhall of the city. Hither the people flocked to him to congratulate his and their safety, and all was well.

It is strange that David did not immediately march back to Jerusalem. Could not he himself go back with the victorious army he had with him in Gilead? He could, but he would go back as a prince, with the consent and unanimous approbation of the people, and not as a conqueror forcing his way. He would go back in honour, and like himself, not at the head of his forces, but in the arms of his subjects; for the prince that has wisdom and goodness enough to make himself his people's darling, without doubt, looks greater and makes a much better figure than the prince that has strength enough to make himself his people's terror.

I. The men of Israel (that is, the ten tribes) were the first that talked of it, v. 9, 10. David had formerly helped them, had fought their battles, subdued their enemies, and done them much service, and therefore it was a shame that he should continue banished from their country who had been so great a benefactor to it. Absalom had now disappointed them. "We were foolishly sick of the cedar, and chose the branch to reign over us; but we have had enough of him: he is consumed, and we narrowly escaped being consumed with him. Let us therefore return to our allegiance, and think of bringing the king back." Perhaps this was all the strife among them, not a dispute whether the king should be brought back, or no (all agreed it was to be done), but whose fault it was that it was not done.

II. The men of Judah were not so forward as the rest. David had intelligence of the good disposition of all the rest towards him, but nothing from Judah. David would not return till he knew the sense of his own tribe. That his way home might be the more clear, 1. He employed Zadok and Abiathar, the two chief priests, to treat with the elders of Judah, and to excite them to give the king an invitation back to his house, even to his house, which was the glory of their tribe, v. 11, 12. Perhaps they were so sensible of the greatness of the provocation they had given to David, by joining with Absalom, that they were afraid to bring him back, despairing of his favour; he therefore warrants his agents to assure them of it, with this reason: "You are my brethren, my bone and my flesh, and therefore I cannot be severe with you." 2. He particularly courted into his interest Amasa, who had been Absalom's general, but was his own nephew as well as Joab, v. 13. He owns him for his kinsman, and promises him that, if he will appear for him now, he will make him captain-general of all his forces in the room of Joab. But, if David did wisely for himself in designating Amasa for this post (Joab having now grown intolerably haughty), he did not do kindly by Amasa in letting his design be known, for it occasioned his death by Joab's hand, ch. xx. 10. 3. The point was hereby gained. He bowed the heart of the men of Judah to pass a vote for the recall of the king, v. 14. God's providence, by the priests' persuasions and Amasa's interest, brought them to this resolve. David stirred not till he received this invitation, and then he came as far back as Jordan, at which river they were to meet him, v. 15.

David, in his flight, remembered God particularly from the land of Jordan (Ps. xlii. 6), and now that land, more than any other, was graced with the glories of his return. David's soldiers furnished themselves with accommodations for their passage over this river, but, for his own family, a ferry-boat was sent on purpose, v. 18. Two remarkable persons met him on the banks of Jordan, both of whom had abused him wretchedly when he was in his flight.

I. Ziba, who by accusing his master had obtained from the king a grant of his estate, ch. xvi. 4, imposing upon his credulity, to draw him in to do a thing so unkind to the son of his friend Jonathan. He comes now to meet the king (v. 17), that he may obtain favour, and so come off the better when Mephibosheth shall shortly undeceive him, and clear himself, v. 26.

II. Shimei, who had railed at him, and cursed him, ch. xvi. 5, thinks it his interest to make his peace with him. Shimei, to recommend himself to the king, 1. Came with good company, with the men of Judah. 2. He brought a regiment of the men of Benjamin with him, offering his own and their service to the king. 3. What he did he hastened to do. He did it publicly. The offence was public, therefore the submission ought to be so. He owns his crime: Thy servant doth know that I have sinned. He begs the king's pardon: Let not the king impute iniquity to thy servant, that is, deal with me as I deserve. A motion made for judgment against him (v. 21) was made by Abishai, who would have ventured his life to have been the death of Shimei when he was cursing, ch. xvi. 9. David rejected Abishai's motion with displeasure: What have I to do with you, you sons of Zeruiah? The less we have to do with those who are of an angry revengeful spirit, and who put us upon doing what is harsh and rigorous, the better. It is the glory of kings to forgive those that humble and surrender themselves: Satis est prostrâsse leoni—It suffices the lion that he has laid his victim prostrate. His joy inclined him to forgive. Yet this was not all; his experience of God's mercy in restoring him to his kingdom, his exclusion from which he attributed to his sin, inclined him to show mercy to Shimei. Shemei hereupon had his pardon signed and sealed with an oath.

The day of David's return was a day of bringing to remembrance. Among other things, after the case of Shimei, that of Mephibosheth comes to be enquired into, and he himself brings it on.

I. He went down in the crowd to meet the king (v. 24), and, as a proof of the sincerity of his joy in the king's return, we are here told what a true mourner he was for the king's banishment. He was never trimmed, nor put on clean linen, but wholly neglected himself, as one abandoned to grief for the king's affliction and the kingdom's misery.

II. When the king came to Jerusalem he made his appearance before him (v. 25); and when the king asked him why he, being one of his family, had stayed behind, and not accompanied him in his exile, he opened his case fully to the king. 1. He complained of Ziba, his servant, who should have been his friend, but had been in two ways his enemy; for, first, he had hindered him from going along with the king, by taking the ass himself which he was ordered to make ready for his master (v. 26), basely taking advantage of his lameness and his inability to help himself; and, secondly, he had accused him to David of a design to usurp the government, v. 27. 2. He gratefully acknowledged the king's great kindness to him when he and all his father's house lay at the king's mercy, v. 28. 3. He referred his cause to the king's pleasure, depending on the king's wisdom, and his ability to discern between truth and falsehood, and disclaiming all pretensions of his own merit.

III. David hereupon recalls the sequestration of Mephibosheth's estate; being deceived in his grant, he revokes it, and confirms his former settlement of it: "I have said, Thou and Ziba divide the land (v. 29), that is, Let it be as I first ordered it (ch. ix. 10); the property shall still be vested in thee, but Ziba shall have the occupancy: he shall till the land, paying thee a rent." Thus Mephibosheth is where he was; no harm is done, only Ziba goes away unpunished for his false and malicious information against his master.

IV. Mephibosheth drowns all his cares about his estate in his joy for the king's return (v. 30): "Yea, let him take all, the presence and favour of the king shall be to me instead of all."

Barzillai, the Gileadite, who had a noble seat at Rogelim, not far from Mahanaim, was the man who, of all the nobility and gentry of that country, had been most kind to David in his distress. If Absalom had prevailed, it is likely he would have suffered for his loyalty; but now he and his shall be no losers by it.

I. Barzillai's great respect to David as his rightful sovereign: He provided him with much sustenance, for himself and his family, while he lay at Mahanaim, v. 32. God had given him a large estate, for he was a very great man, and, it seems, he had a large heart to do good with it: what else but that is a large estate good for?

II. The kind invitation David gave him to court (v. 33): Come thou over with me. He invited him, 1. That he might have the pleasure of his company and the benefit of his counsel. 2. That he might have an opportunity of returning his kindness: "I will feed thee with me."

III. Barzillai's reply to this invitation, wherein,

1. He admires the king's generosity in making him this offer, lessening his service, and magnifying the king's return for it.

2. He declines accepting the invitation. He begs his majesty's pardon for refusing so generous an offer: but, (1) He is old, and unfit to remove at all, especially to court. (2) He is dying, and must begin to think of his long journey, his removal out of the world, v. 37.

3. He desires the king to be kind to his son Chimham: Let him go over with my lord the king, and have preferment at court. What favour is done to him Barzillai will take as done to himself.

IV. David's farewell to Barzillai. 1. He sends him back into his country with a kiss and a blessing (v. 39), signifying that in gratitude for his kindness he would love him and pray for him, and with a promise that whatever request he should at any time make to him he would be ready to oblige him (v. 38): Whatsoever thou shalt think of, when thou comest home to ask of me, that will I do for thee. 2. He takes Chimham forward with him, and leaves it to Barzillai to choose him his preferment: I will do to him what shall seem good to thee, v. 38. And, it should seem, Barzillai begged a country seat for him near Jerusalem, for, long after, we read of a place near Beth-lehem, David's city, which is called the habitation of Chimham, allotted to him, probably, not out of the crown-lands or the forfeited estates, but out of David's paternal estate.

David came over Jordan attended and assisted only by the men of Judah; but when he had advanced as far as Gilgal, the first stage on this side Jordan, half the people of Israel (that is, of their elders and great men) had come to kiss his hand, but found they came too late to witness the solemnity of his first entrance. This occasioned a quarrel between them and the men of Judah, and the beginning of further mischief. Here is, 1. The complaint which the men of Israel brought to the king against the men of Judah (v. 41), that they had performed the ceremony of bringing the king over Jordan, and not given them notice, as if they were not so well affected to the king, whereas the king himself knew that they had spoken of it before the men of Judah thought of it, v. 11. 2. The excuse which the men of Judah made for themselves, v. 42. (1) They plead relation to the king: "He is near of kin to us", and therefore in a matter of mere ceremony, as this was, we may claim precedency. (2) They deny the insinuated charge of self-seeking in what they had done: "Have we eaten at all of the king's cost? No, we have all borne our own charges. Hath he given us any gift? No, we have no design to engross the advantages of his return; you have come time enough to share in them." 3. The men of Israel's vindication of their charge, v. 43. They pleaded, "We have ten parts in the king" (Judah having Simeon only, whose lot lay within his, to join with him), "and therefore it is a slight upon us that our advice was not asked about bringing back the king."

CHAP. XX

No sooner is one of David's troubles over than another arises, I. Before he reaches Jerusalem a new rebellion is raised by Sheba, ver. 1, 2. II. His first work, when he comes to Jerusalem, is to condemn his concubines to perpetual imprisonment, ver. 3. III. Amasa, whom he entrusts to raise an army against Sheba, is too slow in his motions, which puts him into a fright, ver. 4–6. IV. One of his generals barbarously murders the other, when they are taking the field, ver. 7–13. V. Sheba is at length shut up in the city of Abel (ver. 14, 15), but the citizens deliver him up to Joab, and so his rebellion is crushed, ver. 16–22. The chapter concludes with a short account of David's great officers, ver. 23–26.

David, in the midst of his triumphs, has to see his kingdom disturbed and his family disgraced.

1. His subjects revolting from him at the instigation of a man of Belial, whom they followed when they forsook the man after God's own heart. We must not think it strange, while we are in this world, if the end of one trouble be the beginning of another. A broken bone, when it is set, must have time to knit. The ringleader of this rebellion was Sheba, a Benjamite by birth (v. 1), who had his habitation in Mount Ephraim, v. 21. Shimei and he were both of Saul's tribe, and both retained the ancient grudge of that house. The occasion of it was that foolish quarrel, which we read of in the close of the foregoing chapter, between the elders of Israel and the elders of Judah, about bringing the king back. "If the king will suffer himself to be engrossed by the men of Judah, let him and them make their best of one another, and we will set up one for ourselves." This was proclaimed by Sheba (v. 1), who probably was a man of note, and had been active in Absalom's rebellion; the disgusted Israelites took the hint, and went up from after David to follow Sheba (v. 2). The perverting of words is the subverting of peace; and much mischief is made by forcing invidious constructions upon what is said and written and drawing consequences that were never intended. The men of Judah said, The king is near of kin to us. "By this," say the men of Israel, "you mean that we have no part in him"; whereas they meant no such thing.

II. His concubines imprisoned for life, and he himself under a necessity of putting them in confinement, because they had been defiled by Absalom, v. 3. Those whom he had loved must now be loathed.

We have here Amasa's fall just as he began to rise. He had been Absalom's general, and came over into David's interest, upon a promise that he should be general of his forces instead of Joab.

I. Amasa has a commission to raise forces for the suppressing of Sheba's rebellion, and is ordered to raise them with all possible expedition, v. 4. Amasa is sent to assemble the men of Judah within three days; but he finds them so backward and unready that he cannot do it within the time appointed (v. 5).

II. Upon Amasa's delay, Abishai, the brother of Joab, is ordered to take the guards and standing forces, and with them to pursue Sheba (v. 6, 7), for nothing could be of more dangerous consequence than to give him time. David gives these orders to Abishai, because he resolves to mortify Joab. Joab, without orders, though in disgrace, goes along with his brother.

III. Joab, near Gibeon, meets with Amasa, and barbarously murders him, v. 8–10. 1. He did subtilely, and with contrivance, and not upon a sudden provocation. He girded his coat about him, that it might not hang in his way, and girded his belt upon his coat, that his sword might be the readier to his hand; he also put his sword in a sheath too big for it, that, whenever he pleased, it might, upon a little shake, fall out, as if it fell by accident, and so he might take it into his hand, unsuspected, as if he were going to return it into the scabbard. 2. He did it treacherously, and under pretence of friendship, that Amasa might not be upon his guard. He called him brother. 3. He did it impudently, not in a corner, but at the head of his troops. He did it in contempt and defiance of David and the commission he had given to Amasa.

IV. Joab immediately resumes his general's place, and takes care to lead the army on in pursuit of Sheba. He knew how many favoured him rather than Amasa, who had been a traitor. What man of Judah would not be for his old king and his old general? But one would wonder with what face a murderer could pursue a traitor. Care is taken to remove the dead body out of the way, and to cover it with a cloth, v. 12, 13. Wicked men think themselves safe in their wickedness if they can but conceal it from the eye of the world: if it be hidden, it is with them as if it were never done.

I. The rebel, when he had rambled over all the tribes of Israel, and found them not so willing, upon second thoughts, to follow him, at length entered Abel-Beth-maacah, a strong city in the north. His adherents were mostly Berites, of Beeroth in Benjamin, v. 14.

II. Joab drew up all his force against the city, besieged it, battered the wall, and made it almost ready for a general storm, v. 15.

III. A discreet good woman of the city of Abel brings this matter to a good issue, so as to satisfy Joab and yet save the city.

1. Her treaty with Joab by which he is engaged to raise the siege, upon condition that Sheba be delivered up. It seems, none of all the men of Abel offered to treat with Joab. But this one woman with her wisdom saved the city. Souls know no difference of sex. Though the man be the head, it does not therefore follow that he has the monopoly of the brains, and therefore he ought not, by any salique law, to have the monopoly of the crown. Many a masculine heart, and more than masculine, has been found in a female breast; nor is the treasure of wisdom the less valuable for being lodged in the weaker vessel. In the treaty between this nameless heroine and Joab,

(1) She gains his audience and attention, v. 16, 17.

(2) She reasons with him on behalf of her city, and very ingeniously. [1] That it was a city famous for wisdom (v. 18), as we translate it. [2] That the inhabitants were generally peaceable and faithful in Israel, v. 19. [3] That it was a mother in Israel, a guide and nurse to the towns and country about; and that it was a part of the inheritance of the Lord. [4] That they expected him to offer them peace before he made an attack upon them, according to that known law of war, Deut. xx. 10.

(3) Joab and Abel's advocate soon agree that Sheba's head shall be the ransom of the city. "Our quarrel is not with your city. Our quarrel is only with the traitor that is harboured among you; deliver him up, and we have done." A great deal of mischief would be prevented if contending parties would but understand one another. The single condition of peace is the surrender of the traitor. It is so in God's dealings with the soul, when it is besieged by conviction and distress: sin is the traitor; the beloved lust is the rebel; part with that, cast away the transgression, and all shall be well.

2. Her treaty with the citizens. She went to them in her wisdom and persuaded them to cut off Sheba's head. Joab hereupon raised the siege, and marched back to Jerusalem, with the trophies rather of peace than victory.

Verses 23–26

Here is an account of the state of David's court after his restoration. Joab retained the office of general. Benaiah, as before, was captain of the guards. Here is one new office erected, that of treasurer or one over the tribute, for it was not till towards the latter end of his time that David began to raise taxes.

CHAP. XXI

The date of the events of this chapter is uncertain. I incline to think that they happened as they are here placed, after Absalom's and Sheba's rebellion, and towards the latter end of David's reign. The people were numbered just after the three years' famine for the Gibeonites, for that which is threatened as "three" years' famine (1 Chron. xxi. 12) is called "seven" years (2 Sam. xxiv. 12, 13), three more, with the year current, added to those three. We have here. I. The Gibeonites avenged, 1. By a famine in the land, ver. 1. 2. By the putting of seven of Saul's posterity to death (ver. 2–9), care, however, being taken of their dead bodies, and of the bones of Saul, ver. 10–14. II. The giants of the Philistines slain in several battles, ver. 15–22.

Verses 1–9

I. The injury which Saul had, long before this, done to the Gibeonites. The Gibeonites were of the remnant of the Amorites (v. 2), who by a stratagem had made peace with Israel, and had the public faith pledged to them, Joshua ix., where it was agreed (v. 23) that they should have their lives secured, but be deprived of their lands and liberties, that they and theirs should be tenants in villainage to Israel. Saul, under colour of zeal for the honour of Israel, that it might not be said that they had any of the natives among them, aimed to root them out, and, in order to do that, slew many of them. It may be, he designed, by this severity towards the Gibeonites, to atone for his clemency towards the Amalekites. That which made this an exceedingly sinful sin was that he not only shed innocent blood, but therein violated the solemn oath by which the nation was bound to protect them.

II. We find the nation of Israel chastised with a sore famine, long after, for this sin of Saul. 1. Even in the land of Israel, that fruitful land, and in the reign of David, that glorious reign, there was a famine, great drought, and scarcity of provisions, the consequence of it, for three years together. 2. David enquired of God concerning it. Though he was himself a prophet, he must consult the oracle, and know God's mind in his own appointed way. 3. God was ready in his answer, though David was slow in his enquiries: It is for Saul. Time does not wear out the guilt of sin; nor can we build hopes of impunity upon the delay of judgments.

III. We have vengeance taken upon the house of Saul for the turning away of God's wrath from the land, which, at present, smarted for his sin.

1. David, probably by divine direction, referred it to the Gibeonites themselves to prescribe what satisfaction should be given them for the wrong that had been done them, v. 3.

2. They desired that seven of Saul's posterity might be put to death, and David granted their demand. (1) They required no silver, nor gold, v. 4. The Gibeonites had now a fair opportunity to get a discharge from their servitude. But they did not insist on this; though the covenant was broken on the other side, it should not be broken on theirs. They were Nethinim, given to God and his people Israel, and they would not seem weary of the service. (2) They required no lives but of Saul's family. (3) They would not impose it upon David to do this execution: Thou shalt not for us kill any man (v. 4), but we will do it ourselves, we will hang them up unto the Lord (v. 6), that, if there were any hardship in it, they might bear the blame, and not David or his house. (4) They did not require this out of malice against Saul or his family (had they been revengeful, they would have moved it themselves long before), but out of love to the people of Israel, whom they saw plagued for the injury done to them. (5) The nomination of the persons they left to David, who took care to secure Mephibosheth for Jonathan's sake, that, while he was avenging the breach of one oath, he might not himself break another (v. 7). (6) The place, time, and manner, of their execution, all added to the solemnity of their being sacrificed to divine justice. [1] They were hanged up, as anathemas, under a peculiar mark of God's displeasure; for the law had said, He that is hanged is accursed of God, Deut. xxi. 23; Gal. iii. 13. [2] They were hanged up in Gibeah of Saul (v. 6), to show that it was for his sin that they died.

Verses 10–14

I. Saul's sons not only hanged, but hanged in chains, their dead bodies left hanging, and exposed, till the judgment ceased, which their death was to turn away, by the sending of rain upon the land. They died as sacrifices, and thus they were, in a manner, offered up, not consumed all at once by fire, but gradually by the air.

II. Their dead bodies watched by Rizpah, the mother of two of them, v. 10. It was a great affliction to her, now in her old age, to see her two sons, who, we may suppose, had been a comfort to her, and were likely to be the support of her declining years, cut off in this dreadful manner. None know what sorrows they are reserved for. She may not see them decently interred, but they shall be decently attended. She attempts not to violate the sentence passed upon them, that they should hang there till God sent rain; she neither steals nor forces away their dead bodies, though the divine law might have been cited to bear her out; but she patiently submits, pitches a tent of sackcloth near the gibbets, where, with her servants and friends, she protects the dead bodies from birds and beasts of prey. Thus she let the world know that her sons died, not for any sin of their own, not as stubborn and rebellious sons. But they died for their father's sin, and therefore her mind could not be alienated from them by their hard fate. Though there is no remedy, but they must die, yet they shall die pitied and lamented.

III. The solemn interment of their dead bodies, with the bones of Saul and Jonathan, in the burying-place of their family. David was so far from being displeased at what Rizpah had done that he was himself stirred up by it to do honour to the house of Saul, and to these branches of it among the rest; thus it appeared that it was not out of any personal disgust to the family that he delivered them up, but that he was obliged to do it for the public good. 1. He now bethought himself of removing the bodies of Saul and Jonathan from the place where the men of Jabesh-Gilead had decently, but privately and obscurely, interred them, under a tree, 1 Sam. xxxi. 12, 13. 2. With them he buried the bodies of those that were hanged; for, when God's anger was turned away, they were no longer to be looked upon as a curse, v. 13, 14. When water dropped upon them out of heaven (v. 10), that is, when God sent rain to water the earth, they were taken down, for then it appeared that God was entreated for the land.

The story of some conflicts with the Philistines, which happened, as it should seem, in the latter end of David's reign. Though he had so subdued them that they could not bring any great numbers into the field, yet, as long as they had any giants among them to be their champions, they took all occasions to disturb the peace of Israel.

I. David himself was engaged with one of the giants. The Philistines began the war yet again, v. 15. David, though old, desired not a writ of ease from the public service, but he went down in person to fight against the Philistines. But he found age had cut his hair, and, after a little toil, he waxed faint. His body could not keep pace with his mind. The champion of the Philistines was soon aware of his advantage, perceived that David's strength failed him, and, being himself strong and well-armed, he thought to slay David; but God was not in his thoughts, and therefore in that very day they all perished. David was rescued by Abishai, who came seasonably in to his relief, v. 17. When Abishai succoured him, gave him a cordial, it may be, to relieve his fainting spirits, or appeared as his second, he (namely, David, so I understand it) smote the Philistine and killed him; for it is said (v. 22) that David had himself a hand in slaying the giants. David fainted, but he did not flee; though his strength failed him, he bravely kept his ground, and then God sent him this help in the time of need. Christ, in his agonies, was strengthened by an angel. In spiritual conflicts, even strong saints sometimes wax faint; then Satan attacks them furiously; but those that stand their ground and resist him shall be relieved, and made more than conquerors.

II. The rest of the giants fell by the hand of David's servants. 1. Saph was slain by Sibbechai, one of David's worthies, v. 18. 1 Chron. xi. 29. 2. Another, who was brother to Goliath, was slain by Elhanan, who is mentioned ch. xxiii. 24. 3. Another, who was of very unusual bulk, who had more fingers and toes than other people (v. 20), and such an unparalleled insolence that, though he had seen the fall of other giants, yet he defied Israel, was slain by Jonathan the son of Shimea. Shimea had one son named Jonadab (2 Sam. xiii. 3), whom I should have taken for the same with this Jonathan, but that the former was noted for subtlety, the latter for bravery. These giants were probably the remains of the sons of Anak, who, though long feared, fell at last. It is folly for the strong man to glory in his strength. David's servants were no bigger nor stronger than other men; yet thus, by divine assistance, they mastered one giant after another. The most powerful enemies are often reserved for the last conflict. David began his glory with the conquest of one giant, and here concludes it with the conquest of four. Death is a Christian's last enemy, and a son of Anak; but, through him that triumphed for us, we hope to be more than conquerors at last, even over that enemy.

CHAP. XXII

This chapter is a psalm, a psalm of praise; we find it afterwards inserted among David's psalms (Ps. xviii) with some little variation. We have it here as it was first composed for his own harp; but there we have it as it was afterwards delivered to the chief musician for the service of the church. The inspired historian, having largely related David's deliverances in this and the foregoing book, and one particularly in the close of the foregoing chapter, thought fit to record this sacred poem as a memorial of all that had been before related. Some think that David penned this psalm when he was old, upon a general review of the mercies of his life and the many wonderful preservations God had blessed him with, from first to last. We should, in our praises, look as far back as we can, and not suffer time to wear out the sense of God's favours. 1. The title of the psalm, ver. 1. II. The psalm itself, in which, 1. He gives glory to God. 2. He takes comfort in him; and he finds matter for both, (1) In the experience he had of God's former favours. (2) In the expectations he had of his further favours.

Verse 1

I. It has often been the lot of God's people to have many enemies, and to be in imminent danger of falling into their hands. David was a man after God's heart, but not after men's heart: many were those that hated him, and sought his ruin. Let not those whom God loves marvel if the world hate them.

II. Those that trust God in the way of duty shall find him a present help to them in their greatest dangers. We shall never be delivered from all our enemies till we get to heaven; and to that heavenly kingdom God will preserve all that are his, 2 Tim. iv. 18.

III. Those that have received many signal mercies from God ought to give him the glory of them. Every new mercy in our hand should put a new song into our mouth, even praises to our God.

IV. We ought to be speedy in our thankful returns to God: In the day that God delivered him he sang this song.

Verses 2–51

I. How David adores God, and gives him the glory of his infinite perfections. There is none like him, nor any to be compared with him (v. 32): Who is God, save the Lord? All others that are adored as deities are counterfeits and pretenders. Who is a rock, save our God? They are dead, but the Lord liveth, v. 47. God will finish his work, and his word is tried, and what we may trust.

II. How he triumphs in the interest he has in this God, and his relation to him, which he lays down as the foundation of all the benefits he has received from him: He is my God; as such he cries to him (v. 7), and cleaves to him (v. 22); "and, if my God, then my rock" (v. 2), that is "my strength and my power (v. 33), the rock under which I take shelter, the rock on which I build my hope," v. 3. Whatever is my strength and support, he is the God of the rock of my salvation (v. 47). David often hid himself in a rock (1 Sam. xxiv. 2), but God was his chief hiding-place. "He is my fortress, in which I am safe and think myself so—my high tower, or stronghold, in which I am out of the reach of real evils—the tower of salvation (v. 51), which can never be scaled, nor battered, nor undermined. Salvation itself saves me. Christ is spoken of as the horn of salvation in the house of David, Luke i. 69. "Am I burdened, and ready to sink? The Lord is my stay (v. 19), by whom I am supported. Am I in the dark, benighted, at a loss? Thou art my lamp, O Lord! to show me my way, and thou wilt dispel my darkness," v. 29. If we sincerely take the Lord for our God, all this, and much more, he will be to us, all we need and can desire.

III. What improvement he makes of his interest in God. If he be mine, 1. In him will I trust (v. 3). 2. On him I will call (v. 4), for he is worthy to be praised. 3. To him will I give thanks (v. 50), and that publicly.

IV. The full account he gives to others, of the great things God had done for him. This takes up most of the song. He gives God the glory both of his deliverances and of his successes.

1. He magnifies the great salvations God had wrought for him. To magnify the salvation, he observes,

(1) That the danger was very great and threatening out of which he was delivered. Men rose up against him (v. 40, 49) that hated him (v. 41), a violent man (v. 49), namely, Saul, who was malicious and vigorous in his pursuit. This is expressed figuratively, v. 5, 6. So violently did the waves of death beat upon him, so strongly did the cords and snares of death hold him, that he could not help himself, any more than a man in the grave can.

(2) That his deliverance was an answer to prayer, v. 7. He has here left us a good example, when we are in distress, to cry unto God with importunity, as children in a fright cry to their parents.

(3) That God appeared in a singular and extraordinary manner for him and against his enemies. The expressions are borrowed from the descent of the divine Majesty upon Mount Sinai, v. 8, 9, &c.

(4) That God manifested his particular favour and kindness to him in these deliverances (v. 20). He delivered me, because he delighted in me. The deliverance came not from common providence, but covenant-love. Herein he was a type of Christ, whom God upheld because he delighted in him, Isa. xlii. 1, 2.

2. He magnifies the great successes God had crowned him with. He had not only preserved but prospered him. He was blessed, (1) With liberty and enlargement. He was brought into a large place (v. 20). (2) With military skill, and strength, and swiftness. Though he was bred up to the crook, he was well instructed in the arts of war and qualified for the toils and perils of it. God, having called him to fight his battles, qualified him for the service. (3) With victory over his enemies, not only Saul and Absalom, but the Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, Syrians, and other neighbouring nations, whom he subdued and made tributaries to Israel. His wonderful victories are here described, v. 38–43. (4) With advancement to honour and power. God made his way perfect (v. 33), gave him success in all his undertakings, set him upon his high places (v. 34), denoting both safety and dignity. God's gentleness, his grace and tender mercy, made him great (v. 36).

V. The comfortable reflections he makes upon his own integrity, which God, by those wonderful deliverances, had graciously owned and witnessed to, v. 21–25. He means especially his integrity with reference to Saul and Ish-bosheth, Absalom and Sheba, and those who either opposed his coming to the crown or endeavoured to dethrone him. They falsely accused him and misrepresented him, but he had the testimony of his conscience for him that he was not an ambitious aspiring man, a false and bloody man, as they called him. His conscience witnessed for him, 1. That he had made the word of God his rule, and had kept to it, v. 32. Wherever he was, God's judgments were before him as his guide; whithersoever he went, he took his religion along with him. 2. That he had carefully avoided the by-paths of sin. He had not wickedly departed from his God. He could not say but that he had taken some false steps, but he had not deserted God, nor forsaken his way. Sins of infirmity he could not acquit himself from, but the grace of God had kept him from presumptuous sins. David reflected with more comfort upon his victories over his own iniquity than upon his conquest of Goliath and all the hosts of the uncircumcised Philistines. If a great man be a good man, his goodness will be much more his satisfaction than his greatness.

VI. The comfortable prospects he has of God's further favour. As he looks back, so he looks forward, with pleasure, and assures himself of the kindness God has in store for all the saints, for himself, and also for his seed.

1. For all good people, v. 26–28. He takes occasion here to lay down God's procedure with the children of men:

(1) That he will do good to those that are upright in their hearts. [1] God's mercy and grace will be the joy of those that are merciful and gracious. [2] God's uprightness, his justice and faithfulness, will be the joy of those that are upright, just, and faithful, both towards God and man. [3] God's purity and holiness will be the joy of those that are pure and holy. On the other hand,

(2) That those who turn aside to crooked ways he will lead forth with the workers of iniquity, as he says in another psalm.

2. For himself. He foresaw that his conquests and kingdom would be yet further enlarged, v. 45, 46.

3. For his seed: He showeth mercy to his Messiah (v. 51). not only to David himself, but to that seed of his for evermore. David was himself anointed of God, therefore he doubted not but God would show mercy to him, that mercy which he had promised not to take from him nor from his posterity (ch. vii. 15, 16); on that promise he depends, with an eye to Christ, who alone is his seed for evermore, whose throne and kingdom still continue, and will to the end. Thus all his joys and all his hopes terminate, as ours should, in the great Redeemer.

CHAP. XXIII

The historian is now drawing towards a conclusion of David's reign, and gives an account here, I. Of some of his last words, which seem to have reference to his seed, spoken of in the foregoing chapter, ver. 1–7. II. Of the great men that were employed under him, the first three (ver. 8–17), two of the next three (ver. 18–23), and then the thirty, ver. 24–29.

Verses 1–7

The last will and testament of king David, after he had settled the crown upon Solomon and his treasures upon the temple which was to be built.

I. He is described, 1. By the meanness of his origin: He was the son of Jesse. 2. The height of his elevation: He was raised up on high, as one favoured of God, and designed for something great, raised up as a prince, and as a prophet, to see further; for, (1) He was the anointed of the God of Jacob, and so was serviceable to the people of God in their civil interests, the protection of their country and the administration of justice among them. (2) He was the sweet psalmist of Israel, and so was serviceable to them in their religious exercises.

II. It is an account of his communion with God.

1. What God said to him both for his direction and for his encouragement as a king, and to be, in like manner, of use to his successors.

(1) Who spoke: The Spirit of the Lord, the God of Israel, and the Rock of Israel, which some think is an intimation of the Trinity of persons in the Godhead—the Father the God of Israel, the Son the Rock of Israel, and the Spirit proceeding from the Father and the Son, who spoke by the prophets, and particularly by David. David here avows his divine inspiration, that in his psalms, and in this composition, The Spirit of God spoke by him. This puts an honour upon the book of Psalms, and recommends them to our use in our devotions, that they are words which the Holy Ghost teaches.

(2) What was spoken. Here seems to be a distinction made between what the Spirit of God spoke by David, which includes all his psalms, and what the Rock of Israel spoke to David, which concerned himself and his family. Those whose office it is to teach others their duty must be sure to learn and do their own. Now that which is here said (v. 3, 4) may be considered, [1] With application to David, and his royal family. And so here is, First, The duty of magistrates enjoined them. When a king was spoken to from God he was not to be complimented with the height of his dignity and the extent of his power, but to be told his duty. He must be just, ruling in the fear of God; and so must all inferior magistrates in their places. Let rulers remember that they rule over men—not over beasts. They rule over men that have their follies and infirmities, and therefore must be borne with. It is not enough that they do no wrong, but they must not suffer wrong to be done. They must rule in the fear of God. They must also endeavour to promote the fear of God (that is, the practice of religion) among those over whom they rule. He that rules in the fear of God shall be as the light of the morning, v. 4. Light is sweet and pleasant, and he that does his duty shall have the comfort of it; his rejoicing will be the testimony of his conscience. Light is bright, and a good prince is illustrious; his justice and piety will be his honour. Light is a blessing, nor are there any greater and more extensive blessings to the public than princes that rule in the fear of God. As the light of the morning, which is most welcome after the darkness of the night. See Is. lxviii, 8, which were also some of the last words of David, and seem to refer to those recorded here. [2] With application to Christ, the Son of David, and then it must all be taken as a prophecy, and the original will bear it: There shall be a ruler among men, or over men, that shall be just, and shall rule in the fear of God, that is, shall order the affairs of religion and divine worship according to his Father's will; and he shall be as the light of the morning, &c., for he is the light of the world, and as the tender grass, for he is the branch of the Lord, and the fruit of the earth, Isa. iv. 2. God, by the Spirit, gave David the foresight of this, to comfort him under the many calamities of his family and the melancholy prospects he had of the degeneracy of his seed.

2. What comfortable use he made of this which God spoke to him, and what were his devout meditations on it, by way of reply, v. 5.

(1) Trouble supposed: Although my house be not so with God, and although he make it not to grow. David's family was not so with God as is described (v. 3, 4), and as he could wish, not so good, not so happy; it had not been so while he lived; he foresaw it would not be so when he was gone, that his house would be neither so pious nor so prosperous as one might have expected the offspring of such a father to be. This was what David's heart was upon concerning his children, that they might be right with God, faithful to him and zealous for him.

(2) Comfort ensured: Yet he hath made with me an everlasting covenant. Whatever trouble a child of God may have the prospect of, still he has some comfort or other to balance it (2. Cor. iv. 8, 9). God has made a covenant of grace with us in Jesus Christ, and we are here told, First, That it is an everlasting covenant, from everlasting in the contrivance and counsel of it, and to everlasting in the continuance and consequences of it. Secondly, That it is ordered, well ordered in all things, admirably well, to advance the glory of God and the honour of the Mediator, together with the holiness and comfort of believers. Thirdly, That the promised mercies are sure on the performance of the conditions. Fourthly, That it is all our salvation. Nothing but this will save us, and this is sufficient: it is this only upon which our salvation depends. Fifthly, That therefore it must be all our desire.

3. Here is the doom of the sons of Belial read, v. 6, 7. They shall be thrust away as thorns—rejected, abandoned. Now this is intended, [1] As a direction to magistrates to use their power for the punishing and suppressing of wickedness. Let them thrust away the sons of Belial; see Ps. ci. 8. Or, [2] As a caution to magistrates, and particularly to David's sons and successors, to see that they be not themselves sons of Belial (as too many of them were), for then neither the dignity of their place nor their relation to David would secure them from being thrust away by the righteous judgments of God.

Verses 8–38

I. The catalogue which his historian has here left upon record of the great soldiers that were in David's time is intended, 1. For the honour of David, who trained them up in the arts and exercises of war, and set them an example of conduct and courage. 2. For the honour of those worthies themselves, who were instrumental to bring David to the crown, settle and protect him in the throne, and enlarge his conquests. 3. To excite those that come after to a generous emulation. 4. To show how much religion contributes to the inspiring of men with true courage. David, both by his psalms and by his offerings for the service of the temple, greatly promoted piety among the grandees of the kingdom (1 Chron. xxix. 6), and, when they became famous for piety, they became famous for bravery.

II. Now these mighty men are here divided into three ranks:

1. The first three, who had done the greatest exploits and thereby gained the greatest reputation—Adino (v. 8), Eleazar (v. 9, 10), and Shammah (v. 11, 12). The exploits of this brave triumvirate are here recorded. They signalized themselves in the wars of Israel against their enemies, especially the Philistines. (1) Adino slew 800 at once with his spear. (2) Eleazar defied the Philistines, as they by Goliath, had defied Israel, but with better success and greater bravery: for when the men of Israel had gone away, he not only kept his ground, but arose, and smote the Philistines, on whom God struck a terror equal to the courage with which this great hero was inspired. His hand was weary, and yet it clave to his sword; as long as he had any strength remaining he held his weapon and followed his blow. Thus, in the service of God, we should keep up the willingness and resolution of the spirit, notwithstanding the weakness and weariness of the flesh—faint, yet pursuing (Judg. viii. 4), the hand weary, yet not quitting the sword. (3) Shammah met with a party of the enemy, that were foraging, and routed them, v. 11, 12. But observe, both concerning this exploit and the former, it is here said, The Lord wrought a great victory.

2. The next three were distinguished from, and dignified above, the thirty, but attained not to the first three, v. 23. Of this second triumvirate two only are named, Abishai and Benaiah, whom we have often met with in the story of David.

(1) A brave action of these three in conjunction. They attended David in his troubles in the cave of Adullam (v. 13), suffered with him, and therefore were afterwards preferred by him. When David and his brave men who attended him, who had acted so vigorously against the Philistines, were driven to shelter themselves in caves and strongholds, the Philistines put a garrison even in Bethlehem itself, v. 13, 14. [1] How earnestly David longed for the water of the well of Bethlehem. It was harvest-time; the weather was hot; he was thirsty; perhaps good water was scarce, and therefore he earnestly wished, "O that I could but have one draught of the water of the well of Bethlehem!" With the water of that well he had often refreshed himself when he was a youth. Other water might quench his thirst as well, but he had a fancy for that above any. [2] How bravely his three mighty men, Abishai, Benaiah, and another not named, ventured through the camp of the Philistines, upon the very mouth of danger, and fetched water from the well of Bethlehem, without David's knowledge, v. 16. How much they valued their prince, and with what pleasure they could run the greatest hazards and undergo the greatest hardships in his service! And shall not we covet to approve ourselves to our Lord Jesus by a ready compliance with every intimation of his will given us by his word, Spirit, and providence? How little they feared the Philistines! [3] How self-denyingly David, when he had this far-fetched dear-bought water, poured it out before the Lord, v. 17. Thus he would cross his own foolish fancy, and punish himself for entertaining and indulging it. Thus he would honour God and give glory to him. The water purchased at this rate he thought too precious for his own drinking and fit only to be poured out to God as a drink-offering. Bishop Patrick speaks of some who think that David hereby showed that it was not material water he longed for, but the Messiah, who had the water of life, who, he knew, should be born at Bethlehem, which the Philistines therefore should not be able to destroy.

(2) The brave actions of two of them on other occasions. Abishai slew 300 men at once, v. 18, 19. Benaiah did many great things. [1] He slew two Moabites that were lion-like men, so bold and strong, so fierce and furious. [2] He slew a lion in a pit, either in his own defence, as Samson, or perhaps in kindness to the country, a lion that had done mischief. It being in a time of snow, he was more stiff and the lion more fierce and ravenous, and yet he mastered him. [3] He slew an Egyptian, on what occasion it is not said; he was well armed, but Benaiah attacked him with no other weapon than a walking staff, dexterously wrested his spear out of his hand, and slew him with it, v. 21. For these and similar exploits David preferred him to be captain of the life-guard or standing forces, v. 23.

3. Inferior to the second three, but of great note, were the thirty-one here mentioned by name, v. 24, &c. The surnames here given them are taken, as it should seem, from the places of their birth or habitation, as many surnames with us originally were. From all parts of the nation, the most wise and valiant were picked up to serve the king. Several of those who are here named we find captains of the twelve courses which David appointed, one for each month in the year, 1 Chron. xxvii.

Christ, the Son of David, has his worthies too, who, like David's, are influenced by his example, fight his battles against the spiritual enemies of his kingdom, and in his strength are more than conquerors. Christ's apostles were his immediate attendants, did and suffered great things for him, and at length came to reign with him. They are mentioned with honour in the New Testament, as these in the Old, especially, Rev. xxi. 14. Nay, all the good soldiers of Jesus Christ have their names better preserved than even these worthies have; for they are written in heaven.

CHAP. XXIV

The last words of David were good, but in this chapter we read of some of his last works, which were none of the best; yet he repented, and so finished well. We have here, I. His sin, which was numbering the people in the pride of his heart, ver. 1–9. II. His conviction of the sin, and repentance for it, ver. 10. III. The judgment inflicted upon him for it, ver. 11–15. IV. The staying of the judgment, ver. 16, 17. V. The erecting of an altar in token of God's reconciliation to him and his people, ver. 18–25.

Verses 1–9

I. The orders which David gave to Joab to number the people of Israel and Judah, v. 1, 2. Two things here seem strange:—1. The sinfulness of this. What harm was there in it? (1) Some think the fault was that he numbered those that were under twenty years old if they were but of stature and strength able to bear arms, and that this was the reason why this account was not enrolled, because it was illegal, 1 Chron. xxvii. 23, 24. (2) Others think the fault was that he did not require the half-shekel, which was to be paid for the service of the sanctuary whenever the people were numbered, as a ransom for their souls, Exod. xxx. 12. (3) Others think that he did it with a design to impose a tribute upon them for himself, to be put into his treasury. But nothing of this appears, nor was David ever a raiser of taxes. (4) This was the fault, that he had no orders from God to do it. (5) Some think that it was an affront to the ancient promise which God made to Abraham, that his seed should be innumerable as the dust of the earth; it savoured of distrust of that promise. (6) That which was the worst thing in numbering the people was that David did it in the pride of his heart, which was Hezekiah's sin in showing his treasures to the ambassadors. [1] It was a proud conceit of his own greatness in having the command of so numerous a people. [2] It was a proud confidence in his own strength. By publishing among the nations the number of his people, he thought to appear the more formidable.

2. The spring from which it is here said to arise is yet more strange, v. 1. It is not strange that the anger of the Lord should be kindled against Israel. But that, in this displeasure, he should move David to number the people is very strange. We are sure that God is not the author of sin; he tempts no man: we are told (1 Chron. xxi. 1) that Satan provoked David to number Israel. Satan, as an enemy, suggested it for a sin, as he put it into the heart of Judas to betray Christ. God, as righteous Judge, permitted it, with a design, from this sin of David, that princes may from these instances learn, when the judgments of God are abroad, to suspect that their sins are the ground of the controversy, and may therefore repent and reform themselves.

II. The opposition which Joab made to these orders. Even he was aware of David's folly and vain-glory in this design. There was no occasion to tax them, nor to enlist them, nor to make any distribution of them. They were all easy and happy; and Joab wished both that their number might increase and that the king, though old, might live to see their increase, and have the satisfaction of it. "But why doth my lord the king delight in this thing? What need is there of doing it?" Pauperis est numerare pecus—Leave it to the poor to count their flocks. Joab was aware of David's vanity herein, but he himself was not.

III. The orders executed notwithstanding. The king's word prevailed, v. 4. Joab, according to order, applied himself with some reluctancy to this unpleasing task, and took the captains of the host to help him. The sum total was, at length, brought to the king at Jerusalem, v. 9. Whether the numbers answered David's expectation or no we are not told, nor whether the account fed his pride or mortified it.

I. Here is David's penitent reflection upon and confession of his sin in numbering the people. When the account was finished and laid before him, that very night his conscience was awakened. 1. He was convinced of his sin: His heart smote him before the prophet came to him (I think it should not be read for (v. 11), but and when David was up, so it is in the original), his conscience showed him the evil of what he had done. 2. He confessed it to God and begged earnestly for the forgiveness of it. He owned that he had done foolishly, very foolishly, because he had done it in the pride of his heart.

II. The just and necessary correction which he suffered for this sin, David had been full of tossings to and fro all night under the sense of his sin, and he arose in the morning designing to speak with Gad his seer concerning it. God directed the prophet Gad what to say to him (v. 11),

1. Three things are taken for granted, (1) That David must be corrected for his fault. Of the seven things that God hates, pride is the first, Prov. vi. 17. (2) The punishment must answer to the sin. (3) It must be such a punishment as the people must have a large share in, for God's anger was kindled against Israel, v. 1. Though it was David's sin that immediately opened the sluice, the sins of the people all contributed to the deluge.

2. As to the punishment that must be inflicted,

(1) David is told to choose what rod he will be beaten with, v. 12, 13. His heavenly Father must correct him, but, to show that he does not do it willingly, he gives David leave to make choice whether it shall be by war, famine, or pestilence, that he might the more patiently bear the rod when it was a rod of his own choosing. The prophet bids him advise with himself, and then tell him what answer he should return to him that sent him.

(2) He objects only against the judgments of the sword, and, for the other two, he refers the matter to God, but intimates his choice of the pestilence (v. 14). [1] He begs that he may not fall into the hand of man. [2] He casts himself upon God: Let us fall now into the hand of the Lord, for his mercies are great. David refers it to God which of these shall be the scourge, and God chooses the shortest, that he may the sooner testify his being reconciled. But some think that David, by these words, intimates his choice of the pestilence. That is a judgment to which David himself, and his own family, lie as open as the meanest subject, but not so either to famine or sword, and therefore David, tenderly conscious of his guilt, chooses that. But David, a penitent, dares cast himself into God's hand, knowing he shall find that his mercies are great. Good men, even when they are under God's frowns, yet will entertain no other than good thoughts of him. Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him.

(3) A pestilence is accordingly sent (v. 15), which lasted from morning to the third day (so Mr. Poole), or only to the evening of the first day, the time appointed for the evening sacrifice, so Bishop Patrick and others.

III. God's gracious relaxation of the judgment, when it began to be inflicted upon Jerusalem (v. 16): The angel stretched out his hand upon Jerusalem. Perhaps there was more wickedness, especially more pride (and that was the sin now chastised), in Jerusalem than elsewhere, therefore the hand of the destroyer is stretched out upon that; but then the Lord repented him of the evil, and said to the destroying angel, It is enough; stay now thy hand, and let mercy rejoice against judgment. This was on Mount Moriah. Dr. Lightfoot observes that in the very place where Abraham, by a countermand from heaven, was stayed from slaying his son, this angel, by a like countermand, was stayed from destroying Jerusalem.

IV. David's renewed repentance for his sin upon this occasion, v. 17. He saw the angel (God opening his eyes for that purpose), saw his sword stretched out to destroy, a flaming sword, saw him ready to sheath it upon the orders given him to stay proceedings; seeing all this, he spoke to the Lord, and said, Lo, I have sinned. How he criminates himself, as if he could never speak ill enough of his own fault: "I have sinned, and I have done wickedly; mine is the crime, and therefore on me be the cross." How he intercedes for the people, whose bitter lamentations made his heart to ache, and his ears to tingle: These sheep, what have they done? Let this remind us of the grace of our Lord Jesus, who gave himself for our sins and was willing that God's hand should be against him, that we might escape. The shepherd was smitten that the sheep might be spared.

I. A command sent to David to erect an altar in the place where he saw the angel, v. 18. This was to intimate to David, 1. That God was now thoroughly reconciled to him; for, if the Lord had been pleased to kill him, he would not have accepted an offering, and therefore would not have ordered him to build an altar. God's encouraging us to offer to him spiritual sacrifices is evidence of his reconciling us to himself. 2. That peace is made between God and sinners by sacrifice, even by Christ the great propitiation, of whom all the legal sacrifices were types. 3. That when God's judgments are graciously stayed we ought to acknowledge it with thankfulness to his praise.

II. The purchase which David made of the ground. It seems the owner was a Jebusite, Araunah by name, proselyted no doubt to the Jewish religion, though by birth a Gentile, and therefore allowed, not only to dwell among the Israelites, but to have a possession of his own in a city, Lev. xxv. 29, 30. The piece of ground was a threshing-floor, a mean place, yet thus dignified—a place of labour, therefore thus dignified.

1. David went in person to the owner, to treat with him. See his justice, that he would not so much as use this place though the proprietor was an alien, though he himself was a king, and though he had express orders from God to rear an altar there, till he had bought it and paid for it. God hates robbery for burnt-offering. See his humility, though a king, he went himself (v. 19), and lost no honour by it. Araunah, when he saw him, bowed himself to the ground before him, v. 20. Great men will never be the less respected for their humility, but the more.

2. Araunah, when he understood his business (v. 21), generously offered him, not only the ground to build his altar on, but oxen for sacrifices, and other things that might be of use to him in the service (v. 22), and all this gratis, and a good prayer into the bargain: The Lord thy God accept thee! This he did, (1) Because he had a generous spirit with a great estate. He gave as a king (v. 23); though an ordinary subject, he had the spirit of a prince. In the Hebrew it is, He gave, even the king to the king, whence it is supposed that Araunah had been king of the Jebusites in that place. (2) Because he highly esteemed David, though his conqueror. (3) Because he had an affection for Israel, and earnestly desired that the plague might be stayed; and the honour of its being stayed at his threshing-floor, he would account a valuable consideration.

3. David resolved to pay the full value of it, and did so, v. 24. He will not offer that to God which costs him nothing. He thanked him, paid him fifty shekels of silver for the floor and the oxen for the present service, and afterwards 600 shekels of gold for the ground adjoining, to build the temple on.

III. The building of the altar, and the offering of the proper sacrifices upon it (v. 25), burnt-offerings to the glory of God's justice and peace-offerings to the glory of his mercy.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE FIRST BOOK OF KINGS

The Bible began with the story of patriarchs, and prophets, and judges, men whose converse with heaven was more immediate, the record of which strengthens our faith, but is not so easily accommodated to our case, now that we expect not visions, as the subsequent history of affairs like ours under the direction of common providence; and here also we find, though not many types and figures of the Messiah, yet great expectations of him; for not only prophets, but kings, desired to see the great mysteries of the gospel, Luke x. 24.—The two books of Samuel are introductions to the books of the Kings, as they relate the origin of the royal government in Saul and of the royal family in David. These two books give us an account of David's successor, Solomon, the division of his kingdom, and the succession of the several kings both of Judah and Israel, with an abstract of their history down to the captivity. And as from the book of Genesis we may collect excellent rules of economics, for the good governing of families, so from these books we may collect rules of politics, for the directing of public affairs. There is in these books special regard had to the house and lineage of David, from which Christ came. Some of his sons trod in his steps, and others did not. The characters of the kings of Judah may be thus briefly given:—David the devout, Solomon the wise, Rehoboam the simple, Abijah the valiant, Asa the upright, Jehoshaphat the religious, Jehoram the wicked, Ahaziah the profane, Joash the backslider, Amaziah the rash, Uzziah the mighty, Jotham the peaceable, Ahaz the idolater, Hezekiah the reformer, Manasseh the penitent, Amon the obscure, Josiah the tender-hearted, Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah, all wicked, and such as brought ruin quickly on themselves and their kingdom. The number of the good and bad is nearly equal, but the reigns of the good were generally long and those of the bad short. In this first book we have, I. The death of David, ch. i. and ii. II. The glorious reign of Solomon, and his building the temple (ch. iii.–x.), but the cloud his sun set under, ch. xi. III. The division of the kingdoms in Rehoboam, and his reign and Jeroboam's, ch. xii.–xiv. IV. The reigns of Abijah and Asa over Judah, Baasha and Omri over Israel, ch. xv. and xvi. V. Elijah's miracles, ch. xvii.–xix. VI. Ahab's success against Benhadad, his wickedness and fall, ch. xx.–xxii. And in all this history it appears that kings, though gods to us, are men to God, mortal and accountable.

CHAP. I

In this chapter we have, I. David declining in his health, ver. 1–4. II. Adonijah aspiring to the kingdom, ver. 5–10. III. Nathan and Bath-sheba contriving to secure the succession to Solomon, and prevailing for an order from David for that purpose, ver. 11–31. IV. The anointing of Solomon accordingly, and the people's joy therein, ver. 32–40. V. The effectual stop this put to Adonijah's usurpation, and the dispersion of his party, ver. 41–49. VI. Solomon's dismission of Adonijah upon his good behaviour, ver. 50–53.

Verses 1–4

David under the infirmities of old age. 1. It would have troubled one to see David so infirm. He was old, and his natural heat was so wasted that no clothes could keep him warm, v. 1. 2. It would have troubled one to see his physicians so weak and unskilful that they knew no other way of relieving him than by outward applications. They covered him with clothes, which where there is any inward heat, will keep it in, and so increase it; but, where it is not, they have none to communicate, no, not even royal clothing. They foolishly prescribed nuptials. His prophets should have been consulted as well as his physicians in an affair of this nature. That Abishag was married to David before she lay with him, and was his secondary wife, appears from its being imputed as a great crime to Adonijah that he desired to marry her (ch. ii. 22) after his father's death.

Verses 5–10

David had much affliction in his children. Amnon and Absalom had both been his grief; the one his first-born, the other his third, 2 Sam. iii. 2, 3. His second, whom he had by Abigail, we will suppose he had comfort in; his fourth was Adonijah (2 Sam. iii. 4) born in Hebron. He was a comely person, next in age, and (as it proved) next in temper, to Absalom, v. 6. In his father's eyes he had been a jewel, but was now a thorn.

I. His father had made a fondling of him, v. 6. He had not displeased him at any time. It was the son's fault that he was displeased at reproof whereby he lost the benefit of it; and it was the father's fault that, because he saw it displeased him, he did not reprove him; and now he justly smarted for indulging him.

II. He, in return, made a fool of his father. Because he was old, and confined to his bed, he exalted himself, and said, I will be king, v. 5. 1. He looked upon the days of mourning for his father to be at hand, and therefore he prepared to succeed him, though he knew that by the designation both of God and David Solomon was to be the man, 1 Chron. xxii. 9; xxiii. 1. 2. He looked upon his father as superannuated and good for nothing, and therefore he entered immediately upon the possession of the throne. His father is not fit to govern, for he is old and past ruling; nor Solomon, for he is young, and not yet able to rule; and therefore Adonijah will take the government upon him. 3. In pursuance of this ambitious project, (1) He got a great retinue (v. 5), chariots and horsemen, both for state and strength, to wait on him, and to fight for him. (2) He made great interest with no less than Joab, the general of the army, and Abiathar the high priest, v. 7. They were old men, who had been faithful to David in the most difficult and troublesome of his times, men of sense and experience, who, one would think, would not easily be wheedled. But God, in this matter, left them to themselves, perhaps to correct them for some former misconduct with a scourge of their own making. We are told (v. 8) who those were that were of such approved fidelity to David that Adonijah had not the confidence so much as to propose his project to them—Zadok, Benaiah, and Nathan. (3) He prepared a great entertainment (v. 9) at En-rogel, not far from Jerusalem; his guests were the king's sons, and the king's servants, whom he feasted and caressed to bring them over to his party; but Solomon was not invited, either because he despised him or because he despaired of him, v. 10. Some think that Adonijah slew these sheep and oxen, even fat ones, for sacrifice, and that it was a religious feast he made, beginning his usurpation with a show of devotion which he might do the more plausibly when he had the high priest himself on his side.

The effectual endeavours that were used by Nathan and Bath-sheba to obtain from David a ratification of Solomon's succession, for the crushing of Adonijah's usurpation. 1. David himself knew not what was doing. 2. Bath-sheba lived retired, and knew nothing of it either, till Nathan informed her. 3. Solomon, it is likely, knew of it, but was as a deaf man that heard not. Though he had years, and wisdom above his years, yet we do not find that he stirred to oppose Adonijah, but quietly composed himself and left it to God and his friends to order the matter. How then is the design brought about?

I. Nathan the prophet alarms Bath-sheba by acquainting her with the case, and puts her in a way to get an order from the king for the confirming of Solomon's title. He was concerned, because he knew God's mind, and David's and Israel's interest; it was by him that God had named Solomon Jedidiah (2 Sam. xii. 25), and therefore he could not sit still and see the throne usurped, which he knew was Solomon's right by the will of him from whom promotion cometh. Nathan applied to Bath-sheba, as one that had the greatest concern for Solomon, and could have the freest access to David. He informed her of Adonijah's attempt (v. 11), and that it was not with David's consent or knowledge. He suggested to her that not only Solomon was in danger of losing the crown, but that he and she too were in danger of losing their lives if Adonijah prevailed. Now, says Nathan, let me give thee counsel how to save thy own life and the life of thy son, v. 12. He directs her (v. 13) to go to the king, to remind him of his word and oath, that Solomon should be his successor; and to ask him in the most humble manner, Why doth Adonijah reign? He thought David was not so cold but this would warm him. Conscience, as well as a sense of honour, would put life into him upon such an occasion as this; and he promised (v. 14) that, while she was reasoning with the king upon this matter, he would come in and second her, as if he came accidentally.

II. Bath-sheba, according to Nathan's advice and direction, loses no time, but immediately makes her application to the king, to intercede for her life. She knew she should be welcome at any time. Her address to the king, on this occasion, is very discreet. 1. She reminded him of his promise made to her, and confirmed with a solemn oath, that Solomon should succeed him, v. 17. She knew how fast this would hold such a conscientious man as David was. 2. She informed him of Adonijah's attempt, which he was ignorant of (v. 18). She told him who were Adonijah's guests, and who were in his interest, and added, but "Solomon thy servant has he not called," which plainly shows he looks upon him as his rival, and aims to undermine him, v. 19. 3. She pleads that it is very much in his power to obviate this mischief (v. 20): The eyes of all Israel are upon thee, not only as a king, but as a prophet. All Israel knew that David was not only himself the anointed of the God of Jacob, but that the Spirit of the Lord spoke by him (2 Sam. xxiii. 1, 2), and therefore waiting for and depending upon a divine designation, in a matter of such importance, David's word would be an oracle and a law to them. 4. She suggested the imminent peril which she and her son would be in if this matter was not settled in David's lifetime, v. 21.

III. Nathan the prophet, according to his promise, seasonably stepped in, and seconded her, while she was speaking, before the king had given his answer. The king is told that Nathan the prophet has come, and he is sure to be always welcome to the king. He bowed himself with his face to the ground, v. 23. He deals a little more plainly with the king than Bath-sheba had done. 1. He makes the same representation of Adonijah's attempt as Bathsheba had made (v. 25, 26), adding that his party had already got to such a height of assurance as to shout, God save king Adonijah, as if king David were already dead. They had not invited him to their feast (Me thy servant has he not called), thereby intimating that they resolved not to consult either God or David in the matter. 2. He makes David sensible how much he was concerned to clear himself from having a hand in it: Hast thou said, Adonijah shall reign after me? (v. 24), and again (v. 27): Is this thing done by my lord the king? If it be, he is not so faithful either to God's word or to his own as we all took him to be; if it be not, it is high time that we witness against the usurpation, and declare Solomon his successor." Thus he endeavoured to incense David against them, that he might act the more vigorously for the support of Solomon's interest.

IV. David, hereupon, made a solemn declaration of his firm adherence to his former resolution, that Solomon should be his successor. Bath-sheba is called in (v. 28), and to her, as acting for and on behalf of her son, the king gives these fresh assurances. 1. He repeats his former promise and oath, owns that he had sworn unto her by the Lord God of Israel that Solomon should reign after him, v. 30. 2. He ratifies it with another, because the occasion called for it: As the Lord liveth, that hath redeemed my soul out of all distress, even so will I certainly do this day, without dispute, without delay. His form of swearing seems to be what he commonly used on solemn occasions, for we find it in 2 Sam. iv. 9. And it carries in it a grateful acknowledgment of the goodness of God to him. Perhaps he speaks thus, on this occasion, for the encouragement of his son and successor to trust in God in the distresses he also might meet with.

V. Bath-sheba receives these assurances (v. 31), with hearty good wishes for the king's health: Let him live. So far was she from thinking that he lived too long that she prayed he might live for ever, if it were possible, to adorn the crown he wore and to be a blessing to his people.

Verses 32–40

The effectual care David took both to secure Solomon's right and to preserve the public peace, by crushing Adonijah's project.

I. The express orders he gave for the proclaiming of Solomon. The persons he entrusted with this affair were Zadok, Nathan, and Benaiah, men of power and interest whom David had always found faithful to him. David orders them forthwith, with all possible solemnity, to proclaim Solomon. They must take with them the servants of their lord, the lifeguards, and all the servants of the household. They must set Solomon on the mule the king used to ride. 1. Zadok and Nathan, the two ecclesiastical persons, must, in God's name, anoint him king. 2. The great officers, civil and military, are ordered to give public notice of this, and to express the public joy upon this occasion by sound of trumpet, by which the law of Moses directed the gracing of great solemnities; to this must be added the acclamations of the people: "Let king Solomon live." 3. They must then bring him in state to the city of David, and he must sit upon the throne of his father, as his viceroy, to despatch public business during his weakness and be his successor after his death: He shall be king in my stead. It would be a great satisfaction to David himself, and to all parties concerned, to have this done immediately, that upon the demise of the king there might be no dispute, or agitation, in the public affairs.

II. The great satisfaction which Benaiah, in the name of the rest, professed in these orders. The king said, "Solomon shall reign for me, and reign after me." "Amen" (says Benaiah heartily); "as the king says, so say we; and since we can bring nothing to pass without the concurrence of a propitious providence, The Lord God of my lord the king say so too!" v. 36. This is the language of his faith in that promise of God on which Solomon's government was founded. To this he adds a prayer for Solomon (v. 37), that God would be with him as he had been with David, and make his throne greater. He knew David was not one of those that envy their children's greatness, and that therefore he would not be disquieted at this prayer, nor take it as an affront, but would heartily say Amen to it.

III. The immediate execution of these orders, v. 38–40. No time was lost, but Solomon was brought in state to the place appointed, and there Zadok anointed him by the direction of Nathan the prophet and David the king, v. 39. In the tabernacle, where the ark was now lodged, was kept, among other sacred things, the holy oil for many religious services, thence Zadok took a horn of oil, which denotes both power and plenty and therewith anointed Solomon. The people, hereupon, express their great joy and satisfaction in the elevation of Solomon, surround him with their Hosannas—God save king Solomon, and attend him with their music and shouts of joy, v. 40.

I. The tidings of Solomon's inauguration brought to Adonijah and his party, in the midst of their jollity: They had made an end of eating, and, it should seem, it was a great while before they made an end, for all the affair of Solomon's anointing was ordered and finished while they were at dinner, glutting themselves. When they made an end of eating, and were preparing themselves to proclaim their king, and bring him in triumph into the city, they heard the sound of the trumpet (v. 41). Joab was an old man, and was alarmed at it, but Adonijah was very confident that the messenger, being a worthy man, brought good tidings, v. 42. "Verily, the best tidings I have to bring you is that Solomon is made king, so that your pretensions are all quashed." He relates to them, 1. With what great solemnity Solomon was made king (v. 44, 45), and that he was now sitting on the throne of the kingdom, v. 46. 2. With what general satisfaction Solomon was made king. The people were pleased. The courtiers were pleased: The king's servants attended him with an address of congratulation upon this occasion, v. 47. They blessed king David. They also prayed for Solomon, that God would make his name better than his father's, which it might well be when he had his father's foundation to build upon. A child, on a giant's shoulders, is higher than the giant himself. The king himself was pleased: He bowed himself upon the bed, not only to signify his acceptance of his servants' address, but to offer up his own address to God (v. 48).

II. The effectual crush which this gave to Adonijah's attempt. It spoiled the sport of his party, dispersed the company, and obliged every man to shift for his own safety.

III. The terror Adonijah himself was in and the course he took to secure himself. He had despised Solomon as not worthy to be his guest (v. 10), but now he dreads him as his judge: He feared because of Solomon. He took hold on the horns of the altar, which was always looked upon as a sanctuary or place of refuge (Exod. xxi. 14), intimating hereby that he durst not stand a trial, but threw himself upon the mercy of his prince, in suing for which he relied upon no other plea than the mercy of God, which was manifested in the institution and acceptance of the sacrifices that were offered on that altar and the remission of sin thereupon.

IV. His humble address to Solomon for mercy. By those who brought Solomon tidings where he was, he sent a request for his life (v. 15): Let king Solomon swear to me that he will not slay his servant.

V. The orders Solomon gave concerning him. He discharged him upon his good behaviour, v. 52, 53. He considered that Adonijah was his brother, and that it was the first offence. Thus the Son of David receives those to mercy that have been rebellious: if they will return to their allegiance, and be faithful to their Sovereign, their former crimes shall not be mentioned against them; but, if still they continue in the interests of the world and the flesh, this will be their ruin.

CHAP. II

I. The conclusion of David's reign with his life, 1. The charge he gives to Solomon upon his death-bed, in general, to serve God (ver. 1–4), in particular, concerning Joab, Barzillai, and Shimei, ver. 5–9. 2. His death and burial, and the years of his reign, ver. 10, 11. II. The beginning of Solomon's reign, ver. 12. Though he was to be a prince of peace, he began his reign with some remarkable acts of justice, 1. Upon Adonijah, whom he put to death for his aspiring pretensions, ver. 13–25. 2. Upon Abiathar, whom he deposed from the high priesthood for siding with Adonijah, ver. 26, 27. 3. Upon Joab, whom he put to death for his late treasons and former murders, ver. 28–35. 4. Upon Shimei, whom, for cursing David, he confined to Jerusalem (ver. 36–38), and three years after, for transgressing the rules, put to death, ver. 39–46.

David, that great and good man, is here a dying man (v. 1), and a dead man, v. 10. It is well there is another life after this, for death stains all the glory of this, and lays it in the dust.

I. The charge and instructions which David, when he was dying, gave to Solomon, his son and declared successor. He feels himself declining, and is not backward to own it, I go the way of all the earth, v. 2. Heb. I am walking in it. Death is a way; not only a period of this life, but a passage to a better. Even the sons and heirs of heaven must go the way of all the earth, they must needs die; but they walk with pleasure in this way, through the valley of the shadow of death, Ps. xxiii. 4. Prophets, and even kings, must go this way to brighter light and honour than prophecy or sovereignty. David is going this way, and therefore gives Solomon directions what to do.

1. He charges him, in general, to keep God's commandments and to make conscience of his duty, v. 2–4. He prescribes to him, (1) A good rule to act by—the divine will: "Govern thyself by that." David's charge to him is to keep the charge of the Lord his God. (2) A good spirit to act with: Be strong and show thyself a man, though in years but a child. (3) Good reasons for all this. That the Lord may continue and so confirm his word which he spoke concerning me. Let each, in his own age, successively, keep God's charge, and then God will be sure to continue his word. We never let fall the promise till we let fall the precept. God had promised David that the Messiah should come from his loins, and that promise was absolute: but the promise that there should not fail him a man on the throne of Israel was conditional —if his seed behave themselves, as they should. If Solomon, in his day, fulfil the condition, he does his part towards the perpetuating of the promise. The condition is that he walk before God in all his institutions, in sincerity, with zeal and resolution.

2. He gives him directions concerning some particular persons, what to do with them. (1) Concerning Joab, v. 5. David was now conscious to himself that he had not done well to spare him, when he had made himself once and again obnoxious to the law, by the murder of Abner first and afterwards of Amasa, both of them great men, captains of the hosts of Israel. He slew them treacherously (shed the blood of war in peace), and injuriously to David: Thou knowest what he did to me therein. It aggravated Joab's crime that he was neither ashamed of the sin nor afraid of the punishment, but daringly wore the girdle and shoes that were stained with innocent blood, in defiance of the justice both of God and the king. David refers him to Solomon's wisdom (v. 6), with an intimation that he left him to his justice. (2) Concerning Barzillai's family, to whom he orders him to be kind for Barzillai's sake, who, we may suppose, by this time, was dead, v. 7. The kindnesses we have received from our friends must not be buried either in their graves or ours, but our children must return them to theirs. (3) Concerning Shimei, v. 8, 9. He cursed me with a grievous curse; the more grievous because he insulted him when he was in misery and poured vinegar into his wounds. His case is left with Solomon as one that knew what was fit to be done and would do as he found occasion. His turbulent spirit will soon give thee an occasion, which thou shouldst not fail to take, for the bringing of his hoary head to the grave with blood. This proceeded not from personal revenge, but a prudent zeal for the honour of the government and the covenant God had made with his family, the contempt of which ought not to be unpunished.

II. David's death and burial (v. 10): He was buried in the city of David, not in the burying place of his father, as Saul was, but in his own city, which he was the founder of. There were set the thrones, and there the tombs, of the house of David. His epitaph may be taken from 2 Sam. xxiii. 1. Here lies David the son of Jesse, the man who was raised up on high, the anointed of the God of Jacob, and the sweet psalmist of Israel, adding his own words (Ps. xvi. 9), My flesh also shall rest in hope.

I. Solomon's accession to the throne, v. 12. He came to it much more easily and peaceably than David did, and much sooner saw his government established. It is happy for a kingdom when the end of one good reign is the beginning of another, as it was here.

II. His just and necessary removal of Adonijah his rival, in order to the establishment of his throne.

1. Adonijah's treasonable project, which was to marry Abishag, David's concubine, not because he was in love with her, but because, by her, he hoped to renew his claim to the crown, which might stand him in stead. Absalom thought his pretensions much supported by lying with his father's concubines. Adonijah flatters himself that if he may succeed him in his bed, especially with the best of his wives, he may by that means step up to succeed him in his throne.

2. The means he used to compass this. He durst not make suit to Abishag immediately, but he engaged Bath-shebà to be his friend in this matter, who would be forward to believe it a matter of love, and not apt to suspect it a matter of policy. Bath-sheba was surprised to see Adonijah in her apartment, and asked him if he did not come with a design to do her a mischief, because she had been instrumental to crush his late attempt. "No," says he, "I come peaceably (v. 13), and to beg a favour" (v. 14), that she would use the great interest she had in her son to gain his consent, that he might marry Abishag (v. 16, 17). He would represent himself as an object of compassion, that had been deprived of a crown, and therefore might well be gratified in a wife. Thus he pretends to be well pleased with Solomon's accession to the throne, when he is doing all he can to give him disturbance. His words were smoother than butter, but war was in his heart.

3. Bath-sheba's address to Solomon on his behalf. She promised to speak to the king for him (v. 18) and did so, v. 19. Solomon received her with all the respect that was due to a mother, though he himself was a king: He rose up to meet her, bowed himself to her, and caused her to sit on his right hand, according to the law of the fifth commandment. She tells him her errand at last (v. 21): Let Abishag be given to Adonijah thy brother. It was strange that she did not suspect the treason, but more strange that she did not abhor the incest, that was in the proposal. But either she did not take Abishag to be David's wife, because the marriage was not consummated, or she thought it might be dispensed with to gratify Adonijah, in consideration of his tame submission to Solomon.

4. Solomon's just and judicious rejection of the request. Solomon convinces his mother of the unreasonableness of the request, and shows her the tendency of it, which, before, she was not aware of. His reply is somewhat sharp: "Ask for him the kingdom also, v. 22. To ask that he may succeed the king in his bed is, in effect, to ask that he may succeed him in his throne; for that is it he aims at." He convicts and condemns Adonijah for his pretensions, and both with an oath. He convicts him out of his own mouth, v. 23. He condemns him to die immediately: He shall be put to death this day, v. 24. It was plain enough that Adonijah aimed at the crown, and Solomon could not be safe while he lived. Ambitious turbulent spirits commonly prepare for themselves the instruments of death. Many a head has been lost by catching at a crown.

Abiathar and Joab were both aiding and abetting in Adonijah's rebellious attempt, and it is probable were at the bottom of this new motion made by Adonijah for Abishag, and it should seem Solomon knew it, v. 22. This was, in both, an intolerable affront both to God and to the government, and the worse because of their high station and the great influence their examples might have upon many. They are both equally guilty of the treason, but, in the judgment passed upon them, a difference is made and with good reason.

I. Abiathar, in consideration of his old services, is only degraded, v. 26, 27. 1. Solomon convicts him, and by his great wisdom finds him guilty. 2. He calls to mind the respect he had formerly shown to David his father, and that he had both ministered to him in holy things (had borne before him the ark of the Lord), and also had tenderly sympathized with him in his afflictions. 3. For this reason he spares Abiathar's life, but deposes him from his offices, and confines him to his country seat at Anathoth, forbids him the court, the city, the tabernacle, the altar, and all intermeddling in public business. 4. The depriving of Abiathar was the fulfilling of the threatening against the house of Eli (1 Sam. ii. 30), for he was the last high priest of that family.

II. Joab, in consideration of his old sins, is put to death.

1. His guilty conscience sent him to the horns of the altar. He heard that Adonijah was executed and Abiathar deposed, and therefore, fearing his turn would be next, he fled for refuge to the altar.

2. Solomon ordered him to be put to death there for the murder of Abner and Amasa; for these were the crimes upon which he thought fit to ground the sentence, rather than upon his treasonable adherence to Adonijah. On this he grounds the sentence that he fell upon two men more righteous and better than he, that had done him no wrong nor meant him any, and, had they lived, might probably have done David better service. For these crimes, (1) He must die, and die by the sword of public justice. (2) He must die at the altar, rather than escape. Joab resolved not to stir from the altar (v. 30). Benaiah made a scruple of either killing him there or dragging him thence; but Solomon knew the law, that the altar of God should give no protection to wilful murderers. In case of such sins as the blood of beasts would atone for the altar was a refuge, but not in Joab's case. He therefore orders him to be executed there. The holiness of any place should never countenance the wickedness of any person Those who, by a lively faith, take hold on Christ and his righteousness, with a resolution, if they perish, to perish there, shall find in him a more powerful protection than Joab found at the horns of the altar. Benaiah slew him (v. 34), with the solemnity, no doubt, of a public execution.

3. Solomon pleased himself with this act of justice not as it gratified any personal revenge, but as it was the fulfilling of his father's orders and a real kindness to himself and his own government. Peace was hereby secured (v. 33) upon David. Upon his seed, his house, and his throne, shall there be peace for ever from the Lord. Now that such a turbulent man as Joab is removed there shall be peace. Solomon, in this blessing of peace upon his house and throne, piously looks upward to God as the author of it and forward to eternity as the perfection of it. "It shall be peace from the Lord, and peace for ever from the Lord." The Lord of peace himself give us that peace which is everlasting.

I. The preferment of Benaiah and Zadok, two faithful friends to Solomon and his government, v. 35. Joab being put to death, Benaiah was advanced to be general of the forces in his room, and, Abiathar being deposed, Zadok was made high priest in his room, and therein was fulfilled that word of God, when he threatened to cut off the house of Eli (1 Sam. ii. 35), I will raise me up a faithful priest, and will build him a sure house.

II. The course that was taken with Shimei. He is sent for, by a messenger, from his house at Bahurim, expecting perhaps no better than Adonijah's doom, being conscious of his enmity to the house of David; but Solomon knows how to make a difference of crimes and criminals. David had promised Shimei his life for his time. Solomon is not bound by that promise, yet he will not go directly contrary to it. 1. He confines him to Jerusalem, and forbids him, upon any pretence whatsoever, to go out of the city any further than the brook Kidron, v. 36, 37, lest he should make mischief among his neighbours, but took him to Jerusalem, where he kept him prisoner at large. He has his life upon easy terms: he shall live if he will but be content to live at Jerusalem. 2. Shimei submits to the confinement, and thankfully takes his life upon those terms. Two of his servants ran from him to the land of the Philistines, v. 39. Thither he pursued them, and thence brought them back to Jerusalem, v. 40. Solomon takes the forfeiture. Information is given him that Shimei has transgressed, v. 41. Had he represented to Solomon the urgency of the occasion, and begged leave to go, perhaps Solomon might have given him leave; but to presume either upon his ignorance or his connivance was to affront him in the highest degree. He condemns him for his former crime, cursing David, and throwing stones at him in the day of his affliction. He gives orders for the execution of Shimei immediately, v. 46.

CHAP. III

Solomon's reign looked bloody in the foregoing chapter, but the necessary acts of justice must not be called cruelty; in this chapter it appears with another face. We must not think the worse of God's mercy to his subjects for his judgments on rebels. We have here, I. Solomon's marriage to Pharaoh's daughter, ver. 1. II. A general view of his religion, ver. 2–4. III. A particular account of his prayer to God for wisdom, and the answer to that prayer, ver. 5–15. IV. A particular instance of his wisdom, in deciding the controversy between the two harlots, ver. 16–28. And very great he looks here, both at the altar and on the bench, and therefore on the bench because at the altar.

I Something that was unquestionably good, for which Solomon is to be praised and in which he is to be imitated. 1. He loved the Lord, v. 3. Particular notice was taken of God's love to him, 2 Sam. xii. 24. He had his name from it: Jedidiah—beloved of the Lord. And here we find he returned that love, as John, the beloved disciple, was most full of love. Solomon was a wise man, a rich man, a great man; yet the brightest encomium of him is that which is the character of all the saints, even the poorest, He loved the Lord. He loved the worship of the Lord, so the Chaldee; all that love God love his worship, love to hear from him and speak to him, and so to have communion with him. 2. He walked in the statutes of David his father, that is, in the statutes that David gave him, ch. ii. 2, 3; 1 Chron. xxviii. 9, 10, or in God's statutes, which David his father walked in before him; he kept close to God's ordinances. Those that truly love God will make conscience of walking in his statutes. 3. He was very free and generous in what he did for the honour of God. We must never think that wasted which is laid out in the service of God.

II. Here is something concerning which it may be doubted whether it was good or no. 1. His marrying Pharaoh's daughter, v. 1. We will suppose she was proselyted, otherwise the marriage would not have been lawful; yet, if so, surely it was not advisable. Some think that he did this with the advice of his friends, that she was a sincere convert (for the gods of the Egyptians are not reckoned among the strange gods which his strange wives drew him in to the worship of, ch. xi. 5, 6), and that the book of Canticles and the 45th Psalm were penned on this occasion, by which these nuptials were made typical of the mystical espousals of the church to Christ, especially the Gentile church. 2. His worshipping in the high places, and thereby tempting the people to do so too, v. 2, 3. Abraham built his altars on mountains (Gen. xii. 8; xxii. 2), and worshipped in a grove, Gen. xxi. 33. Thence the custom was derived, and was proper, till the divine law confined them to one place, Deut. xii. 5, 6. David kept to the ark, and did not care for the high places, but Solomon, though in other things he walked in the statutes of his father, in this came short of him. He showed thereby a great zeal for sacrificing, but to obey would have been better.

An account of a gracious visit which God paid to Solomon, and the communion he had with God.

I. The circumstances of this visit, v. 5. 1. The place. It was in Gibeon; that was the great high place, because there the tabernacle and the brazen altar were, 2 Chron. i. 3. There Solomon offered his great sacrifices, and there God owned him. The nearer we come to the rule in our worship the more reason we have to expect the tokens of God's presence. 2. The time. It was by night, the night after he had offered that generous sacrifice, v. 4. The more we abound in God's work the more comfort we may expect in him; if the day has been busy for him, the night will be easy in him. Silence and retirement befriend our communion with God. 3. The manner. It was in a dream, when he was asleep, his senses locked up, that God's access to his mind might be the more free and immediate. In this way God used to speak to the prophets (Num. xii. 6) and to private persons, for their own benefit, Job xxxiii. 15, 16. These divine dreams were plainly distinguishable from those in which there are divers vanities, Eccl. v. 7.

II. The gracious offer God made him, v. 5. He saw the glory of God shine about him, and heard a voice saying, Ask what I shall give thee.

III. The pious request Solomon hereupon made to God. He readily laid hold of this offer. Solomon prayed in his sleep, God's grace assisting him; yet it was a lively prayer. The grace of God wrought in him these gracious desires.

1. He acknowledges God's great goodness to his father David, v 6. God's favours are doubly sweet when we observe them transmitted to us through the hands of those that have gone before us.

2. He owns his own insufficiency for the discharge of that great trust to which he is called, v. 7, 8. And here is a double plea to enforce his petition for wisdom:—(1) That his place required it, as he was successor to David. (2) That he wanted it. As one that had a humble sense of his own deficiency, he pleads, "Lord, I am but a little child. I know not how to go out or come in as I should, nor to do so much as the common daily business of the government." Paul's question (Who is sufficient for these things?) is much like Solomon's here, Who is able to judge this thy so great a people? v. 9. Absalom, who was a fool, wished himself a judge; Solomon, who was a wise man, trembles at the undertaking and suspects his own fitness for it.

3. He begs of God to give him wisdom (v. 9): Give therefore thy servant an understanding heart. Thus his good father prayed, and thus he pleaded. Ps. cxix. 125, I am thy servant, give me understanding. An understanding heart is God's gift, Prov. ii. 6. We must pray for it (James i. 5), and pray for it with application to our particular calling.

4. The favourable answer God gave to his request. It was a pleasing prayer (v. 10): The speech pleased the Lord. Those are accepted of God who prefer spiritual blessings to temporal. But that was not all; it was a prevailing prayer, and prevailed for more than he asked. (1) God gave him wisdom, v. 12. Such an insight, and such a foresight, never was prince so blessed with. (2) He gave him riches and honour over and above into the bargain (v. 13). These also are God's gift, and, as far as is good for them, are promised to all that seek first the kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof, Matt. vi. 33. Let young people learn to prefer grace to gold in all that they choose, because godliness has the promise of the life that now is, but the life that now is has not the promise of godliness. But, if we make sure of wisdom and grace, these will either bring outward prosperity with them or sweeten the want of it. God promised Solomon riches and honour absolutely, but long life upon condition (v. 14). If thou wilt walk in my ways, as David did, then I will lengthen thy days. He failed in the condition; and therefore, though he had riches and honour, he did not live so long to enjoy them as in the course of nature he might have done. [1] The way to obtain spiritual blessings is to be importunate for them, to wrestle with God in prayer for them, as Solomon did for wisdom, asking that only, as the one thing needful. [2] The way to obtain temporal blessings is to be indifferent to them and to refer ourselves to God concerning them. Solomon had wisdom given him because he did ask it and wealth because he did not ask it.

5. The grateful return Solomon made for the visit God was pleased to pay him, v. 15. He awoke, we may suppose in a transport of joy; being satisfied of God's favour, he began to think what he should render to the Lord. He had made his prayer at the high place at Gibeon, and there God had graciously met him; but he comes to Jerusalem to give thanks before the ark of the covenant, blaming himself, as it were, that he had not prayed there, the ark being the token of God's presence, and wondering that God had met him anywhere else. God's passing by our mistakes should persuade us to amend them. There he, (1) Offered a great sacrifice to God. (2) He made a great feast upon the sacrifice, that those about him might rejoice with him in the grace of God.

An instance is here given of Solomon's wisdom. The proof is fetched, not from the mysteries of state, though there no doubt he excelled, but from the trial of a cause between party and party.

I. The case opened, not by lawyers, but by the parties themselves, though they were women. These two women were harlots. It is probable the cause had been heard in the inferior courts, before it was brought before Solomon, the judges being unable to determine it. These two women, who lived in a house together, were each of them delivered of a son within three days of one another, v. 17, 18. One of them overlaid her child, and, in the night, exchanged it with the other (v. 19, 20), who was soon aware of the cheat put upon her, and appealed to public justice to be righted, v. 21.

II. The difficulty of the case. The question was, Who was the mother of this living child? Both mothers were vehement in their claim, and showed a deep concern about it. Neither will own the dead child, though it would be cheaper to bury that than to maintain the other: but it is the living one they strive for. The neighbours, though it is probable that some of them were present at the birth and circumcision of the children, yet had not taken so much notice of them as to be able to distinguish them.

III. The determination of it. Solomon, having patiently heard what both sides had to say, sums up the evidence, v. 23. Solomon calls for a sword, and gives orders to divide the living child between the two contenders. It proved an effectual discovery of the truth. Some think that Solomon did himself discern it, before he made this experiment, by the countenances of the women and their way of speaking. To find out the true mother, he could not try which the child loved best, and must therefore try which loved the child best; both pretended to a motherly affection, but their sincerity will be tried when the child is in danger. (1) She that knew the child was not her own, but in contending for it stood upon a point of honour, was well content to have it divided. (2) She that knew the child was her own, rather than the child should be butchered, gives it up to her adversary. How feelingly does she cry out, O, my lord! give her the living child, v. 26. "Let me see it hers, rather than not see it at all." By this tenderness towards the child it appeared that she was not the careless mother that had overlaid the dead child, but was the true mother of the living one, that could not endure to see its death, having compassion on the son of her womb.

IV. We are told what a great reputation Solomon got among his people by this and other instances of his wisdom, which would have a great influence upon the ease of his government: They feared the king (v. 28), for they saw that the wisdom of God was in him, that is, that wisdom with which God had promised to endue him.

CHAP. IV

An instance of the wisdom God granted to Solomon we had in the close of the foregoing chapter. In this we have an account of his wealth and prosperity. I. The magnificence of his court, his ministers of state (ver. 1–6), and the purveyors of his household (ver. 7–19), and their office, ver. 27, 28. II. The provisions for his table, ver. 22, 23. III. The extent of his dominion, ver. 21–24. IV. The numbers, ease, and peace, of his subjects, ver. 20–25. V. His stables, ver. 26. VI. His great reputation for wisdom and learning, ver. 29–34.

I. Solomon upon his throne (v. 1): So king Solomon was king, that is, he was confirmed and established king over all Israel.

II. The great officers of his court. It is observable, 1. That several of them are the same that were in his father's time. Zadok and Abiathar were then priests (2 Sam. xx. 25), Jehoshaphat was then recorder, Benaiah, in his father's time, was a principal man in military affairs. 2. The rest were priests' sons. His prime-minister of state was Azariah the son of Zadok the priest. Two others of the first rank were the sons of Nathan the prophet, v. 5.

III. The purveyors for his household, whose business it was to send in provisions from several parts of the country, that thus, 1. His house might always be well furnished at the best hand. 2. That thus he himself, and those who immediately attended him, might the more closely apply themselves to the business of the state, not troubled about much serving. 3. That thus all the parts of the kingdom might be equally benefited by the taking off of the commodities that were the productions of their country and the circulating of the coin. Industry would hereby be encouraged, and consequently wealth increased, even in those tribes that lay most remote from the court. 4. The dividing of this trust into so many hands was prudent, that no man might be continually burdened with the care of it nor grow exorbitantly rich with the profit of it.

Such a kingdom, and such a court, surely never any prince had, as Solomon's.

I. Such a kingdom. The account here given of it is such as fully answers the prophecies which we have concerning it in Ps. lxxii., which is a psalm for Solomon, but with references to Christ. 1. The territories of his kingdom were large and its tributaries many; so it was foretold that he should have dominion from sea to sea, Ps. lxxii. 8–11. Solomon reigned over all the neighbouring kingdoms, who were his subjects by constraint. All the princes from the river Euphrates, north-east to the border of Egypt south-west, added to his wealth by serving him, and bringing him presents, v. 21. He had peace on all sides, v. 24. 2. The subjects of his kingdom, and its inhabitants, were many and cheerful. (1) They were numerous and the country was exceedingly populous (v. 20): Judah and Israel were many, and that good land was sufficient to maintain them all. (2) They were easy, they dwelt safely. They dwelt every man under his vine and fig tree. Solomon invaded no man's property, but what they had they could call their own: he protected every man in the possession and enjoyment of his property. (3) They were cheerful in the use of their plenty, eating and drinking, and making merry, v. 20. Go where you would, you might see all the marks of plenty, peace, and satisfaction. The spiritual peace, and joy, and holy security, of all the faithful subjects of the Lord Jesus were typified by this. The kingdom of God is not, as Solomon's was, meat and drink, but, what is infinitely better, righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost.

II. Such a court Solomon kept as can scarcely be paralleled. Ahasuerus, once in his reign, made a great feast, to show the riches of his kingdom, Esther i. 3, 4. But it was much more the honour of Solomon that he kept a constant table not of dainties but substantial food, for the entertainment of those who came to hear his wisdom. Thus Christ fed those whom he taught, 5,000 at a time, more than ever Solomon's table would entertain at once: and all believers have in him a continual feast. Herein he far outdoes Solomon, that he feeds all his subjects, not with the bread that perishes, but with that which endures to eternal life.

Solomon's wisdom was more his glory than his wealth.

I. The fountain of his wisdom: God gave it him, v. 29.

II. The fulness of it: He had wisdom and understanding, exceeding much. It is called largeness of heart; for the heart is often put for the intellectual powers. He was very free and communicative, had the gift of utterance as well as wisdom, was as free of his learning as he was of his meat, and grudged neither to any that were about him. The greatness of Solomon's wisdom is illustrated by comparison. Chaldea and Egypt were nations famous for learning; thence the Greeks borrowed theirs; but the greatest scholars of these nations came short of Solomon, v. 30. Solomon excelled them all (v. 30), he outdid them and confounded them; his counsel was much more valuable.

III. The fame of it. It was talked of in all nations round about.

IV. The fruits of it; by these the tree is known: he did not bury his talent, but showed his wisdom,

1. In his compositions. It appears by what he spoke, or dictated to be written from him, (1) That he was a moralist, and a man of great prudence, for he spoke 3,000 proverbs, wise sayings, apophthegms, of admirable use for the conduct of human life. Whether those proverbs of Solomon that we have were any part of the 3,000 is uncertain. (2) That he was a poet and a man of great wit: His songs were 1,005, of which one only is extant, because that only was divinely inspired, which is therefore called his Song of songs. (3) That he was a natural philosopher, and a man of great learning and insight into the mysteries of nature. From his own and others' observations and experience, he wrote both of plants and animals (v. 33).

2. In his conversation. There came persons from all parts to hear the wisdom of Solomon, v. 34. But, Lastly, Solomon was, herein, a type of Christ, in whom are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, and hidden for use; for he is made of God to us wisdom.

CHAP. V

The great work which Solomon was raised up to do was the building of the temple. In this chapter we have an account of the preparations he made for that and his other buildings. Gold and silver his good father had prepared in abundance, but timber and stones he must get ready; and about these we have him treating with Hiram king of Tyre. I. Hiram congratulated him on his accession to the throne, ver. 1. II. Solomon signified to him his design to build the temple and desired him to furnish him with workmen, ver. 2–6. III. Hiram agreed to do it, ver. 7–9. IV. Solomon's work was accordingly well done and Hiram's workmen were well paid, ver. 10–18.

Verses 1–9

The amicable correspondence between Solomon and Hiram. Tyre was a famous trading city, that lay close upon the sea, in the border of Israel. It is here said of Hiram the king that he was ever a lover of David; and we have reason to think he was a worshipper of the true God, and had himself renounced, though he could not reform, the idolatry of his city.

I. Hiram's embassy of compliment to Solomon, v. 1.

II. Solomon's embassy of business to Hiram, sent, it is likely, by messengers of his own. Solomon, in his letter to Hiram, acquaints him,

1. With his design to build a temple to the honour of God. Solomon tells Hiram, who was himself no stranger to the affair, (1) That David's wars were an obstruction to him, that he could not build this temple, though he designed it, v. 3. (2) That peace gave him an opportunity to build it, and therefore he resolved to set about it immediately: God has given me rest both at home and abroad, and there is no adversary (v. 4), no Satan (so the word is), no instrument of Satan to oppose it, or to divert us from it.

2. With his desire that Hiram would assist him herein. Lebanon was the place whence timber must be had, a noble forest in the north of Canaan, particularly expressed in the grant of that land to Israel —all Lebanon, Joshua xiii. 5, so that Solomon was proprietor of all its productions. But Solomon owned that though the trees were his the Israelites had not skill to hew timber, like the Sidonians, who were Hiram's subjects. Solomon courts Hiram to send him workmen, and promises (v. 6) both to assist them (my servants shall be with thy servants, to work under them), and to pay them (unto thee will I give hire for thy servants); for the labourer, even in church-work, though it be indeed its own wages, is worthy of his hire. The evangelical prophet seems to allude to this story, Isa. lx, where he prophesies, (1) That the sons of strangers (such were the Tyrians and Sidonians) shall build up the wall of the gospel temple, v. 10. (2) That the glory of Lebanon shall be brought to it to beautify it, v. 13.

3. Hiram's reception of, and return to, this message. (1) He received it with great satisfaction to himself: He rejoiced greatly (v. 7) that Solomon trod in his father's steps. In this Hiram's generous spirit rejoiced. With what pleasure Hiram speaks of Solomon's wisdom and the extent of his dominion. Let us learn not to envy others either those secular advantages or those endowments of the mind wherein they excel us.

(2) He answered it with great satisfaction to Solomon, granting him what he desired, and showing himself very forward to assist him in this great and good work to which he was laying his hand. We have here his articles of agreement with Solomon. [1] He deliberated upon the proposal, before he returned an answer (v. 8). Those do not lose time who take time to consider. [2] He descended to particulars in the articles. Solomon had spoken of hewing the trees (v. 6), and Hiram agrees to what he desired concerning that (v. 8); but nothing had been said concerning carriage, he therefore undertakes to bring all the timber down from Lebanon by sea, a coasting voyage. Solomon must appoint the place where the timber shall be delivered, and thither Hiram will undertake to bring it and be responsible for its safety. As the Sidonians excelled the Israelites in timber-work, so they did in sailing; for Tyre and Sidon were situate at the entry of the sea (Ezek. xxvii. 3): they therefore were fittest to take care of the water-carriage. And, [3] If Hiram undertake for the work, he justly expects that Solomon shall undertake for the wages: "Thou shalt accomplish my desire in giving food for my household (v. 9), not only for the workmen, but for my own family." If Tyre supply Israel with craftsmen, Israel will supply Tyre with corn, Ezek. xxvii. 17. Thus, by the wise disposal of Providence, one country has need of another.

Verses 10–18

I. The performance of the agreement between Solomon and Hiram. 1. Hiram delivered Solomon the timber, according to his bargain, v. 10. 2. Solomon conveyed to Hiram the corn which he had promised him, v. 11.

II. The confirmation of the friendship that was between them hereby. It is wisdom to strengthen our friendship with those whom we find to be honest and fair, lest new friends prove not so firm and so kind as old ones.

III. The labourers whom Solomon employed in preparing materials for the temple. 1. Some were Israelites, who were employed felling trees and helping to square them, in conjunction with Hiram's servants; for this he appointed 30,000, but employed only 10,000 at a time, so that for one month's work they had two months' vacation, both for rest and for the despatch of their own affairs at home, v. 13, 14. It was temple service, yet Solomon takes care that they shall not be overworked. 2. Others were captives of other nations, who were to bear burdens and to hew stone (v. 15). 3. There were some employed as directors and overseers (v. 16), 3,300 that ruled over the people, for preparation was now to be made, not only for the temple, but for all the rest of Solomon's buildings, at Jerusalem, and here in the forest of Lebanon, and in other places of his dominion, of which see ch. ix. 17–19.

IV. The laying of the foundation of the temple; for that is the building his heart is chiefly upon, and therefore he begins with that, v. 17, 18. It should seem, Solomon was himself present, and president, at the founding of the temple, and that the first stone was laid with some solemnity. Solomon commanded and they brought costly stones for the foundation; though, being out of sight, worse might have served. That sincerity which is our gospel perfection obliges us to lay our foundation firm and to bestow most pains on that part of our religion which lies out of the sight of men.

CHAP. VI

Great and long preparation had been making for the building of the temple, and here, at length, comes an account of the building of it; a noble piece of work it was, in its spiritual significancy, one of the glories of the church. I. The time when it was built (ver. 1), and how long it was in the building, ver. 37, 38. II. The silence with which it was built, ver. 7. III. The dimensions of it, ver. 2, 3. IV. The message God sent to Solomon, when it was in the building, ver. 11–13. V. The particulars: windows (ver. 4), chambers (ver. 5, 6, 8–10), the walls and flooring (ver. 15–18), the oracle (ver. 19–22), the cherubim (ver. 23–30), the doors (ver. 31–35), and the inner court, ver. 36.

I. The temple is called the house of the Lord (v. 1), because it was, 1. Directed and modelled by him. Infinite Wisdom was the architect, and gave David the plan or pattern by the Spirit. 2. Dedicated and devoted to him and to his honour, to be employed in his service, for he manifested his glory in it in a way agreeable to that dispensation. This gave it its beauty of holiness, that it was the house of the Lord, which far transcended all its other beauties.

II. The time when it began to be built is exactly set down. 1. It was just 480 years after the bringing of the children of Israel out of Egypt. Allowing forty years to Moses, seventeen to Joshua, 299 to the Judges forty to Eli, forty to Samuel and Saul, forty to David, and four to Solomon before he began the work, we have just the sum of 480. David's tent, which was clean and convenient, though it was neither stately nor rich, is called the house of the Lord (2 Sam. xii. 20), and served as well as Solomon's temple; yet, when God gave Solomon great wealth, he put it into his heart thus to employ it, and graciously accepted him, chiefly because it was to be a shadow of good things to come, Heb. ix. 9. 2. It was in the fourth year of Solomon's reign, the first three years being taken up in settling the affairs of his kingdom, that he might not find any embarrassment from them in this work. It is not time lost which is spent in composing ourselves for the work of God, and disentangling ourselves from everything which might distract or divert us.

III. The materials are brought in, ready for their place (v. 7), so ready that there was neither hammer nor axe heard in the house while it was in building. It was to be the temple of the God of peace, and therefore no iron tool must be heard in it. Quietness and silence both become and befriend religious exercises: God's work should be done with as much care and as little noise as may be. The temple was thrown down with axes and hammers, and those that threw it down roared in the midst of the congregation (Ps. lxxiv. 4, 6); but it was built up in silence. Clamour and violence often hinder the work of God, but never further it.

IV. The dimensions are laid down (v. 2, 3) according to the rules of proportion. Some observe that the length and breadth were just double to that of the tabernacle.

V. An account of the windows (v. 4): They were broad within, and narrow without, Marg. Such should the eyes of our mind be, reflecting nearer on ourselves than on other people, looking much within, to judge ourselves, but little without, to censure our brethren.

VI. The chambers are described (v. 5, 6), which served as vestries, in which the utensils of the tabernacle were carefully laid up, and where the priests dressed. Care was taken that the beams should not be fastened in the walls to weaken them, v. 6. Let not the church's strength be impaired under pretence of adding to its beauty or convenience.

I. The word God sent to Solomon, when he was engaged in building the temple. He assured him that if he would proceed and persevere in obedience to the divine law, and keep in the way of duty and the true worship of God, the divine loving-kindness should be drawn out both to himself (I will perform my word with thee) and to his kingdom. This word God sent him probably by a prophet, 1. That by the promise he might be encouraged and comforted in his work. An eye to the promise will carry us cheerfully through our work; and those who wish well to the public will think nothing too much that they can do to secure and perpetuate to it the tokens of God's presence. 2. That, by the condition annexed, he might be awakened to consider that though he built the temple ever so strong the glory of it would soon depart, unless he and his people continued to walk in God's statutes.

II. The work Solomon did for God: So he built the house (v. 14), so animated by the message God had sent him, so admonished not to expect that God should own his building unless he were obedient to his laws. The strictness of God's government will never drive a good man from his service, but quicken him in it. Solomon built and finished, he went on with the work, and God went along with him till it was completed.

I. We have a particular account of the details of the building.

1. The wainscot of the temple. It was of cedar (v. 15), which was strong and durable, and of a very sweet smell. The wainscot was curiously carved with knops (like eggs or apples) and flowers, v. 18.

2. The gilding. It was not like ours, washed over, but the whole house, all the inside of the temple (v. 22), even the floor (v. 30), he overlaid with gold, and the most holy place with pure gold, v. 21.

3. The oracle, or speaking-place, the holy of holies, so called because thence God spoke to Moses, and perhaps to the high priest. In this place the ark of the covenant was to be set, v. 19. Solomon made everything new, except the ark, which was still the same that Moses made, with its mercy-seat and cherubim; that was the token of God's presence, which is always the same with his people whether they meet in tent or temple, and changes not with their condition.

4. The cherubim. Besides those at the ends of the mercy-seat, which covered the ark, (1) Solomon set up two more, very large ones, with wings made of olive-wood, and all overlaid with gold, v. 23, &c. (2) He carved cherubim upon all the walls of the house, v. 29. The heathen set up images of their gods and worshipped them; but these were designed to represent the servants and attendants of the God of Israel, the holy angels, not to be themselves worshipped.

5. The doors. The folding doors that led into the oracle were but a fifth part of the wall (v. 31), those into the temple were a fourth part (v. 33); but both were beautified with cherubim engraven on them, v. 32, 35.

6. The inner court, in which the brazen altar was at which the priests ministered. This was separated from the court where the people were by a low wall, three rows of hewn stone tipped with a cornice of cedar (v. 36), that over it the people might see what was done and hear what the priests said to them.

7. The time spent in this building. It was but seven years and a half from the founding to the finishing of it, v. 38.

II. Let us now see what was typified by this temple. 1. Christ is the true temple; he himself spoke of the temple of his body, John ii. 21. God himself prepared him his body, Heb. x. 5. In him dwelt the fulness of the Godhead, as the Shechinah in the temple. In him meet all God's spiritual Israel. Through him we have access with confidence to God. 2. Every believer is a living temple, in whom the Spirit of God dwells, 1 Cor. iii. 16. Even the body is such by virtue of its union with the soul, 1 Cor. vi. 19. We are not only wonderfully made by the divine providence, but more wonderfully made anew by the divine grace. This living temple is built upon Christ as its foundation and will be perfected in due time. 3. The gospel church is the mystical temple; it grows to a holy temple in the Lord (Eph. ii. 21), enriched and beautified with the gifts and graces of the Spirit, as Solomon's temple with gold and precious stones. Only Jews built the tabernacle, but Gentiles joined with them in building the temple. Even strangers and foreigners are built up a habitation of God, Eph. ii. 19, 22. The temple was divided into the holy place and the most holy, the courts of it into the outer and inner; so there are the visible and the invisible church. The door into the temple was wider than that into the oracle. Many enter into profession that come short of salvation. The top-stone of the gospel church will, at length, be brought forth with shoutings, and it is a pity that there should be the clashing of axes and hammers in the building of it. Angels are ministering spirits, attending the church on all sides and all the members of it. 4. Heaven is the everlasting temple. There the church will be fixed, and no longer movable. The streets of the new Jerusalem, in allusion to the flooring of the temple, are said to be of pure gold, Rev. xxi. 21. The cherubim there always attend the throne of glory. The temple was uniform, and in heaven there is the perfection of beauty and harmony.

In Solomon's temple there was no noise of axes and hammers. Everything is quiet and serene in heaven; all that shall be stones in that building must in the present state of probation and preparation be fitted and made ready for it, hewn and squared by divine grace, and so made meet for a place there.

CHAP. VII

In this chapter we have, I. Solomon's fitting up several buildings for himself and his own use, ver. 1-12. II. His furnishing the temple which he had built for God, 1. With two pillars, ver. 13-22. 2. With a molten sea, ver. 23-26. 3. With ten basins of brass (ver. 27-37), and ten lavers upon them, ver. 38, 39. 4. With all the other utensils of the temple, ver. 40-50. 5. With the things that his father had dedicated, ver. 51. The particular description of these things was not needless when it was written, nor is it now useless.

Verses 1-12

Never had any man so much of the spirit of building as Solomon had, nor to better purpose; he began with the temple, built for God first, and then all his other buildings were comfortable. 1. He built a house for himself (v. 1), where he dwelt, v. 8. His father had built a good house; but it was no reflection upon his father for him to build a better. Much of the comfort of this life is connected with an agreeable house. He was thirteen years building this house, whereas he built the temple in little more than seven years. He was in no haste for his own palace, but impatient till the temple was finished and fit for use. 2. He built the house of the forest at Lebanon (v. 2), supposed to be a country seat, so called from the trees that encompassed it. Express notice is taken of his buildings, not only in Jerusalem, but in Lebanon (ch. ix. 19), and we read of the tower of Lebanon, which looks towards Damascus (Cant. vii. 4), which probably was part of this house. A particular account is given of this house, that being built in Lebanon, a place famed for cedars, the pillars, and beams, and roof, were all cedar (v. 2, 3), and, being designed for pleasant prospects, there were three tiers of windows on each side, light against light (v. 4, 5), or, as it may be read, prospect against prospect. 3. He built piazzas before one of his houses, either that at Jerusalem or that in Lebanon, which were very famous—a porch of pillars (v. 6). He himself speaks of Wisdom's building her house, and hewing out her seven pillars (Prov. ix. 1). 4. At his house where he dwelt in Jerusalem he built a great hall, or porch of judgment, where was set the throne, or king's bench, for the trial of causes, in which he himself was appealed to, and this was richly wainscoted with cedar, from the floor to the roof, v. 7. He had there also another court within the porch, nearer his house, of similar work, for his attendants to walk in, v. 8. 5. He built a house for his wife, where she kept her court, v. 8. It is said to be like the porch, because built of cedar like it.

Verses 13-47

We have here an account of the brasswork about the temple. There was no iron about the temple, though we find David preparing for the temple iron for things of iron, 1 Chron. xxix. 2.

I. The brazier whom Solomon employed to preside in this part of the work was Hiram, or Huram (2 Chron. iv. 11), who was by his mother's side an Israelite, of the tribe of Naphtali, by his father's side a man of Tyre, v. 14. If he had the ingenuity of a Tyrian, and the affection of an Israelite to the house of God, it was happy that the blood of the two nations mixed in him, for thereby he was qualified for the work to which he was designed. As the tabernacle was built with the wealth of Egypt, so the temple with the wit of Tyre.

II. All the brazen vessels were of bright brass (v. 45), good brass, so the Chaldee, that which was strongest and looked finest.

III. The place where all the brazen vessels were cast was the plain of Jordan, because the ground there was stiff and clayey, fit to make moulds of for the casting of the brass (v. 46), and Solomon would not have this dirty smoky work done in or near Jerusalem.

IV. The quantity was not accounted for. The vessels were exceedingly numerous, and it would have been an endless thing to keep the account of them; neither was the weight of the brass, when it was delivered to the workmen, searched or enquired into; so honest were the workmen, and such great plenty of brass they had, that there was no danger of wanting.

V. Some particulars of the brass-work are described.

1. Two brazen pillars were set up in the porch of the temple (v. 21), between the temple and the court of the priests, purely for ornament. (1) What an ornament they were we may gather from the account here given of the curious work that was about them, chequer-work, chain-work, net-work, lily-work, and pomegranates in rows, and all of bright brass. (2) Their significancy is intimated in the names given them (v. 21): Jachin—he will establish; and Boaz—in him is strength. Some think they were intended for memorials of the pillar of cloud and fire which led Israel through the wilderness: I rather think them designed for memorandums to the priests and others that came to worship at God's door, [1] To depend upon God for strength and establishment in all their religious exercises. When we come to wait upon God, and find our hearts wandering and unfixed, then by faith let us fetch in help from heaven: Jachin—God will fix this roving mind. Boaz—in him is our strength, who works in us both to will and to do. I will go in the strength of the Lord God. Spiritual strength and stability are to be had at the door of God's temple, where we must wait for the gifts of grace in the use of the means of grace. [2] It was a memorandum to them of the strength and establishment of the temple of God among them. But, with respect to this temple, when it was destroyed particular notice was taken of the destroying of these pillars (2 Kings xxv. 13, 17), which had been the tokens of its establishment, and would have been so if they had not forsaken God.

2. A brazen sea, a very large vessel, above five yards in diameter, and which contained above 500 barrels of water for the priests' use, in washing themselves and the sacrifices, and keeping the courts of the temple clean, v. 23, &c. It stood raised upon the figures of twelve oxen in brass. The Gibeonites, or Nethinim, who were to draw water for the house of God, had the care of filling it. Some think Solomon made the images of oxen to support this great cistern in contempt of the golden calf which Israel had worshipped, that (as Bishop Patrick expresses it) the people might see there was nothing worthy of adoration in those figures; they were fitter to make posts of than to make gods of.

3. Ten bases, or stands, or settles, of brass, on which were put ten lavers, to be filled with water for the service of the temple, because there would not be room at the molten sea for all that had occasion to wash there. The bases on which the lavers were fixed are very largely described here, v. 27, &c. They were curiously adorned and set upon wheels, that the lavers might be removed as there was occasion; but ordinarily they stood in two rows, five on one side of the court and five on the other, v. 39. Each laver contained forty baths, that is, about ten barrels, v. 38.

4. Besides these, there was a vast number of brass pots made to boil the flesh of the peace-offerings in, which the priests and offerers were to feast upon before the Lord (see 1 Sam. ii. 14); also shovels, wherewith they took out the ashes of the altar. Some think the word signifies flesh-hooks, with which they took meat out of the pot. The basins also were made of brass, to receive the blood of the sacrifices.

1. The making of the gold work of the temple, which it seems was done last, for with it the work of the house of God ended. All within doors was gold, and all made new (except the ark, with its mercy-seat and cherubim), the old being either melted down or laid by—the golden altar, table, and candlestick, with all their appurtenances. The altar of incense was still one, for Christ and his intercession are so: but he made ten golden tables, 2 Chron. iv. 8, and ten golden candlesticks (v. 49), intimating the much greater plenty both of spiritual food and heavenly light which the gospel blesses us with than the law of Moses did or could afford. Even the hinges of the door were of gold (v. 50). 2. The bringing in of the dedicated things, which David had devoted to the honour of God, v. 51. What was not expended in the building and furniture was laid up in the treasury, for repairs, exigencies, and the constant charge of the temple-service. What the parents have dedicated to God the children ought by no means to alienate or recall, but should cheerfully devote what was intended for pious and charitable uses, that they may, with their estates, inherit the blessing.

CHAP. VIII

The building and furniture of the temple were very glorious, but the dedication of it exceeds in glory as much as prayer and praise exceed the casting of metal and the graving of stones. The temple was designed for the keeping up of the correspondence between God and his people; and here we have an account of the solemnity of their first meeting there. I. The representatives of all Israel were called together (ver. 1, 2), to keep a feast to the honour of God, for fourteen days, ver. 65. II. The priests brought the ark into the most holy place, and fixed it there, ver. 3–9. III. God took possession of it by a cloud, ver. 10, 11. IV. Solomon, with thankful acknowledgments to God, informed the people touching the occasion of their meeting, ver. 12–21. V. In a long prayer he recommended to God's gracious acceptance all the prayers that should be made in or towards this place, ver. 22–53. VI. He dismissed the assembly with a blessing and an exhortation, ver. 54–61. VII. He offered abundance of sacrifices, on which he and his people feasted, and so parted, with great satisfaction, ver. 62–66. These were Israel's golden days, days of the Son of man in type.

The temple, though richly beautified, yet while it was without the ark was like a body without a soul, or a candlestick without a candle, or a house without an inhabitant. All the cost and pains bestowed on this stately structure are lost if God do not accept them. When therefore all the work is ended (ch. vii. 51), the one thing needful is the bringing in of the ark. This must crown the work.

I. Solomon presides in this service, as David did in the bringing up of the ark to Jerusalem. This great assembly he summons (v. 1), at the feast in the seventh month (v. 2), namely, the feast of tabernacles, which was appointed on the fifteenth day of that month, Lev. xxiii. 34. David, like a very good man, brings the ark to a convenient place, near him; Solomon, like a very great man, brings it to a magnificent place. Let children proceed in God's service where their parents left off.

II. All Israel attend the service, their judges and the chief of their tribes and families, all their officers, civil and military, and the heads of their clans. These came together, on this occasion, 1. To do honour to Solomon, and to return him the thanks of the nation for all the good offices he had done. 2. To do honour to the ark. Public mercies call for public acknowledgments. Those that appeared before the Lord did not appear empty, for they all sacrificed sheep and oxen innumerable, v. 5.

III. The priests do their part of the service. In the wilderness, the Levites were to carry the ark, but here (it being the last time that the ark was to be carried) the priests themselves did it, as they were ordered to do when it surrounded Jericho. We are here told, 1. What was in the ark, nothing but the two tables of stone (v. 9), a treasure far exceeding all the dedicated things both of David and Solomon. The pot of manna and Aaron's rod were by the ark, but not in it. 2. What was brought up with the ark (v. 4): The tabernacle of the congregation. It is probable that both that which Moses set up in the wilderness, which was in Gibeon, and that which David pitched in Zion, were brought to the temple, to which they did, as it were, surrender all their holiness, merging it in that of the temple, which must henceforward be the place where God must be sought unto. Thus will all the church's holy things on earth, that are so much its joy and glory, be swallowed up in the perfection of holiness above. 3. Where it was fixed in its place, the place appointed for its rest after all its wanderings (v. 6): In the oracle of the house, whence they expected God to speak to them, even in the most holy place, which was made so by the presence of the ark, under the wings of the great cherubim which Solomon set up (ch. vi. 27), signifying the special protection of angels, under which God's ordinances and the assemblies of his people are taken.

IV. God graciously owns what is done and testifies his acceptance of it, v. 10, 11. The priests might come into the most holy place till God manifested his glory there; but, thenceforward, none might, at their peril, approach the ark, except the high priest, on the day of atonement. Therefore it was not till the priests had come out of the oracle that the Shechinah took possession of it, in a cloud, which filled not only the most holy place, but the temple, so that the priests who burnt incense at the golden altar could not bear it. By this visible emanation of the divine glory, 1. God put an honour upon the ark, and owned it as a token of his presence. The glory of it had been long diminished and eclipsed by its frequent removes, the meanness of its lodging, and its being exposed too much to common view; but God will now show that it is as dear to him as ever, and he will have it looked upon with as much veneration as it was when Moses first brought it into his tabernacle. 2. He testified his acceptance of the building and furnishing of the temple as good service done to his name and his kingdom among men. 3. He struck an awe upon this great assembly; and, by what they saw, confirmed their belief of what they read in the books of Moses concerning the glory of God's appearances to their fathers. 4. He showed himself ready to hear the prayer Solomon was now about to make. But the glory of God appeared in a cloud, a dark cloud, to signify, (1) The darkness of that dispensation in comparison with the light of the gospel. (2) The darkness of our present state in comparison with the vision of God, which will be the happiness of heaven, where the divine glory is unveiled.

I. Solomon encourages the priests. The disciples of Christ feared when they entered into the cloud, though it was a bright cloud (Luke ix. 34), so did the priests when they found themselves wrapped in a thick cloud. To silence their fears, 1. He reminds them that this was a token of God's presence (v. 12). It is an indication of his favour; for he had said, I will appear in a cloud, Lev. xvi. 2. Where God dwells in light faith is swallowed up in vision and fear in love. 2. He himself bids it welcome, as worthy of all acceptation (v. 13): "Surely I come," says God.

"Amen," says Solomon. "Even so, come, Lord. The house is thy own, entirely thy own, I have surely built it for thee." It is Solomon's joy that God has taken possession; and it is his desire that he would keep possession. Let not the priests therefore dread that in which Solomon so much triumphs.

II. He instructs the people. He spoke briefly to the priests, but turned his face about (v. 14) from them to the congregation that stood in the outer court, and addressed himself to them largely.

1. He blessed them. When they saw the dark cloud enter the temple they blessed themselves, being astonished at it and afraid lest the thick darkness should be utter darkness to them. Solomon blessed them, that is, he pacified them, and freed them from the consternation they were in.

2. He informed them concerning this house which he had built and was now dedicating.

(1) He began his account with a thankful acknowledgment of the good hand of his God upon him hitherto: Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, v. 15. What we have the pleasure of, God must have the praise of. He thus engaged the congregation to lift up their hearts in thanksgivings to God. Solomon here blessed God, [1] For his promise which he spoke with his mouth to David. [2] For the performance, that he had now fulfilled it with his hand. We have then the best sense of God's mercies, when we compare what God does with what he has said.

(2) Solomon is now making a solemn surrender or dedication of this house unto God. Here is a recital of the special causes and considerations moving Solomon to build this house. [1] He recites the want of such a place. I chose no city to build a house in for my name; therefore there is occasion for the building of this. [2] He recites David's purpose to build such a place. God chose the person first that should rule his people (I chose David, v. 16) and then put it into his heart to build a house for God's name, v. 17. [3] He recites God's promise concerning himself. God approved his father's purpose (v. 18): Thou didst well, that it was in thy heart. What he had done was not of his own head, nor for his own glory, but the work itself was according to his father's design and his doing it was according to God's designation. [4] He recites what he himself had done, and with what intention: I have built a house, not for my own name, but for the name of the Lord God of Israel (v. 20), and set there a place for the ark, v. 21. The more we do for God the more we are indebted to him; for our sufficiency is of him, and not of ourselves.

Solomon having made a general surrender of this house to God, which God had signified his acceptance of by taking possession, next followed Solomon's prayer, his request that this temple may be deemed and taken, not only for a house of sacrifice but a house of prayer for all people; and herein it was a type of the gospel church; see Isa. lvi. 7, compared with Matt. xxi. 13.

I. Solomon did not appoint one of the priests to do it, nor one of the prophets, but did it himself, in the presence of all the congregation of Israel, v. 22. 1. It was well that he was able to do it, a sign that he learnt to pray well, and knew how to express himself to God in a suitable manner, pro re nata—on the spur of the occasion, without a prescribed form. 2. It was well that he was not shy of performing divine service before so great a congregation. Solomon, in all his other glory, even on his ivory throne, looked not so great as he did now.

II. The posture in which he prayed was very reverent, and expressive of humility, seriousness, and fervency in prayer. 1. He kneeled down, as appears, v. 54, where he is said to rise from his knees; compare 2 Chron. vi. 13. Kneeling is the most proper posture for prayer, Eph. iii. 14. Mr. Herbert says, "Kneeling never spoiled silk stockings." 2. He spread forth his hands towards heaven, and (as it should seem by v. 54) continued so to the end of the prayer, hereby expressing his desire towards, and expectations from, God, as a Father in heaven. He spread forth his hands, as it were to offer up the prayer from an open enlarged heart and to present it to heaven, and also to receive thence, with both arms, the mercy which he prayed for.

III. The prayer itself was very long, and perhaps much longer than is here recorded. It is not making long prayers, but making them for a pretence, that Christ condemns. In this prayer Solomon does,

1. Give glory to God. This he begins with, as the most proper act of adoration. (1) He gives him the praise of what he is, the best of masters to his people: "Who keepest covenant and mercy with thy servants; doing that for them of which thou hast not given them an express promise, provided they walk before thee with all their hearts." (2) He gives him thanks for what he had done, in particular, for his family (v. 24): "Thou hast kept with thy servant David, as with thy other servants, that which thou promisedst him."

2. He sues for grace and favour from God.

(1) That God would perform to him and his the mercy which he had promised, v. 25, 26. Hitherto God has helped, 2. Cor. i. 10. Solomon repeats the promise (v. 25): There shall not fail thee a man to sit on the throne, not omitting the condition, so that thy children take heed to their way; for we cannot expect God's performance of the promise but upon our performance of the condition. And then he humbly begs this entail (v. 26): Now, O God of Israel! let thy word be verified.

(2) That God would have respect to this temple, that he would graciously own it. To this purpose,

[1] He premises, First, A humble admiration of God's gracious condescension (v. 27): "But will God indeed dwell on the earth? Can we imagine that a Being infinitely high, and holy, and happy, will stoop so low as to let it be said of him that he dwells upon the earth?" Secondly, A humble acknowledgment of the incapacity of the house he had built, though very capacious, to contain God: "The heaven of heavens cannot contain thee, this house is too little, too mean to be the residence of him that is infinite in being and glory."

[2] This premised, he prays in general, First, That God would graciously hear and answer the prayer he was now praying, v. 28. It was a humble prayer, an earnest prayer, a prayer made in faith: "Lord, hearken to it, have respect to it, not as the prayer of Israel's king but as the prayer of thy servant." Secondly, That God would in like manner hear and answer all the prayers that should, at any time hereafter, be made in or towards this house which he had now built, "Hear it in heaven, that is indeed thy dwelling-place, and, when thou hearest, forgive." None but priests might come into that place; but when they worshipped in the courts of the temple, it must be with an eye towards it, as an instituted medium of their worship, helping the weakness of their faith, and typifying the mediation of Jesus Christ, who is the true temple.

[3] More particularly, he here puts divers cases: First, If God were appealed to by an oath for the determining of any controverted right between man and man, and the oath were taken before this altar, he prayed that God would, in some way or other, discover the truth, and judge between the contending parties, v. 31, 32. He prayed that, in difficult matters, this throne of grace might be a throne of judgment.

Secondly, If the people of Israel were groaning under any national calamity, or any particular Israelite under any personal calamity, he desired that the prayers they should make in or towards this house might be heard and answered.

a. In case of public judgments, he could not, he would not, ask that their prayer might be answered unless they did also turn from their sin (v. 35) and turn again to God (v. 33), that is, unless they did truly repent and reform. But if they did thus qualify for mercy he prays, (a) That God would hear from heaven. (b) That he would forgive their sin. (c) That he would teach them the good way wherein they should walk, by his Spirit, with his word and prophets; and thus they might be both profited by their trouble, and prepared for deliverance, which then comes in love when it finds us brought back to the good way of God and duty. (d) That he would then remove the judgment, and redress the grievance, in the mercy prayed for.

b. In case of personal afflictions, v. 38–40. He does not mention particulars, so numerous, so various, are the grievances of the children of men. He supposes that the complainants themselves would very sensibly feel their own burden. They shall know every man the plague of his own heart, and shall spread their hands, that is, spread their case, as Hezekiah spread the letter, in prayer, towards this house; whether the trouble be of body or mind, they shall represent it before God. He refers all cases of this kind, that should be brought hither, to God. (a) To his omniscience. (b) To his justice: Give to every man according to his ways; and he will not fail to do so, by the rules of grace, not the law, for then we should all be undone. (c) To his mercy: Hear, and forgive, and do (v. 39), that they may fear thee all their days, v. 40.

c. The case of the stranger that is not an Israelite is next mentioned, a proselyte that comes to the temple to pray to the God of Israel, being convinced of the folly and wickedness of worshipping the gods of his country. He begged that God would accept and answer the proselyte's prayer (v. 43): Do according to all that the stranger calleth to thee for. Thus early, thus ancient, were the indications of favour towards the sinners of the Gentiles: as there was then one law for the native and for the stranger (Exod. xii. 49), so there was one gospel for both.

d. The case of an army going forth to battle is next recommended by Solomon to the divine favour. It is supposed that the army is encamped at a distance, somewhere a great way off, sent by divine order against the enemy, v. 44.

e. The case of poor captives is the last that is here mentioned as a proper object of divine compassion. (a) He supposes that Israel will sin. He knew them, and himself, and the nature of man. (b) He supposes that, if Israel revolt from God, God will be angry with them, and deliver them into the hand of their enemies, to be carried captive into a strange country, v. 46. (c) He then supposes that they will bethink themselves, will repent and humble themselves, saying, We have sinned and have done perversely (v. 47), and in the land of their enemies will return to God, whom they had forsaken in their own land. (d) He supposes that in their prayers they will look towards their own land, the holy land, Jerusalem, the holy city, and the temple, the holy house, and directs them so to do (v. 48). (e) He prays that then God would hear their prayers, forgive their sins, plead their cause, and incline their enemies to have compassion on them, v. 49, 50.

Lastly, No place now, under the gospel, can be imagined to add any acceptableness to the prayers made in or towards it, as the temple then did. That was a shadow: the substance is Christ; whatever we ask in his name, it shall be given us.

Solomon, after his sermon in Ecclesiastes, gives us the conclusion of the whole matter; so he does here, after this long prayer; it is called his blessing the people, v. 55.

I. He gives God the glory of the great things he had done for Israel, v. 56. He stood up to bless the congregation (v. 55), but began with blessing God. He blesses God who has given, he does not say wealth, and honour, and power, and victory, to Israel, but rest, as if that were a blessing more valuable than any of those. 1. He refers to the promises given by the hand of Moses, as he did (v. 15, 24) to those which were made to David. There were promises given by Moses, as well as precepts. 2. He does, as it were, write a receipt in full on the back of these bonds: There has not failed one word of all his good promises.

II. He blesses himself and the congregation, expressing his earnest desire and hope of these four things: 1 The presence of God with them. This great congregation was now shortly to be scattered, and it was not likely that they would ever be all together again in this world. Solomon therefore dismisses them with this blessing: "The Lord be present with us, and that will be comfort enough when we are absent from each other. The Lord our God be with us, as he was with our fathers (v. 57); let him not leave us, let him be to us today, and to ours for ever, what he was to those that went before us." 2. The power of his grace upon them: "Let him be with us, and continue with us, not that he may enlarge our coasts and increase our wealth, but that he may incline our hearts to himself, to walk in all his ways and to keep his commandments," v. 58. 3. An answer to the prayer he had now made: "Let these my words be nigh unto the Lord our God day and night, v. 59. Let a gracious return be made to every prayer that shall be made here, and that will be a continual answer to this prayer." What Solomon asks here for his prayer is still granted in the intercession of Christ.

III. He solemnly charges his people to continue and persevere in their duty to God. Having spoken to God for them, he here speaks from God to them, and those only would fare the better for his prayers that were made better by his preaching.

We read before that Judah and Israel were very cheerful under their own vines and fig-trees; here we have them so in God's courts.

I. They had abundant joy and satisfaction while they attended at God's house, for there, 1. Solomon offered a great sacrifice, 22,000 oxen and 120,000 sheep, enough to have drained the country of cattle if it had not been a very fruitful land. All these sacrifices could not be offered in one day, but in the several days of the feast. 2. He kept a feast, the feast of tabernacles, as it should seem, after the feast of dedication, and both together lasted fourteen days (v. 65).

II. They carried this joy and satisfaction with them to their own houses. God's goodness was the matter of their joy, so it should be of ours at all times.

CHAP. IX

In this chapter we have, I. The answer which God, in a vision, gave to Solomon's prayer, and the terms he settled with him, ver. 1–9. II. The interchanging of grateful kindnesses between Solomon and Hiram, ver. 10–14. III. His workmen and buildings, ver. 15–24. IV. His devotion, ver. 25. V. His trading navy, ver. 26–28.

Verses 1–9

God had given a real answer to Solomon's prayer, and tokens of his acceptance of it, immediately, by the fire from heaven which consumed the sacrifices (as we find, 2 Chron. vii. 1); but here we have a more express and distinct answer to it.

I. In what way God gave him this answer. He appeared to him, as he had done at Gibeon, in the beginning of his reign, in a dream or vision, v. 2. The comparing of it with that intimates that it was the very night after he had finished the solemnities of his festival, for so that was, 2 Chron. i. 6, 7.

II. The purport of this answer. 1. He assures him of his special presence in the temple he had built, in answer to the prayer he had made (v. 3): I have hallowed this house. Solomon had dedicated it, but it was God's prerogative to hallow it—to sanctify or consecrate it. 2. He shows him that he and his people were for the future upon their good behaviour. Let them not be secure now, as if they might live as they please now that they have the temple of the Lord among them, Jer. vii. 4. "If thou wilt walk before me as David did, in integrity of heart and uprightness, then I will establish the throne of thy kingdom, and not otherwise," for on that condition the promise was made, Ps. cxxxii. 12. "But know thou, and let thy family and kingdom know it, and be admonished by it, that if you shall altogether turn from following me" Israel, though a holy nation, will be cut off (v. 7), by one judgment after another. "The temple, though a holy house, which God himself has hallowed for his name, shall be abandoned and laid desolate (v. 8, 9): This house which is high." Those that now pass by it are astonished at the bulk and beauty of it; but, if you forsake God, its height will make its fall the more amazing. God gave Solomon fair warning of this, now that he had newly built and dedicated it, that he and his people might not be high-minded, but fear.

Verses 10–14

Solomon and Hiram, their fair and friendly parting when the work was done. 1. Hiram made good his bargain to the utmost. So far was he from envying Solomon's growing greatness and reputation, that he helped to magnify him. 2. Solomon, no doubt, made good his bargain, and gave Hiram food for his household, as was agreed, ch. v. 9. But here we are told that he gave him twenty cities (small ones we may suppose, like those mentioned here, v. 19) in the land of Galilee, v. 11. Hiram came to see these cities, and did not like them (v. 12): They pleased him not. He called the country the land of Cabul, a Phœnician word (says Josephus) which signifies displeasing, v. 13. He therefore returned them to Solomon (as we find, 2 Chron. viii. 2), who repaired them, and then caused the children of Israel to inhabit them. The country was truly valuable, and so were the cities in it, but not agreeable to Hiram's genius. The Tyrians were merchants, trading men, that lived in fine houses, and became rich by navigation, but knew not how to value a country that was fit for corn and pasture. Hiram desired Solomon to gratify him by becoming his partner in trade, as we find he did, v. 27. Some take delight in husbandry, and wonder what pleasure sailors can take on a rough sea; others take as much delight in navigation, and wonder what pleasure husbandmen can take in a dirty country, like the land of Cabul.

Verses 15–28

A further account of Solomon's greatness.

I. His buildings. He raised a great levy both of men and money, because he projected a great deal of building, which would both employ many hands and put him to a vast expense, v. 15. He raised it, not for war (as other princes), which would spend the blood of his subjects, but for building, which would require only their labour and purses. Perhaps David observed Solomon's genius to lie towards building, and foresaw he would have his head and hands full of it, when he penned that song of degrees for Solomon, which begins, Except the Lord build the house, those labour in vain that build it (Ps. cxxvii. 1). And Solomon verily began his work at the right end, for he built God's house first, and finished that before he began his own; and then God blessed him, and he prospered in all his other buildings. The further order in Solomon's buildings is observable. God's house first for religion, then his own for his own convenience, then a house for his wife, to which she removed as soon as it was ready for her (v. 24), then Milo, the town-house or guild-hall, then the wall of Jerusalem, the royal city, then some cities of note and strength in the country, which were decayed and unfortified, Hazor, Megiddo, &c.

II. His workmen and servants. In doing such great works, he must needs employ abundance of workmen. 1. Solomon employed those who remained of the conquered nations in all the slavish work, v. 20, 21. 2. He employed Israelites in the more creditable services (v. 22, 23): Of them he made no bondmen, for they were God's freemen, and honoured their relation to God as a kingdom of priests.

III. His piety and devotion (v. 25): Three times in a year he offered burnt-offerings extraordinary (namely, at the three yearly feasts, the passover, pentecost, and feast of tabernacles) in honour of the divine institution. It is said, He offered on the altar which he himself built. He took care to build it, and then, 1. He himself made use of it. Many will assist the devotions of others that neglect their own. 2. He himself had the benefit and comfort of it.

IV. His merchandise. He built a fleet of trading ships at Ezion-geber (v. 26), a port on the coast of the Red Sea, the furthest stage of the Israelites when they wandered in the wilderness, Num. xxxiii. 35. The fleet traded to Ophir in the East Indies, supposed to be that which is now called Ceylon. Gold was the commodity traded for, substantial wealth. It should seem, Solomon had before been Hiram's partner, or put a venture into his ships, which made him a rich return of 120 talents (v. 14), which encouraged him to build a fleet of his own. Solomon sent his own servants as factors, and merchants, and supercargoes, but hired Tyrians for sailors, for they had knowledge of the sea, v. 27. Thus one nation needs another, Providence so ordering it that there may be mutual commerce and assistance; for not only as Christians, but as men, we are members one of another. The fleet brought home to Solomon 420 talents of gold, v. 28. Solomon got much by his merchandise, but, it should seem, David got much more by his conquests. What were Solomon's 420 talents to David's 100,000 talents of gold? 1 Chron. xxii. 14; xxix. 4. Solomon got much by his merchandise, and yet he has directed us to a better trade, within reach of the poorest, having assured us from his own experience of both that the merchandise of wisdom is better than the merchandise of silver and the gain thereof than fine gold, Prov. iii. 14.

CHAP. X

Still Solomon looks great, and everything in this chapter adds to his magnificence. We read nothing indeed of his charity, yet, no question, many poor were relieved from the abundance of his table. A church he had built, never to be equalled; schools or colleges he need not build any, his own palace is an academy. I. What abundance of wisdom there was there appears from the application the queen of Sheba made to him, and the great satisfaction she had in her entertainment there (ver. 1–13), and others likewise, ver. 24. II. What abundance of wealth there was there appears here by the gold imported, with other things, yearly (ver. 14, 15), and in a triennial return, ver. 22. Gold presented (ver. 25), and gold used in targets and shields (ver. 16, 17), and vessels, ver. 21. A stately throne made, ver. 18–20. His chariots and horsemen, ver. 26. His trade with Egypt, ver. 28, 29. And the great plenty of silver and cedars among his people, ver. 27. So that, putting all together, "king Solomon exceeded all the kings of the earth for riches, and for wisdom." Yet what was he to the King of kings? Where Christ is, by his word and Spirit, "Behold, a greater than Solomon is there."

An account of the visit which the queen of Sheba made to Solomon, no doubt when he was in the height of his piety and prosperity. Our Saviour calls her the queen of the south, for Sheba lay south of Canaan. The common opinion is that it was in Africa; and the Christians in Ethiopia, to this day, are confident that she came from their country, and that Candace was her successor, who is mentioned Acts viii. 27. But it is more probable that she came from the south part of Arabia.

I. On what errand the queen of Sheba came—not to treat of trade or commerce, but, 1. To satisfy her curiosity; for she had heard of his fame, especially for wisdom. 2. To receive instruction from him. She came to hear his wisdom, and thereby to improve her own (Matt. xii. 42), that she might be the better able to govern her own kingdom by his maxims of policy. But that which she chiefly aimed at was to be instructed in the things of God.

II. With what equipage she came, with a very great retinue, agreeable to her rank. Yet she came not as one begging, but brought enough abundantly to recompense Solomon for his attention to her, nothing mean or common, but gold, and precious stones, and spices, because she came to trade for wisdom.

III. What entertainment Solomon gave her. He despised not the weakness of her sex, but made her welcome and all her train, gave her liberty to put all her questions, to commune with him of all that was in her heart (v. 2) and gave her a satisfactory answer to all her questions (v. 3), whether natural, moral, political, or divine. But he informed her no doubt, with particular care, concerning God, and his law and instituted worship.

IV. How she was affected with what she saw and heard in Solomon's court. Divers things are here mentioned which she admired, the buildings and furniture of his palace, the provision that was made every day for his table, the orderly sitting of his servants, every one in his place, and the ready attendance of his ministers. But, above all these, the first thing mentioned is his wisdom (v. 4), and the last thing mentioned, which crowned all, is his piety, the ascent by which he went up to the house of the Lord.

V. How she expressed herself upon this occasion. 1. She owned her expectation far out-done, though it was highly raised by the report she heard, v. 6, 7. She is far from repenting her journey or calling herself a fool for undertaking it, but acknowledges it was well worth her while to come so far for the sight of that which she could not believe the report of. Those who, through grace, are brought to experience the delights of communion with God will say that the one-half was not told them of the pleasures of Wisdom's ways and the advantages of her gates. Glorified saints, much more, will say that it was a true report which they heard of the happiness of heaven, but that the thousandth part was not told them, 1 Cor. ii. 9. 2. She pronounced those happy that constantly attended him, and waited on him at table: "Happy are thy men, happy are these thy servants (v. 8); they may improve their own wisdom by hearing thine." 3. She blessed God, the giver of Solomon's wisdom and wealth, and the author of his advancement, who had made him king. "He has made thee king, not that thou mayest live in pomp and pleasure, and do what thou wilt, but to do judgment and justice."

VI. How they parted. 1. She made a noble present to Solomon of gold and spices, v. 10. The present of gold and spices which the wise men of the east brought to Christ was signified by this, Matt. ii. 11. Thus she paid for the wisdom she had learned and did not think she bought it dearly. Let those that are taught of God give him their hearts, and the present will be more acceptable than this of gold and spices. The almug-trees are here spoken of (v. 11, 12) as extraordinary, because perhaps much admired by the queen of Sheba. 2. Solomon was not behind-hand with her: He gave her whatsoever she asked, patterns, we may suppose, of those things that were curious, by which she might make the like; or perhaps he gave her his precepts of wisdom and piety in writing, besides that which he gave her of his royal bounty, v. 13.

Verses 14–29

A further account of Solomon's prosperity.

I. How he increased his wealth. 1. Besides the gold that came from Ophir (ch. ix. 28), he brought so much into his country from other places that the whole amounted, every year, to 666 talents (v. 14). 2. He received a great deal in customs from the merchants, and in land-taxes from the countries his father had conquered and made tributaries to Israel, v. 15. 3. He was Hiram's partner in a Tharshish fleet, of Tyre, which imported once in three years, not only gold, and silver, and ivory, substantial goods and serviceable, but apes and peacocks, v. 22. 4. He had presents made him, every year, from the neighbouring princes and great men, because they had often occasion to consult him as an oracle, and sent him these presents by way of recompence for his advice in politics. 5. He traded to Egypt for horses and linen-yarn (or, as some read it, linen-cloth), the staple commodities of that country, and had his own merchants or factors whom he employed in this traffic and who were accountable to him, v. 28, 29.

II. What use he made of his wealth.

1. He laid out his gold in fine things for himself, which he might the better be allowed to do when he had before laid out so much in fine things for the house of God. (1) He made 200 targets, and 300 shields, of beaten gold (v. 16, 17), not for service, but for state, to be carried before him when he appeared in pomp. Solomon had shields and targets carried before him, to signify that he took more pleasure in using his power for the defence and protection of the good, to whom he would be a praise. (2) He made a stately throne, on which he sat, to give laws to his subjects, audience to ambassadors, and judgment upon appeals, v. 18–20. It was made of ivory, or elephants' teeth, which was very rich; and yet, as if he had so much gold that he knew not what to do with it, he overlaid that with gold, the best gold. (3) He made all his drinking vessels, and all the furniture of his table, even at his country seat, of pure gold, v. 21.

2. He made it circulate among his subjects, so that the kingdom was as rich as the king; for he had no separate interests of his own to consult, but sought the welfare of his people. Solomon was instrumental to bring so much gold into the country, and disperse it, that silver was nothing accounted of, v. 21. If gold in abundance would make silver to seem so despicable, shall not wisdom, and grace, and the foretastes of heaven, which are far better than gold, make earthly wealth seem much more despicable?

Now let us remember, 1. That this was he who, when he was setting out in the world, did not ask for the wealth and honour of it, but asked for a wise and understanding heart. 2. That this was he who, having tasted all these enjoyments, wrote a whole book to show the vanity of all worldly things and the folly of setting our hearts upon them, and to recommend to us the practice of serious godliness, which, through the grace of God, is within our reach, when the thousandth part of Solomon's greatness is a thousand times more than we can ever be so vain as to promise ourselves in this world.

CHAP. XI

Hitherto we have read nothing of Solomon but what was great and good; but the lustre both of his goodness and of his greatness is here sullied and eclipsed, and his sun sets under a cloud. I. The glory of his piety is stained by his departure from God and his duty, in his latter days, marrying strange wives and worshipping strange gods, ver. 4–8. II. The glory of his prosperity is stained by God's displeasure against him and the fruits of that displeasure.

Verses 1–8

Solomon's defection and degeneracy.

I. Let us enquire into the occasions and particulars of it. There was no king like Solomon who was beloved of his God, yet even him did outlandish women cause to sin. There is the summary of his apostasy.

1. He doted on strange women, many strange women. (1) He gave himself to women, which his mother had particularly cautioned him against. Prov. xxxi. 3, Give not thy strength unto women (perhaps alluding to Samson, who lost his strength by giving information of it to a woman). His father David's fall began with the lusts of the flesh. The love of women has cast down many wounded (Prov. vii. 26) and many (says Bishop Hall) have had their head broken by their own rib. (2) He took many women, so many that, at last, they amounted to 700 wives and 300 concubines, 1,000 in all. Divine wisdom has appointed one woman for one man, and those who do not think one enough will not think two or three enough. (3) They were strange women, Moabites, Ammonites, &c., of the nations which God had particularly forbidden them to inter-marry with, v. 2. Some think it was in policy that he married these foreigners, by them to get intelligence of the state of those countries. (4) To complete the mischief, Solomon clave unto these in love, v. 2. Solomon was master of a great deal of knowledge, but to what purpose, when he had no better a government of his appetites?

2. He was drawn by them to the worship of strange gods, as Israel to Baal-peor by the daughters of Moab. His wives turned away his heart after other gods, v. 3, 4. (1) He grew cool and indifferent in his own religion and remiss in the service of the God of Israel: His heart was not perfect with the Lord his God (v. 4), nor did he follow him fully (v. 6), like David. He was not perfect, because he was not constant. (2) He tolerated and maintained his wives in their idolatry and made no scruple of joining with them in it. He built chapels for their gods (v. 7, 8), maintained their priests, and occasionally did himself attend their altars, making a jest of it, asking, "What harm is there in it? Are not all religions alike?" which (says Bishop Patrick) has been the disease of some great wits. These high places continued here, not utterly demolished, till Josiah's time, 2 Kings xxiii. 13. This is the account here given of Solomon's apostasy.

II. Let us now pause a while, and lament Solomon's fall; and we must justly stand and wonder at it.

1. How strange, (1) That Solomon, in his old age, should be ensnared with fleshly lusts, youthful lusts. (2) That so wise a man as Solomon was, so famed for a quick understanding and sound judgment, should suffer himself to be made such a fool of by these foolish women. (3) That one who had so often and so plainly warned others of the danger of the love of women should himself be so wretchedly bewitched with it; it is easier to see a mischief, and to show it to others, than to shun it ourselves. (4) That so good a man, so zealous for the worship of God, should do these sinful things.

2. What shall we say to all this? (1) Let him that thinks he stands take heed lest he fall. We see how weak we are of ourselves, without the grace of God; let us therefore live in a constant dependence on that grace. (2) See the danger of a prosperous condition, and how hard it is to overcome the temptations of it. Solomon, like Jeshurun, waxed fat and then kicked. (3) See what need those have to stand upon their guard who have made a great profession of religion, and shown themselves forward and zealous in devotion, because the devil will set upon them most violently, and, if they misbehave, the reproach is the greater. It is the evening that commends the day; let us therefore fear, lest, having run well, we seem to come short.

I. God's anger against Solomon for his sin. The thing he did displeased the Lord for there was in his sin, 1. The most base ingratitude that could be. God's appearing to Solomon was such a sensible confirmation of his faith as should have for ever prevented his worshipping any other god. 2. The most wilful disobedience. This was the very thing concerning which God had commanded him—that he should not go after other gods, yet he was not restrained by such an express admonition, v. 10.

II. The message he sent him hereupon (v. 11): The Lord said unto Solomon (it is likely by a prophet) that he must expect to smart for his apostasy. And here, 1. The sentence is just, that, since he had revolted from God, part of his kingdom should revolt from his family. Sin brings ruin upon families, cuts off entails, alienates estates, and lays men's honour in the dust. 2. Yet the mitigations of it are very kind, for David's sake (v. 12, 13), that is, for the sake of the promise made to David. The kingdom shall be rent from Solomon's house, but, (1) Not immediately. Solomon shall not live to see it done, but it shall be rent out of the hand of his son, a son that was born to him by one of his strange wives, for his mother was an Ammonitess (1 Kings xiv. 31). (2) Not wholly. One tribe, that of Judah, the strongest and most numerous, shall remain to the house of David (v. 13), for Jerusalem's sake, which David built, and for the sake of the temple there, which Solomon built; these shall not go into other hands.

Upon this message which God graciously sent to Solomon, to awaken his conscience and bring him to repentance, we have reason to hope that he humbled himself before God, confessed his sin, begged pardon, and returned to his duty, that he then published his repentance in the book of Ecclesiastes. That penitential sermon was as true an indication of a heart broken for sin and turned from it as David's penitential psalms were, though of another nature. God's grace in his people works variously. Thus, though Solomon fell, he was not utterly cast down; what God had said to David concerning him was fulfilled: I will chasten him with the rod of men, but my mercy shall not depart from him, 2 Sam. vii. 14, 15. Though God may suffer those whom he loves to fall into sin, he will not suffer them to lie still in it.

An account of two adversaries that appeared against him, inconsiderable, and that could not have done anything worth taking notice of if Solomon had not first made God his enemy. What hurt could Hadad or Rezon have done to so great and powerful a king as Solomon was if he had not, by sin, made himself mean and weak? And then those little people menace and insult him.

I. Both these adversaries God stirred up, v. 14, 23. Though they themselves were moved by principles of ambition or revenge, God made use of them to serve his design of correcting Solomon.

II. Both these adversaries had the origin of their enmity to Solomon and Israel laid in David's time, and in his conquests of their respective countries, v. 15, 24. Solomon had the benefit and advantage of his father's successes both in the enlargement of his dominion and the increase of his treasure, and would never have known anything but the benefit of them if he had kept closely to God; but now he finds evils to balance the advantages.

1. Hadad, an Edomite, was an adversary to Solomon. (1) What induced him to bear Solomon a grudge. David had conquered Edom, 2 Sam. viii. 14. Joab put all the males to the sword, v. 15, 16. A terrible execution he made, avenging on Edom their old enmity to Israel. From this general slaughter, while Joab was burying the slain, Hadad, a branch of the royal family, then a little child, was taken and preserved by some of the king's servants, and conveyed to Egypt, v. 17. They halted by the way, in Midian first, and then in Paran, where they furnished themselves with men to attend them, that their young master might go into Egypt with an equipage agreeable to his quality. There he was kindly sheltered by Pharaoh, as a distressed prince, and so recommended himself that he married the queen's sister (v. 19), and by her had a child, which the queen herself conceived such a kindness for that she brought him up in Pharaoh's house, among the king's children. (2) What enabled him to do Solomon a mischief. Upon the death of David and Joab, he returned to his own country, in which, it should seem, he settled and remained quiet while Solomon continued wise and watchful for the public good, but from which he had opportunity of making inroads upon Israel when Solomon, having sinned away his wisdom as Samson did his strength, forfeited the divine protection. What vexation Hadad gave to Solomon we are not here told, but only how loth Pharaoh was to part with him and how earnestly he solicited his stay (v. 22): What hast thou lacked with me? "Nothing," says Hadad; "but let me go to my own country, my native air, my native soil."

2. Rezon, a Syrian, was another adversary to Solomon. When David conquered the Syrians, he headed the remains, lived at large by spoil and rapine, till Solomon grew careless, and then he got possession of Damascus, reigned there (v. 24) and over the country about (v. 25), and he created troubles to Israel, probably in conjunction with Hadad, all the days of Solomon (namely, after his apostasy).

Verses 26–40

Here is the first mention of that infamous name Jeroboam the son of Nebat, that made Israel to sin, an adversary to Solomon. God had expressly told (v. 11) that he would give the greatest part of his kingdom to his servant, and Jeroboam was the man.

I. Of his extraction, v. 26. He was of the tribe of Ephraim, the next in honour to Judah. His mother was a widow.

II. Of his elevation. It was Solomon's wisdom, when he had work to do, to employ proper persons in it. Jeroboam was ruler of the burden, or tribute, that is, either of the taxes or of the militia of the house of Joseph. Observe a difference between David, and both his predecessor and his successor: when Saul saw a valiant man he took him to himself (1 Sam. xiv. 52); when Solomon saw an industrious man he preferred him.

III. Of his designation to the government of the ten tribes after the death of Solomon. The Jews say that when he was employed by Solomon in building Millo he took opportunities of reflecting upon Solomon as oppressive to his people, and suggesting that which would alienate them from his government. Solomon made him ruler over the tribes of Joseph, and, as he was going to take possession of his government, he was told by a prophet in God's name that he should be king, which emboldened him to aim high, and in some instances to oppose the king. 1. The prophet by whom this message was sent was Ahijah of Shiloh; we shall read of him again, ch. xiv. 2. It seems, Shiloh was not so perfectly forsaken and forgotten of God but that, in remembrance of the former days, it was blessed with a prophet. 2. The sign by which it was represented to him was the rending of a garment into twelve pieces, and giving him ten, v. 30, 31. The prophets, both true and false, used such signs, even in the New Testament, as Agabus, Acts xxi. 10, 11. 3. The message itself, which is very particular. (1) He assures him that he shall be king over ten of the twelve tribes of Israel, v. 31. (2) He tells him the reason; not for his good character or deserts, but for the chastising of Solomon's apostasy: "Because he, and his family, and many of his people with him, have forsaken me, and worshipped other gods," v. 33. Jeroboam did not deserve so good a post, but Israel deserved so bad a prince. (3) He limits his expectations to the ten tribes only, and to them in reversion after the death of Solomon, lest he should aim at the whole and give immediate disturbance to Solomon's government. He is here told, [1] That two tribes (called here one tribe, because little Benjamin was in a manner lost in the thousands of Judah) should remain sure to the house of David, and he must never make any attempt upon them. He must not think that David was rejected, as Saul was. The house of David must be supported and kept in reputation, for all this, because out of it the Messiah must arise. Destroy it not, for that blessing is in it. [2] That Solomon must keep possession during his life, v. 34, 35. Jeroboam therefore must not offer to dethrone him, but wait with patience till his day shall come to fall. Children that do not tread in their parents' steps yet often fare the better in this world for their good parents' piety. (4) He gives him to understand that he will be upon his good behaviour. "If thou wilt do what is right in my sight, I will build thee a sure house, and not otherwise" (v. 38).

IV. Jeroboam's flight into Egypt, v. 40. In some way or other Solomon came to know of all this, probably from Jeroboam's own talk of it. 1. Solomon foolishly sought to kill his successor. 2. Jeroboam prudently withdrew into Egypt.

We have here the conclusion of Solomon's story, and in it, 1. Reference is had to another history then extant, but since lost, the Book of the Acts of Solomon, v. 41. Probably this book was written by a chronologer whom Solomon employed to write his annals, out of which the sacred writer extracted what God saw fit to transmit to the church. 2. A summary of the years of his reign (v. 42): His reign was as long as his father's, but not his life. Sin shortened his days. 3. His death and burial, and his successor, v. 43. (1) He followed his fathers to the grave, slept with them, and was buried in David's burying-place. (2) His son followed him in the throne.

CHAP. XII

The glory of the kingdom of Israel was in its height and perfection in Solomon; it was long in coming to it, but it soon declined, and began to sink and wither in the very next reign. I. Rehoboam's accession to the throne and Jeroboam's return out of Egypt, ver. 1, 2. II. The people's petition to Rehoboam for the redress of grievances, and the rough answer he gave, by the advice of his young counsellors, ver. 3–15. III. The revolt of the ten tribes and their setting up Jeroboam, ver. 16–20. IV. Rehoboam's attempt to reduce them and the prohibition God gave to that attempt, ver. 21–24. V. Jeroboam's establishment of his government upon idolatry, ver. 25–33. Thus did Judah become weak, being deserted by their brethren, and Israel, by deserting the house of the Lord.

Solomon had 1,000 wives and concubines, yet we read but of one son he had to bear up his name, and he a fool. Sin is a bad way of building up a family. Rehoboam was the son of the wisest of men, yet did not inherit his father's wisdom. Neither wisdom nor grace runs in the blood. Solomon's court was a mart of wisdom and the rendezvous of learned men, and Rehoboam was the darling of the court; and yet all was not sufficient to make him a wise man.

I. The people desired a treaty with him at Shechem, and he condescended to meet them there. 1. Their pretence was to make him king, but the design was to unmake him. They would give him a public inauguration in another place than the city of David, that he might not seem to be king of Judah only. 2. The place was ominous: at Shechem, where Abimelech set up himself (Judges ix.); yet it had been famous for the convention of the states there, Joshua xxiv. 1. Rehoboam knew of the threatening, that the kingdom should be rent from him, and hoped by going to Shechem, and treating there with the ten tribes, to prevent it: yet it proved the most impolitic thing he could do, and hastened the rupture.

II. The representatives of the tribes addressed him, praying to be eased of the taxes they were burdened with. The meeting being appointed, they sent for Jeroboam out of Egypt to come and be their speaker. In their address, 1. They complain of the last reign: Thy father made our yoke grievous, v. 4. They complain not of his father's idolatry, so careless and indifferent were they in the matters of religion, as if God or Moloch were all one, so they might but live at ease and pay no taxes. Yet the complaint was groundless and unjust. Never did people live more at ease than they did, nor in greater plenty. Did they pay taxes? It was to advance the strength and magnificence of their kingdom. If Solomon's buildings cost them money, they cost them no blood, as war would do. Factious spirits will never want something to complain of. I know nothing in Solomon's administration that could make the people's yoke grievous, unless perhaps the women were connived at in oppressing them. 2. They demand relief from him, and on this condition will continue in their allegiance to the house of David.

III. Rehoboam consulted with those about him concerning the answer he should give to this address. 1. The grave experienced men of his council advised him by all means to give the petitioners a kind answer, and that he would redress all their grievances. The way to rule is to serve, to do good, and stoop to do it, to become all things to all men and so win their hearts. 2. The young men of his council were hot and haughty, and they advised him to return a severe and threatening answer to the people's demands. It was an instance of Rehoboam's weakness, (1) That he did not prefer aged counsellors, but had a better opinion of the young men that had grown up with him and with whom he was familiar, v. 8. It is of great consequence to young people, setting out in the world, on whom they depend upon for advice. If they reckon those that feed their pride, and further them in their pleasures, their best friends, they are already marked for ruin. (2) That he did not prefer moderate counsels, but was pleased with those that advised him to double the taxes. These young counsellors thought the old men expressed themselves but dully, v. 7. The old men did not undertake to put words into Rehoboam's mouth, but the young men will furnish him with very quaint and pretty phrases: My little finger shall be thicker than my father's loins, &c. That is not always the best sense that is best worded.

IV. He answered the people according to the counsel of the young men, v. 14, 15. He affected to be haughty and imperious, and fancied he could carry all before him with a high hand.

1. How Rehoboam was infatuated in his counsels. (1) He owned their reflections upon his father's government to be true: My father made your yoke heavy; and therein he was unjust to his father's memory. (2) He fancied himself better able to manage them, and impose upon them, than his father was. (3) He threatened not only to squeeze them by taxes, but to chastise them by cruel laws. (4) He gave this provocation to a people that by long ease and prosperity were made wealthy, and strong, and proud, to a people that were now disposed to revolt, and had one ready to head them.

2. How God's counsels were hereby fulfilled. It was from the Lord, v. 15. He left Rehoboam to his own folly, and hid from his eyes the things which belonged to his peace. Those that lose the kingdom of heaven throw it away, as Rehoboam did his, by their own wilfulness and folly.

The rending of the kingdom of the ten tribes from the house of David, to effect which,

I. The people were bold and resolute in their revolt. What portion have we in David? v. 16. Had they enquired who gave Rehoboam this advice, and taken a course to remove those evil counsellors from about him, the rupture might have been prevented. Thus to rebel against the seed of David, whom God had advanced to the kingdom (entailing it on his seed), and to set up another king in opposition to that family, was a great sin; see 2 Chron. xiii. 5–8. (And it is here mentioned to the praise of the tribe of Judah that they followed the house of David (v. 17, 20), and found Rehoboam better than his word, nor did he rule with the rigour which at first he threatened.)

II. Rehoboam was imprudent in the further management of this affair. 1. He was very unadvised in sending Adoram, who was over the tribute, to treat with them, v. 18. The very sight of him, whose name was odious among them, exasperated them, and made them outrageous. 2. Some think he was also unadvised in quitting his ground, and making so much haste to Jerusalem, for thereby he deserted his friends and gave advantage to his enemies, who had gone to their tents indeed (v. 16) in disgust, but did not offer to make Jeroboam king till Rehoboam had gone, v. 20.

III. God forbade his attempt to recover by the sword what he had lost. The thing must rest as it is, and therefore God forbids the battle. 1. It was brave in Rehoboam to design the reducing of the revolters by force. His courage came to him when he had come to Jerusalem, v. 21. Judah and Benjamin (who feared the Lord and the king, and meddled not with those that were given to change) presently raised an army of 180,000 men, for the recovery of their king's right to the ten tribes, and were resolved to stand by him. 2. It was more brave in Rehoboam to desist when God, by a prophet, ordered him to lay down his arms. To proceed in this war would be not only to fight against their brethren (v. 24), whom they ought to love, but to fight against their God, to whom they ought to submit. Rehoboam and his people hearkened to the word of the Lord, disbanded the army, and acquiesced. (1) They regarded the command of God though sent by a poor prophet. (2) They consulted their own interest, concluding that though they had all the advantages, even that of right, on their side, yet they could not prosper if they fought in disobedience to God.

The beginning of the reign of Jeroboam. He built Shechem first and then Penuel—beautified and fortified them, but he formed another project for the establishing of his kingdom which was fatal to the interests of religion in it.

I. That which he designed was by some effectual means to secure those to himself who had now chosen him for their king, and to prevent their return to the house of David, v. 26, 27. 1. He was jealous of the people, afraid that, some time or other, they would kill him and go again to Rehoboam. Jeroboam could not put any confidence in the affections of his people, for what is got by usurpation cannot be enjoyed nor kept with any security. 2. He was distrustful of the promise of God, but he would contrive ways and means, and sinful ones too, for his own safety. A practical disbelief of God's all-sufficiency is at the bottom of all our treacherous departures from him.

II. The way he took to do this was by keeping the people from going up to Jerusalem to worship.

1. Jeroboam apprehended that, if the people continued to do this, they would in time return to the house of David, allured by the magnificence both of the court and of the temple. If they cleave to their old religion, they will go back to their old king.

2. He therefore dissuaded them from going up to Jerusalem, pretending to consult their ease: "It is too much for you to go so far to worship God, v. 28. Why should we now be tied to one place any more than in Samuel's time?"

3. He provided for the assistance of their devotion at home. Upon consultation with some of his politicians, he set up two golden calves, as tokens or signs of the divine presence, and some are so charitable as to think they were made to represent the mercy-seat and the cherubim over the ark: but more probably he adopted the idolatry of the Egyptians, in whose land he had sojourned for some time and who worshipped their god Apis under the similitude of a bull or calf. He intended, no doubt, by these to represent, or rather make present, not any false god, as Moloch or Chemosh, but the true God only, the God of Israel, the God that brought them up out of the land of Egypt, as he declares, v. 28. So that it was no violation of the first commandment, but the second. He set up two, by degrees to break people off from the belief of the unity of the godhead, which would pave the way to the polytheism of the Pagans.

4. The people complied with him herein, and were fond enough of the novelty: They went to worship before the one, even unto Dan (v. 30). Those that thought it much to go to Jerusalem, to worship God according to his institution, made no difficulty of going twice as far, to Dan, to worship him according to their own inventions. God had sometimes dispensed with the law concerning worshipping in one place, but never allowed the worship of him by images.

5. Having set up the gods, he fitted up accommodations for them. (1) He made a house of high-places, or of altars, one temple at Dan, we may suppose, and another at Beth-el (v. 31), and in each many altars. (2) He made priests of the lowest of the people; and the lowest of the people were good enough to be priests to his calves, and too good. He made priests out of every corner of the country. Thus were they dispersed as the Levites, but were not of the sons of Levi. But the priests of the high-places, or altars, he ordered to reside in Beth-el, as the priests at Jerusalem (v. 32), to attend the public service. (3) The feast of tabernacles, which God had appointed on the fifteenth day of the seventh month, he adjourned to the fifteenth day of the eighth month (v. 32), the month which he devised of his own heart, to show his power in ecclesiastical matters, v. 33. (4) He himself assuming a power to make priests, no marvel if he undertook to do the priests' work with his own hands: He offered upon the altar. He did it himself to get the reputation of a devout man. And thus, [1] Jeroboam sinned himself, yet perhaps excused himself that he did not do so ill as Solomon did, who worshipped other gods. [2] He made Israel to sin, drew them off from the worship of God and entailed idolatry upon their seed.

CHAP. XIII

Jeroboam attending his altar at Beth-el, when he received a testimony from God against his idolatry and apostasy. This was sent to him by a prophet, a man of God that lived in Judah. I. What passed between him and the new king. 1. The prophet threatened Jeroboam's altar (ver. 1, 2), and gave him a sign (ver. 3), which immediately came to pass, ver. 5. 2. The king threatened the prophet, and was himself made another sign, by the withering of his hand (ver. 4), and the restoring of it upon his submission and the prophet's intercession, ver. 6. 3. The prophet refused the kindness offered him thereupon, ver. 7–10. II. What passed between him and the old prophet. 1. The old prophet fetched him back by a lie, and gave him entertainment, ver. 11–19. 2. He, for accepting it, in disobedience to the divine command, is threatened with death, ver. 20–22. And, 3. The threatening is executed, for he is slain by a lion (ver. 23, 24), and buried at Beth-el, ver. 25–32. 4. Jeroboam is hardened in his idolatry, ver. 32, 34. "Thy judgments, Lord, are a great deep."

I. A messenger sent to Jeroboam, to signify to him God's displeasure against his idolatry, v. 1. The army of Judah that aimed to ruin him was countermanded, and might not draw a sword against him (ch. xii. 24); but a prophet of Judah is sent to reclaim him from his evil way, and is sent in time, while he is but dedicating his altar, before his heart is hardened, for God delights not in the death of sinners, but would rather they would turn and live.

II. The message delivered in God's name, not whispered, but cried with a loud voice, denoting both the prophet's courage, and his earnestness. It was directed, not to Jeroboam nor to the people, but to the altar. Yet, in threatening the altar, God threatened the founder and worshippers, who might conclude, "If God's wrath fasten upon the lifeless guiltless altar, how shall we escape?" That which was foretold concerning the altar (v. 2) was that, in process of time, a prince of the house of David, Josiah by name, should pollute this altar by sacrificing the idolatrous priests themselves upon it, and burning the bones of dead men. Let Jeroboam know and be sure, 1. That the altar he now consecrated should be desecrated. 2. That the priests of the high places he now made should themselves be made sacrifices to the justice of God. 3. That this should be done by a branch of the house of David. It was about 356 years ere this prediction was fulfilled, yet it was spoken of as sure and nigh at hand, for a thousand years with God are but as one day.

III. A sign is given for the confirming of the truth of this prediction, that the altar should be shaken to pieces by an invisible power and the ashes of the sacrifice scattered (v. 3), which came to pass immediately, v. 5. This was, 1. A proof that the prophet was sent of God, who confirmed the word with this sign following, Mark xvi. 20. 2. A present indication of God's displeasure against these idolatrous sacrifices. 3. It was a reproach to the people, whose hearts were harder than these stones and rent not under the word of the Lord. 4. It was a specimen of what should be done to it in the accomplishment of this prophecy by Josiah; it was now rent, in token of its being then ruined.

IV. Jeroboam's hand withered, which he stretched out to seize or smite the man of God, v. 4. Jeroboam's inability to pull in his hand made him a spectacle to all about him, that they might see and fear. If God, in justice, harden the hearts of sinners, so that the hand they had stretched out in sin they cannot pull in again by repentance, that is a spiritual judgment, represented by this, and much more dreadful.

V. The sudden healing of the hand that was suddenly dried up, upon his submission, v. 6. That word of God which should have touched his conscience humbled him not, but this which touched his bone and his flesh brings down his proud spirit. He looks for help now, 1. Not from his calves, but from God only, from his power and his favour. 2. Not by his own sacrifice or incense, but by the prayer and intercession of the prophet, whom he had just now threatened and aimed to destroy. But observe, He did not desire the prophet to pray that his sin might be pardoned, and his heart changed, only that his hand might be restored. The prophet immediately addresses himself to God for him. God put this further honour upon him, that at his word he recalled the judgment and by another miracle healed the withered hand, that by the goodness of God Jeroboam might be led to repentance, and, if he were not broken by the judgment, yet might be melted by the mercy. With both he seemed affected for the present, but the impressions wore off.

VI. The prophet's refusal of Jeroboam's kind invitation, in which observe, 1. That God forbade his messenger to eat or drink in Beth-el (v. 9), to show his detestation of their execrable idolatry and apostasy from God. 2. That Jeroboam was so affected with the cure of his hand that he was willing to express his gratitude to the prophet and pay him for his prayers, v. 7. 3. That the prophet, though hungry and weary, and perhaps poor, in obedience to the divine command refused both the entertainment and the reward proffered him.

The man of God had honestly and resolutely refused the king's invitation, though he promised him a reward; yet he was over-persuaded by an old prophet to come back with him, and dine in Beth-el, contrary to the command given him. Here we find how dearly his dinner cost him.

I. The old prophet's wickedness. I cannot but call him a false prophet. Perhaps he was trained up among the sons of the prophets, in one of Samuel's colleges not far off, whence he retained the name of a prophet, but, growing worldly and profane, the spirit of prophecy had departed from him. If he had been a good prophet he would have reproved Jeroboam's idolatry. 1. Whether he had any good design in fetching back the man of God is not certain. One may hope that he did it in compassion to him, concluding he wanted refreshment. I suppose it was done with a bad design, for false prophets have ever been the worst enemies to the true prophets, usually aiming to destroy them, but sometimes, as here, to debauch them and draw them from their duty. But, 2. It is certain that he took a very bad method to bring him back. When the man of God had told him, "I may not, and therefore I will not, return to eat bread with thee," he wickedly pretended that he had an order from heaven to fetch him back.

II. The good prophet's weakness, in suffering himself to be thus imposed upon: He went back with him, v. 19. He that had resolution enough to refuse the invitation of the king, who promised him a reward, could not resist the insinuations of one that pretended to be a prophet. The message delivered to the man of God was strange. Judgment is given upon it: "Thou shalt never reach thy own house, but shalt be a carcase quickly, nor shall thy dead body be brought to the place of thy father's sepulchres, to be interred." Yet it was more strange that the old prophet himself should be the messenger. The message could not but affect him the more when he himself had the delivering of it, and had so strong an impression made upon his spirit by it that he cried out, as one in an agony, v. 21. Perhaps it had a good effect upon him. Those who preach God's wrath to others have hard hearts indeed if they fear it not themselves.

I. The death of the deceived disobedient prophet. The old prophet that had deluded him, furnished him with an ass to ride home on; but by the way a lion set upon him, and killed him, v. 23, 24. Did he think this old prophet's house safer to eat in than other houses at Beth-el, when God had forbidden him to eat in any? That was to refine upon the command, and make himself wiser than God. Nothing is more provoking to him than disobedience to an express command. God is displeased at the sins of his own people, and no man shall be protected in disobedience by the sanctity of his profession, the dignity of his office, his nearness to God, or any good services he has done for him.

II. The wonderful preservation of his dead body, which was a token of God's mercy remembered in the midst of wrath. The lion that gently strangled him, or tore him, did not devour his dead body, nor so much as tear the ass, v. 24, 25, 28. Nay, what was more, he did not set upon the old prophet when he came to take up the corpse.

III. The care which the old prophet took of his burial. The case was indeed very lamentable that so good a man, a prophet so faithful, and so bold in God's cause, should, for one offence, die as a criminal, while an old lying prophet lives at ease and an idolatrous prince in pomp and power. We cannot judge of men by their sufferings, nor of sins by their present punishments; with some the flesh is destroyed that the spirit may be saved.

IV. The charge which the old prophet gave his sons concerning his own burial, that they should be sure to bury him in the same grave where the man of God was buried (v. 3): "Lay my bones beside his bones." Though he was a lying prophet, yet he desired to die the death of a true prophet. "Gather not my soul with the sinners of Beth-el, but with the man of God." He does honour to the deceased prophet, as one whose word would not fall to the ground, though he did. It was foretold that men's bones should be burnt upon Jeroboam's altar: "Lay mine (says he) close to his, and then they will not be disturbed"; and it was, accordingly, their security, as we find, 2 Kings xxiii. 18. No mention is made here of the inscription on the prophet's tomb; but it is spoken of 2 Kings xxiii. 17, where Josiah asks, What title is that? and is told, It is the sepulchre of the man of God that came from Judah, who proclaimed these things which thou hast done.

V. The obstinacy of Jeroboam in his idolatry (v. 33): He returned not from his evil way; some hand was found that durst repair the altar God had rent, and then Jeroboam offered sacrifice on it again. Various methods had been used to reclaim him, but neither threats nor signs, neither judgments nor mercies, wrought upon him, so strangely was he wedded to his calves.

CHAP. XIV

The kingdom divided into that of Judah and that of Israel. I. The prophecy of the destruction of Jeroboam's house, ver. 7–16. The sickness of his child was the occasion of it (ver. 1–6), and the death of his child the earnest of it (ver. 17, 18), together with the conclusion of his reign, ver. 19, 20. II. The history of the declension and diminution of Rehoboam's house and kingdom (ver. 21–28) and the conclusion of his reign, ver. 29–31.

Verses 1-6

Jeroboam persisted in his contempt of God and religion.

I. His child fell sick, v. 1. It is probable that he was his eldest son, and heir-apparent to the crown; for at his death all the kingdom went into mourning for him, v. 13. At that time, when Jeroboam prostituted and profaned the priesthood (ch. xiii. 33), his child sickened.

II. He sent his wife in disguise to enquire of Ahijah the prophet what should become of the child, v. 2, 3.

1. Jeroboam's great desire, under this affliction, is to know what shall become of the child, whether he will live or die. (1) It would have been more prudent if he had desired to know what means they should use for the recovery of the child, but by this instance, and those of Ahaziah (2 Kings i. 2) and Benhadad (2 Kings viii. 8), it should seem they had then such a foolish notion of fatality as took them off from all use of means; for, if they were sure the patient would live, they thought means needless; if he would die, they thought them useless. (2) It would have been more pious if he had begged the prophet's prayers, and cast away his idols from him; then the child might have been restored to him, as his hand was. But most people would rather be told their fortune than their faults or their duty.

2. That he might know the child's doom, he sent to Ahijah the prophet, who lived obscurely and neglected in Shiloh, blind through age, yet still blest with the visions of the Almighty, which need not bodily eyes, but are rather favoured by the want of them, the eyes of the mind being then most intent and least diverted. Jeroboam sent not to him for advice about the setting up of his calves, or the consecrating of his priests, but had recourse to him in his distress, when the gods he served could give him no relief. He sent to Ahijah, because he had told him he should be king, v. 2. "He was once the messenger of good tidings, surely he will be so again." Those that by sin disqualify themselves for comfort, and yet expect their ministers, because they are good men, should speak peace and comfort to them, greatly wrong both themselves and their ministers.

3. He sent his wife to enquire of the prophet, because she could best put the question without naming names, or making any other description than this, "Sir, I have a son ill; will he recover or not?" It would have been much fitter for her to have stayed at home to tend him than go to Shiloh to enquire what would become of him. If she go, she must go incognito – in disguise, not only to conceal herself from her own court and the country through which she passed, but also to conceal herself from the prophet himself, that he might only answer her question concerning her son, and not enter upon the unpleasing subject of her husband's defection.

III. God gave Ahijah notice of the approach of Jeroboam's wife, and that she came in disguise, and full instructions what to say to her (v. 5), which enabled him, as she came in at the door, to call her by her name, to her great surprise, and so to discover to all about him who she was (v. 6): Come in, thou wife of Jeroboam, why feignest thou thyself to be another?

1. The prophet anticipates the enquiry concerning the child, and foretells the ruin of Jeroboam's house for the wickedness of it.

1. God calls himself the Lord God of Israel. Though Israel had forsaken God, God had not cast them off. He is Israel's God, and therefore will take vengeance on him who did them the greatest mischief he could do them, debauched them and drew them away from God.

2. He upbraids Jeroboam with the great favour he had bestowed upon him, in making him king over God's chosen Israel, and taking the kingdom from the house of David, to bestow it upon him.

3. He charges him with his impiety and apostasy, and his idolatry particularly: Thou hast done evil above all that were before thee, v. 9. Jeroboam's calves, though pretended to be set up in honour of the God of Israel, yet are here called other gods, or strange gods, because by them he changed the truth of God into a lie and represented him as altogether different from what he is, and because many of the ignorant worshippers terminated their devotion in the image, and did not at all regard the God of Israel.

4. He foretells the utter ruin of Jeroboam's house, v. 10, 11. See this fulfilled, ch. xv. 29.

5. He foretells the immediate death of the sick child, v. 12, 13.

(1) In mercy to him, lest, if he live, he be infected with the sin, and so involved in the ruin, of his father's house. Observe the character given of him: In him was found some good thing towards the Lord God of Israel, in the house of Jeroboam. The divine image in miniature has a peculiar beauty and lustre in it. He only, of all Jeroboam's family, shall die in honour, shall be buried, and shall be lamented as one that lived desired. This hopeful child dies first of all the family, for God often takes those soonest whom he loves best. Heaven is the fittest place for them; this earth is not worthy of them.

(2) In wrath to the family. It was a sign the family would be ruined when he was taken by whom it might have been reformed.

6. He foretells the setting up of another family to rule over Israel, v. 14. This was fulfilled in Baasha of Issachar, who conspired against Nadab the son of Jeroboam, in the second year of his reign, and murdered him and all his family.

7. He foretells the judgments which should come upon the people of Israel for conforming to the worship which Jeroboam had established. It is here foretold, v. 15, (1) That they should never be easy, not rightly settled in their land, but continually shaken like a reed in the water. After they left the house of David, the government never continued long in one family, but one undermined and destroyed another. (2) That they should, ere long, be totally expelled out of their land. This was fulfilled in the captivity of the ten tribes by the king of Assyria.

II. Jeroboam's wife has nothing to say against the word of the Lord, but she goes home with a heavy heart to their house in Tirzah, a sweet delightful place, so the name signifies, famed for its beauty, Cant. vi. 4. 1. The child died (v. 17), and justly did all Israel mourn, for the loss of so hopeful a prince. 2. Jeroboam himself died soon after, v. 20, when he had reigned twenty-two years, and left his crown to a son who lost it, and his life, too, and all the lives of his family, within two years after.

Judah's story and Israel's are intermixed. Jeroboam out-lived Rehoboam, four or five years, yet his history is despatched first, that the account of Rehoboam's reign may be laid together; and a sad account it is.

I. Here is no good said of the king. All the account we have of him here is, 1. That he was forty-one years old when he began to reign. 2. That he reigned seventeen years in Jerusalem, the city where God put his name, where he had opportunity enough to know his duty, if he had but had a heart to do it. 3. That his mother was Naamah, an Ammonitess; this is twice mentioned, v. 21, 31. Probably she was daughter to Shobi the Ammonite, who was kind to David (2 Sam. xvii. 27), and David was too willing to requite him by matching his son into his family. 4. That he had continual war with Jeroboam (v. 30), which could not but be a perpetual uneasiness to him. 5. That when he had reigned but seventeen years he died, and left his throne to his son.

II. Here is much evil said of the subjects, both as to their character and their condition.

1. It is a most sad account that is here given of their apostasy from God, v. 22–24. Judah, the only professing people God had in the world, did evil in his sight. Their fathers had been bad enough, especially in the times of the judges, but they did abominable things, above all that their fathers had done. Nothing less than the pouring out of the Spirit from on high will keep God's Israel in their allegiance to him. (1) They became vain in their imaginations concerning God, and changed his glory into an image, for they built themselves high places, images, and groves (v. 23), profaning God's name by affixing to it their images, and God's ordinances by serving their idols with them. (2) They were given up to vile affections (as those idolaters Rom. i. 26, 27), for there were sodomites in the land (v. 24), men with men working that which is unseemly, and not to be thought of, much less mentioned, without abhorrence and indignation. They dishonoured God by one sin and then God left them to dishonour themselves by another.

2. See here how weak and poor they were; and this was the consequence of the former. Shishak, king of Egypt, came against them, and so far, either by force or surrender, made himself master of Jerusalem itself that he took away the treasures both of the temple and of the exchequer, of the house of the Lord and of the king's house, which David and Solomon had amassed, v. 25, 26. He also took away the golden shields that were made but in his father's time, v. 26. These the king of Egypt carried off as trophies of his victory; and, instead of them, Rehoboam made brazen shields. This was an emblem of the diminution of his glory. Sin makes the gold become dim, changes the most fine gold, and turns it into brass.

CHAP. XV

In this chapter we have the history, I. Of two of the kings of Judah, Abijam, the days of whose reign were few and evil (ver. 1–8), and Asa, who reigned well and long, ver. 9–24. II. Of two of the kings of Israel, Nadab the son of Jeroboam, and Baasha the destroyer of Jeroboam's house, ver. 25–34.

Verses 1–8

A short account of the short reign of Abijam, the son of Rehoboam king of Judah. He makes a better figure, 2 Chron. xiii, where we have an account of his war with Jeroboam. There he is called Abijah—My father is the Lord, because no wickedness is there laid to his charge. But here, where we are told of his faults, Jah, the name of God, is taken away from his name, and he is called Abijam.

I. Few particulars are related concerning him. 1. Here began his reign in the beginning of Jeroboam's eighteenth year; for Rehoboam reigned but seventeen, ch. xiv. 21. Jeroboam indeed survived Rehoboam, but Rehoboam's Abijah lived to succeed him and to be a terror to Jeroboam, while Jeroboam's Abijah (whom we read of ch. xiv. 1) died before him. 2. He reigned scarcely three years, for he died before the end of Jeroboam's twentieth year, v. 9. Being made proud and secure by his great victory over Jeroboam (2 Chron. xiii. 21), God cut him off, to make way for his son Asa, who would be a better man. 3. His mother's name was Maachah, the daughter of Abishalom, that is, Absalom, David's son, as I am the rather inclined to think. 4. He carried on his father's wars with Jeroboam. As there was continual war between Rehoboam and Jeroboam, not set battles but frequent encounters, especially upon the borders, so there was between Abijam and Jeroboam (v. 7), till Jeroboam, with a great army, invaded him, and then Abijam, not being forbidden to act in his own defence, routed him, so that he compelled him to be quiet during the rest of his reign, 2 Chron. xiii. 20.

II. But, in general, we are told, 1. That he was not like David, had no hearty affection for the ordinances of God, though, to serve his purpose against Jeroboam, he pleaded his possession of the temple and priesthood, as that upon which he valued himself, 2 Chron. xiii. 10–12. He seemed to have zeal, but he wanted sincerity; he began pretty well, but he fell off, and walked in all the sins of his father. 2. That yet it was for David's sake that he was advanced, and continued upon the throne; it was for his sake (v. 4, 5) that God thus set up his son after him; not for his own sake, nor for the sake of his father, in whose steps he trod, but for the sake of David, whose example he would not follow. It aggravates the sin of a degenerate seed that they fare the better for the piety of their ancestors and owe their blessings to it, and yet will not imitate it.

A short account of the reign of Asa; we shall find a more copious history of it 2 Chron. xiv, xv and xvi.

I. The length of it: He reigned forty-one years in Jerusalem, v. 10. In the account we have of the kings of Judah we find the number of the good kings and the bad ones nearly equal; but then we may observe, to our comfort, that the reign of the good kings was generally long, but that of the bad kings short.

II. The general good character of it (v. 11): Asa did that which was right in the eyes of the Lord, and that is right indeed which is so in God's eyes. He did as did David his father, kept close to God, though he was not a prophet, or psalmist, as David was. If we come up to the graces of those that have gone before us it will be our praise with God, though we come short of their gifts.

III. The particular instances of Asa's piety. His times were times of reformation.

1. He removed that which was evil. Immorality he first struck at: He took away the sodomites out of the land, suppressed the brothels; for how can either prince or people prosper, while those cages of unclean and filthy birds, more dangerous than pest-houses, are suffered to remain? Then he proceeded against idolatry: He removed all the idols, even those that his father had made, v. 12. When it appeared that Maachah his mother, or rather his grandmother (but called his mother because she had the educating of him in his childhood), had an idol in a grove, he would by no means connive at her idolatry. Reformation must begin at home. Asa, in everything else, will honour and respect his mother; he loves her well, but he loves God better, and (like the Levite, Deut. xxxiii. 9) readily forgets the relation when it comes in competition with his duty. If she be an idolater, (1) Her idol shall be destroyed, publicly exposed to contempt, defaced, and burnt to ashes by the brook Kidron. (2) She shall be deposed. He removed her from being queen, or from the queen, that is, from conversing with his wife; he banished her from the court, and confined her to an obscure and private life.

2. He re-established that which was good (v. 15): He brought into the house of God the dedicated things which he himself had vowed out of the spoils of the Ethiopians he had conquered. When those who, in their infancy, were by baptism devoted to God, make it their own act and deed to join themselves to him and vigorously employ themselves in his service, this is bringing in the dedicated things which they and their fathers have dedicated.

IV. The policy of his reign. He built cities himself, to encourage the increase of his people (v. 23) and to invite others to him by the conveniences of habitation.

V. The faults of his reign. In both the things for which he was praised he was found defective. The fairest characters are not without some but or other in them. 1. Did he take away the idols? That was well; but the high places were not removed (v. 14); therein his reformation fell short. It was not well that Asa, when his hand was in, did not remove these. Nevertheless his heart was perfect with the Lord. This affords us a comfortable note, That those may be found honest and upright with God, and be accepted of him, who yet, in some instances, come short of doing the good they might and should do. The perfection which is made the indispensable condition of the new covenant is not to be understood of sinlessness (then we were all undone), but sincerity. 2. Did he bring in the dedicated things? That was well; but he afterwards alienated the dedicated things, when he took the gold and silver out of the house of God and sent them as a bribe to Benhadad, to hire him to break his league with Baasha, and, by making an inroad upon his country, to give him a diversion from the building of Ramah, v. 18, 19. Here he sinned, (1) In tempting Ben-hadad to break his league, and so to violate the public faith. If he did wrong in doing it, as certainly he did, Asa did wrong in persuading him to do it. (2) In that he could not trust God, who had done so much for him, to free him out of this strait, without using such indirect means to help himself. (3) In taking the gold out of the treasury of the temple, which was not to be made use of but on extraordinary occasions. The project succeeded. Ben-hadad made a descent upon the land of Israel, which obliged Baasha to retire with his whole force from Ramah (v. 20, 21), which gave Asa a fair opportunity to demolish his works there, and the timber and stones served him for the building of some cities of his own, v. 22. But, though the design prospered, we find it was displeasing to God; and though Asa valued himself upon the policy of it, and promised himself that it would effectually secure his peace, he was told by the prophet that he had done foolishly, and that thenceforth he should have wars; see 2 Chron. xvi. 7–9.

VI. The troubles of his reign. For the most part he prospered; but, 1. Baasha king of Israel was a very troublesome neighbour to him. This was the effect of the division of the kingdoms, that they were continually vexing one another, which made them both an easier prey to the common enemy. 2. In his old age he was himself afflicted with the gout.

VII. The conclusion of his reign. He reigned long, but finished at last with honour, and left his throne to a successor no way inferior to him.

The miserable state of Israel, while the kingdom of Judah was happy under Asa's good government. It was threatened that they should be as a reed shaken in the water (ch. xiv. 15), and so they were, when, during the single reign of Asa, the government of their kingdom was in six or seven different hands. Jeroboam was upon the throne in the beginning of his reign and Ahab at the end of it, and between them were Nadab, Baasha, Elah, Zimri, Tibni, and Omri, undermining and destroying one another. This they got by deserting the house both of God and of David. 1. The ruin and extirpation of the family of Jeroboam, according to the word of the Lord by Ahijah. His son Nadab succeeded him. If the death of his brother Ahijah had had a due influence upon him to make him religious, and the honour done him at his death had engaged him to follow his good example, his reign might have been long and glorious; but he walked in the way of his father (v. 26), kept up the worship of his calves, and forbade his subjects to go up to Jerusalem to worship, sinned and made Israel to sin, and therefore God brought ruin upon him quickly, in the second year of his reign. He was besieging Gibbethon, a city which the Philistines had taken from the Danites, and there did Baasha, with others, conspire against him and kill him (v. 27), and so little interest had he in the affections of his people that his army chose his murderer for his successor. Baasha slew him, and reigned in his stead, v. 28. And the first thing he did when he came to the crown was to cut off all the house of Jeroboam. 2. The elevation of Baasha. He shall be tried awhile, as Jeroboam was. Twenty-four years he reigned (v. 33), but walked in the way of Jeroboam (v. 34), though he had seen the end of that way.

CHAP. XVI

This chapter relates wholly to the kingdom of Israel, and the revolutions of that kingdom. I. The ruin of Baasha's family, after it had been but twenty-six years a royal family, foretold by a prophet (ver. 1–7), and executed by Zimri, one of his captains, ver. 8–14. II. The seven days' reign of Zimri, and his sudden fall, ver. 15–20. III. The struggle between Omri and Tibni, and Omri's prevalency, and his reign, ver. 21–28. IV. The beginning of the reign of Ahab, ver. 29–33. V. The rebuilding of Jericho, v. 34. All this while, in Judah, things went well.

Verses 1–14

I. The ruin of the family of Baasha foretold. He was a man likely enough to have raised and established his family—active, politic, and daring; but he was an idolater, and this brought destruction upon his family.

1. God sent him warning of it before. (1) That, if he were thereby wrought upon to repent and reform, the ruin might be prevented. (2) That, if not, the destruction when it did come, whoever might be instruments of it, was the punishment of sin.

2. The warning was sent by Jehu the son of Hanani. The father was a seer, or prophet, at the same time (2 Chron. xvi. 7), and was sent to Asa king of Judah; but the son, who was young and more active, was sent on this longer and more dangerous expedition to Baasha king of Israel. This Jehu continued long in his usefulness, for we find him reproving Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xix. 2) above forty years after, and writing the annals of that prince, 2 Chron. xx. 34.

(1) He reminds Baasha of the great things God had done for him (v. 2). God puts power into bad men's hands, which he makes to serve his good purposes, notwithstanding the bad use they make of it.

(2) He charges him with high crimes and misdemeanours. [1] That he had caused Israel to sin and brought them to pay to dunghill-deities the homage due to him only. [2] That he had himself provoked God to anger with the work of his hands, that is, by worshipping images, the work of men's hands. [3] That he had destroyed the house of Jeroboam (v. 7), because he killed him, namely, Jeroboam's son and all his, and is justly punished for the malice and ambition which actuated and governed him in all he did.

(3) He foretells the same destruction to come upon his family which he himself had been employed to bring upon the family of Jeroboam, v. 3, 4.

II. A reprieve granted for some time, so long that Baasha himself dies in peace, and is buried with honour in his own royal city (v. 6), so far is he from being a prey either to the dogs or to the fowls, which yet was threatened to his house, v. 4.

III. Execution done at last. Baasha's son Elah, like Jeroboam's son, Nadab, reigned two years, and then was slain by Zimri, one of his own soldiers, as Nadab was by Baasha; so like was his house made to that of Jeroboam, as was threatened, v. 3.

1. As then, so now, the king himself was first slain, but Elah fell more ingloriously than Nadab. Nadab was slain in the field of action and honour, he and his army then besieging Gibbethon (ch. xv. 27). Elah should have been with them to command in chief, but he loved his own ease and therefore stayed behind to take his pleasure; and, when he was drinking himself drunk in his servant's house, Zimri killed him, v. 9, 10. Death comes easily upon men when they are drunk. Besides the chronic diseases which men frequently bring themselves into by hard drinking, and which cut them off in the midst of their days, men in that condition are more easily overcome by an enemy, as Amnon by Absalom, and are liable to more bad accidents, being unable to help themselves.

2. As then, so now, the whole family was cut off, and rooted out. The first thing Zimri did was to slay all the house of Baasha; thus he held by cruelty what he got by treason.

Zimri, and Tibni, and Omri, are here striving for the crown. Proud aspiring men ruin one another, and involve others in the ruin. These confusions end in the settlement of Omri.

I. How he was chosen, as the Roman emperors often were, by the army in the field, now encamped before Gibbethon, that they might without delay avenge the death of Elah upon Zimri. The siege of Gibbethon is quitted (Philistines are sure to gain when Israelites quarrel) and Zimri is prosecuted.

II. How he conquered Zimri, who is said to have reigned seven days (v. 15), so long before Omri was proclaimed king and himself proclaimed traitor. Tirzah was a beautiful city, but not fortified, so that Omri soon made himself master of it (v. 17), forced Zimri into the palace, which being unable to defend, and yet unwilling to surrender, he burnt, and himself in it, v. 18.

III. How he struggled with Tibni, and at length got clear of him: Half of the people followed this Tibni (v. 21), probably those who were in Zimri's interest. The contest between these two lasted some years, and it was in the twenty-seventh year of Asa that Omri was first elected (v. 15), but it was not till the thirty-first year of Asa that he began to reign without a rival; then Tibni died, it is likely in battle, and Omri reigned, v. 22.

IV. How he reigned when he was at length settled on the throne. 1. He made himself famous by building Samaria, which, ever after, was the royal city of the kings of Israel. He bought the ground for two talents of silver. It was called Samaria, or Shemeren (as it is in the Hebrew), from Shemer, the former owner, v. 24. The kings of Israel changed their royal seats, Shechem first, then Tirzah, now Samaria; but the kings of Judah were constant to Jerusalem, the city of God. 2. He made himself infamous by his wickedness; for he did worse than all that were before him, v. 25. He went further than they had done in establishing iniquity by a law. Jeroboam caused Israel to sin by temptation, example, and allurement; but Omri did it by compulsion.

The beginning of the reign of Ahab, of whom we have more particulars recorded than of any of the kings of Israel.

I. He exceeded all his predecessors in wickedness, did evil above all that were before him (v. 30), and, as if it were done with a particular enmity both to God and Israel, to affront him and ruin them, it is said, He did more to provoke the Lord God of Israel to anger than all the kings of Israel that were before him, v. 33.

II. He married a wicked woman, Jezebel (v. 31), a zealous idolater, extremely imperious and malicious in her natural temper, addicted to witchcrafts and whoredoms (2. Kings ix. 22), and every way vicious. What mischiefs she did, and what mischief at last befell her (2 Kings ix. 33), we shall find in the following story.

III. He set up the worship of Baal and served the god of the Sidonians, Jupiter, a deified hero of the Phœnicians. In honour of this mock deity, whom they called Baal—lord, 1. Ahab built a temple in Samaria, the royal city, because the temple of God was in Jerusalem, the royal city of the other kingdom. 2. He reared an altar in that temple, on which to offer sacrifice to Baal. 3. He made a grove about his temple.

IV. One of his subjects, in imitation of his presumption, ventured to build Jericho, in defiance of the curse Joshua had long since pronounced on him that should attempt it, v. 34. He built for his children, but his eldest son died when he began, and youngest when he finished, and all the rest (it is supposed) between. None ever hardened his heart against God and prospered.

CHAP. XVII

Never was Israel so blessed with a good prophet as when it was so plagued with a bad king. Never was king so bold to sin as Ahab; never was prophet so bold to reprove and threaten as Elijah, whose story begins in this chapter and is full of wonders. He only, of all the prophets, had the honour of Enoch, the first prophet, to be translated, that he should not see death, and the honour of Moses, the great prophet, to attend our Saviour in his transfiguration. Other prophets prophesied and wrote, he prophesied and acted, but wrote nothing; but his actions cast more lustre on his name than their writings did on theirs. I. His prediction of a famine in Israel, through the want of rain, ver. 1. II. The provision made for him in that famine, 1. By the ravens at the brook Cherith, ver. 2–7. 2. When that failed, by the widow at Zarephath, who received him in the name of a prophet and had a prophet's reward; for (1) He multiplied her meal and her oil, ver. 8–16. (2) He raised her dead son to life, ver. 17–24. Thus his story begins with judgments and miracles, designed to awaken that stupid generation that had so deeply corrupted themselves.

The history of Elijah begins somewhat abruptly. Elijah drops (so to speak) out of the clouds, as if, like Melchisedek, he were without father, without mother, and without descent, which made some of the Jews fancy that he was an angel sent from heaven; but the apostle has assured us that he was a man subject to like passions as we are (James v. 17). 1. The prophet's name: Elijahu—"My God Jehovah is he" (so it signifies), "is he who sends me and will own me and bear me out, is he to whom I would bring Israel back and who alone can effect that great work." 2. His country: He was of the inhabitants of Gilead, on the other side Jordan, either of the tribe of Gad or the half of Manasseh, for Gilead was divided between them. We need not enquire whence men are, but what they are: if it be a good thing, no matter though it come out of Nazareth. He is called a Tishbite from Thisbe. The beginning of his story:—

I. How he foretold a famine with which Israel should be punished for their sins. He proclaimed it to the king, in whose power it was to reform the land, and so to prevent the judgment. Unless he repented and reformed this judgment would be brought upon his land. There should be neither dew nor rain for some years. He prayed earnestly that it might not rain; and, according to his prayers, the heavens became as brass, till he prayed again that it might rain. Elijah lets Ahab know, 1. That the Lord Jehovah is the God of Israel, whom he had forsaken. 2. That he is a living God, and not like the gods he worshipped, which were dead dumb idols. 3. That he himself was God's servant in office, and a messenger sent from him. 4. That, notwithstanding the present peace and prosperity of the kingdom of Israel, God was displeased with them for their idolatry and would chastise them for it by the want of rain, which would effectually prove their impotency, and the folly of those who left the living God, to make their court to such as could do neither good nor evil. 5. He lets Ahab know what interest he had in heaven: It shall be according to my word.

II. How he was himself taken care of in that famine. 1. How he was hidden. God bade him go and hide himself by the brook Cherith, v. 3. For the present, in obedience to the divine command, he went and dwelt all alone in some obscure unfrequented place, probably among the reeds of the brook. If Providence calls us to solitude and retirement, it becomes us to acquiesce; when we cannot be useful we must be patient, and when we cannot work for God we must sit still quietly for him. 2. How he was fed. When the woman, the church, is driven into the wilderness, care is taken that she be fed and nourished there, time, times, and half a time, that is, three years and a half, which was just the time of Elijah's concealment. See Rev. xii. 6, 14. Elijah must drink of the brook, and the ravens were appointed to bring him meat (v. 4) and did so, v. 6. Here, (1) The provision was plentiful, and good, and constant, bread and flesh twice a day, daily bread and food convenient. It ill becomes God's servants, especially his servants the prophets, to be nice and curious about their food and to affect dainties and varieties; instead of envying those who have daintier fare, we should think how many there are, better than we, who live comfortably upon coarser fare and would be glad of our leavings. (2) The caterers were very unlikely; the ravens brought it to him. Obadiah would gladly have entertained Elijah; but he was a man by himself, a figure of John the Baptist, whose meat was locusts and wild honey. If it be asked whence the ravens had this provision, how and where it was cooked, and whether they came honestly by it, we must answer, as Jacob did (Gen. xxvii. 20), The Lord our God brought it to them. But why ravens? [1] They are birds of prey, more likely to have taken his meat from him, or to have picked out his eyes (Prov. xxx. 17); but thus Samson's riddle is again unriddled, Out of the eater comes forth meat. [2] They are unclean creatures. Every raven after his kind was, by the law, forbidden to be eaten (Lev. xi. 15), yet Elijah did not think the meat they brought ever the worse for that, but ate and gave thanks, asking no question for conscience' sake. [3] Ravens feed on insects and carrion themselves, yet they brought the prophet man's meat and wholesome food. [4] Ravens could bring but a little, and broken meat, yet Elijah was thankful that he was fed, though not feasted. [5] Ravens neglect their own young ones, and do not feed them; yet when God pleases they shall feed his prophet. [6] Ravens are themselves fed by special providence (Job xxxviii. 41; Ps. cxlvii. 9), and now they fed the prophet.

Thus does Elijah, for a great while, eat his morsels alone, and his provision of water, which he has in an ordinary way from the brook, fails him before that which he has by miracle. The powers of nature are limited, but not the powers of the God of nature. Elijah's brook dried up (v. 7) because there was no rain.

Verses 8-16

An account of the further protection Elijah was taken under. When the brook was dried up Jordan was not; why did not God send him thither? Surely because he would show that he has a variety of ways to provide for his people and is not tied to any one.

I. The place he is sent to, to Zarephath, or Sarepta, a city of Sidon, out of the borders of the land of Israel, v. 9. Our Saviour takes notice of this as an early and ancient indication of the favour of God designed for the poor Gentiles, in the fulness of time, Luke iv. 25, 26. Many widows were in Israel in the days of Elias, yet he is sent to honour and bless with his presence a city of Sidon, a Gentile city, and so becomes (says Dr. Lightfoot) the first prophet of the Gentiles. Elijah was hated and driven out by his countrymen; therefore, lo, he turns to the Gentiles, as the apostles were afterwards ordered to do, Acts xviii. 6. But why to a city of Sidon? Perhaps because the worship of Baal came lately thence with Jezebel, who was a Sidonian (ch. xvi. 31). Jezebel was Elijah's greatest enemy; yet, to show her the impotency of her malice, God will find a hiding-place for him even in her country.

II. The person that is appointed to entertain him, a poor widow woman, destitute and desolate. It is God's way, and it is his glory, to make use of the weak and foolish things of the world and put honour upon them.

III. The provision made for him there. Providence brought the widow woman to meet him very opportunely at the gate of the city (v. 10).

1. Her case and character: (1) She had nothing to live upon but a handful of meal and a little oil. When she has eaten the little she has, for aught she yet sees, she must die for want, she and her son, v. 12. She had no fuel but the sticks she gathered in the streets. To her Elijah was sent, that he might still live upon Providence as much as he did when the ravens fed him. It was in compassion to the low estate of his handmaiden that God sent the prophet to her, not to beg of her, but to board with her, and he would pay well for his table. (2) She was very humble and industrious. He found her gathering sticks, and preparing to bake her own bread, v. 10, 12. (3) She was very charitable and generous. When this stranger desired her to go and fetch him some water to drink, she readily went, at the first word, v. 10, 11. She objected not to the present scarcity of it, nor asked him what he would give her, nor hinted that he was a stranger, an Israelite, but left off gathering the sticks for herself to fetch water for him. (4) It was a great trial for her faith and obedience when, having told the prophet how low her stock of meal and oil was and that she had but just enough for herself and her son, he bade her make a cake for him, and make his first, and then prepare for herself and her son. Elijah, it is true, made mention of the God of Israel (v. 14), but what was that to a Sidonian? Or if she had a veneration for the name Jehovah, and valued the God of Israel as the true God, yet what assurance had she that this stranger was his prophet or had any warrant to speak in his name? It was easy for a hungry vagrant to impose upon her. But she gets over all these objections, and obeys the precept in dependence upon the promise. Those that deal with God must deal upon trust; seek first his kingdom, and then other things shall be added. But surely the increase of this widow's faith, to such a degree as to enable her thus to deny herself and to depend upon the divine promise, was as great a miracle in the kingdom of grace as the increase of her oil was in the kingdom of providence.

2. The care God took of her guest: The barrel of meal wasted not, nor did the cruse of oil fail, but still as they took from them more was added to them by the divine power, v. 16. Never did corn or olive so increase in the growing (says Bishop Hall) as these did in the using; but the multiplying of the seed sown (2 Cor. ix. 10) in the common course of providence is an instance of the power and goodness of God not to be overlooked because common. The meal and the oil multiplied, not in the hoarding, but in the spending. (1) This was a maintenance for the prophet. Still miracles shall be his daily bread. Hitherto he had been fed with bread and flesh, now he was fed with bread and oil, which they used as we do butter. (2) It was a maintenance for the poor widow and her son, and a recompence to her for entertaining the prophet. Christ has promised to those who open their doors to him that he will come in to them, and sup with them, and they with him, Rev. iii. 20. It is promised to those that trust in God that they shall not be ashamed in the evil time, but in the days of famine they shall be satisfied, Ps. xxxvii. 19.

A further recompence made to the widow for her kindness to the prophet; her son, when dead, is restored to life.

I. The sickness and death of the child. For aught that appears he was her only son. the comfort of her widowed estate. 1. She was nurse to a great prophet, was employed to sustain him, and had strong reason to think the Lord would do her good; yet now she loses her child. 2. She was herself nursed by miracle, and in the midst of all this satisfaction she was thus afflicted.

II. Her pathetic complaint to the prophet of this affliction. 1. She expresses herself passionately: What have I to do with thee, O thou man of God? The death of her child was now a surprise to her, and it is hard to keep our spirits composed when troubles come upon us suddenly and unexpectedly, and in the midst of our peace and prosperity. She calls him a man of God, and yet quarrels with him as if he had occasioned the death of her child. "Wherein have I offended thee, or been wanting in my duty? Show me wherefore thou contendest with me." 2. Yet she expresses herself penitently: "Hast thou come to call my sin to thy remembrance, as the cause of the affliction?" Perhaps she knew of Elijah's intercession against Israel, and, being conscious of her former worshipping of Baal the god of the Sidonians, she apprehends he had made intercession against her.

III. The prophet's address to God upon this occasion. He gave no answer to her expostulation, but brought it to God, and laid the case before him, not knowing what to say to it himself. He took the dead child from the mother's bosom to his own bed, v. 19. Probably he had taken a particular kindness to the child. He retired to his chamber, and, 1. He humbly reasons with God concerning the death of the child, v. 20. 2. He earnestly begs of God to restore the child to life again, v. 21. We do not read before this of any that were raised to life; yet Elijah, by a divine impulse, prays for the resurrection of this child, which yet will not warrant us to do the like. David expected not, by fasting and prayer, to bring his child back to life (2 Sam. xii. 23), but Elijah had a power to work miracles, which David had not. He stretched himself upon the child, to effect the restoration of the child—he would if he could put life into him by his own breath and warmth. He is very particular in his prayer: I pray thee let this child's soul come into him again, which plainly supposes the existence of the soul in a state of separation from the body, and consequently its immortality, which Grotius thinks God designed by this miracle to give intimation and evidence of, for the encouragement of his suffering people.

IV. The resurrection of the child, and the great satisfaction it gave to the mother: the child revived, v. 22. See the power of prayer and the power of him that hears prayer, who kills and makes alive. Elijah brought him to his mother, who, we may suppose, could scarcely believe her own eyes. The good woman hereupon cries out, Now I know that thou art a man of God; though she knew it before, by the increase of her meal, yet the death of her child she took so unkindly that she began to question it; but now she was abundantly satisfied that he had both the power and goodness of a man of God. Thus the death of the child was for the glory of God and the honour of his prophet.

CHAP. XVIII

It does not appear that either the increase of the provision or the raising of the child had caused Elijah to be taken notice of at Zarephath. The days appointed for his concealment being finished, he is now commanded to show himself to Ahab, and to expect rain upon the earth, ver. 1. I. His interview with Obadiah, one of Ahab's servants, by whom he sends notice to Ahab of his coming, ver. 2–16. II. His interview with Ahab himself, ver. 17–20. III. His interview with all Israel upon Mount Carmel, in order to a public trial of titles between the Lord and Baal; a most distinguished solemnity it was, in which, 1. Baal and his prophets were confounded. 2. God and Elijah were honoured, ver. 21–39. IV. The execution he did upon the prophets of Baal, ver. 40. V. The return of the mercy of rain, at the word of Elijah, ver. 41–46.

Verses 1–16

I. The sad state of Israel at this time, upon two accounts:

1. Jezebel cut off the prophets of the Lord (v. 4), slew them, v. 13. Being an idolater, she was a persecutor, and made Ahab one. Even in those bad times there were some good people that feared God and served him, and some good prophets that assisted them in their devotions. The priests and the Levites had all gone to Judah and Jerusalem (2 Chron. xi. 13, 14), but, instead of them, God raised up these prophets, who read and expounded the law in private meetings, or in the families that retained their integrity; they had not the spirit of prophecy as Elijah, nor did they offer sacrifice, or burn incense, but taught people to live well, and keep close to the God of Israel. These Jezebel aimed to extirpate, and put many of them to death, which was as much a public calamity as a public iniquity, and threatened the utter ruin of religion's poor remains in Israel. Those few that escaped the sword were forced to abscond, and hide themselves in caves, where they were buried alive and cut off, though not from life, yet from usefulness, which is the end and comfort of life.

(1) There was one very good man, who was a great man at court, Obadiah, who answered his name—a servant of the Lord, one who feared God and was faithful to him, and yet was steward of the household to Ahab. He feared the Lord greatly (v. 3), and he feared the Lord from his youth (v. 12). [1] It was strange that so wicked a man as Ahab would prefer him; certainly it was because he was a man of celebrated honesty, industry, and ingenuity, and one in whom he could repose a confidence, whose eyes he could trust as much as his own, as appears here, v. 5. [2] It was strange that so good a man as Obadiah would accept of preferment in a court so addicted to idolatry and all manner of wickedness. Obadiah would not have accepted the place if he could not have had it without bowing the knee to Baal. Obadiah therefore could with a good conscience enjoy the place. Those that fear God need not go out of the world, bad as it is.

(2) This great good man used his power for the protection of God's prophets. He hid 100 of them in two caves, when the persecution was hot, and fed them with bread and water, v. 4. See how wonderfully God raises up friends for his ministers and people, for their shelter in difficult times, even where one would least expect them.

2. When Jezebel cut off God's prophets God cut off the necessary provisions by the extremity of the drought. Perhaps Jezebel persecuted God's prophets under pretence that they were the cause of the judgment, because Elijah had foretold it. But God made them know the contrary, for the famine continued till Baal's prophets were sacrificed, and so great a scarcity of water there was that the king himself and Obadiah went in person throughout the land to seek for grass for the cattle, v. 5, 6. Ahab's care was not to lose all the beasts, many being already lost; but he took no care about his soul, not to lose that; he took a deal of pains to seek grass, but none to seek the favour of God, fencing against the effect, but not enquiring how to remove the cause. The land of Judah lay close to the land of Israel, yet we find no complaint there of the want of rain; for Judah yet ruled with God.

II. The steps taken towards redressing the grievance, by Elijah's appearing again upon the stage, to act as a Tishbite, a converter or reformer of Israel, for so (some think) that title of his signifies. Turn them again to the Lord God of hosts, from whom they have revolted, and all will be well quickly; this must be Elijah's doing. See Luke i. 16, 17.

1. Ahab had made diligent search for him (v. 10), had offered rewards to any one that would discover him. It should seem, he made this diligent search for him, not so much that he might punish him for what he had done in denouncing the judgment as that he might oblige him to undo it again, by recalling the sentence.

2. God, at length, ordered Elijah to present himself to Ahab, because the time had now come when he would send rain upon the earth (v. 1), or rather upon the land. Above two years he had lain hid with the widow at Zarephath, after he had been concealed one year by the brook Cherith; so that the third year of his sojourning there, here spoken of (v. 1), was the fourth of the famine, which lasted in all three years and six months, as we find, Luke iv. 25; James v. 17.

3. Elijah first surrendered, or rather discovered, himself to Obadiah. He knew, by the Spirit, where to meet him.

(1) Obadiah saluted him with great respect, fell on his face, and humbly asked, Art thou that my lord Elijah? v. 7. As he had shown the tenderness of a father to the sons of the prophets, so he showed the reverence of a son to this father of the prophets; and by this made it appear that he did indeed fear God greatly.

(2) Elijah, in answer to him, [1] Transfers the title of honour he gave him to Ahab: "Call him thy lord, not me;" that is a fitter title for a prince than for a prophet, who seeks not honour from men. Prophets should be called seers, and shepherds, and watchmen, and ministers, rather than lords, as those that mind duty more than dominion. [2] He bids Obadiah go and tell the king that he is there to speak with him: Tell thy lord, Behold, Elijah is forth-coming, v. 8.

(3) Obadiah begs to be excused from carrying this message to Ahab, for it might prove as much as his life was worth. He thought Elijah was not in good earnest when he bade him tell Ahab where he was, but intended only to expose the impotency of his malice; for he knew Ahab was not worthy to receive any kindness from the prophet and it was not fit that the prophet should receive any mischief from him. He is sure Ahab would be so enraged that he would put him to death for making a fool of him, or for not laying hands on Elijah himself, when he had him in his reach, v. 12. He pleads that he did not deserve to be thus exposed, and put in peril of his life: What have I said amiss? v. 9. Nay (v. 13), Was it not told my lord how I hid the prophets? He mentions this to convince Elijah that though he was Ahab's servant he was not in his interest. He that had protected so many prophets, he hoped, should not have his own life hazarded by so great a prophet.

(4) Elijah satisfied him that he might with safety deliver this message to Ahab, by assuring him, with an oath, that he would, this very day, present himself to Ahab, v. 15.

(5) Notice is hereby soon brought to Ahab that Elijah had sent him a challenge to meet him immediately at such a place, and Ahab accepts the challenge: He went to meet Elijah, v. 16. We may suppose it was a great surprise to Ahab to hear that Elijah, whom he had so long sought and not found, was now found without seeking. He went in quest of grass, and found him from whose word, at God's mouth, he must expect rain. Yet his guilty conscience gave him little reason to hope for it, but, rather, to fear some other more dreadful judgment.

Verses 17–20

The meeting between Ahab and Elijah, as bad a king as ever the world was plagued with and as good a prophet as ever the church was blessed with. 1. Ahab, like himself, basely accused Elijah. He durst not strike him, remembering that Jeroboam's hand withered when it was stretched out against a prophet, but gave him bad language, which was no less an affront to him that sent him. Art thou he that troubleth Israel? v. 17. How unlike was this to that with which his servant Obadiah saluted him (v. 7): Art thou that my lord Elijah? Obadiah feared God greatly; Ahab had sold himself to work wickedness; and both discovered their character by the manner of their address to the prophet. It has been the lot of the best and most useful men to be called and counted the troublers of the land, and to be run down as public grievances. Even Christ and his apostles were thus misrepresented, Acts xvii. 6. 2. Elijah boldly returned the charge upon the king, and proved it upon him, that he was the troubler of Israel, v. 18. Those that procure God's judgments do the mischief, not he that merely foretells them and gives warning of them, that the nation may repent and prevent them. I would have healed Israel, but they would not be healed. Ahab is the troubler, who follows Baalim, those accursed things. 3. As one having authority immediately from the King of kings, he ordered a convention of the states to be forthwith summoned to meet at Mount Carmel, where there had been an altar built to God, v. 30. Thither all Israel must come, to give Elijah the meeting; and the prophets of Baal who were dispersed all the country over, with those of the groves who were Jezebel's domestic chaplains, must there make their personal appearance. 4. Ahab issued out writs accordingly, for the convening of this great assembly (v. 20), either because he feared Elijah and durst not oppose him, or because he hoped Elijah would bless the land, and speak the word that they might have rain, and upon those terms they would be all at his beck.

Verses 21–40

Ahab and the people expected that Elijah would, in this solemn assembly, bless the land, and pray for rain; but he had other work to do first. The people must be brought to repent and reform, and then they may look for the removal of the judgment, but not till then. Deserters must not look for God's favour till they return to their allegiance. Elijah might have looked for rain seventy times seven times, and not have seen it, if he had not thus begun his work at the right end. God's cause is so incontestably just that it need not fear to have the evidences of its equity searched into and weighed.

I. Elijah reproved the people for mixing the worship of God and the worship of Baal together. Not only some Israelites worshipped God and others Baal, but the same Israelites sometimes worshipped one and sometimes the other. This he calls (v. 21) halting between two opinions, or thoughts. They worshipped God to please the prophets, but worshipped Baal to please Jezebel and curry favour at court. "There can be but one God, but one infinite and but one supreme: there needs but one God, one omnipotent, one all-sufficient. What occasion for addition to that which is perfect? Now if, upon trial, it appears that Baal is that one infinite omnipotent Being, that one supreme Lord and all-sufficient benefactor, you ought to renounce Jehovah and cleave to Baal only: but, if Jehovah be that one God, Baal is a cheat, and you must have no more to do with him." Those halt between, that are unresolved under their convictions, unstable and unsteady in their purposes, promise fair, but do not perform, begin well, but do not hold on, that are inconsistent with themselves, or indifferent and lukewarm in that which is good. Their heart is divided (Hos. x. 2), whereas God will have all or none. We are fairly put to our choice whom we will serve, Joshua xxiv. 15. To this fair proposal which Elijah here makes, the people knew not what to say: They answered him not a word.

II. He proposed to bring the matter to a fair trial; and Baal had all the external advantages on his side. The king and court were all for Baal; so was the body of the people. The managers of Baal's cause were 450 men (v. 22), besides 400 more, their supporters or seconds, v. 19. The manager of God's cause was but one man, lately a poor exile, hardly kept from starving; so that God's cause has nothing to support it but its own right. However, it is put to this experiment, "Let each side prepare a sacrifice, and pray to its God, and the God that answereth by fire, let him be God; if neither shall thus answer, let the people turn Atheists; if both, let them continue to halt between two." It is an instance of the courage of Elijah that he durst stand alone in the cause of God against such powers and numbers; and the issue encourages all God's witnesses and advocates never to fear the face of man.

III. The people join issue with him: It is well spoken, v. 24. Ahab and the prophets of Baal durst not oppose for fear of the people. If, in this trial, they could but bring it to a drawn battle, their other advantages would give them the victory. Let it go on therefore to a trial.

IV. The prophets of Baal try first, but in vain, with their god. Elijah allows it to them (v. 25), gives them the lead for their greater confusion.

1. How importunate and noisy the prophets of Baal were in their applications to him. They got their sacrifices ready; and they cried as one man, and with all their might, O Baal! hear us, O Baal! answer us. How senseless, how brutish, were they in their addresses to Baal! (1) Like fools, they leaped upon the altar, as if they would themselves become sacrifices with their bullock. They leaped up and down to please their deity. (2) Like madmen they cut themselves in pieces with knives and lancets (v. 28) for vexation that they were not answered, or in a sort of prophetic fury, hoping to obtain the favour of their god by offering to him their own blood. God expressly forbade his worshippers to cut themselves, Deut. xiv. 1.

2. How sharp Elijah was upon them, v. 27. He stood by them, and patiently heard them for so many hours praying to an idol, yet with secret indignation and disdain; and at noon bantered them: "Cry aloud, for he is a god, a goodly god that cannot be made to hear without all this clamour." Baal's prophets were so far from being convinced and put to shame by the just reproach Elijah cast upon them that it made them the more violent and led them to act more ridiculously.

3. How deaf Baal was to them. Elijah did not interrupt them, but let them go on till they were tired, and quite despaired of success, which was not till the time of the evening sacrifice, v. 29.

V. Elijah soon obtains from his God an answer by fire.

1. He fitted up an altar. He would not make use of theirs, which had been polluted with their prayers to Baal, but, finding the ruins of an altar there, which had formerly been used in the service of the Lord, he chose to repair that (v. 30), to intimate to them that he was not about to introduce any new religion, but to revive the faith and worship of their fathers' God. He repaired this altar with twelve stones, according to the number of the twelve tribes, v. 31. Though ten of the tribes had revolted to Baal, he would look upon them as belonging to God still, by virtue of the ancient covenant with their fathers.

2. Having built his altar in the name of the Lord (v. 32), he prepared his sacrifice, v. 33. Behold the bullock and the wood; but where is the fire? Gen. xxii. 7, 8. God will provide himself fire. If we, in sincerity, offer our hearts to God, he will, by his grace, kindle a holy fire in them. Elijah was no priest, nor were his attendants Levites. Carmel had neither tabernacle nor temple, yet never was any sacrifice more acceptable to God than this.

3. He ordered abundance of water to be poured upon his altar, for which he had prepared a trench for its reception (v. 32). Twelve barrels of water (probably sea-water, for the sea was near, and so much fresh water in this time of drought was too precious for him to be so prodigal of it) he poured upon this sacrifice, to prevent the suspicion of any fire under.

4. He then solemnly addressed himself to God by prayer before his altar, humbly beseeching him to turn to ashes his burnt-offering and to testify his acceptance of it. His prayer was not long, but it was very grave and composed, and showed his mind to be calm and sedate, and far from the heats and disorders that Baal's prophets were in, v. 36, 37. He addressed himself to God as "the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Israel," reminding people of their relation both to God and to the patriarchs. Two things he pleads here: (1) The glory of God: "Lord, hear me, and answer me, that it may be known that thou art God in Israel." (2) The edification of the people: "That they may know that thou art the Lord, turning their heart back again to thee, in order to thy return in a way of mercy to them."

5. God immediately answered him by fire, v. 38. While he was yet speaking, the fire of the Lord fell, consumed the sacrifice and the wood, licked up all the water in the trench. But this was not all; to complete the miracle, the fire consumed the stones of the altar, and the very dust. Moses's altar and Solomon's were consecrated by the fire from heaven; but this was destroyed, because no more to be used. We may well imagine what a terror the fire struck on guilty Ahab and all the worshippers of Baal.

VI. What was the result of this fair trial. The prophets of Baal had failed. Elijah had, by the most convincing and undeniable evidence, proved his claims on behalf of the God of Israel. And now, 1. The people, as the jury, gave in their verdict upon the trial, and they are all agreed in it: They fell on their faces, and all, as one man, said, "Jehovah, he is the God, and not Baal; Jehovah, he is the God" (v. 39), whence, one would think, they should have inferred, "If he be the God, he shall be our God, and we will serve him only." Some, we hope, had their hearts thus turned back, but the generality of them were convinced only, not converted, yielded to the truth of God, that he is the God, but consented not to his covenant, that he should be theirs. 2. The prophets of Baal, as criminals, are seized, condemned, and executed, according to law, v. 40. Elijah (acting still by an extraordinary commission, which is not to be drawn into a precedent) orders them all to be slain immediately as the troublers of the land. These were the 450 prophets of Baal; the 400 prophets of the groves (who, some think, were Sidonians), though summoned (v. 19), yet, as it should seem, did not attend, and so escaped this execution, but it proved they were reserved to be the instruments of Ahab's destruction, some time after, by encouraging him to go up to Ramoth-Gilead, ch. xxii. 6.

Israel being thus far reformed that they had acknowledged the Lord to be God, God thereupon opened the bottles of heaven, and poured out blessings upon his land, that very evening.

I. Elijah sent Ahab to eat and drink. Ahab had continued fasting all day, either religiously, it being a day of prayer, or for want of leisure, it being a day of great expectation; but now let him eat and drink, for, though others perceive no sign of it, Elijah, by faith, hears the sound of abundance of rain, v. 41.

II. He himself retired to pray and to give thanks for God's answer by fire, now hoping for an answer by water. 1. He withdrew to a strange place, to the top of Carmel, which was very high and very private. Hence we read of those that hide themselves in the top of Carmel, Amos ix. 3. There he would be alone. Those who are called to appear and act in public for God must yet find time to be private with him and keep up their converse with him in solitude. 2. He put himself into a strange posture. He cast himself down on his knees upon the earth, in token of humility, and put his face between his knees.

III. He ordered his servant to bring him notice as soon as he discerned a cloud arising out of the sea, the Mediterranean Sea, which he had a large prospect of from the top of Carmel. The sailors at this day call it Cape Carmel. Six times his servant goes to the point of the hill and sees nothing, brings no good news to his master; yet Elijah continues praying, but still sends his servant to see if he can discover any hopeful cloud, while he keeps his mind close and intent in prayer, and abides by it, as one that has taken up his father Jacob's resolution, I will not let thee go except thou bless me.

IV. A little cloud at length appeared, no bigger than a man's hand, which presently overspread the heaven's and watered the earth, v. 44, 45. Great blessings often arise from small beginnings, and showers of plenty from a cloud of a span long.

V. Elijah hereupon hastened Ahab home, and attended him himself. Ahab rode in his chariot, at ease and in state, v. 45. Elijah ran on foot before him. If Ahab had paid the respect to Elijah that he deserved he would have taken him into his chariot, as the eunuch did Philip, that he might honour him before the elders of Israel, and confer with him further about the reformation of the kingdom. But his corruptions got the better of his convictions, and he was glad to get clear of him, as Felix of Paul, when he dismissed him, and adjourned his conference with him to a more convenient season.

CHAP. XIX

We left Elijah at the entrance of Jezreel, still appearing publicly, and all the people's eyes upon him. In this chapter we have him again absconding, and driven into obscurity, at a time when he could ill be spared. When people will not learn it is just with God to remove their teachers into corners. Now observe, I. How he was driven into banishment by the malice of Jezebel his sworn enemy, ver. 1–3. II. How he was met, in his banishment, by the favour of God, his covenant friend. 1. How God fed him, ver. 4–8. 2. How he conversed with him, and manifested himself to him (ver. 9, 11–13), heard his complaint (ver. 10–14), directed him what to do (ver. 15–17), and encouraged him, ver. 18. III. How his hands were strengthened, at his return out of banishment, by the joining of Elisha with him, ver. 19–21.

Verses 1–8

One would have expected, after such a public and sensible manifestation of the glory of God that now they would all, as one man, return to the worship of the God of Israel and take Elijah for their guide and oracle. But he is neglected whom God honoured; no respect is paid to him, no care taken of him, nor any use made of him, but, on the contrary, the land of Israel is now made too hot for him. 1. Ahab incensed Jezebel against him. That queen-consort, it seems, was in effect queen-regent, as she was afterwards when she was queen-dowager, an imperious woman that managed king and kingdom and did what she would. Ahab's conscience would not let him persecute Elijah, but he told Jezebel all that Elijah had done (v. 1), not to convince, but to exasperate her. It is not said he told her what God had done, but what Elijah had done, as if he, by some spell or charm, had brought fire from heaven, and the hand of the Lord had not been in it. Especially he represented to her that he had slain the prophets. 2. Jezebel sent him a threatening message (v. 2), that she had vowed and sworn to be the death of him within twenty-four hours. But how came she to send him word of her design, and so to give him an opportunity of making his escape? I think that though she desired nothing more than his blood, yet, at this time, she durst not meddle with him for fear of the people, all counting him a prophet, a great prophet, and therefore sent this message to him merely to frighten him and get him out of the way. 3. Elijah, hereupon, fled for his life, it is likely by night, and came to Beer-sheba, v. 3. Where was the courage with which he had lately confronted Ahab and all the prophets of Baal? He could not but know that he might be very serviceable to Israel at this juncture, and had all the reason in the world to depend upon God's protection while he was doing God's work; yet he fled. In his former danger God had bidden him hide himself (ch. xvii. 3), therefore he supposed he might do so now. 4. From Beer-sheba he went forward into the wilderness, that vast howling wilderness in which the Israelites wandered. Beer-sheba was so far distant from Jezreel, and within the dominion of so good a king as Jehoshaphat, that he could not but be safe there; yet, as if his fears haunted him even when he was out of the reach of danger, he could not rest there, but went a day's journey into the desert. Yet perhaps he retired thither not so much for his safety as that he might be wholly retired from the world, in order to a more free and intimate communion with God. He left his servant at Beer-sheba, perhaps because he would not expose his servant, who was young and tender, to the hardships of the wilderness. 5. Being wearied with his journey, he grew cross (like children when they are sleepy) and wished he might die, v. 4. Those that are, in this manner, forward to die are not in the fittest frame for dying. Jezebel has sworn his death, and therefore he, in a fret, prays for it, runs from death to death, yet with this difference, he wishes to die by the hand of the Lord. He would rather die in the wilderness than as Baal's prophet died, according to Jezebel's threatening (v. 2), lest the worshippers of Baal should triumph and blaspheme the God of Israel. He pleads, "It is enough. I have done enough, and suffered enough. I am weary of living." He pleads, "I am not better than my fathers." But is this Elijah? Can that great and gallant spirit shrink thus? God thus left him to himself, to show that when he was bold and strong it was in the Lord and the power of his might, but of himself he was no better than his fathers or brethren. 6. God, by an angel, fed him in that wilderness, into the wants and perils of which he had wilfully thrown himself. Elijah, in a pet, wished to die; God needed him not, yet he designed further to employ and honour him, and therefore sent an angel to keep him alive. Our case would be bad sometimes if God should take us at our word and grant us our foolish passionate requests. Having prayed that he might die, he laid down and slept (v. 5), wishing it may be to die in his sleep, but he is awakened and finds himself not only well provided for with bread and water (v. 6), but attended by an angel, who guarded him when he slept, and twice called him to his food when it was ready for him, v. 5, 7. Wherever God's children are, as they are still upon their Father's ground, so they are still under their Father's eye and care. They may lose themselves in a wilderness, but God has not lost them. 7. He was carried, in the strength of this meat, to Horeb, the mount of God, v. 8. Thither the Spirit of the Lord led him, probably beyond his own intention, that he might have communion with God in the same place where Moses had. The angel bade him eat the second time, because of the greatness of the journey that was before him, v. 7. Note God knows what he designs us for, that we be furnished with grace sufficient. He that appoints what the voyage shall be will victual the ship accordingly. See how many different ways God took to keep Elijah alive; he fed him by ravens, with multiplied meals—then by an angel—and now, to show that man lives not by bread alone, he kept him alive forty days without meat, continually traversing the mazes of the desert, a day for a year of Israel's wanderings; yet he neither needs food nor desires it.

Verses 9–18

Here is, I. Elijah housed in a cave at Mount Horeb, which is called the mount of God, because on it God had formerly manifested his glory. And perhaps this was the same cave, or cleft of a rock, in which Moses was hidden when the Lord passed by before him and proclaimed his name, Exod. xxxiii. 22.

II. The visit God paid to him there and the enquiry he made concerning him: The word of the Lord came to him. We cannot go anywhere to be out of the reach of God's eye, his arm, and his word. John saw visions of the Almighty when he was in banishment in the isle of Patmos, Rev. i. 9. The question God puts to the prophet is, What doest thou here, Elijah? v. 9, and again v. 13. This is a reproof, 1. For his fleeing hither. "What brings thee so far from home? Dost thou flee from Jezebel?" Lay the emphasis upon the pronoun thou. "What thou!" 2. For his fixing here. "What doest thou here, in this cave? Is this a place for a prophet of the Lord to lodge in? Is this a time for such men to retreat, when the public has such need of them?"

III. The account he gives of himself, in answer to the question put to him (v. 10), and repeated, in answer to the same question, v. 14.

1. He excuses his retreat. God knew, and his own conscience witnessed for him, that as long as there was any hope of doing good he had been very jealous for the Lord God of Hosts; but now that he had laboured in vain, and all his endeavours were to no purpose, he thought it was time to give up the cause.

2. He complains of the people, their obstinacy in sin. "The children of Israel have forsaken thy covenant, and that is the reason I have forsaken them; who can stay among them, to see everything that is sacred ruined and run down?" He had often been, of choice, their advocate, but now he is necessitated to be their accuser, before God. He charges them (1) With having forsaken God's covenant; though they retained circumcision, the sign and seal of it, yet they had quitted his worship and service, which was the intention of it. (2) With having thrown down his altars, not only deserted them and suffered them to go to decay, but, in their zeal for the worship of Baal, wilfully demolished them. These separate altars, though breaking in upon the unity of the church, yet, being erected and attended by those that sincerely aimed at the glory of God, God owned them for his altars, as well as that at Jerusalem, and the putting of them down is charged upon Israel as a crying sin. (3) They have slain thy prophets with the sword, who, it is probable, ministered at those altars. Jezebel, a foreigner, slew them (ch. xviii. 4), but the crime is charged upon the body of the people because the generality of them were consenting to their death, and pleased with it.

3. He gives the reasons why he retired into this desert and took up his residence in this cave. (1) It was because he could not appear to any purpose: "I only am left. What can one do against thousands?" (2) It was because he could not appear with any safety: "They seek my life to take it away; and I had better spend my life in a useless solitude than lose my life in a fruitless endeavour to reform those that hate to be reformed."

IV. God's manifestation of himself to him. Did he come hither to meet with God? Moses was put into the cave when God's glory passed before him; but Elijah was called out of it: Stand upon the mount before the Lord, v. 11. He saw no manner of similitude, any more than Israel did when God talked to them in Horeb. But, 1. He heard a strong wind, and saw the terrible effects of it, for it rent the mountains and tore the rocks. 2. He felt the shock of an earthquake. 3. He saw an eruption of fire, v. 12. But, 4. At last he perceived a still small voice, in which the Lord was, that is, by which he spoke to him, and not out of the wind, or the earthquake, or the fire. Those struck an awe upon him, but God chose to make known his mind to him in whispers soft, not in those dreadful sounds. When he perceived this, (1) He wrapped his face in his mantle, as one afraid to look upon the glory of God. Elijah hid his face in token of shame for having been such a coward as to flee from his duty when he had such a God of power to stand by him in it. The wind, and earthquake, and fire, did not make him cover his face, but the still voice did. Gracious souls are more affected by the tender mercies of the Lord than by his terrors. (2) He stood at the entrance of the cave, ready to hear what God had to say to him. Elijah being now called to revive that law, especially the first two commandments of it, is here taught how to manage it; he must not only awaken and terrify the people with amazing signs, like the earthquake and fire, but he must endeavour, with a still small voice, to convince and persuade them. Faith comes by hearing the word of God; miracles do but make way for it.

V. The orders God gives him to execute. He repeats the question he had put to him before, "What doest thou here? This is not a place for thee now." Elijah gives the same answer (v. 14), complaining of Israel's apostasy from God and the ruin of religion among them. To this God gives him a reply. He sends him back with directions to appoint Hazael king of Syria (v. 15), Jehu king of Israel, and Elisha his successor in the eminency of the prophetical office (v. 16), which is intended as a prediction that by these God would chastise the degenerate Israelites, plead his own cause among them, and avenge the quarrel of his covenant, v. 17. Elisha, with the sword of the Spirit, shall terrify and wound the consciences of those who escape Hazael's sword of war and Jehu's sword of justice.

VI. The comfortable information God gives him of the number of Israelites who retained their integrity, though he thought he was left alone (v. 18): I have left 7,000 in Israel (besides Judea) who have not bowed the knee to Baal. In times of the greatest degeneracy and apostasy God has always had, and will have, a remnant faithful to him, some that keep their integrity and do not go down the stream. It is God's work to preserve that remnant, and distinguish them from the rest, for without his grace they could not have distinguished themselves. God's faithful ones are often his hidden ones (Ps. lxxxiii. 3), and the visible church is scarcely visible, the wheat lost in the chaff and the gold in the dross, till the sifting, refining, separating day comes. The Lord knows those that are his, though we do not; he sees in secret. There are more good people in the world than some wise and holy men think there are. When we come to heaven, as we shall miss a great many whom we thought to meet there, so we shall meet a great many whom we little thought to find there. God's love often proves larger than man's charity and more extensive.

Elisha was named last in the orders God gave to Elijah, but he was first called, for by him the other two were to be called. He must come in Elijah's room; yet Elijah rejoices to think that he shall leave the work of God in such good hands. Concerning the call of Elisha observe, 1. That it was an unexpected surprising call. Elijah found him in the field, not reading, nor praying, nor sacrificing, but ploughing, v. 19. Though a great man (as appears by his feast, v. 21), master of the ground, and oxen, and servants, yet he did not think it any disparagement to lay his hand to the plough. An honest calling in the world does not at all put us out of the way of our heavenly calling, any more than it did Elisha, who was taken from following the plough to feed Israel and to sow the seed of the word, as the apostles were taken from fishing to catch men. 2. That it was a powerful call. Elijah did but cast his mantle upon him (v. 19), in token of friendship, that he would take him under his care and tuition as he did under his mantle, in token of his being clothed with the spirit of Elijah (now he put some of his honour upon him, as Moses on Joshua, Num. xxvii. 20); but, when Elijah went to heaven, he had the mantle entire, 2 Kings ii. 13. And immediately he left the oxen to go as they would, and ran after Elijah. An invisible hand touched his heart, and unaccountably inclined him by a secret power, without any external persuasions, to quit his husbandry and give himself to the ministry. Elisha came to a resolution presently, but begged a little time, not to ask leave, but only to take leave, of his parents. Elijah bade him go back and do it. He will not force him, nor take him against his will; let him sit down and count the cost, and make it his own act. The efficacy of God's grace preserves the native liberty of man's will, so that those who are good are good of choice and not by constraint, not pressed men, but volunteers. 3. That it was a pleasant and acceptable call to him, which appears by the farewell-feast he made for his family (v. 21). It was a discouraging time for prophets to set out in. A man that had consulted with flesh and blood would not be fond of Elijah's mantle, nor willing to wear his coat; yet Elisha cheerfully, and with a great deal of satisfaction, leaves all to accompany him. 4. That it was an effectual call. Elijah did not stay for him, lest he should seem to compel him, and he soon arose, went after him, and not only associated with him, but ministered to him as his servitor, poured water on his hands, 2 Kings iii. 11. Those that would be fit to teach must have time to learn; and those that hope hereafter to rise and rule must be willing at first to stoop and serve.

CHAP. XX

This chapter is the history of a war between Ben-hadad king of Syria and Ahab king of Israel, in which Ahab was victorious. We read nothing of Elijah or Elisha in all this story; Jezebel's rage it is probable, had abated, and the persecution of the prophets began to cool, which gleam of peace Elijah improved. He appeared not at court, but, being told how many thousands of good people there were in Israel more than he thought of, employed himself, as we may suppose, in founding schools of prophets, in several parts of the country, to be nurseries of religion, that they might help to reform the nation when the throne and court would not be reformed. While he was thus busied, God favoured the nation with the successes we here read of, which were the more remarkable because obtained against Ben-hadad king of Syria, whose successor, Hazael, was ordained to be a scourge to Israel. They must shortly suffer by the Syrians, and yet now triumphed over them, that, if possible, they might be led to repentance by the goodness of God. Here is, I. Ben-hadad's descent upon Israel, and his insolent demand, ver. 1–11. II. The defeat Ahab gave him, encouraged and directed by a prophet, ver. 12–21. III. The Syrians rallying again, and the second defeat Ahab gave them, ver. 22–30. IV. The covenant of peace Ahab made with Ben-hadad, when he had him at his mercy (ver. 31–34), for which he is reproved and threatened by a prophet, ver. 35–43.

Verses 1–11

I. The threatening descent which Ben-hadad made upon Ahab's kingdom, and the siege he laid to Samaria, his royal city, v. 1. David in his time had quite subdued the Syrians and made them tributaries to Israel, but Israel's apostasy from God makes them formidable again. Asa had tempted the Syrians to invade Israel once (ch. xv. 18 20), and now they did it of their own accord. It is dangerous bringing a foreign force into the country: posterity may pay dearly for it.

II. The treaty between these two kings.

1. Ben-hadad's proud spirit sends Ahab a very insolent demand, v. 2, 3. A parley is sounded to let Ahab know that he will raise the siege upon condition that Ahab becomes his vassal and not only pay him a tribute but make over his title to Ben-hadad, and hold all at his will, even his wives and children.

2. Ahab's poor spirit sends Ben-hadad a very disgraceful submission. I am thine, and all that I have, v. 4. See the effect of sin. (1) If he had not by sin provoked God to depart from him, Ben-hadad could not have made such a demand. If God may not rule us, our enemies shall. A rebel to God is a slave to all besides. (2) If he had not by sin wronged his own conscience, and set that against him, he could not have made such a mean surrender. Guilt dispirits men, and makes them cowards.

3. Ben-hadad's proud spirit rises upon his submission, and becomes yet more insolent and imperious, v. 5, 6. (1) Ben-hadad is as covetous as he is proud, and cannot go away unless he have the possession as well as the dominion. (2) He is as spiteful as he is haughty. Had he come himself to select what he had a mind for, it would have shown some respect to a crowned head; but he will send his servants to insult the prince: Whatsoever is pleasant in thy eyes they shall take away. (3) He is as unreasonable as he is unjust, and will construe the surrender Ahab made for himself as made for all his subjects too.

4. Ahab's poor spirit begins to rise too, upon this growing insolence; and, if it becomes not bold, yet it becomes desperate, and he will rather hazard his life than give up all thus. (1) Now he takes advice of his privy-council, who encourage him to stand it out. (2) Yet he expresses himself very modestly in his denial, v. 9.

5. Ben-hadad proudly swears the ruin of Samaria.

6. Ahab sends him a decent rebuke to his assurance, dares not defy his menaces, only reminds him of the uncertain turns of war (v. 11).

Verses 12–21

The treaty between the besiegers and the besieged being broken off abruptly, we have here an account of the battle that ensued.

I. The Syrians, the besiegers, had their directions from a drunken king, who gave orders over his cups, as he was drinking (v. 12), drinking himself drunk (v. 16) with the kings in the pavilions, and this at noon. Had he not been very secure he would not have sat to drink; and, had he not been intoxicated, he would not have been so very secure. Security and sensuality went together in the old world, and Sodom, Luke xvii. 26, &c. Ben-hadad's drunkenness was the forerunner of his fall, as Belshazzar's was, Dan. v. In his drink, 1. He orders the town to be invested. 2. When the besieged made a sally he gave orders to take them alive (v. 18), not to kill them, which might have been done more easily and safely, but to seize them, which gave them an opportunity of killing the aggressors.

II. The Israelites, the besieged, had their directions from an inspired prophet, one of the prophets of the Lord, whom Ahab had hated and persecuted.

1. Behold, and wonder, that God should send a prophet with a kind and gracious message to so wicked a prince as Ahab was; but he did it, (1) For his people Israel's sake. (2) That he might magnify his mercy, in doing good to one so evil and unthankful, might either bring him to repentance or leave him the more inexcusable. (3) That he might mortify the pride of Ben-hadad and check his insolence. He enquired not for a prophet of the Lord, but God sent one to him unasked, for he waits to be gracious.

2. Two things the prophet does: (1) He animates Ahab with an assurance of victory, which was more than all the elders of Israel could give him (v. 8), though they promised to stand by him. He is informed what use he ought to make of this blessed turn of affairs: "Thou shalt know that I am Jehovah, the sovereign Lord of all." (2) He instructs him what to do for the gaining of this victory. [1] He must not stay till the enemy attacked him, but must sally out upon them and surprise them in their trenches. [2] The persons employed must be the young men of the princes of the provinces, the pages, the footmen, who were few in number, only 232, utterly unacquainted with war, and the unlikeliest men that could be thought of for such a bold attempt. [3] Ahab must himself so far testify his confidence in the word of God as to command in person, though, in the eye of reason, he exposed himself to the utmost danger by it. Yet, [4] He is allowed to make use of what other forces he has at hand, to follow the blow, when these young men have broken the ice. All he had in Samaria, or within call, were but 7,000 men, v. 15. It is observable that it is the same number with theirs that had not bowed the knee to Baal (ch. xix. 18), though, it is likely, not the same men.

III. The issue was accordingly. The proud Syrians were beaten, and the poor despised Israelites were more than conquerors. See how God takes away the spirit of princes, and makes himself terrible to the kings of the earth. Now where are the silver and gold he demanded of Ahab? Where are the handfuls of Samaria's dust?

Verses 22–30

An account of another successful campaign which Ahab, by divine aid, made against the Syrians, in which he gave them a greater defeat than in the former. Strange! Ahab idolatrous and yet victorious, a persecutor and yet a conqueror! God has wise and holy ends in suffering wicked men to prosper.

I. Ahab is admonished by a prophet to prepare for another war, v. 22. The prophet told him they would renew their attempt at the return of the year, hoping to retrieve the honour they had lost and be avenged for the blow they had received. He therefore bade him strengthen himself. It concerns us always to expect assaults from our spiritual enemies, and therefore to mark and see what we do.

II. Ben-hadad is advised by those about him concerning the operations of the next campaign. 1. They advised him to change his ground, v. 23. They took it for granted that it was not Israel, but Israel's gods, that beat them, but they speak very ignorantly of Jehovah—that he was many, whereas he is one and his name one—that he was their God only, a local deity, peculiar to that nation, whereas he is the Creator and ruler of all the world. 2. They advised him to change his officers (v. 24, 25), not to employ the kings, who were commanders by birth, but captains rather, who were commanders by merit, who were inured to war.

III. Both armies take the field. Ben-hadad, with his Syrians, encamps near Aphek, in the tribe of Asher. Ahab, with his forces, posted himself at some distance over against them, v. 27. The disproportion of numbers was very remarkable. The children of Israel, who were cantoned in two battalions, looked like two little flocks of kids, their numbers small, their equipage mean, and the figure they made contemptible; but the Syrians filled the country with their numbers, their noise, their chariots, their carriages, and their baggage.

IV. Ahab is encouraged to fight the Syrians, notwithstanding their advantages and confidence. A man of God is sent to him, to tell him that this numerous army shall all be delivered into his hand (v. 28), but not for his sake; be it known to him, he is utterly unworthy for whom God will do this.

V. After the armies had faced one another seven days they engaged, and the Syrians were totally routed. Ben-hadad, who thought his city Aphek would hold out against the conquerers, finding it thus unwalled, and the remnant of his forces dispirited and dispersed, had nothing but secrecy to rely upon for safety, and therefore hid himself in a chamber within a chamber, lest the pursuers should seize him. See how the greatest confidence often ends in the greatest cowardice.

An account of what followed upon the victory which Israel obtained over the Syrians.

I. Ben-hadad's tame and mean submission. His servants, seeing him and themselves reduced to the last extremity, advised that they should surrender at discretion, and make themselves prisoners and petitioners to Ahab for their lives, v. 31. The servants will put their lives in their hands, and venture first. They had heard that the God of Israel proclaimed his name gracious and merciful, and they concluded their kings would make their God their pattern. This encouragement poor sinners have to repent and humble themselves before God. "Have we not heard that the God of Israel is a merciful God? Have we not found him so? Let us therefore rend our hearts and return to him." Joel ii. 13. That is evangelical repentance which flows from an apprehension of the mercy of God in Christ; there is forgiveness with him. Two things Ben-hadad's servants undertake to represent to Ahab: 1. Their master a penitent; for they girded sackcloth on their loins, as mourners, and put ropes on their heads, as condemned criminals going to execution. Many pretend to repent of their wrong-doing, when it does not succeed, who, if they had prospered in it, would have justified it and gloried in it. 2. Their master a beggar, a beggar for his life: Thy servant Ben-hadad saith, "I pray thee, let me live," v. 32. What a great change is here, (1) In his condition! How has he fallen from the height of power and prosperity to the depths of disgrace and distress. (2) In his temper—in the beginning of the chapter hectoring, swearing, and threatening, and none more high in his demands, but here crouching and whining and none more low in his requests!

II. Ahab's foolish acceptance of his submission, and the league he suddenly made with him upon it. He was proud to be thus courted by him whom he had feared. Is he yet alive? He is my brother, brother-king, though not brother-Israelite; and Ahab valued himself more upon his royalty than on his religion. "Is he thy brother, Ahab? Did he use thee like a brother when he sent thee that barbarous message? v. 5, 6. Would he have called thee brother if he had been the conqueror? Would he now have called himself thy servant if he had not been reduced to the utmost strait? Canst thou suffer thyself to be thus imposed upon by a forced and counterfeit submission?" Ben-hadad, upon his submission, shall not only be honourably conveyed (he took him up into the chariot), but treated with as an ally (v. 34): he made a covenant with him, not consulting God's prophets, or the elders of the land. He might now have demanded some of Ben-hadad's cities, but was content with the restitution of his own. He might now have demanded the stores, and treasures, and magazines of Damascus, but was content with a poor liberty, at his own expense, to build streets there. With this covenant he sent him away, without so much as reproving him for his blasphemous reflections upon the God of Israel, for whose honour Ahab had no concern.

III. The reproof given to Ahab for his clemency to Ben-hadad and his covenant with him. It was given him by a prophet, in the name of the Lord, the Jews say by Micaiah, and not unlikely, for Ahab complains of him (ch. xxii. 8) that he used to prophesy evil concerning him. This prophet designed to reprove Ahab by a parable. To make his parable the more plausible, he finds it necessary to put himself into the posture of a wounded soldier. 1. With some difficulty he gets himself wounded, for he would not wound himself with his own hands. He commanded one of his brother prophets to smite him, and this in God's name (v. 35), but finds him not so willing to give the blow as he is to receive it. We cannot but think it was from a good principle he declined it. Good men can much more easily receive a wrongful blow than give one; yet because he disobeyed an express command of God (which was so much the worse if he was himself a prophet), like that other disobedient prophet (ch. xiii. 24), he was presently slain by a lion, v. 36. This was intended to intimate to Ahab that if a good prophet were thus punished for sparing his friend and God's, when God said, Smite, of much sorer punishment should a wicked king be thought worthy, who spared his enemy and God's, when God said, Smite. The next he met with made no difficulty of smiting him and did it so that he wounded him, v. 37. He fetched blood with the blow, probably in his face. 2. Wounded as he was, and disguised with ashes that he might not be known to be a prophet, he made his application to the king in a story wherein he charged himself with such a crime as the king was now guilty of in sparing Ben-hadad, and waited for the king's judgment upon it. The case in short is this—A prisoner taken in the battle was committed to his custody by a man with this charge, If he be missing, thy life shall be for his life, v. 39. The prisoner has made his escape through his carelessness. Can the chancery in the king's breast relieve him against his captain, who demands his life in lieu of the prisoner's? "By no means," says the king, "thou shouldst either not have undertaken the trust or been more careful and faithful to it; there is no remedy, thou hast forfeited thy bond, and execution must go out upon it: So shall thy doom be, thou thyself hast decided it." Now the prophet has what he would have, puts off his disguise, and is known by Ahab himself to be a prophet (v. 41) and plainly tells him, "Thou art the man. Out of thy own mouth art thou judged. God delivered into thy hands one plainly marked for destruction both by his own pride and God's providence, and thou hast wittingly and willingly dismissed him, and so hast been false to thy trust." 3. We are told how Ahab resented this reproof. He went to his house heavy and displeased (v. 43), enraged at the prophet, exasperated against God, and yet vexed at himself.

CHAP. XXI

Ahab is still the unhappy subject of the sacred history; from the great affairs of his camp and kingdom this chapter leads us into his garden, and gives us an account of some ill things relating to his domestic affairs. I. Ahab is sick for Naboth's vineyard, ver. 1–4. II. Naboth dies by Jezebel's plot, that the vineyard may escheat to Ahab, ver. 5–14. III. Ahab goes to take possession, ver. 15–16. IV. Elijah meets him, and denounces the judgments of God against him for his injustice, ver. 17–24. V. Upon his humiliation a reprieve is granted, ver. 25–29.

Verses 1–4

1. Ahab coveting his neighbour's vineyard, which unhappily lay near his palace and conveniently for a kitchen-garden. Ahab sets his eye and heart on this vineyard, v. 2. It will be a pretty addition to his demesne, and nothing will serve him but it must be his own. Yet he is not such a tyrant as to take it by force, but fairly proposes either to give Naboth the full value of it in money or a better vineyard in exchange. To desire a convenience to his estate was not evil, but to desire anything inordinately is a fruit of selfishness. 2. The repulse he met with in his desire. Naboth would by no means part with it (v. 3): The Lord forbid it me. Canaan was in a peculiar manner God's land; the Israelites were his tenants; and this was one of the conditions of their leases, that they should not alienate any part of that which fell to their lot, unless in case of extreme necessity, and then only till the year of jubilee, Lev. xxv. 28. Now Naboth foresaw that, if his vineyard were sold to the crown, it would never return to his heirs, no, not in the jubilee. He would gladly oblige the king, but he must obey God rather than men, and therefore in this matter desires to be excused. Some conceive that Naboth looked upon his earthly inheritance as an earnest of his lot in the heavenly Canaan, and therefore would not part with the former, lest it should amount to a forfeiture of the latter. 3. Ahab's great discontent and uneasiness hereupon. He was as before (ch. xx. 43) heavy and displeased (v. 4), grew melancholy upon it, threw himself upon his bed, would not eat nor admit company to come to him. He cursed the squeamishness of Naboth's conscience. Nor could he bear the disappointment; it cut him to the heart to be crossed in his desires, and he was perfectly sick for vexation. He had all the delights of Canaan, that pleasant land, at command, the wealth of a kingdom, the pleasures of a court, and the honours and powers of a throne; and yet all this avails him nothing without Naboth's vineyard.

Verses 5–16

Nothing but mischief is to be expected when Jezebel enters into the story—that cursed woman, 2 Kings ix. 34.

1. Under pretence of comforting her afflicted husband, she feeds his pride and passion, and blows the coals of his corruptions. He told her what troubled him (v. 6), yet invidiously concealed Naboth's reason for his refusal, representing it as peevish, when it was conscientious—I will not give it thee, whereas he said, I may not. What! says Jezebel (v. 7), Dost thou govern Israel? Arise, and eat bread. "Dost thou govern Israel, and shall any subject thou hast deny thee anything thou hast a mind to? If thou knowest not how to support the dignity of a king, let me alone to do it; give me but leave to make use of thy name, and I will soon give thee the vineyard of Naboth; right or wrong, it shall be thy own shortly, and cost thee nothing."

II. In order to gratify him, she projects and compasses the death of Naboth.

1. Had she aimed only at his land, her false witnesses might have sworn him out of that by a forged deed, but Naboth must die.

(1) Never were more wicked orders given by any prince than those which Jezebel sent to the magistrates of Jezreel, v. 8–10. She borrows the privy-seal, but the king shall not know what she will do with it. She makes use of the king's name; in short, she commands them, upon their allegiance, to put Naboth to death. She must have looked upon the elders of Jezreel as men perfectly lost to everything that is honest and honourable when she expected these orders should be obeyed. [1] It must be done under colour of religion: "Proclaim a fast; pretend to be afraid that there is some great offender among you undiscovered, for whose sake God is angry with your city; and at last let Naboth be fastened upon as the suspected person, probably because he does not join with his neighbours in their worship." [2] It must be done under colour of justice too, and with the formalities of a legal process. The crime they must lay to his charge was blaspheming God and the king— a complicated blasphemy.

(2) Never were wicked orders more wickedly obeyed than these were by the magistrates of Jezreel. They did as it was written in the letters (v. 11, 12), neither made any difficulty of it, nor met with any difficulty in it, but cleverly carried on the villainy. They stoned Naboth to death (v. 13), and, as it should seem, his sons with him, or after him.

2. Let us take occasion (1) To stand amazed at the wickedness of the wicked, and the power of Satan in the children of disobedience. (2) To lament the hard case of oppressed innocency. (3) To commit the keeping of our lives and comforts to God, for innocency itself will not always be our security. (4) To rejoice in the belief of a judgment to come, in which such wrong judgments as these will be called over.

III. Naboth being taken off, Ahab takes possession of his vineyard. 1. The elders of Jezreel sent notice to Jezebel very unconcernedly, sent it to her as a piece of agreeable news, Naboth is stoned and is dead, v. 14. 2. Jezebel, jocund enough that her plot succeeded so well, brings notice to Ahab that Naboth is not alive, but dead; therefore, says she, Arise, take possession of his vineyard, v. 15. He might have taken possession by one of his officers, but so pleased is he with this accession to his estate that he will make a journey to Jezreel himself to enter upon it; and it should seem he went in state too, as if he had obtained some mighty victory, for Jehu remembers long after that he and Bidkar attended him at this time, 2 Kings ix. 25.

Verses 17–29

1. The very bad character that is given of Ahab (v. 25, 26), which comes in here to justify God in the heavy sentence passed upon him, and to show that though it was passed upon occasion of his sin in the matter of Naboth, yet God would not have punished him so severely if he had not been guilty of many other sins, especially idolatry. He was wholly given up to sin, and, upon condition he might have the pleasures of it, he would take the wages of it, which is death, Rom. vi. 23. It was no excuse of his crimes that Jezebel his wife stirred him up to do wickedly, and made him, in many respects, worse then otherwise he would have been.

II. The message with which Elijah was sent to him, when he went to take possession of Naboth's vineyard, v. 17–19.

1. Hitherto God kept silence, but now Ahab is reproved and his sin set in order before his eyes. (1) The person sent is Elijah. (2) The place is Naboth's vineyard and the time just when he is taking possession of it; then, and there, must his doom be read him. Now he is pleasing himself with his ill-gotten wealth, and giving direction for the turning of this vineyard into a flower-garden.

2. What passed between him and the prophet.

(1) Ahab vented his wrath against Elijah, fell into a passion at the sight of him, and, instead of humbling himself before the prophet, as he ought to have done (2 Chron. xxxvi. 12), was ready to fly in his face. Hast thou found me, O my enemy? v. 20. This shows, [1] That he hated him. The last time we found them together they parted very good friends, ch. xviii. 46. Then Ahab had countenanced the reformation, and therefore then all was well between him and the prophet; but now he had relapsed, and was worse than ever. His conscience told him he had made God his enemy, and therefore he could not expect Elijah should be his friend. [2] That he feared him: Hast thou found me? Never was poor debtor or criminal so confounded at the sight of the officer that came to arrest him.

(2) Elijah denounced God's wrath against Ahab: I have found thee (says he, v. 20), because thou hast sold thyself to work evil. [1] Elijah finds the indictment against him, and convicts him upon the notorious evidence of the fact (v. 19): Hast thou killed, and also taken possession? [2] He passes judgment upon him. He told him from God that his family should be ruined and rooted out (v. 21) and all his posterity cut off. "Thy blood, even thine, though it be royal blood, though it swell thy veins with pride and boil in thy heart with anger, shall ere long be an entertainment for the dogs," which was fulfilled, ch. xxii. 38.

III. Ahab's humiliation under the sentence passed upon him, and the favourable message sent him thereupon. 1. Ahab was a kind of penitent. The message Elijah delivered to him in God's name put him into a fright for the present, so that he rent his clothes and put on sackcloth, v. 27. Ahab put on the garb and guise of a penitent, and yet his heart was unhumbled and unchanged. 2. He obtained hereby a reprieve, which I may call a kind of pardon. Though it was but an outside repentance (lamenting the judgment only, and not the sin), though he did not leave his idols, nor restore the vineyard to Naboth's heirs, yet, because he did hereby give some glory to God, God took notice of it, and bade Elijah take notice of it: Seest thou how Ahab humbles himself? v. 29. This teaches us to take notice of that which is good even in those who are not so good as they should be: let it be commended as far as it goes. This gives a reason why wicked people sometimes prosper long; God is rewarding their external services with external mercies. This encourages all those that truly repent and unfeignedly believe the holy gospel. If a pretending partial penitent shall go to his house reprieved, doubtless a sincere penitent shall go to his house justified.

CHAP. XXII

It was promised in the close of the foregoing chapter that the ruin of his house should not come in his days, but his days were soon at an end. His war with the Syrians at Ramoth-Gilead is that which we have an account of in this chapter. I. His preparations for that war. He consulted, 1. His privy-council, ver. 1–3. 2. Jehoshaphat, ver. 4. 3. His prophets. (1) His own, who encouraged him to go on this expedition (ver. 5, 6), Zedekiah particularly, ver. 11, 12. (2) A prophet of the Lord, Micaiah, who was desired to come by Jehoshaphat (ver. 7, 8), was sent for (ver. 9, 10–13, 14), upbraided Ahab with his confidence in the false prophets (ver. 15), but foretold his fall in this expedition (ver. 16–18), and gave him an account how he came to be thus imposed upon by his prophets, ver. 19–23. He is abused by Zedekiah (ver. 24, 25), and imprisoned by Ahab, ver. 26–28. II. The battle itself, in which, 1. Jehoshaphat is exposed. But, 2. Ahab is slain, ver. 29–40. In the close of the chapter we have a short account, (1) Of the good reign of Jehoshaphat king of Judah, ver. 41–50. (2) Of the wicked reign of Ahaziah king o Israel, ver. 51–53.

As a reward for his professions of repentance and humiliation, though the time drew near when he should descend into battle and perish, yet we have him blessed with a three years' peace (v. 1) and an honourable visit made him by Jehoshaphat king of Judah, v. 2. The Jews have a fabulous conceit, that when Ahab humbled himself for his sin, and lay in sackcloth, he sent for Jehoshaphat to come to him, to chastise him; and that he stayed with him for some time, and gave him so many stripes every day. This is a groundless tradition. He came now, it is probable, to consult him about the affairs of their kingdoms. The Syrians durst not give Ahab any disturbance. But,

I. Ahab here meditates a war against the Syrians, and advises concerning it with those about him, v. 3. The king of Syria gave him the provocation; when he lay at his mercy, he promised to restore him his cities (ch. xx. 34), and Ahab foolishly took his word. Ben-hadad is one of those princes that think themselves bound by their word no further and no longer than it is for their interest. Whether any other cities were restored we do not find, but Ramoth-Gilead was not, a considerable city in the tribe of Gad, on the other side Jordan, a Levites' city, and one of the cities of refuge. Ahab blames himself, and his people, that they did not bestir themselves to recover it out of the hands of the Syrians, and to chastise Ben-hadad's violation of his league.

II. He engages Jehoshaphat, and draws him in, to join with him in this expedition, for the recovery of Ramoth-Gilead, v. 4. But it is strange that Jehoshaphat will go so entirely into Ahab's interests as to say, I am as thou art, and my people as thy people. I hope not; Jehoshaphat and his people are not so wicked and corrupt as Ahab and his people. Too great a complaisance to evil-doers has brought many good people, through unwariness, into a dangerous fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness. Jehoshaphat had like to have paid dearly for his compliment when, in battle, he was taken for Ahab. Yet some observe that in joining with Israel against Syria he atoned for his father's fault in joining with Syria against Israel, ch. xv. 19, 20.

III. At the special instance and request of Jehoshaphat, he asks counsel of the prophets concerning this expedition. Ahab thought it enough to consult with his statesmen, but Jehoshaphat moves that they should enquire of the word of the Lord, v. 5. Whithersoever a good man goes he ought to take his religion along with him, and not be ashamed to own it, no, not when he is with those who have no kindness for it.

IV. Ahab's 400 prophets (prophets of the groves they called them), agreed to encourage him in this expedition and to assure him of success, v. 6. He put the question to them: Shall I go or shall I forbear? But they knew which way his inclination was and designed only to humour the two kings. To please Jehoshaphat, they made use of the name Jehovah: He shall deliver it into the hand of the king. To please Ahab they said, Go up. "Thou shalt certainly recover Ramoth-Gilead." Zedekiah, a leading man among these prophets, illustrated his false prophecy with a sign, v. 11. He made himself a pair of iron horns, representing the two kings, and their honour and power (both of which were signified by horns, exaltation and force), and with these the Syrians must be pushed. All the prophets agreed, as one man, that Ahab should return from this expedition a conqueror, v. 12.

V. Jehoshaphat cannot relish this sort of preaching; it is not like what he was used to. The false prophets cannot so mimic the true but that he who had spiritual senses exercised could discern the fallacy, and therefore he enquired for a prophet of the Lord besides, v. 7.

VI. Ahab has another, but one he hates, Micaiah by name, a true prophet, and one that knew God's mind. And yet, 1. He hated him, and was not ashamed to own to the king of Judah that he did so, and to give this for a reason, He doth not prophesy good concerning me, but evil. And whose fault was that? If Ahab had done well, he would have heard nothing but good from heaven. Those are wretchedly hardened in sin, and are ripening apace for ruin, who hate God's ministers because they deal plainly with them. 2. He had imprisoned him. We may suppose that this was he that reproved him for his clemency to Ben-hadad (ch. xx. 38, &c.) and for so doing was cast into prison, where he had lain these three years. This was the reason why Ahab knew where to find him so readily, v. 9. He was bound, but the word of the Lord was not. Jehoshaphat gave too gentle a reproof to Ahab for expressing his indignation against a faithful prophet: Let not the king say so, v. 8. Such sinners as Ahab must be rebuked sharply. However he so far yielded to the reproof that, for fear of provoking Jehoshaphat to break off from his alliance with him, he orders Micaiah to be sent for with all speed, v. 9. The two kings sat each in their robes and chairs of state, in the gate of Samaria, ready to receive this poor prophet, and to hear what he had to say. They were attended with a crowd of flattering prophets, that could not think of prophesying anything but what was very sweet and very smooth to two such glorious princes now in confederacy.

VII. Micaiah is pressed by the officer that fetches him to follow the cry, v. 13. But Micaiah, who knows better things, protests, and backs his protestation with an oath, that he will deliver his message from God with all faithfulness, whether it be pleasing or displeasing to his prince (v. 14): "What the Lord saith to me, that will I speak."

I. We are told how faithfully he delivered his message. In three ways he delivers his message, and all displeasing to Ahab:

1. He spoke as the rest of the prophets had spoken, but ironically: Go, and prosper, v. 15. Ahab put the same question to him that he had put to his own prophets, seeming desirous to know God's mind, when, like Balaam, he was strongly bent to do his own, which Micaiah plainly took notice of when he bade him go, but he spoke by way of derision; as if he had said, go then, and take what follows. In answer to this Ahab adjured him to tell him the truth, and not to jest with him (v. 16).

2. Being thus pressed, he plainly foretold that the king would be cut off in this expedition, and his army scattered, v. 17. He saw them in a vision, dispersed upon the mountains, as sheep that had no one to guide them. This intimates, (1) That Israel should be deprived of their king, who was their shepherd. (2) That they would make a dishonourable retreat. Let them return every man to his house in peace, no great losers by the death of their king. Thus Micaiah, in his prophecy, testified what he had seen and heard. Now Ahab finds himself aggrieved, turns to Jehoshaphat and appeals to him whether Micaiah had not manifestly a spite against him, v. 18.

3. He informed the king how it was that all his prophets encouraged him to proceed, that God permitted Satan by them to deceive him into his ruin, and he by vision knew of it. God is a great king above all kings, and has a throne above all the thrones of earthly princes. The rise and fall of princes, the issues of war, and all the great affairs of state, which are the subject of the consultations of wise and great men, are no more above God's direction than the meanest concerns of the poorest cottages are below his notice. It is not without the divine permission that the devil deceives men, and even thereby God serves his own purposes. Thus Micaiah gave Ahab fair warning, not only of the danger of proceeding in this war, but of the danger of believing those that encouraged him to proceed.

II. We are told how he was abused for delivering his message thus faithfully. 1. Zedekiah, a wicked prophet, impudently insulted him in the face of the court, smote him on the cheek, to silence him and stop his mouth. To strike within the verge of the court, especially in the king's presence, is looked upon by our law as a high misdemeanour; yet this wicked prophet gives this abuse to a prophet of the Lord. Micaiah, though he returns not his blow leaves Ahab to be convinced of his error by the event: Thou shalt know when thou hidest thyself in an inner chamber, v. 25. It is likely Zedekiah went with Ahab to the battle, and took his horns of iron with him to encourage the soldiers, to see with pleasure the accomplishment of his prophecy, and return in triumph with the king; but, the army being routed, he fled among the rest from the sword of the enemy, sheltered himself as Ben-hadad had done in a chamber within a chamber (ch. xx. 30), lest he should perish. 2. Ahab, that wicked king, committed him to prison (v. 27), to be fed with bread and water, coarse bread and puddle-water, till he should return, not doubting but that he should return a conqueror, and then he would put him to death for a false prophet (v. 27)—hard usage for one that would have prevented his ruin! Micaiah put it upon the issue, and called all the people to be witnesses that he did so: "If thou return in peace, the Lord has not spoken by me, v. 28. Let me incur the reproach and punishment of a false prophet, if the king come home alive."

Verses 29–40

I. The two kings march with their forces to Ramoth-Gilead, v. 29. That Jehoshaphat, that pious prince, who had desired to enquire by a prophet of the Lord, discrediting Ahab's prophets, should yet proceed, after so fair a warning, is matter of astonishment. But by the easiness of his temper he was carried away with the delusion of his friends. He gave too much heed to Ahab's prophets, because it was 400 to one that they should succeed.

II. Ahab adopts a contrivance by which he hopes to secure himself and expose his friend (v. 30): "I will disguise myself, and go in the habit of a common soldier, but let Jehoshaphat put on his robes, to appear in the dress of a general." He pretended thereby to do honour to Jehoshaphat, but he intended, 1. To make a liar of a good prophet. Thus he hoped to elude the danger. 2. To make a fool of a good king, whom he did not cordially love. How can it be expected that he should be true to his friend that has been false to his God?

III. Jehoshaphat, having more piety than policy, put himself into the post of honour, though it was the post of danger, and was thereby brought into peril of his life, but God graciously delivered him. The king of Syria charged his captains to level their force, not against the king of Judah, for with him he had no quarrel, but against the king of Israel only (v. 31). Some think that he designed only to have him taken prisoner. Whatever was the reason, the officers, seeing Jehoshaphat in his royal habit, took him for the king of Israel, and surrounded him. 1. By his danger God let him know that he was displeased with him for joining in confederacy with Ahab. 2. By his deliverance God let him know that, though he was displeased with him, yet he had not deserted him. Some of the captains that knew him perceived their mistake, and so retired from the pursuit of him.

IV. Ahab receives his mortal wound in the battle. Let no man think to hide himself from God's judgment. The Syrian that shot him drew a bow at a venture, not aiming particularly at any man, yet God so directed the arrow that, 1. He hit the right person. 2. He hit him in the right place, between the joints of the harness, the only place about him where this arrow of death could find entrance.

V. The army is dispersed by the enemy and sent home by the king. Ahab himself lived long enough to see that part of Micaiah's prophecy accomplished that all Israel should be scattered upon the mountains of Gilead (v. 17).

VI. The royal corpse is brought to Samaria and buried there (v. 37). Now Naboth's blood was avenged (ch. xxi. 19), and that word of David was fulfilled (Ps. lxviii. 23), That thy foot may be dipped in the blood of thy enemies, and the tongue of thy dogs in the same.

Lastly, The story of Ahab is here concluded in the usual form, v. 39, 40. Among his works mention is made of an ivory house, so called because many parts of it were inlaid with ivory; perhaps it was intended to vie with the stately palace of the kings of Judah, which Solomon built.

I. A short account of the reign of Jehoshaphat king of Judah, of which we have a much fuller narrative in the book of Chronicles, and of the greatness and goodness of that prince, neither of which was lessened or sullied by anything but his intimacy with the house of Ahab. His confederacy with Ahab in war we have already found dangerous to him, and his confederacy with Ahaziah his son in trade sped no better. He offered to go partner with him in a fleet of merchant-ships, that should fetch gold from Ophir. But, while they were preparing to set sail, they were disabled by a storm (broken at Ezion-geber). When Ahaziah desired a second time to be a partner with him, Jehoshaphat would not. The rod of God, expounded by the word of God, had effectually broken him off from his confederacy with that ungodly unhappy prince. Now Jehoshaphat's reign appears here to have been none of the longest, but one of the best. 1. It was none of the longest, for he reigned but twenty-five years (v. 42), but these twenty-five, added to his father's happy forty-one, give us a grateful idea of the flourishing condition of the kingdom of Judah, and of religion in it. 2. Yet it was one of the best, both in respect of piety and prosperity. (1) He did well: He did that which was right in the eyes of the Lord (v. 43). Yet the high places were not taken away, no, not out of Judah and Benjamin, though those tribes lay so near Jerusalem that they could not pretend, as some other of the tribes, the inconveniency of lying remote. (2) His affairs did well. He prevented the mischiefs which had attended their wars with the kingdom of Israel, establishing a lasting peace (v. 44); he put a deputy, or viceroy, in Edom, so that that kingdom was tributary to him (v. 47), and therein the prophecy concerning Esau and Jacob was fulfilled, that the elder should serve the younger. He pleased God, and God blessed him with strength and success.

II. The beginning of the story of Ahaziah the son of Ahab, v. 51–53. His reign was very short, not two years. Some sinners God makes quick work with. It is a very bad character that is here given him. He not only kept up Jeroboam's idolatry, but the worship of Baal likewise; though he had heard of the ruin of Jeroboam's family, and had seen his own father drawn into destruction by the prophets of Baal, who had often been proved false prophets, yet he followed the example of his wicked father and the counsel of his more wicked mother Jezebel, who was still living.

THE SECOND BOOK OF KINGS

This second book of the Kings (which the LXX., numbering from Samuel, called the fourth) is a continuation of the former book; and, some think, might better have been made to begin with the fifty-first verse of the foregoing chapter, where the reign of Ahaziah begins. The former book had an illustrious beginning, in the glories of the kingdom of Israel, when it was entire; this has a melancholy conclusion, in the desolations of the kingdoms of Israel first, and then of Judah. But, as Elijah's mighty works were very much the glory of the former book, towards the latter end of it, so were Elisha's the glory of this, towards the beginning of it. These prophets out-shone their princes; and therefore, as far as they go, the history shall be accounted for in them. Here is, I. Elijah fetching fire from heaven and ascending in fire to heaven, ch. i and ii. II. Elisha working many miracles, both for prince and people, Israelites and foreigners, ch. iii.–vii. III. Hazael and Jehu anointed, the former for the correction of Israel, the latter for the destruction of the house of Ahab and the worship of Baal, ch. viii.–x. IV. The reign of several of the kings, both of Judah and Israel, ch. xi.–xvi. V. The captivity of the ten tribes, ch. xvii. VI. The good and glorious reign of Hezekiah, ch. xviii.–xx. VII. Manasseh's wicked reign, and Josiah's good one, ch. xxi.–xxiii. VIII. The destruction of Jerusalem by the king of Babylon, ch. xxiv.–xxv. This history, in the several passages of it, confirms that observation of Solomon, That righteousness exalts a nation, but sin is the reproach of any people.

CHAP. I

We here find Ahaziah, the genuine son and successor of Ahab, on the throne of Israel. His reign continued not two years; he died by a fall in his own house. I. The message which he sent to the god of Ekron, ver. 2. II. The message he received from the God of Israel, ver. 3–8. III. The destruction of the messengers he sent to seize the prophet, once and again, ver. 9–12. IV. His compassion to, and compliance with, the third messenger, upon his submission, and the delivery of the message to the king himself, ver. 13–16. V. The death of Ahaziah, ver. 17, 18. In the story we may observe how great the prophet looks and how little the prince.

Verses 1–8

Ahaziah, the wicked king of Israel, under God's rebukes both by his providence and by his prophet, by his rod and by his word.

I. He is crossed in his affairs. How can those expect to prosper that do evil in the sight of the Lord, and provoke him to anger? When he rebelled against God, and revolted from his allegiance to him, Moab rebelled against Israel, and revolted from the subjection they had long paid to the kings of Israel, v. 1.

II. He is seized with sickness in body, not from any inward cause, but by a severe accident. He fell down through a lattice. Ahaziah would not attempt to reduce the Moabites, lest he should perish in the field of battle: but he is not safe, though he tarry at home. Royal palaces do not always yield firm footing.

III. In his distress he sends messengers to enquire of the god of Ekron whether he should recover or no, v. 2. 1. His enquiry was very foolish: Shall I recover? Even nature itself would rather have asked, "What means may I use that I may recover?" 2. His sending to Baal-zebub was very wicked. Baal-zebub, which signifies the lord of a fly, was one of their Baals that perhaps gave his answers, either by the power of the demons or the craft of the priests, with a humming noise, like that of a great fly, or that had (as they fancied) rid their country of the swarms of flies wherewith it was infested, or of some pestilential disease brought among them by flies. In the New Testament the prince of the devils is called Beel-zebub (Matt. xii. 24).

IV. Elijah, by direction from God, meets the messengers, and turns them back with an answer that shall save them the labour of going to Ekron.

1. He faithfully reproves his sin (v. 3): Is it not because there is not (that is, because you think there is not) a God in Israel that you go to enquire of Baal-zebub, the god of Ekron, a despicable town of the Philistines (Zech. ix. 7), long since vanquished by Israel? (1) The sin was bad enough, giving that honour to the devil which is due to God alone. (2) The construction which Elijah, in God's name, puts upon it, makes it much worse: "It is because you think not only that the God of Israel is not able to tell you, but that there is no God at all in Israel, else you would not send so far for a divine answer."

2. He plainly reads his doom: Go, tell him he shall surely die, v. 4.

V. The message being delivered to him by his servants, he enquires of them by whom it was sent to him, and concludes, by their description of him, that it must be Elijah, v. 7, 8. His dress was the same that he had seen him in, in his father's court. He was clad in a hairy garment, and had a leathern girdle about him, was plain and homely in his garb.

Verses 9–18

I. The king issues out a warrant for the apprehending of Elijah. If the God of Ekron had told him he should die, it is probable he would have taken it quietly; but now that a prophet of the Lord tells him so, reproving him for his sin and reminding him of the God of Israel, he cannot bear it.

II. The captain that was sent with his fifty soldiers found Elijah on the top of a hill (some think Carmel), and commanded him, in the king's name, to surrender himself, v. 9. Elijah was now so far from absconding, as formerly, into the close recesses of a cave, that he makes a bold appearance on the top of a hill; experience of God's protection makes him more bold. The captain calls him a man of God. Had he really looked upon him as a prophet, he would not have attempted to make him his prisoner; and, had he thought him entrusted with the word of God, he would not have pretended to command him with the word of a king.

III. Elijah calls for fire from heaven, to consume this haughty daring sinner, to prove his mission. It was not long since Elijah had fetched fire from heaven, to consume the sacrifice (1 Kings xviii. 38), but, they having slighted that, now the fire falls, not on the sacrifice, but on the sinners themselves, v. 10. 1. What an interest the prophets had in heaven; what the Spirit of God in them demanded the power of God effected. Elijah did but speak, and it was done. 2. What an interest heaven had in the prophets! God was always ready to plead their cause, and avenge the injuries done to them. Doubtless Elijah did this by a divine impulse, and yet our Saviour would not allow the disciples to draw it into a precedent, Luke ix. 54. "No," says Christ, "by no means, you know not what manner of spirit you are of," that is, (1) "You do not consider what manner of spirit, as disciples, you are called to, and how different from that of the Old Testament dispensation; it was agreeable enough to that dispensation of terror for Elias to call for fire, but the dispensation of the Spirit and of grace will by no means allow of it." (2) "You are not aware what manner of spirit you are, upon this occasion, actuated by, and how different from that of Elias: he did it in holy zeal, you in passion; he was concerned for God's glory, you for your own reputation only."

IV. Ahaziah sends, a second time, to apprehend Elijah (v. 11), as if he were resolved not to be baffled by omnipotence itself. Another captain is ready with his fifty. This is as impudent and imperious as the last, and more in haste. "Come down quickly, and do not trifle, the king's business requires haste." Elijah relents not, but calls for another flash of lightning, which instantly lays this captain and his fifty dead upon the spot.

V. The third captain humbled himself and cast himself upon the mercy of God and Elijah. He took warning by the fate of his predecessors, and, instead of summoning the prophet down, fell down before him, and begged for his life and the lives of his soldiers, acknowledging their own evil deserts and the prophet's power (v. 13, 14): Let my life be precious in thy sight.

VI. Elijah does more than grant the request of this third captain. God is as ready to show mercy to those that repent and submit to him; never any found it in vain to cast themselves upon the mercy of God. This captain, not only has his life spared, but is permitted to carry his point: Elijah, being so commanded by the angel, goes down with him to the king, v. 15. He comes boldly to the king, and tells him to his face what he had before sent to him (v. 16), that he shall surely and shortly die; he mitigates not the sentence, either for fear of the king's displeasure or in pity to his misery. The God of Israel has condemned him, let him send to see whether the god of Ekron can deliver him. So thunderstruck is Ahaziah with this message, when it comes from the prophet's own mouth, that neither he nor any of those about him durst offer him any violence, nor so much as give him an affront; but out of that den of lions he comes unhurt, like Daniel.

Lastly, The prediction is accomplished in a few days. Ahaziah died (v. 17), and, dying childless, left his kingdom to his brother Jehoram.

CHAP. II

I. The translation of Elijah. In the close of the foregoing chapter we had a wicked king leaving the world in disgrace, here we have a holy prophet leaving it in honour. Here is, 1. Elijah taking leave of his friends, the sons of the prophets, and especially Elisha, who kept close to him, and walked with him through Jordan, ver. 1–10. 2. Elijah taken into heaven by the ministry of angels (ver. 11), and Elisha's lamentation of the loss this earth had of him, ver. 12. II. The manifestation of Elisha, as a prophet in his room. 1. By the dividing of Jordan, ver. 13, 14. 2. By the respect which the sons of the prophets paid him, ver. 15–18. 3. By the healing of the unwholesome waters of Jericho, ver. 19–22. 4. By the destruction of the children of Bethel that mocked him, ver. 23–25.

Verses 1–8

Elijah's times, and the events concerning him, are as little dated as those of any great man in scripture; we are not told of his age, nor in what year of Ahab's reign he first appeared, nor in what year of Jehoram's he disappeared, and therefore cannot conjecture how long he flourished; it is supposed about twenty years in all.

I. God had determined to take him up into heaven by a whirlwind, v. 1. It is not for us to say why God would put such a peculiar honour upon Elijah above any other of the prophets; he was a man subject to like passions as we are, knew sin, and yet never tasted death. We may suppose that herein, 1. God looked back upon his past services, which were eminent and extraordinary, and intended a recompence for those and an encouragement to the sons of the prophets to tread in the steps of his zeal and faithfulness, and to witness against the corruptions of the age they lived in. 2. He looked down upon the present dark and degenerate state of the church, and would thus give a very sensible proof of another life after this, and draw the hearts of the faithful few upward towards himself, and that other life. 3. He looked forward to the evangelical dispensation, and, in the translation of Elijah, gave a type and figure of the ascension of Christ and the opening of the kingdom of heaven to all believers. Elijah had, by faith and prayer, conversed much with heaven, and now he is taken thither, to assure us that if we have our conversation in heaven, while we are here on earth, we shall be there shortly, the soul shall (and that is the man) be happy there, there for ever.

II. Elisha had determined, as long as he continued on earth to cleave to him, and not to leave him. Elijah seemed desirous to shake him off, would have had him stay behind at Gilgal, at Bethel, at Jericho, v. 2, 4, 6. Some think out of humility; he knew what glory God designed for him, but would not seem to glory in it. In vain does Elijah entreat him to tarry here and tarry there; he resolves to tarry nowhere behind his master, till he goes to heaven, and leaves him behind on this earth. "Whatever comes of it, I will not leave thee;" and why so? 1. Because he desired to be edified by his holy heavenly converse as long as he stayed on earth. 2. Because he desired to be satisfied concerning his departure, and to see him when he was taken up, that his faith might be confirmed and his acquaintance with the invisible world increased.

III. That Elijah, before his departure, visited the schools of the prophets and took leave of them. It seems that there were such schools in many of the cities of Israel, probably even in Samaria itself. Here we find sons of the prophets, and considerable numbers of them, even at Bethel, where one of the calves was set up, and at Jericho, which was lately built in defiance of a divine curse. At Jerusalem, and in the kingdom of Judah, they had priests and Levites, and the temple-service, the want of which, in the kingdom of Israel, God graciously made up by those colleges, where men were trained up and employed in the exercises of religion and devotion.

IV. That the sons of the prophets had intelligence that he was now shortly to be removed; and, 1. They told Elisha of it, both at Bethel (v. 3) and at Jericho (v. 5): Knowest thou that the Lord will take away thy master from thy head today? Elisha knew it too well and sorrow had filled his heart upon this account (as the disciples in a like case, John xvi. 6), and therefore he did not need to be told of it, did not care for hearing of it. I know it; hold you your peace. He speaks with an awful silence expecting the event: I know it; be silent, Zech. ii. 13. 2. They went themselves to be witnesses of it at a distance, though they might not closely attend (v. 7): Fifty of them stood to view afar off, intending to satisfy their curiosity, but God so ordered it that they might be eye-witnesses of the honour heaven did to that prophet, who was despised and rejected of men.

V. That the miraculous dividing of the river Jordan was the preface to Elijah's translation into the heavenly Canaan, as it had been to the entrance of Israel into the earthly Canaan, v. 8. He must go on to the other side Jordan to be translated, because it was his native country, and that he might be near the place where Moses died, and that thus honour might be put on that part of the country which was most despised. God would magnify Elijah in his exit, as he did Joshua in his entrance, by the dividing of this river, Joshua iii. 7. When God will take up his faithful ones to heaven death is the Jordan which, immediately before their translation, they must pass through, and they find a way through it, a safe and comfortable way; the death of Christ has divided those waters, that the ransomed of the Lord may pass over.

Verses 9–12

I. Elijah makes his will, and leaves Elisha his heir, now anointing him to be prophet in his room, more than when he cast his mantle upon him, 1 Kings xix. 19.

1. Elijah, being greatly pleased with the constancy of Elisha's affection and attendance, bade him ask what he should do for him, what blessing he should leave him at parting.

2. Elisha, having this fair opportunity to enrich himself with the best riches, prays for a double portion of his spirit. He asks not for wealth, nor honour, nor exemption from trouble, but to be qualified for the service of God and his generation; he asks, (1) For the Spirit, not that the gifts and graces of the Spirit were in Elijah's power to give, therefore, he says not, "Give me the Spirit" (he knew very well it was God's gift), but, "Let it be upon me, intercede with God for this for me." (2) For his spirit, because he was to be a prophet in his room, to carry on his work, to father the sons of the prophets and face their enemies, because he had the same difficulties to encounter. (3) For a double portion of his spirit; he does not mean double to what Elijah had, but double to what the rest of the prophets had, from whom so much would not be expected as from Elisha, who had been brought up under Elijah.

3. Elijah promised him that which he asked, but under two provisos, v. 10. (1) Provided he put a due value upon it and esteem it highly: this he teaches him to do by calling it a hard thing, not too hard for God to do, but too great for him to expect. (2) Provided he kept close to his master, even to the last, and was observant of him: If thou see me when I am taken from thee, it shall be so, otherwise not.

II. Elijah is carried up to heaven in a fiery chariot, v. 11. Like Enoch, he was translated, that he should not see death; and was (as Mr. Cowley expresses it) the second man that leaped the ditch where all the rest of mankind fell, and went not downward to the sky. Let it suffice that we are here told,

1. What his Lord, when he came, found him doing. He was talking with Elisha, instructing and encouraging him, directing him in his work, and quickening him to it, for the good of those whom he left behind. He was not meditating nor praying, as one wholly taken up with the world he was going to, but engaged in edifying discourse, as one concerned about the kingdom of God among men.

2. What convoy his Lord sent for him—a chariot of fire and horses of fire, that he may ride in state, may ride in triumph, like a prince, like a conqueror, yea, more than a conqueror. The angels are called in scripture cherubim and seraphim, and their appearance here, though it may seem below their dignity, answers to both those names; for (1) Seraphim signifies fiery, and God is said to make them a flame of fire, Ps. civ. 4. (2) Cherubim (as many think) signifies chariots, and they are called the chariots of God (Ps. lxviii. 17). The chariot and horses appeared like fire, not for burning, but brightness, not to torture or consume him, but to render his ascension conspicuous and illustrious in the eyes of those that stood afar off to view it. Elijah had burned with holy zeal for God and his honour, and now with a heavenly fire he was refined and translated.

3. How he was separated from Elisha. This chariot parted them both asunder.

4. Whither he was carried. He went up by a whirlwind into heaven. Elijah had once, in a passion, wished he might die; yet God was so gracious to him as to honour him with this singular privilege, that he should never see death; and by this instance, and that of Enoch, (1) God showed how men should have left the world if they had not sinned, not by death, but by a translation. (2) He gave a glimpse of that life and immortality which are brought to light by the gospel, and the opening of the kingdom of heaven to all believers, as then to Elijah. It was also a figure of Christ's ascension.

III. Elisha pathetically laments the loss of that great prophet. 1. He saw it; by which he was assured of the grant of his request for a double portion of Elijah's spirit. He looked steadfastly towards heaven, whence he was to expect that gift, as the disciples did, Acts i. 10. He saw it awhile, but the vision was presently out of his sight; and he saw him no more. 2. He rent his own clothes, in token of the sense he had of his own and the public loss. Though Elijah had gone triumphantly to heaven, yet this world could ill spare him. Surely their hearts are hard whose eyes are dry when God, by taking away faithful useful men, calls for weeping and mourning. Though Elijah's departure made way for Elisha's eminency, yet he lamented the loss of him, for he loved him, and could have served him for ever. 3. He gave him a very honourable character. He himself had lost the guide of his youth: My father, my father. The public had lost its best guard; he was the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof. He would have brought them all to heaven, as in this chariot, if it had not been their own fault.

Verses 13–18

What followed immediately after the translation of Elijah.

I. The tokens of God's presence with Elisha, and the marks of his elevation into Elijah's room.

1. He was possessed of Elijah's mantle, the badge of his office, which, we may suppose, he put on and wore for his master's sake, v. 13. When Elijah went to heaven he left his mantle as a legacy to Elisha, and, as it was a token of the descent of the Spirit upon him, it was more than if he had bequeathed to him thousands of gold and silver. Elisha took it up as a significant garment to be worn. He that then so cheerfully obeyed the summons of it, and became Elijah's servant, is now dignified with it, and becomes his successor.

2. He was possessed of Elijah's power to divide Jordan, v. 14. Having parted with his father, he returns to his sons in the schools of the prophets. Jordan was between him and them; it had been divided to make way for Elijah to his glory; he will try whether it will divide to make way for him to his business. Elijah's last miracle shall be Elisha's first. In dividing the waters, (1) He made use of Elijah's mantle, as Elijah himself had done (v. 8), to signify that he designed to keep to his master's methods. (2) He applied to Elijah's God: Where is the Lord God of Elijah? He does not ask, "Where is Elijah?" "The God that owned, and protected, and provided for Elijah, and many ways honoured him, especially now at last, where is he? Lord, am not I promised Elijah's spirit? Make good that promise." The words which next follow in the original, aph-his—even he, which we join to the following clause, when he also had smitten the waters, some make an answer to this question, Where is Elijah's God? "He is in being still, and nigh at hand. We have lost Elijah, but we have not lost Elijah's God. He has not forsaken the earth; it is even he that is still with me." Those that walk in the spirit and steps of their godly faithful predecessors shall certainly experience the same grace that they experienced; Elijah's God will be Elisha's too. The Lord God of the holy prophets is the same yesterday, today, and for ever; and what will it avail us to have the mantles of those that are gone, their places, their books, if we have not their spirit, their God?

3. He was possessed of Elijah's interest in the sons of the prophets, v. 15. Some, who had placed themselves conveniently near Jordan, to see what passed, were surprised to see Jordan divided before Elisha in his return, and took that as a convincing evidence that the spirit of Elijah did rest upon him. Accordingly they went to meet him, to congratulate him on his safe passage through fire and water, and the honour God had put upon him; and they bowed themselves to the ground before him. They were trained up in the schools; Elisha was taken from the plough; yet when they perceived that God was with him, and that this was the man whom he delighted to honour, they readily submitted to him as their head and father, as the people to Joshua when Moses was dead, Joshua i. 17. Whomsoever God honours, we must.

II. The needless search which the sons of the prophets made for Elijah. 1. They suggested that possibly he was dropped, either alive or dead, upon some mountain, or in some valley, v. 16. Some of them perhaps started this as a demurrer to the choice of Elisha: "Let us first be sure that Elijah has quite gone." 2. Elisha consented not till they overcame him with importunity, v. 17. They urged him till he was ashamed to oppose it any further, lest he should be thought wanting in his respect to his old master or loth to resign the mantle again. 3. The issue made them ashamed of their proposal. Their messengers, after they had tired themselves with fruitless search, returned and gave Elisha an opportunity of upbraiding his friends with their folly: Did I not say unto you, Go not? v. 18. Traversing hills and valleys will never bring us to Elijah, but the imitation of his holy faith and zeal will, in due time.

Elisha wrought more miracles than Elijah. Some reckon them in number just double. Two are recorded in these verses—a miracle of mercy to Jericho and a miracle of judgment to Bethel, Ps. ci. 1.

I. Here is a blessing upon the waters of Jericho, which was effectual to heal them. Jericho was built in disobedience to a command, but even within those walls that were built by iniquity we find a nursery of piety. Hither Elisha came, to confirm the souls of the disciples with a more particular account of Elijah's translation than their spies, who saw at a distance, could give them. Here he stayed while the fifty men were searching for him. And, 1. The men of Jericho represented to him their grievance, v. 19. They had not applied to Elijah concerning the matter, perhaps because he was not so easy of access as Elisha was. The situation was pleasant and afforded a good prospect; but they had neither wholesome water to drink nor fruitful soil to yield them food. Some think that it was not all the ground about Jericho that was barren and had bad water, but some one part only. 2. He soon redressed their grievance. Prophets should endeavour to make every place they come to, some way or other, the better for them, endeavouring to sweeten bitter spirits, and to make barren souls fruitful, by the due application of the word of God. Elisha will heal their waters; but, (1) They must furnish him with salt in a new cruse, v. 20. If salt had been proper to season the water, yet what could so small a quantity do towards it and what the better for being in a new cruse? But thus those that would be helped must be employed and have their faith and obedience tried. God's works of grace are wrought, not by any operations of ours, but in observance of his institutions. (2) He cast the salt into the spring of the waters, and so healed the streams and the ground they watered. Thus the way to reform men's lives is to renew their hearts; let those be seasoned with the salt of grace, for out of them are the issues of life. Purify the heart and that will cleanse the hands. (3) He did not pretend to do this by his own power, but in God's name: Thus saith the Lord, I have healed these waters. By doing them this kindness with a Thus saith the Lord, they would be made the more willing, hereafter, to receive from him a reproof, admonition, or command, with the same preface. (4) The cure was lasting, and not for the present only: The waters were healed unto this day, v. 22.

II. A curse upon the children of Bethel. At Bethel there was another school of prophets. Thither Elisha went next, and the scholars welcomed him with all possible respect, but the townsmen were abusive to him. One of Jeroboam's calves was at Bethel; this they were proud of, and hated those that reproved them. We may suppose it was their usual practice to jeer the prophets as they went along the streets, to call them by some nickname or other, and, if possible, drive them out of their town. Had the abuse done to Elisha been the first offence of that kind, it is probable that it would not have been so severely punished. But mocking the messengers of the Lord, and misusing the prophets, was one of the crying sins of Israel, as we find, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 16. 1. An instance of that sin. The little children of Bethel, the boys and girls that were playing in the streets, went out to meet him, gathered about him and mocked him, as if he had been a fool. Go up, thou bald head, go up, thou bald head. It was his character as a prophet that they designed to abuse. The honour God had crowned him with should have been sufficient to cover his bald head and protect him from their scoffs. These children said as they were taught; they had learned of their idolatrous parents to call foul names and give bad language, especially to prophets. These young cocks, as we say, crowed after the old ones. 2. A specimen of that ruin which came upon Israel at last, for misusing God's prophets, and of which this was intended to give them fair warning. Elisha heard their taunts, a good while, with patience; but at length he turned and looked upon them, to try if a grave and severe look would put them out of countenance, but they were not ashamed, and therefore he cursed them in the name of the Lord, to punish the dishonour done to God. His summons was immediately obeyed; two she-bears came out of an adjacent wood, and presently killed forty-two children, v. 24. The prophet must be justified, for he did it by divine impulse. He intended hereby to punish the parents and to make them afraid of God's judgments. Let parents, that would have comfort in their children, train them up well. In vain do we look for good from those children whose education we have neglected; and in vain do we grieve for those miscarriages which our care might have prevented.

CHAP. III

The public affairs of Israel, in which we find Elisha concerned. I. The general character of Jehoram, king of Israel, ver. 1–3. II. A war with Moab, in which Jehoram and his allies were engaged, ver. 4–8. III. The straits which the confederate army were reduced to in their expedition against Moab, and their consulting Elisha in that distress, with the answer of peace he gave them, ver. 9–19. IV. The glorious issue of this campaign (ver. 20–25) and the barbarous method the king of Moab took to oblige the confederate army to retire, ver. 26, 27. The house of Ahab is doomed to destruction.

Jehoram, the son of Ahab, and brother of Ahaziah, is here upon the throne of Israel: and, though he was a bad man, yet two commendable things are here recorded of him:

I. That he removed his father's idols. He did evil in many things, but not like his father Ahab or his mother Jezebel, v. 2. Perhaps Jehoshaphat, though by his alliance with the house of Ahab he made his own family worse, did something towards making Ahab's better. Jehoram put away the image of Baal, resolving to worship the God of Israel only, and consult none but his prophets. So far was well, yet it did not prevent the destruction of Ahab's family. 1. He only put away the image of Baal which his father had made. He did not destroy the worship of Baal among the people, for Jehu found it prevalent, ch. x. 19. It was well to reform his family, but he ought to have used his power for the reforming of his kingdom. 2. When he put away the image of Baal, he adhered to the worship of the calves, that politic sin of Jeroboam, v. 3. He departed not therefrom, by which the division between the two tribes was supported. Those do not truly reform, who only part with the sins that they lose by, but continue their affection to the sins that they get by. 3. He only put away the image of Baal, he did not break it in pieces, as he ought to have done.

II. That he did what he could to recover his brother's losses. As he had something more of the religion of an Israelite than his father, so he had something more of the spirit of a king than his brother. Moab rebelled against Israel immediately upon the death of Ahab, ch. i. 1. And we do not find that Ahaziah made any attempt to chastise or reduce them. The tribute which the king of Moab paid was a very considerable branch of the revenue of the crown of Israel: 100,000 lambs, and 100,000 wethers, v. 4. Taxes were then paid not so much in money as in the commodities of the country. The revolt of Moab was a great loss to Israel, yet Ahaziah sat still in sloth and ease. But an upper chamber in his house proved as fatal to him as the high places of the field could have been (ch. i. 2), and the breaking of his lattice let into his throne a man of a more active genius.

Jehoram has no sooner got the sceptre into his hand than he takes the sword to reduce Moab.

I. The concerting of this expedition between Jehoram king of Israel and Jehoshaphat king of Judah. Jehoram levied an army (v. 6), and such an opinion he had of the godly king of Judah that, 1. He courted him to be his confederate: Wilt thou go with me against Moab? And he gained him. Judah and Israel, though unhappily divided from each other, yet can unite against Moab a common enemy. Jehoshaphat treats with Israel as a sister-kingdom. Those are no friends to their own peace and strength who can never find in their hearts to forgive and forget an old injury. 2. He consulted him as his confidant, v. 8. He took advice of Jehoshaphat, who had more wisdom and experience than himself, which way they should make their descent upon the country of Moab; and he advised that they should not march against them the nearest way, over Jordan, but go round through the wilderness of Edom, that they might take the king of Edom (who was tributary to him) and his forces along with them.

II. The great straits that the army of the confederates was reduced to in this expedition. Before they saw the face of an enemy they were all in danger of perishing for want of water, v. 9. The king of Israel sadly lamented the present distress, and the imminent danger. It was he that had called these kings together; yet he charges it upon Providence, and reflects upon that as unkind.

III. Jehoshaphat's good motion to ask counsel of God in this exigency, v. 11. The place they were now in could not but remind them of the wonders of which their fathers told them, the waters fetched out of the rock. The thought of this, we may suppose, encouraged Jehoshaphat to ask, Is there not here a prophet of the Lord, like unto Moses? It was well that Jehoshaphat enquired of the Lord now, but it would have been much better if he had done it sooner, before he steered this course; so the distress might have been prevented.

IV. Elisha recommended as a proper person for them to consult with, v. 11. We may suppose it was by special direction from heaven that Elisha attended the war, as the chariot of Israel and the horsemen thereof. A servant of the king of Israel knew of his being there when the King himself did not. Probably it was such a servant as Obadiah was to his father Ahab, one that feared the Lord; to such a one Elisha made himself known, not to the kings.

V. The application which the kings made to Elisha. They went down to him to his quarters, v. 12. He that humbled himself was thus exalted, and looked great, when three kings came to knock at his door, and beg his assistance.

VI. The entertainment which Elisha gave them. 1. He was very plain with the wicked king of Israel (v. 13): "What have I to do with thee? Get thee to the prophets of thy father and mother, whom they hast countenanced and maintained in thy prosperity, and let them help thee now in thy distress. The world and the flesh have ruled you, let them help you; why should God be enquired of by you?" Ezek. xiv. 3. Elisha tells him to his face, in a holy indignation at his wickedness, that he can scarcely find in his heart to look towards him or to see him, v. 14. Jehoram is to be respected as a prince. Elisha, as a subject, will honour him, but as a prophet he will cause him to know his iniquity. Jehoram has so much self-command as to take this plain dealing patiently; he cares not now for hearing of the prophets of Baal, but is a humble suitor to the God of Israel and his prophet, representing the present case as very deplorable and humbly recommending it to the prophet's compassionate consideration. In effect, he owns himself unworthy, but let not the other kings be ruined for his sake. 2. Elisha showed a great respect to the godly king of Judah, regarded his presence, and, for his sake, would enquire of the Lord for them all. 3. He composed himself to receive instructions from God, yet his zeal for the present indisposed him for prayer and the operations of the Spirit, which required a mind very calm and sedate. He therefore called for a musician (v. 15), a devout musician, one accustomed to play upon his harp and sing psalms to it. Elisha being refreshed, and having the tumult of his spirits laid by this divine music, the hand of the Lord came upon him, and his visit did him more honour than that of three kings. 4. God, by him, gave them assurance that the issue of the present distress would be comfortable and glorious. (1) They should speedily be supplied with water, v. 16, 17. To try their faith and obedience, he bids them make the valley full of ditches to receive the water. Elijah, by prayer, obtained water out of the clouds, but Elisha fetches it nobody knows whence. The spring of these waters shall be as secret as the head of the Nile. God is not tied to second causes.

Ordinarily it is by a plentiful rain that God confirms his inheritance (Ps. lxviii. 9), but here it is done without rain, at least without rain in that place. (2) That supply should be an earnest of victory (v. 18): "This is but a light thing in the sight of the Lord; you shall not only be saved from perishing, but shall return in triumph." It is promised that they shall be masters of the rebellious country.

I. We have here the divine gift of both those things which God had promised by Elisha—water and victory, and the former not only a pledge of the latter, but a means of it.

1. It relieved their armies, which were ready to perish, v. 20. And this relief came just at the time of the offering of the morning sacrifice upon the altar at Jerusalem. We now cannot pitch upon any hour more acceptable than another, because our high priest is always appearing for us, to present and plead his sacrifice. That time God chose for the hour of mercy to put an honour upon the daily sacrifice, which had been despised. God answered Daniel's prayer just at the time of the evening sacrifice (Dan. ix. 21).

2. It deceived their enemies, who were ready to triumph, promising themselves that it would be easy dealing with an army fatigued by so long a march through the wilderness of Edom.

(1) How easily they were drawn into their own delusions. [1] They saw the water in the valley where the army of Israel encamped, and conceited it was blood (v. 22), because they knew the valley to be dry, and could not imagine it should be water. The sun shone upon it, probably the sky was red and lowering, making the water look red, which made them willing to believe This is blood. [2] If their camp was thus full of blood, they conclude, "Certainly the kings have fallen out and they have slain one another" (v. 23). "Now therefore, Moab, to the spoil."

(2) How fatally they thereby ran upon their own destruction. They rushed carelessly into the camp of Israel, to plunder it, but were undeceived when it was too late. The Israelites, animated by the assurances Elisha had given them of victory, fell upon them with the utmost fury, routed them, and pursued them into their own country (v. 24), which they laid waste (v. 25), destroyed the cities, marred the ground, stopped up the wells, felled the timber, and left only the royal city standing, in the walls of which they made great breaches with their battering engines.

II. In the close of the chapter we are told what the king of Moab did when he found himself reduced to the last extremity. 1. He attempted that which was bold and brave. He got together 700 choice men, and with them sallied out upon the intrenchments of the king of Edom, who, being but a mercenary in this expedition, would not, he hoped, make any great resistance if vigorously attacked, and so he might make his escape that way. But it would not do; even the king of Edom proved too hard for him, and obliged him to retire, v. 26. 2. This failing, he did that which was brutish and barbarous; he took his own son, his eldest son, that was to succeed him, than whom nothing could be more dear to himself and his people, and offered him for a burnt-offering upon the wall, v. 27. He designed by this, (1) To obtain the favour of Chemosh his god, which, being a devil, delighted in blood and murder, and the destruction of mankind. (2) To terrify the besiegers, and oblige them to retire. Therefore he did it upon the wall, in their sight, that they might see what desperate courses he resolved to take rather than surrender, and how dearly he would sell his city and life.

CHAP. IV

Great service Elisha had done for the three kings: to his prayers and prophecies they owed their lives and triumphs. One would have expected that the next chapter would tell us what honours and what dignities were conferred on Elisha for this. No, the wise man delivered the army, but no man remembered the wise man, Eccles. ix. 15. Or, if he had preferment offered him, he declined it: he preferred the honour of doing good in the schools of the prophets before that of being great in the courts of princes. God magnified him, and that sufficed him—for we have him here employed in working no fewer than five miracles. I. He multiplied the poor widow's oil, ver. 1–7. II. He obtained for the good Shunammite the blessing of a son in her old age, ver. 8–17. III. He raised that child to life when it was dead, ver. 18–37. IV. He healed the deadly pottage, ver. 38–41. V. He fed 100 men with twenty small loaves, ver. 42–44.

Verses 1–7

Elisha's miracles were for use, not for show; this recorded here was an act of real charity. Such also were the miracles of Christ, not only great wonders, but great favours to those for whom they were wrought.

I. Elisha readily receives a poor widow's complaint. She was a prophet's widow. It seems, the prophets had wives as well as the priests. Marriage is honourable in all, and not inconsistent with the most sacred professions. Now, by the complaint of this poor woman (v. 1), we are given to understand, 1. That her husband, being one of the sons of the prophets, was well known to Elisha. 2. That he had the reputation of a godly man. He was one that kept his integrity in a time of general apostasy, one of the 7,000 that had not bowed the knee to Baal. 3. That he was dead. Those that were clothed with the spirit of prophecy were not thereby armed against the stroke of death. 4. That he died poor, and in debt more than he was worth. He did not contract his debts by prodigality, and luxury, and riotous living, for he was one that feared the Lord. Yet it may be the lot of those that fear God to be in debt, and insolvent, through afflictive providences, losses by sea, or bad debts, or their own imprudence, for the children of light are not always wise for this world. Perhaps this prophet was impoverished by persecution: when Jezebel ruled, prophets had much ado to live, and especially if they had families. 5. That the creditors were very severe with her. Two sons she had to be the support of her widowed state, and their labour is reckoned assets in her hand; that must go therefore, and they must be bondmen for seven years (Exod. xxi. 2) to work out this debt. In this distress the poor widow goes to Elisha, in dependence upon the promise that the seed of the righteous shall not be forsaken.

II. He effectually relieves this poor widow's distress, and puts her in a way both to pay her debt and to maintain herself and her family. He did not give her some small matter for her present provision, but set her up in the world to sell oil, and put a stock into her hand to begin with.

1. He directed her what to do, considered her case: What shall I do for thee? Elisha therefore enquired what she had to make money of, and found she had nothing to sell but one pot of oil, v. 2. If she had not had this pot of oil, the divine power could have supplied her; but, having this, it will work upon this, and so teach us to make the best of what we have. The prophet, knowing her to have credit among her neighbours, bids her borrow of them empty vessels (v. 3). He directs her to shut the door upon herself and her sons, while she filled all those vessels out of that one. The oil was to be multiplied in the pouring, as the other widow's meal in the spending. The way to increase what we have is to use it; to him that hath shall be given.

2. She did it firmly believing the divine power and goodness, and in obedience to the prophet. They were all amazed to find their pot, like a fountain of living water, always flowing, and yet always full.

3. The oil continued flowing as long as she had any empty vessels to receive it. He gives above what we ask: were there more vessels, there is enough in God to fill them—enough for all, enough for each.

4. The prophet directed her what to do with the oil she had, v. 7. (1) She must sell the oil to those that were rich, and could afford to bestow it on themselves. (2) She must pay her debt with the money she received for her oil. It is one of the fundamental laws of our religion that we render to all their due, for conscience' sake. (3) The rest must not be laid up, but she and her children must live upon the money received, with which they must put themselves into a capacity of getting an honest livelihood. [1] Let those that are poor and in distress be encouraged to trust God. Verily thou shalt be fed, though not feasted. It is true we cannot now expect miracles, yet we may expect mercies, if we wait on God and seek to him. [2] Let those whom God has blessed with plenty use it for the glory of God and under the direction of his word.

Verses 8–17

The giving of a son to such as were old, and had been long childless, was an ancient instance of the divine power and favour; we find it here among the wonders wrought by Elisha.

I. The kindness of the Shunammite woman to Elisha. Shunem lay in the road between Samaria and Carmel, a road that Elisha often travelled, as we find ch. ii. 25. There lived a great woman, who was very hospitable. So famous a man as Elisha could not pass and repass unobserved. Probably this pious matron, having notice of his being there, constrained him to dine with her, v. 8. He was modest and loth to be troublesome, so that it was not without some difficulty that he was first drawn into an acquaintance there; but afterwards, whenever he went that way, he called. She suggests, 1. That the stranger she would invite was a holy man of God, who therefore would do good to their family. 2. That the kindness she intended him would be no great charge to them; she would build him only a little chamber. The furniture shall be very plain; a bed, and a table, a stool, and a candlestick, all that was needful for his convenience. Elisha seemed highly pleased with these accommodations.

II. Elisha's gratitude for this kindness. 1. He offered to use his interest for her in the king's court (v. 13): "Wouldst thou be spoken for to the king, or the captain of the host, for an office for thy husband, civil or military? Wherein can I serve thee?" But she needs not any good offices of this kind to be done for her: I dwell (says she) among my own people, that is, "We are well off as we are, and do not aim at preferment." Some years after this we find this Shunammite had occasion to be spoken for to the king, though now she needed it not, ch. viii. 3, 4. 2. He did use his interest for her in the court of heaven. Elisha consulted with his servant what kindness he should do for her. Gehazi reminded him that she was childless, had a great estate, but no son to leave it to, and was past hopes of having any, her husband being old. If Elisha could obtain this favour from God for her, it would be the removal of that which at present was her only grievance. He sent for her immediately. She very humbly and respectfully stood in the door (v. 15), according to her accustomed modesty, and then he assured her that within a year she should bring forth a son, v. 16. The event, within the time limited, confirmed the truth of the promise: She bore a son at the season that Elisha spoke of, v. 17.

We may well suppose that, after the birth of this son, the prophet was doubly welcome to the good Shunammite. He had thought himself indebted to her, but henceforth, as long as she lives, she will think herself in his debt, and that she can never do too much for him. We may also suppose that the child was very dear to the prophet, as the son of his prayers, and very dear to the parents, as the son of their old age.

I. The sudden death of the child. A child of promise, a child of prayer, and given in love, yet taken away. But how admirably does the prudent pious mother guard her lips under this surprising affliction! She had heard of the raising of the widow's son of Sarepta, and that the spirit of Elijah rested on Elisha; and such confidence had she of God's goodness that she was very ready to believe that he who so soon took away what he had given would restore what he had now taken away. In this faith she makes no preparation for the burial of her dead child, but for its resurrection; for she lays him on the prophet's bed (v. 21), expecting that he will stand her friend. O woman! great is thy faith.

II. The sorrowful mother's application to the prophet on this sad occasion; for it happened very opportunely that he was now at the college upon Mount Carmel, not far off.

1. She begged leave of her husband to go to the prophet, yet not acquainting him with her errand, lest he should not have faith enough to let her go, v. 22. See how this husband and wife vied with each other in showing mutual regard; she was so dutiful to him that she would not go till she had acquainted him with her journey, and he so kind to her that he would not oppose it, though she did not think fit to acquaint him with her business. 2. She made all the haste she could to the prophet (v. 24), and he, seeing her at a distance, sent his servant to enquire whether anything was amiss, v. 25, 26. The answer was general: It is well. Gehazi was not the man that she came to complain to, and therefore she put him off with this. Note, When God calls away our dearest relations by death it becomes us quietly to say, "It is well both with us and them;" it is well, for all is well that God does; all is well with those that are gone if they have gone to heaven, and all well with us that stay behind if by the affliction we are furthered in our way thither. 3. When she came to the prophet she humbly reasoned with him concerning her present affliction. Elisha waited to hear from her, since he might not know immediately from God, what was the cause of her trouble. What she said was very pathetic. She appealed to the prophet, (1) Concerning her indifference to this mercy which was now taken from her: "Did I desire a son of my lord? No, thou knowest I did not; it was thy own proposal, not mine; I did not fret for the want of a son, as Hannah, nor beg, as Rachel, Give me children or else I die." (2) Concerning her entire dependence upon the prophet's word, pleading with the prophet for the raising of the child to life again: "I said, Do not deceive me, and I know thou wilt not."

III. The raising of the child to life again. We may suppose that the woman gave Elisha a more express account of the child's death, and he gave her a more express promise of his resurrection, than is here related, where we are briefly told,

1. That Elisha sent Gehazi to go in all haste to the dead child, gave him his staff, and bade him lay that on the face of the child, v. 29. Bishop Hall suggests that it was done out of human conceit, and not by divine instinct, and therefore it failed of the effect; God will not have such great favours made too cheap, nor shall they be too easily come by, lest they be undervalued.

2. The woman resolved not to go back without the prophet himself (v. 30): I will not leave thee. She had no great expectation from the staff, she would have the hand, and she was in the right of it.

3. The prophet, by earnest prayer, obtained from God the restoring of this dead child to life again. He found the child dead upon his own bed (v. 32), and shut the door upon them twain, v. 33.

(1) How closely the prophet applied himself to this great operation, perhaps being sensible that he had tempted God too much in thinking to effect it by the staff in Gehazi's hand. [1] He prayed unto the Lord (v. 33), probably as Elijah had done, Let this child's soul come into him again. Christ raised the dead to life as one having authority—Damsel, arise—Young man, I say unto thee, Arise—Lazarus, come forth (for he was powerful and faithful as a Son, the Lord of life), but Elijah and Elisha did it by petition, as servants. [2] He lay upon the child (v. 34), as if he would communicate to him some of his vital heat or spirits. He first put his mouth to the child's mouth, as if, in God's name, he would breathe into him the breath of life; then his eyes to the child's eyes, to open them again to the light of life; then his hands to the child's hands, to put strength into them. He then returned, and walked in the house, as one full of care and concern, and wholly intent upon what he was about. Then he went upstairs again, and, the second time, stretched himself upon the child, v. 35.

(2) How gradually the operation was performed. At the first application, the flesh of the child waxed warm (v. 34), which gave the prophet encouragement to continue instant in prayer. After a while, the child sneezed seven times, which was an indication, not only of life, but liveliness.

(3) How joyfully the child was restored alive to his mother (v. 36, 37), and all parties concerned were not a little comforted, Acts xx. 12.

Elisha in his place, in his element, among the sons of the prophets, teaching them, and, as a father, providing for them. There was a dearth in the land, for the wickedness of those that dwelt therein, the same that we read of, ch. viii. 1. It continued seven years, just as long again as that in Elijah's time.

I. He made hurtful food to become safe and wholesome. 1. The sons of the prophets being all to attend, he ordered his servant to provide food for their bodies, while he was breaking to them the bread of life for their souls. He orders only that pottage should be seethed for them of herbs, v. 38. The sons of the prophets should be examples of temperance and mortification. 2. One of the servitors, who was sent to gather herbs, by mistake brought in that which was noxious, and shred it into the pottage: wild gourds they are called, v. 39. Some think it was coloquintida, a herb strongly cathartic, and dangerous. 3. The guests complained to Elisha of the unwholesomeness of their food. They cried out, There is death in the pot, v. 40. 4. Elisha immediately cured the bad taste and prevented the bad consequences of this unwholesome pottage; as before he had healed the bitter waters with salt, so now the bitter broth with meal, v. 41. Now all was well, not only no death, but no harm in the pot.

II. He made a little food to go a great way. 1. Elisha had a present brought him of twenty barley-loaves and some ears of corn (v. 42), a present in a special manner valuable, when there was a dearth in the land. 2. Having freely received, he freely gave, ordering it all to be set before the sons of the prophets, reserving none for himself, none for hereafter. It well becomes the fathers of the prophets to be liberal to the sons of the prophets. 3. Though the loaves were little, yet with twenty of them he satisfied 100 men, v. 43, 44. His servant thought that to set so little meat before so many men was but to shame his master; but he, in God's name, pronounced it a full meal for them, and so it proved; they did eat, and left thereof, not because their stomachs failed them, but because the bread increased in the eating.

CHAP. V

Two more of Elisha's miracles are recorded in this chapter. I. The cleansing of Naaman, a Syrian, a stranger, from his leprosy, 1. The badness of his case, ver. 1. 2. The providence that brought him to Elisha, the intelligence given him by a captive maid, ver. 2–4. A letter from the king of Syria to the king of Israel, to introduce him, ver. 5–7. And the invitation Elisha sent him, ver. 8. 3. The method prescribed for his cure, his submission to that method, and his cure thereby, ver. 9–14. 4. The grateful acknowledgments he made to Elisha hereupon, ver. 15–19. II. The smiting of Gehazi, his own servant, with that leprosy. 1. Gehazi's sins, which were belying his master to Naaman (ver. 20–24), and lying to his master when he examined him, ver. 25. 2. His punishment for these sins. Naaman's leprosy was entailed on his family, ver. 26, 27. And, if Naaman's cure was typical of the calling of the Gentiles, as our Saviour seems to make it (Luke iv. 27), Gehazi's stroke may be looked upon as typical of the blinding and rejecting of the Jews, who envied God's grace to the Gentiles, as Gehazi envied Elisha's favour to Naaman.

Verses 1–8

Our Saviour's miracles were intended for the lost sheep of the house of Israel, yet one, like a crumb, fell from the table to a woman of Canaan; so this one miracle Elisha wrought for Naaman, a Syrian; for God does good to all, and will have all men to be saved.

I. The great affliction Naaman was under, in the midst of all his honours, v. 1. He was very acceptable to his prince, was his favourite, and prime-minister of state; a mighty man of valour, but he was a leper, a burden to himself. Every man has some but or other in his character, something that blemishes and diminishes him. Naaman was as great as the world could make him, and yet (as Bishop Hall expresses it) the basest slave in Syria would not change skins with him.

II. The notice that was given him of Elisha's power, by a little maid that waited on his lady, v. 2, 3. This maid was, by birth, an Israelite, providentially carried captive into Syria, into Naaman's family, where she published Elisha's fame to the honour of Israel and Israel's God. The unhappy dispersing of the people of God has sometimes proved the happy occasion of the diffusion of the knowledge of God, Acts viii. 4. This little maid, as became a true-born Israelite, consulted the honour of her country, and could give an account, though but a girl, of the famous prophet they had among them. As became a good servant, she desired the health and welfare of her master. Elisha had not cleansed any leper in Israel (Luke iv. 27), yet this little maid inferred that he could cure her master, and that he would do it, though he was a Syrian.

III. The application which the king of Syria hereupon made to the king of Israel on Naaman's behalf. See what Naaman did upon this little hint. 1. He would not send for the prophet to come to him, but such honour would he pay to one that had so much of a divine power with him as to be able to cure diseases that he would go to him himself. 2. He would not go incognito—in disguise, though his errand proclaimed his loathsome disease, but went in state, and with a great retinue, to do the more honour to the prophet. 3. He would not go empty-handed, but took with him gold, silver, and raiment, to present to his physician. 4. He would not go without a letter to the king of Israel from the king his master, who did himself earnestly desire his recovery.

IV. The alarm this gave to the king of Israel, v. 7. He apprehended there was in this letter, 1. A great affront upon God, and therefore he rent his clothes, according to the custom of the Jews when they heard or read that which they thought blasphemous; and what less could it be than to attribute to him a divine power? "Am I a God, to kill whom I will, and make alive whom I will? No, I pretend not to such an authority." 2. A bad design upon himself. He appeals to those about him for this: "See how he seeketh a quarrel against me; he requires me to recover the leper, and if I do not, though I cannot, he will make that a pretence to wage war with me," which he suspects the rather because Naaman is his general. If he had bethought himself of Elisha, and his power, he would easily have understood the letter, and have known what he had to do.

V. The proffer which Elisha made of his services. Hearing on what occasion the king had rent his clothes, he sent to him to let him know that if his patient would come to him he should not lose his labour (v. 8): He shall know that there is a prophet in Israel who can do that which the king of Israel dares not attempt, which the prophets of Syria cannot pretend to.

The cure of Naaman's leprosy.

I. The short and plain direction which the prophet gave him, with assurance of success. Naaman, with all his retinue, attended at Elisha's door as a beggar for an alms. Naaman expected to have his compliment returned, but Elisha gave him his answer without any formality, would not go to the door to him, lest he should seem too much pleased with the honour done him, but sent a messenger to him, saying, Go wash in Jordan seven times, and promising him that if he did so his disease should be cured. The promise was express: Thou shalt be clean. The method prescribed was plain: Go wash in Jordan. It was intended as a sign of the cure, and a trial of his obedience. Those that will be helped of God must do as they are bidden.

II. Naaman's disgust at the method prescribed, because it was not what he expected. Two things disgusted him:

1. That Elisha, as he thought, put a slight upon his person, in sending him orders by a servant, and not coming to him himself, v. 11. Being big with the expectation of a cure, he had been fancying how this cure would be wrought: "He will surely come out to me, that is the least he can do to me, a peer of Syria, to me that have so often been victorious over Israel. He will stand, and call on the name of his God, and name me in his prayer, and then he will wave his hand over the place, and so effect the cure." And, because the thing was not done just thus, he fell into a passion. He scorns to be healed, unless he be humoured.

2. That Elisha, as he thought, put a slight upon his country. He took it hard that he must be sent to wash in Jordan, a river of Israel, when he thought Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel. May I not wash in them and be clean? He might wash in them and be clean from dirt, but not wash in them and be clean from leprosy. Jordan was the river appointed, and, if he expected a cure from the divine power, he ought to acquiesce in the divine will, without asking why or wherefore. Naaman talked himself into such a heat (as passionate men usually do) that he turned away from the prophet's door in a rage, ready to swear he would never have anything more to say to Elisha; and who then would be the loser?

III. The modest advice which his servants gave him, to observe the prophet's prescriptions, with a tacit reproof of his resentments, v. 13. "If the prophet had bidden thee do some great thing, had ordered thee into a tedious course of physic, Wouldst thou not have done it? No doubt thou wouldst. And wilt thou not submit to so easy a method as this, Wash and be clean?" The reproof was very modest and respectful, very rational and considerate. If the servants had stirred up their master's angry resentment, and offered to avenge his quarrel upon the prophet, how mischievous would the consequences have been! They reasoned with him, (1) From his earnest desire of a cure: Wouldst thou not do anything? Note, When diseased sinners come to this, that they are content to do anything, to submit to anything, to part with anything, for a cure, then, and not till then, there begin to be some hopes of them. Then they will take Christ on his own terms when they are made willing to have Christ upon any terms. (2) From the easiness of the method prescribed: Wash and be clean. Note, The methods prescribed for the healing of the leprosy of sin are so plain that we are utterly inexcusable if we do not observe them. It is but, "Believe, and be saved"—"Repent, and be pardoned" —"Wash, and be clean."

IV. The cure effected, in the use of the means prescribed, v. 14. Naaman, upon second thoughts, yielded to make the experiment. His flesh came again, like the flesh of a child, to his great surprise and joy.

Verses 15-19

Of the ten lepers that our Saviour cleansed, the only one that returned to give thanks was a Samaritan, Luke xvii. 16. This Syrian did so, and here expresses himself.

I. Convinced of the power of the God of Israel, not only that he is God, but that he is God alone, and that indeed there is no God in all the earth but in Israel (v. 15). Had he seen other lepers cleansed, perhaps the sight would not have convinced him, but the mercy of the cure affected him more than the miracle of it. Those are best able to speak of the power of divine grace who have themselves experienced it.

II. Grateful to Elisha the prophet: "Therefore, for his sake whose servant thou art, I have a present for thee, silver, and gold, and raiment, whatever thou wilt please to accept." But Elisha generously refused the fee, not because he did not need it, for he was poor enough, but he would not be beholden to this Syrian. It would be much for the honour of God to show this new convert that the servants of the God of Israel were taught to look upon the wealth of this world with a holy contempt, which would confirm him in his belief that there was no God but in Israel. See 1 Cor. ix. 18; 2 Cor. xi. 9.

III. Proselyted to the worship of the God of Israel. He will not only offer a sacrifice to the Lord, in thanks for his present cure, but he resolves he will never offer sacrifice to any other gods, v. 17. It was a happy cure of his leprosy which cured him of his idolatry, a more dangerous disease. But, 1. In one instance he over-did it, that he would not only worship the God of Israel, but he would have clods of earth out of the prophet's garden to make an altar of, v. 17. He that awhile ago had spoken very slightly of the waters of Israel (v. 12) now is in another extreme, and over-values the earth of Israel, supposing that an altar of that earth would be most acceptable to him. 2. In another instance he under-did it, that he reserved to himself a liberty to bow in the house of Rimmon, in complaisance to the king his master, and according to the duty of his place at court (v. 18), in this thing he must be excused. If, in covenanting with God, we make a reservation for any known sin, which we will continue to indulge ourselves in, that reservation is a defeasance of his covenant. We must cast away all our transgressions and not except any house of Rimmon. If we ask for a dispensation to go on in any sin for the future, we mock God, and deceive ourselves.

Verses 20-27

Elisha, a holy prophet, a man of God, has but one servant, and he proves a base fellow. One would have expected that Elisha's servant should be a saint (even Ahab's servant, Obadiah, was), but even Christ himself had a Judas among his followers.

I. Gehazi's sin. 1. The love of money, that root of all evil, was at the bottom of it. His master contemned Naaman's treasures, but he coveted them, v. 20. His heart (says Bishop Hall) was packed up in Naaman's chests, and he must run after him to fetch it. 2. He blamed his master for refusing Naaman's present, envied and grudged his kindness and generosity to this stranger. 3. When Naaman alighted from his chariot to meet him (v. 21), he told him a deliberate lie, that his master sent him to him. 4. He abused his master, and basely misrepresented him to Naaman as one that had soon repented of his generosity. His story of the two sons of the prophets was as silly as it was false; if he would have begged a token for two young scholars, surely less than a talent of silver might serve them. 5. There was danger of his alienating Naaman from that holy religion which he had espoused, and lessening his good opinion of it. 6. His seeking to conceal what he had unjustly got added much to his sin. He hid it, till he should have an opportunity of laying it out, v. 24. He denied it: He went in, and stood before his master, ready to receive his orders. His master asked him where he had been. "Nowhere, sir" (said he), "out of the house."

II. The punishment of this sin. Elisha immediately called him to an account for it.

1. How he was convicted. He thought to impose upon the prophet, but was soon given to understand that the Spirit of prophecy could not be deceived, and that it was in vain to lie to the Holy Ghost. Elisha could tell him, (1) What he had done, though he had denied it. "Thou sayest thou wentest nowhere, but went not my heart with thee?" v. 26. (2) What he designed, though he kept that in his own breast. He could tell him the very thoughts and intents of his heart, that he was projecting, now that he had got these two talents, to purchase ground and cattle, to leave Elisha's service, and to set up for himself. "Is it a time to receive money? Is this an opportunity of enriching thyself? Couldst thou find no better way of getting money than by belying thy master and laying a stumbling-block before a young convert?"

2. How he was punished for it: The leprosy of Naaman shall cleave to thee, v. 27. He went out from his presence a leper as white as snow. Thus he is stigmatised and made infamous, and carries the mark of his shame wherever he goes. What was Gehazi profited, though he gained his two talents, when thereby he lost his health, his honour, his peace, his service, and, if repentance prevented not, his soul for ever? See Job xx. 12, &c.

CHAP. VI

I. A further account of the wondrous works of Elisha. 1. His making iron to swim, ver. 1-7. 2. His disclosing to the king of Israel the secret counsels of the king of Syria, ver. 8-12. 3. His saving himself out of the hands of those who were sent to apprehend him, ver. 13-23. II. The besieging of Samaria by the Syrians and the great distress the city was reduced to, ver. 24-33.

Verses 1-7

I. Concerning the sons of the prophets, and their condition and character. The college here spoken of seems to be that at Gilgal, and it was near Jordan; and, probably, wherever Elisha resided as many as could of the sons of the prophets flocked to him for the advantage of his instructions, counsels, and prayers. Everyone would covet to dwell with him and be near him.

1. Their number increased so that they wanted room: The place is too strait for us (v. 1)—a good hearing, for it is a sign many are added to them. Elisha's miracles doubtless drew in many.

2. They were humble men. It becomes the sons of the prophets, who profess to look for great things in the other world, to be content with mean things in this.

3. They were poor men. Poverty is no bar to prophecy.

4. They were industrious men, and willing to take pains. Let no man think an honest employment either a burden or disparagement.

5. They were men that had a great value and veneration for Elisha. (1) They would not go about to build at all without his leave, v. 2. (2) They would not willingly go to fell timber without his company: "Go with thy servants" (v. 3). Good disciples desire to be always under good discipline.

6. They were honest men, and men that were in care to give all men their own. When one of them, accidentally fetching too fierce a stroke, threw off his axe-head into the water, he cries out with deep concern, Alas, master! For it was borrowed, v. 5. It is likely this prophet was poor, and had not wherewithal to pay for the axe, which made the loss of it so much the greater trouble.

II. Concerning the father of the prophets, Elisha. 1. That he was a man of great condescension and compassion; he went with the sons of the prophets to the woods, when they desired his company, v. 3. 2. That he was a man of great power; he could make iron to swim, contrary to its nature (v. 6). God's grace can thus raise the stony iron heart which has sunk into the mud of this world, and raise up affections naturally earthly, to things above.

Verses 8-12

Here we have Elisha, with his spirit of prophecy, serving the king, as before helping the sons of the prophets.

I. How the king of Israel was informed by Elisha of all the designs of his enemy, the king of Syria, v. 8-10. 1. The enemies of God's Israel are politic in their devices, and restless in their attempts, against him. 2. All those devices are known to God, even those that are deepest laid. He knows not only what men do, but what they design, and has many ways of countermining them. 3. It is a great advantage to us to be warned of our danger, that we may stand upon our guard against it. The work of God's prophets is to give us warning. The king of Israel would regard the warnings Elisha gave him of his danger by the Syrians, but not the warnings he gave him of his danger by his sins.

II. How the king of Syria resented this. He suspected treachery among his senators, and that his counsels were betrayed, v. 11. But one of his servants, that had heard, by Naaman and others, of Elisha's wondrous works, concludes it must needs be he that gave this intelligence to the king of Israel, v. 12.

Verses 13-23

I. The great force which the king of Syria sent to seize Elisha. He found out where he was, at Dothan (v. 13), which was not far from Samaria; thither he sent a great host, who were to come upon him by night, and to bring him dead or alive, v. 14. Thus he hoped to make sure of him, especially coming upon him by surprise.

II. The grievous fright which the prophet's servant was in, when he perceived the city surrounded by the Syrians, and the effectual course which the prophet took to pacify him and free him from his fears. 1. What a consternation he was in. He ran straight to Elisha, to bring him an account of it: "Alas, master!" (said he), "what shall we do? We are undone: it is to no purpose to think either of fighting or flying, we must fall into their hands." Had he considered that he was embarked with his master, by whom God had done great things, and whom he would not now leave to fall into the hands of the uncircumcised, he would not have been thus at a loss. If he had only said, What shall I do? it would have been the more excusable. 2. How his master quieted him, (1) By word. What he said to him (v. 16) is spoken to all the faithful servants of God, when without are fightings and within are fears: "Fear not with that fear which has torment and amazement, for those that are with us, to protect us, are more than those that are against us, to destroy us—angels unspeakably more numerous—God infinitely more powerful." When we are magnifiying the causes of our fear we ought to possess ourselves with clear, and great, and high thoughts of God and the invisible world. If God be for us, we know what follows, Rom. viii. 31. (2) By vision, v. 17. [1] It seems Elisha was much concerned for the satisfaction of his servant, newly come into his service. [2] He saw himself safe, and wished no more than that his servant might see what he saw, a guard of angels round about him. [3] For the satisfaction of his servant there needed no more than the opening of his eyes; that therefore he prayed for, and obtained for him: Lord, open his eyes that he may see. The eyes of his body were open, and with them he saw the danger. "Lord, open the eyes of his faith, that with them he may see the protection we are under." The opening of our eyes will be the silencing of our fears. In the dark we are most apt to be frightened. The clearer sight we have of the sovereignty and power of heaven the less we shall fear the calamities of this earth.

III. The shameful defeat which Elisha gave to the host of Syrians who came to seize him. 1. He prayed to God to smite them with blindness, and they were all struck blind immediately, not stone-blind, but their sight was so altered that they could not know the persons and places they were before acquainted with, v. 18. They were so confounded that those among them whom they depended upon for information did not know this place to be Dothan nor this person to be Elisha, but groped at noon day as in the night.

2. When they were thus bewildered and confounded he led them to Samaria (v. 19), promising that he would show them the man whom they sought, and he did so. He did not lie to them when he told them, This is not the way, nor is this the city where Elisha is; for he had now come out of the city. 3. When he had brought them to Samaria he prayed to God so to open their eyes that they might see where they were (v. 20), and behold, to their great terror, they were in the midst of Samaria, where, it is probable, there was a standing force sufficient to cut them all off, or make them prisoners of war. 4. When he had them at his mercy he made it appear that he was influenced by a divine goodness as well as a divine power. (1) He took care to protect them from the danger into which he had brought them, and was content to show them what he could have done: My father shall I smite them? And, again, as if he longed for the assault, Shall I smite them? But the prophet would by no means suffer him to meddle with them; they were brought hither to be convinced and shamed, not to be killed, v. 22. They were not his prisoners; they were God's prisoners and the prophet's, and therefore he must do them no harm. (2) He took care to provide for them; he ordered the king to treat them handsomely and then dismiss them fairly, which he did, v. 23. [1] It was the king's praise that he was so obsequious to the prophet, contrary to his inclination, and, as it seemed, to his interest, 1 Sam. xxiv. 19. So willing was he to oblige Elisha that he prepared great provision for them, for the credit of his court and the country and of Elisha. [2] It was the prophet's praise that he was so generous to his enemies. The great duty of loving enemies, and doing good to those that hate us, was both commanded in the Old Testament (Prov. xxv. 21, 22, If thy enemy hunger, feed him, Exod. xxiii. 4, 5) and practised, as here by Elisha.

IV. The good effect this had, for the present, upon the Syrians. They came no more into the land of Israel (v. 23). The most glorious victory over an enemy is to turn him into a friend.

This last paragraph of this chapter begins a new story.

I. The siege which the king of Syria laid to Samaria. The Syrians had soon forgotten the kindnesses they had lately received in Samaria, and without any provocation, sought the destruction of it, v. 24. The country was plundered and laid waste when this capital city was brought to the last extremity, v. 25. The dearth which had of late been in the land was probably the occasion of the emptiness of their stores, so that, while the sword devoured without, the famine within was more grievous, for the Syrians designed not to storm the city, but to starve it. So great was the scarcity that an ass's head was sold for five pounds, and a small quantity of coarse corn, then called dove's dung, no more of it than the quantity of six eggs, for five pieces of silver. How contemptible money is, when, in time of famine, it is so freely parted with for anything that is eatable.

II. The sad complaint which a poor woman had to make to the king, in the extremity of the famine. He was passing by upon the wall to give orders for the mounting of the guard, when a woman of the city cried to him, Help, my lord, O king! v. 26. He returns but a melancholy answer (v. 27): If the Lord do not help thee, whence shall I? Some think it was a quarrelling word, but it rather seems to be a quieting word: "Let us be content, and make the best of our affliction, looking up to God, for, till he help us, I cannot help thee." 1. He laments the emptiness of the floor and the wine-press. 2. He acknowledges himself disabled to help, unless God would help them. However, though he cannot help her, he is willing to hear her (v. 28): "What ails thee? Is there anything singular in thy case, or dost thou fare worse than thy neighbours?" Truly yes; she and one of her neighbours had made a barbarous agreement, that, all provisions failing, they should boil and eat her son first and then her neighbour's; hers was eaten and now her neighbour hid hers, v. 28, 29.

III. The king's indignation against Elisha upon this occasion. He lamented the calamity, rent his clothes, and had sackcloth upon his flesh (v. 30), as one heartily concerned for the misery of his people, and that it was not in his power to help them; but he did not lament his own iniquity, nor the iniquity of his people. Instead of vowing to pull down the calves at Dan and Beth-el, he swears the death of Elisha, v. 31. Why? What has Elisha done? His head is the most innocent and valuable in all Israel. Thus in the days of the persecuting emperors, when the empire groaned under any extraordinary calamity, the fault was laid on the Christians, and they were doomed to destruction. Christianos ad leones—Away with the Christians to the lions.

IV. The foresight Elisha had of the king's design against him, v. 32. He sat in his house well composed, and the elders with him. He told the elders there was an officer coming from the king to cut off his head, and bade them stop him at the door, for the king his master was just following him, to revoke the order.

V. The king's passionate speech, when he came to prevent the execution of his edict for the beheading of Elisha. He seems to have been in a struggle between his convictions and his corruptions.

CHAP. VII

Relief is here brought to Samaria and her king. I. It is foretold by Elisha, and an unbelieving lord shut out from the benefit of it, ver. 1, 2. II. It is brought about, 1. By an unaccountable fright into which God put the Syrians (ver. 6), which caused them to retire precipitately, ver. 7. 2. By the seasonable discovery which four lepers made of this (ver. 3–5), and the account which they gave of it to the court, ver. 8–11. 3. By the cautious trial which the king made of the truth of it, ver. 12–15. III. The event answered the prediction both in the sudden plenty (ver. 16), and the death of the unbelieving lord (ver. 17–20).

Verses 1–2

I. Elisha foretells that within twenty-four hours they shall have plenty, v. 1. The king of Israel despaired of it and grew weary of waiting: then Elisha foretold it, when things were at the worst. Man's extremity is God's opportunity of magnifying his own power; his time to appear for his people is when their strength is gone, Deut. xxxii. 36. The king said, Why shall I wait for the Lord any longer? "Well," said Elisha, "now hear you the word of the Lord, hear what he says: tomorrow corn shall be sold at the usual rate in the gate of Samaria." 2. The consequence of that shall be great plenty. This would, in time, follow of course, but that corn should be thus cheap in so short a time was quite beyond what could be thought of.

II. A peer of Israel that happened to be present openly declared his disbelief of this prediction, v. 2. He was a courtier whom the king had an affection for, on whom he leaned, and in whom he reposed much confidence.

III. The just doom passed upon him for his infidelity, that he should see this great plenty for his conviction, and yet not eat of it to his comfort.

Verses 3–11

I. How the siege of Samaria was raised in the evening, at the edge of night (v. 6, 7), not by might or power, but by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts, striking terror upon the spirits of the besiegers. Here was not a sword drawn against them, but, 1. The Lord made them to hear a noise of chariots and horses. The Syrians that besieged Dothan had their sight imposed upon, ch. vi. 18. These had their hearing imposed upon. Whether the noise was really made in the air by the ministry of angels, or whether it was only a sound in their ears, is not certain; whichsoever it was, it was from God, who both brings the wind out of his treasures, and forms the spirit of man within him. Notices from the invisible world are either very comfortable or very dreadful, according as men are at peace with God or at war with him. 2. Hearing this noise, they concluded the king of Israel had certainly procured assistance from some foreign power: He has hired against us the kings of the Hittites and the kings of the Egyptians. 3. Hereupon they all fled with incredible precipitation, as for their lives, left their camp as it was: even their horses, that might have hastened their flight, they could not stay to take with them, v. 7. Those that will not fear God he can make to fear at the shaking of a leaf.

II. How the Syrians' flight was discovered by four leprous men. Samaria was delivered, and did not know it. The watchmen on the walls were not aware of the retreat of the enemy, so silently did they steal away. But Providence employed four lepers to be the intelligencers, who had their lodging without the gate, being excluded from the city, as ceremonially unclean: the Jews say they were Gehazi and his three sons. 1. How these lepers reasoned themselves into a resolution to make a visit in the night to the camp of the Syrians, v. 3, 4. They were ready to perish for hunger; none passed through the gate to relieve them. They therefore determine to go over to the enemy, and throw themselves upon their mercy: perhaps they would save them alive, as objects of compassion. According to this resolution, they went, in the beginning of the night, to the camp of the Syrians, and, to their great surprise, found it wholly deserted, not a man to be seen or heard in it, v. 5. 2. How they reasoned themselves into a resolution to bring tidings of this to the city. They feasted in the first tent they came to (v. 8) and then began to think of enriching themselves with the plunder; but they corrected themselves (v. 9): "We do not well to conceal these good tidings from the community we are members of, therefore let us bring them the news. Though it awake them from sleep, it will be life from the dead to them." According to this resolution, they returned to the gate, and acquainted the sentinel with what they had discovered (v. 10), who straightway brought the intelligence to court (v. 11), and it was not the less acceptable for being first brought by lepers.

I. The king's jealousy of a stratagem in the Syrian's retreat, v. 12. He feared that they had withdrawn into an ambush, to draw out the besieged, that they might fall on them with more advantage.

II. The course they took to prevent their falling into a snare. They sent out spies to see what had become of the Syrians, and found they had all fled indeed, commanders as well as common soldiers. They could track them by the garments, which they threw off, and left by the way, for their greater expedition, v. 15. He that gave this advice seems to have been very sensible of the deplorable condition the people were in (v. 13). He advised to send five horsemen, but, it should seem, there were only two horses fit to be sent, and those chariot-horses, v. 14.

III. The plenty that was in Samaria, from the plunder of the camp of the Syrians, v. 16. God determined that the besieging of Samaria, which was intended for its ruin, should turn to its advantage, and that Israel should now be enriched with the spoil of the Syrians as of old with that of the Egyptians. The word of Elisha fulfilled to a tittle: A measure of fine flour was sold for a shekel; those that spoiled the camp had not only enough to supply themselves with, but an overplus to sell at an easy rate for the benefit of others, and so even those that tarried at home did divide the spoil, Ps. lxviii. 12; Isa. xxxiii. 23.

IV. The death of the unbelieving courtier, that questioned the truth of Elisha's word. This lord, 1. Was preferred by the king to the charge of the gate (v. 17), to keep the peace, and to see that there was no tumult or disorder in dividing and disposing of the spoil. 2. Was trodden to death by the people in the gate, either by accident, the crowd being exceedingly great, or perhaps designedly, because he abused his power. However it was, God's justice was glorified, and the word of Elisha was fulfilled. He saw the plenty, corn cheap without opening windows in heaven, and therein saw his own folly in prescribing to God; but he did not eat of the plenty he saw. This event is compared with the prediction (v. 18–20), that we might take special notice of it, and might learn, (1) How deeply God resents our distrust of him, of his power, providence, and promise. (2) How uncertain life and the enjoyments of it are. Honour and power cannot secure men from sudden and inglorious deaths. He whom the king leaned upon the people trod upon.

CHAP. VIII

The passages of story recorded in this chapter oblige us to look back. I. We read before of a Shunammite woman that was a kind benefactor to Elisha; now here we are told how she fared the better for it, afterwards, in the advice Elisha gave her, and the favour the king showed her for his sake, ver. 1–6. II. We read before of the designation of Hazael to be king of Syria (1 Kings xix. 15), and here we have an account of his elevation to that throne by killing his master, ver. 7–15. III. We read before of Jehoram's reigning over Judah in the room of his father Jehoshaphat (1 Kings xxii. 50), now here we have a short and sad history of his short and wicked reign (ver. 16–24), and the beginning of the history of the reign of his son Ahaziah, ver. 25–29.

I. The wickedness of Israel punished with a long famine, one of God's sore judgments often threatened in the law. The famine in Samaria was soon relieved by the raising of the siege, but neither that judgment nor that mercy had a due influence upon them. If less judgments do not prevail to bring men to repentance, he will send greater and longer. This famine continued seven years, as long again as that in Elijah's time; for, if men will walk contrary to him, he will heat the furnace yet hotter.

II. The kindness of the good Shunammite to the prophet rewarded by the care that was taken of her in that famine. 1. She had notice given her of this famine before it came, that she might provide accordingly, and was directed to remove to some other country; anywhere but in Israel she would find plenty. 2. Providence gave her a comfortable settlement in the land of the Philistines, who, though subdued by David, yet were not wholly rooted out. It seems the famine was peculiar to the land of Israel, and other countries that joined close to them had plenty at the same time, which plainly showed the immediate hand of God in it.

III. Her petition to the king at her return, favoured by the seasonableness of her application to him. 1. When the famine was over she returned out of the land of the Philistines. 2. At her return she found herself kept out of the possession of her own estate, it being either confiscated to the exchequer, or usurped in her absence by some of the neighbours. 3. She made her application to the king himself for redress. 4. She found the king talking with Gehazi about Elisha's miracles, v. 4. The law did not forbid all conversation with lepers, but only dwelling with them. There being then no priests in Israel, perhaps the king, or someone appointed by him, had the inspection of lepers, and passed the judgment upon them, which might bring him acquainted with Gehazi. 5. This happy coincidence befriended both Gehazi's narrative and her petition. (1) It made the king ready to believe Gehazi's narrative when it was thus confirmed by the persons most nearly concerned: "This is the woman, and this her son; let them speak for themselves," v. 5. (2) It made him ready to grant her request; for who would not be ready to favour one whom heaven had thus favoured, and to support a life which was given once and again by miracle? In consideration of this the king gave orders that her land should be restored to her and all the profits that were made of it in her absence. It is not enough for those in authority that they do no wrong themselves, but they must support the right of those that are wronged.

I. We may enquire what brought Elisha to Damascus, the chief city of Syria. Perhaps he went to pay a visit to Naaman his convert, and to confirm him in his choice of the true religion, which was the more needful now because he was now out of his place (for Hazael is supposed to be captain of the host); either he resigned it or was turned out of it, because he would not bow heartily, in the house of Rimmon. Some think he went to Damascus upon account of the famine, or rather he went thither in obedience to the orders God gave Elijah, 1 Kings xix. 15, "Go to Damascus to anoint Hazael, thou, or thy successor."

II. We may observe that Benhadad, a great king, rich and mighty, lay sick. No honour, wealth, or power, will secure men from the common diseases and disasters of human life; palaces and thrones lie as open to sickness and death as the meanest cottage.

III. We may wonder that the king of Syria, in his sickness, should make Elisha his oracle.

1. Notice was soon brought him that the man of God (for by that title he was well known in Syria since he cured Naaman) had come to Damascus, v. 7. "Never in better time," says Benhadad. "Go, and enquire of the Lord by him." In his health he bowed in the house of Rimmon, but now that he is sick he distrusts his idol, and sends to enquire of the God of Israel. This is the more observable, (1) Because it was not long since a king of Israel had, in his sickness, sent to enquire of the god of Ekron (ch. i. 2), as if there had been no God in Israel. (2) Because it was not long since this Benhadad had sent a great force to treat Elisha as an enemy (ch. vi. 14), yet now he courts him as a prophet.

2. To put an honour upon the prophet, (1) He sends to him, and does not send for him, as if, with the centurion, he thought himself not worthy that the man of God should come under his roof. (2) He sends to him by Hazael, his prime-minister of state, and not by a common messenger. (3) He sends him a noble present, of every good thing of Damascus, as much as loaded forty camels (v. 9), bidding him welcome to Damascus. It is probable that Elisha accepted it, though he refused Naaman's. (4) He orders Hazael to call him his son Ben-hadad, conforming to the language of Israel, who called the prophets fathers. (5) He puts an honour upon him as one acquainted with the secrets of heaven, when he enquires of him, Shall I recover?

IV. What passed between Hazael and Elisha is especially remarkable.

1. Elisha answered his enquiry concerning the king, that he might recover, the disease was not mortal, but that he should die another way (v. 10), not a natural but a violent death.

2. He looked Hazael in the face with an unusual concern, till he made Hazael blush and himself weep, v. 11.

3. When Hazael asked him why he wept he told him what a great deal of mischief he foresaw he would do to the Israel of God (v. 12). Elisha wept to think that ever Israelites should be thus abused. See what havoc war makes, what havoc sin makes, and how the nature of man is changed by the fall, and stripped even of humanity itself.

4. Hazael was greatly surprised at this prediction (v. 13): What, says he, Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing? This great thing he looks upon to be, (1) An act of great power, not to be done but by a crowned head. (2) An act of great barbarity, which could not be done but by one lost to all honour and virtue. It is possible for a wicked man, under the convictions and restraints of natural conscience, to express great abhorrence of a sin, and yet afterwards to be well reconciled to it.

5. In answer to this Elisha only told him he should be king over Syria; then he would have power to do it, and then he would find in his heart to do it.

V. What mischief Hazael did to his master hereupon. 1. He basely cheated his master, and belied the prophet (v. 14): He told me thou shouldst certainly recover. This was an injury to the king, who lost the benefit of this warning to prepare for death and an injury to Elisha, who would be counted a false prophet. 2. He barbarously murdered his master, and so made good the prophet's word, v. 15. He dipped a thick cloth in cold water, and stifled him. Hazael, who was Benhadad's confidant, was his murderer, and, some think, was not suspected, nor did the truth ever come out but by the pen of this inspired historian.

A brief account of the life and reign of Jehoram, one of the worst of the kings of Judah, but the son and successor of Jehoshaphat, one of the best. A nation is sometimes justly punished with the miseries of a bad reign for not improving the blessings and advantages of a good one.

Concerning Jehoram,

I. The general idea here given of his wickedness (v. 18): He did as the house of Ahab, and worse he could not do. Jehoram chose the house of Ahab for his pattern rather than his father's house, and this choice was his ruin.

II. The occasions of his wickedness. His father was a very good man, and no doubt took care to have him taught the good knowledge of the Lord, but, 1. It is certain he did ill to marry him to the daughter of Ahab. Those that are ill-matched are already half-ruined. 2. He did not do well to make him king in his own life-time. It is said here (v. 16) that he began to reign, Jehoshaphat being then king; hereby he gratified his pride. Jehoshaphat had made this wicked son of his viceroy once, when he went with Ahab to Ramoth-Gilead, from which Jehoshaphat's seventeenth year (1 Kings xxii. 51) is made Jehoram's second (2 Kings i. 17), but afterwards, in his twenty-second year, he made him partner in his government. It has been hurtful to many young men to come too soon to their estates. Samuel got nothing by making his sons judges.

III. The rebukes of Providence which he was under for his wickedness. 1. The Edomites revolted, who had been under the government of the kings of Judah ever since David's time, about 150 years, v. 20. He attempted to reduce them, and gave them a defeat (v. 21), but he could not recover his dominion over them: Yet Edom revolted (v. 22), and the Edomites were, after this, bitter enemies to the Jews, as appears by the prophecy of Obadiah and Ps. cxxxvii. 7. 2. Libnah revolted. This was a city in Judah, in the heart of his country, a priests' city; the inhabitants of this city shook off his government because he had forsaken God, and would have compelled them to do so too, 2 Chron. xxi. 10, 11. In order that they might preserve their religion they set up for a free state. 3. His reign was short. God cut him off in the midst of his days, when he was but forty years old, and had reigned but eight years.

IV. The gracious care of Providence for the keeping up of the kingdom of Judah, and the house of David, notwithstanding the apostasies and calamities of Jehoram's reign (v. 19): Yet the Lord would not destroy Judah.

V. The conclusion of this impious and inglorious reign, v. 23, 24. Nothing peculiar is here said of him; but we are told (2 Chron. xxi. 19, 20) that he died of sore diseases and died without being desired.

Verses 25–29

As among common persons there are some that we call little men, who make no figure, are little regarded, and less valued, so among kings there are some whom, in comparison with others, we may call little kings. This Ahaziah was one of these; he looks mean in the history, and in God's account vile, because wicked. Jehoshaphat and Ahab had the same names in their families at the same time, in which they designed to compliment one another. Ahab had two sons, Ahaziah and Jehoram, who reigned successively; Jehoshaphat had a son and grandson named Jehoram and Ahaziah, who, in like manner, reigned successively. Ahaziah king of Israel had reigned but two years, Ahaziah king of Judah reigned but one. We are here told that his relation to Ahab's family was the occasion, 1. Of his wickedness (v. 27): He walked in the way of the house of Ahab, that idolatrous bloody house: for his mother was Ahab's daughter (v. 26). When men choose wives for themselves they must remember they are choosing mothers for their children, and are concerned to choose accordingly. 2. Of his fall. Joram, his mother's brother, courted him to join with him for the recovery of Ramoth-Gilead, an attempt fatal to Ahab; so it was to Joram his son, for in that expedition he was wounded (v. 28), and returned to Jezreel to be cured, leaving his army there in possession of the place. Ahaziah likewise returned, but went to Jezreel to see how Jehoram did, v. 29.

CHAP. IX

Hazael and Jehu were designed to be the instruments of God's justice in destroying the house of Ahab. Elijah was told to appoint them to this service; but, upon Ahab's humiliation, a reprieve was granted, and so it was left to Elisha to appoint them. Hazael's elevation to the throne of Syria we read of in the foregoing chapter; and we must now attend Jehu to the throne of Israel; for him that escapeth the sword of Hazael, as Joram and Ahaziah did, Jehu must slay. I. A commission is sent to Jehu by the hand of one of the prophets, to take upon him the government, and destroy the house of Ahab, ver. 1–10. II. His speedy execution of this commission. 1. He communicates it to his captains, ver. 11–15. 2. He marches directly to Jezreel (ver. 16–20), and there dispatches, (1) Joram king of Israel, ver. 21–26. (2) Ahaziah king of Judah, ver. 27–29. (3) Jezebel, ver. 30–37.

Verses 1–10

The anointing of Jehu to be king. It does not appear that Jehu aimed at the government. Some think that he had been anointed before by Elijah, whom God ordered to do it, but privately, and with an intimation that he must not act till further orders, as Samuel anointed David long before he was to come to the throne: but that is not at all probable, for then we must suppose Elijah had anointed Hazael too.

I. The commission sent.

1. Elisha did not go himself to anoint Jehu, because he was old and unfit for such a journey and so well known that he could not do it privately, therefore he sends one of the sons of the prophets to do it, v. 1.

2. When he sent him, (1) He put the oil into his hand with which he must anoint Jehu: Take this box of oil. Solomon was anointed with oil out of the tabernacle, 1 Kings i. 39. That could not now be had, but oil from a prophet's hand was equivalent to oil out of God's house. (2) He put the words into his mouth which he must say (v. 3)—I have anointed thee king, v. 7–10. (3) He also ordered him, [1] To do it privately, to single out Jehu from the rest of the captains and anoint him in an inner chamber (v. 2). [2] To do it expeditiously. When he had done it he must flee and not tarry.

II. The commission delivered. The young prophet did his business with despatch, was at Ramoth-Gilead presently, v. 4. There he found the general officers in a council of war, v. 5. With the assurance that became a messenger from God, he called Jehu out from the rest as one having authority: I have an errand to thee, O captain. Perhaps Jehu had some intimation of his business; and therefore, that he might not seem too forward to catch at the honour, he asked, To which of all us? When the prophet had him alone he anointed him, v. 6.

1. He invests him with the royal dignity: Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, whose messenger I am, in his name I have anointed thee king over the people of the Lord. He reminds him that he was made king, (1) By the God of Israel; from him he must see his power derived, for him he must use it, and to him he must be accountable. (2) Over the Israel of God. Though the people of Israel had forfeited all the honour of relationship to God, yet they are here called the people of the Lord, for he had a right to them. Jehu must look upon the people he was made king of as the people of the Lord, God's freemen, not to be abused or tyrannised over, God's people, and therefore to be ruled for him, and according to his laws.

2. He instructs him in his present service, which was to destroy all the house of Ahab (v. 7), not that he might clear his own way to the throne, but that he might execute the judgments of God upon that guilty and obnoxious family. He calls Ahab his master: "But thou art under higher obligations to thy Master in heaven than to thy master Ahab. He has determined that the whole house of Ahab shall perish, and by thy hand; fear not danger; his command will secure and prosper thee." That he might intelligently do this execution on the house of Ahab, he tells him, (1) What was their crime. That they were idolaters was bad enough, but the controversy God has with them is for their being persecutors, not so much their throwing down God's altars as their slaying his prophets with the sword. This was the sin that brought on Jerusalem its first destruction (2 Chron. xxxvi. 16) and its final one, Matt. xxiii. 37, 38. Jezebel's whoredoms and witchcrafts were not so provoking as her persecuting the prophets, killing some and driving the rest into corners and caves, 1 Kings xviii. 4. (2) What was their doom. They were sentenced to utter destruction; and he is particularly directed to throw Jezebel to the dogs, v. 10.

Jehu, after some pause, returned to his place at the board, taking no notice of what had passed, but, as it should seem, designing, for the present, to keep it to himself.

I. With what contempt the captains speak of the young prophet (v. 11): "Wherefore came this mad fellow to thee? What business had he with thee?" They thought the prophets were fools and the spiritual men were mad, Hos. ix. 7. Those that have no religion commonly speak with disdain of those that are religious, and look upon them as mad. They said of our Saviour, He is beside himself, of John Baptist, He has a devil, of St. Paul, Much learning has made him mad. The highest wisdom is thus represented as folly, and those that best understand themselves are looked upon as beside themselves. Perhaps Jehu intended it for a rebuke to his friends when he said, "You know the man to be a prophet, why then do you call him a mad fellow?" Thus he thought to put them off, but they urged him to tell them. "It is false," say they, "we cannot conjecture what was his errand, and therefore tell us." Being thus pressed to it, he told them that the prophet had anointed him king, and it is probable showed them the oil upon his head, v. 12.

II. With what respect they compliment the new king upon the first notice of his advancement, v. 13. In token of their subjection and allegiance to him, they put their garments under him, that he might stand on the top of the stairs, in sight of the soldiers, who, upon the first intimation, came together to grace the solemnity.

III. With what caution Jehu proceeded. He had the army with him. Joram had left it, and had gone home badly wounded. Jehu's good conduct appears in two things:—1. That he complimented the captains, and would do nothing without their advice and consent. 2. That he contrived to surprise Joram; and, in order thereto, to come upon him with speed. The suddenness of an attack sometimes turns to as good an account as the force of it.

Verses 16–29

From Ramoth-Gilead to Jezreel was more than one day's march; about the mid-way between them the river Jordan must be crossed.

I. Joram's watchman discovers him first at a distance, him and his retinue, and gives notice to the king of the approach of a company, whether of friends or foes he cannot tell. But the king sent first one messenger, and then another, to bring him intelligence, v. 17–19. Each messenger asked the same question: "Is it peace? are you for us or for our adversaries?" Each had the same answer: What hast thou to do with peace? Turn thee behind me, v. 18, 19. The watchman gave notice that the messengers were taken prisoners, and at length observed that the leader of this troop drove like Jehu, who it seems was noted for driving furiously. A man of such a violent temper was fittest for the service to which Jehu was designated.

II. Joram himself goes out to meet him, and takes Ahaziah king of Judah along with him, neither of them equipped for war, as not expecting an enemy, but in haste to have their curiosity satisfied.

1. The place where Joram met Jehu was ominous: In the portion of Naboth the Jezreelite, v. 21. The very sight of that ground was enough to make Joram tremble and Jehu triumph; for Joram had the guilt of Naboth's blood fighting against him and Jehu had the force of Elijah's curse fighting for him.

2. Joram's demand was still the same: "Is it peace, Jehu? Is all well? Dost thou come home thus flying from the Syrians or more than a conqueror over them?"

3. Jehu's reply was very startling. He answered him with a question: What peace canst thou expect, so long as the whoredoms of thy mother Jezebel and her witchcrafts are so many? Observe, (1) He charges upon him his mother's wickedness. She stands impeached for whoredom, corporal and spiritual, for witchcraft likewise, enchantments and divinations, used in honour of her idols; and these multiplied, for those that abandon themselves to wicked courses know not where they will stop. (2) Upon that account he throws him off from all pretensions to peace: "What peace can come to that house in which there is so much wickedness unrepented of?" The way of sin can never be the way of peace, Isa. lvii. 21. No peace so long as sin is persisted in; but, as soon as it is repented of and forsaken there is peace.

4. The execution was done immediately. When Joram heard of his mother's crimes his heart failed him; he presently concluded the long-threatened day of reckoning had now come, and cried out, "There is treachery, O Ahaziah! Jehu is our enemy, and it is time for us to shift for our safety." Both fled, and, (1) Joram king of Israel was slain presently, v. 24. Jehu dispatched him with his own hands. He died a criminal, under the sentence of the law, which Jehu, the executioner, pursues in the disposal of the dead body. Naboth's vineyard was hard by, which put him in mind of that circumstance of the doom Elijah passed upon Ahab, "I will requite thee in this plat, said the Lord (v. 25, 26), for the blood of Naboth himself, and for the blood of his sons." That very piece of ground which he, with so much pride and pleasure, had made himself master of at the expense of the guilt of innocent blood, now became the theatre on which his son's dead body lay exposed a spectacle to the world. (2) Ahaziah king of Judah was pursued, and slain in a little time, and not far off, v. 27, 28. Though he was now in Joram's company, he would not have been slain but that he was joined with the house of Ahab both in affinity and in iniquity.

The greatest delinquent in the house of Ahab was Jezebel: it was she that introduced Baal, slew the Lord's prophets, contrived the murder of Naboth, stirred up her husband first, and then her sons, to do wickedly; a cursed woman she is here called (v. 34). Three reigns her reign had lasted, but now, at length, her day had come to fall. So that Jezebel's destruction may be looked upon as typical of the destruction of idolaters and persecutors.

I. Jezebel daring the judgment. She heard that Jehu had slain her son, and slain him for her whoredoms and witchcrafts, and thrown his dead body into the portion of Naboth, and that he was now coming to Jezreel. She posted herself in a window at the entering of the gate, to affront Jehu and set him at defiance. 1. Instead of hiding herself, as one afraid of divine vengeance, she exposed herself to it and scorned to flee. 2. Instead of humbling herself, and putting herself into close mourning for her son, she painted her face, and tired her head, that she might appear like herself, that is (as she thought), great and majestic, hoping thereby to daunt Jehu. There is not a surer presage of ruin than an unhumbled heart under humbling providences. 3. Instead of trembling before Jehu, the instrument of God's vengeance, she thought to make him tremble with that threatening question, Had Zimri peace, who slew his master? (1) She took no notice of the hand of God gone out against her family, but flew in the face of him that was only the sword in his hand. (2) She pleased herself with the thought that what Jehu was now doing would certainly end in his own ruin, and that he would not have peace in it. (3) She quoted a precedent, to deter him from the prosecution of this enterprise: "Had Zimri peace? No, he had not; he came to the throne by blood and treachery, and within seven days was constrained to burn the palace over his head and himself in it: and canst thou expect to fare any better?" But Zimri had no warrant for what he did, but was incited to it merely by his own ambition and cruelty; whereas Jehu was anointed by one of the sons of the prophets, and did this by order from heaven, which would bear him out.

II. Jehu demanding aid against her. He looked up to the window, not daunted at the menaces of her impudent but impotent rage, and cried, Who is on my side? Who? v. 32. When reformation-work is set on foot, it is time to ask, "Who sides with it?"

III. Her own attendants delivering her up to his just revenge. Two or three chamberlains looked out to Jehu with such a countenance as encouraged him to believe they were on his side, and to them he called immediately to throw her down, which was one way of stoning malefactors, casting them headlong from some steep place. Thus was vengeance taken on her for the stoning of Naboth. They threw her down, v. 33. Thus she was most shamefully put to death, dashed against the wall and the pavement.

IV. The very dogs completing her shame and ruin, according to the prophecy. Jehu bethought himself of showing so much respect to Jezebel's sex and quality as to bury her. As bad as she was, she was a daughter, a king's daughter, a king's wife, a king's mother: Go and bury her, v. 34. While he was eating and drinking, the dogs had devoured her dead body. The hungry dogs had no respect to the dignity of her extraction; a king's daughter was no more to them than a common person. When notice was brought of this to Jehu, he remembered the threatening (1 Kings xxi. 23), The dogs shall eat Jezebel by the wall of Jezreel. Jezebel's name nowhere remained, but as stigmatised in sacred writ: they could not so much as say, "This is Jezebel's dust, This is Jezebel's grave."

CHAP. X

I. A further account of Jehu's execution of his commission. He cut off, 1. All Ahab's sons, ver. 1–10. 2. All Ahab's kindred, ver. 11–14, 17. 3. Ahab's idolatry: his zeal against this he took Jonadab to be witness to (ver. 15, 16), summoned all the worshippers of Baal to attend (ver. 18–23), and slew them all (ver. 24, 25), and then abolished that idolatry, ver. 26–28. II. A short account of the administration of his government. 1. The old idolatry of Israel, the worship of the calves, was retained, ver. 29–31. 2. This brought God's judgments upon them by Hazael, with which his reign concludes, ver. 32–36.

Jehu knew the whole house of Ahab must be cut off.

I. He got the heads of all the sons of Ahab cut off by their own guardians at Samaria. These sons of Ahab were now at Samaria, a strong city, perhaps brought thither upon occasion of the war with Syria, as a place of safety, or upon notice of Jehu's insurrection; with them were the rulers of Jezreel, that is, the great officers of the court, who went to Samaria to secure themselves or to consult what was to be done. Jehu did not think fit to bring his forces to Samaria to destroy them, but, that the hand of God might appear the more remarkably in it, made their guardians their murderers. 1. He sent a challenge to their friends to stand by them, v. 2, 3. Not that he desired they should do this, or expected they would, but thus he upbraided them with their cowardice and utter inability to contest with the divine counsels. 2. Hereby he gained from them a submission. They prudently reasoned with themselves: "Behold, two kings stood not before him, but fell as sacrifices to his rage; how then shall we stand?" v. 4. Therefore they sent him a surrender of themselves: "We are thy servants, thy subjects, and will do all that thou shalt bid us." 3. This was improved so far as to make them the executioners of those whom they had the tuition of (v. 6). These elders of Jezreel had been wickedly obsequious to Jezebel's order for the murder of Naboth, 1 Kings xxi. 11. She gloried, it is likely, in the power she had over them; and now the same base spirit makes them as pliable to Jehu and as ready to obey his orders for the murder of Ahab's sons. When the heads were presented to Jehu, he upbraided those that were the executioners, yet owned the hand of God in it. (1) He seems to blame those that had been the executioners of this vengeance. "I slew but one; they have slain all these. Let not the people of Samaria, nor any of the friends of the house of Ahab, ever reproach me for what I have done, when their own elders, and the very guardians of the orphans, have done this." But, (2) He resolves all into the righteous judgment of God (v. 10): The Lord hath done that which he spoke by Elijah.

II. He proceeded to destroy all that remained of the house of Ahab, not only those that descended from him, but those that were in any relation to him. Having done this in Jezreel, he did the same in Samaria (v. 17), slew all that remained to Ahab in Samaria. This was bloody work, and is not now, in any case, to be drawn into a precedent. Let the guilty suffer, but not the guiltless for their sakes.

III. Providence bringing the brethren of Ahaziah in his way, as he was going on with this execution, he slew them likewise, v. 12–14. 1. They were branches of Ahab's house, being descended from Athaliah, and therefore fell within his commission. 2. They were tainted with the wickedness of the house of Ahab. 3. They were now going to make their court to the princes of the house of Ahab, to salute the children of the king and the queen, Joram and Jezebel, which showed that they were linked to them in affection as well as in affinity.

I. Courting the friendship of a good man, Jehonadab the son of Rechab, v. 15, 16. This Jehonadab, though mortified to the world and meddling little with the business of it (as appears by his charge to his posterity, which they religiously observed 300 years after, not to drink wine nor dwell in cities, Jer. xxxv. 6, &c.), yet, upon this occasion, went to meet Jehu, that he might encourage him in the work to which God had called him. Jehonadab, though no prophet, priest, or Levite, was generally respected for that life of self-denial and devotion which he lived: Jehu, though a soldier, knew him and honoured him. When he met him (though it is likely he drove now as furiously as ever) he stopped to speak to him. 1. Jehu saluted him; he blessed him (so the word is), paid him respect. 2. Jehu professed that his heart was right with him, that he had a true affection for his person and a veneration for the crown of his Nazariteship, and desired to know whether he had the same affection for him: Is thy heart right? Jehonadab gave him his word (It is), and gave him his hand as a pledge of his heart. 3. Jehu took him up into his chariot and took him along with him to Samaria. All sober people would think the better of Jehu when they saw Jehonadab in the chariot with him. This was not the only time in which the piety of some has been made to serve the policy of others, and designing men have strengthened themselves by drawing good men into their interests. Jehonadab is a stranger to the arts of fleshly wisdom, and therefore, if Jehu be a servant of God and an enemy to Baal, he will be his faithful friend. "Come then" (says Jehu), "come with me, and see my zeal for the Lord." This is commonly taken as giving cause to suspect that the zeal he pretended for the Lord was really zeal for himself and his own advancement. For, (1) He boasted of it, and spoke as if God and man were mightily indebted to him for it. (2) He desired it might be seen and taken notice of, like the Pharisees, who did all to be seen of men. Jehonadab went with him, and, it is likely, animated and assisted him in the further execution of his commission (v. 17), destroying all Ahab's friends in Samaria. A man may hate cruelty and yet love justice.

II. Contriving the destruction of all the worshippers of Baal. Jehu's project is to cut them all off together. 1. By a wile he brought them together to the temple of Baal. He pretended he would worship Baal more than ever Ahab had done, v. 18. He issued a proclamation, requiring the attendance of all the worshippers of Baal to join with him in a sacrifice to Baal (v. 19, 20). 2. He took care that none of the servants of the Lord should be among them, v. 23. 3. He gave orders for the cutting of them all off, and Jehonadab joined with him therein, v. 23. Then the guards were sent in to put them all to the sword. 4. The idolators being thus destroyed, the idolatry itself was utterly abolished. The buildings about the house of Baal were destroyed; all the little images, statues, pictures, or shrines, which beautified Baal's temple, with the great image of Baal himself, were brought out and burnt (v. 26, 27), and the temple of Baal was broken down. Thus was the worship of Baal quite destroyed. Thus will God destroy all the gods of the heathen, and, sooner or later, triumph over them all.

The account of the reign of Jehu.

I. God's approbation of what Jehu had done. 1. God pronounced that to be right which he had done. The extirpating of idolaters and idolatry was a thing right in God's eyes. 2. God promised him a reward, that his children of the fourth generation from him should sit upon the throne of Israel.

II. Jehu's carelessness in what he was further to do. By this it appeared that his heart was not right with God, that he was partial in his reformation. 1. He did not put away all the evil. He departed from the sins of Ahab, but not from the sins of Jeroboam—discarded Baal, but adhered to the calves. The worship of the calves was a politic idolatry, was begun and kept up for reasons of state, to prevent the return of the ten tribes to the house of David, and therefore Jehu clave to that. True conversion is not only from those sins that are destructive to the secular interest, but from those that support and befriend it, in forsaking which is the great trial whether we can deny ourselves and trust God. 2. He put away evil, but he did not mind that which was good (v. 31): He took no heed to walk in the law of the Lord God of Israel. He had shown great care and zeal for the rooting out of a false religion; but in the true religion, (1) He was not at all solicitious to please God. (2) He showed no zeal. It seems, he was a man that had little religion himself, and yet God made use of him as an instrument of reformation in Israel.

III. The judgment that came upon Israel in his reign. There was a general decay of piety and increase of profaneness; and therefore it is not strange that the next news we hear is, In those days the Lord began to cut Israel short, v. 32. Their neighbours encroached upon them on every side. Hazael king of Syria was, above any other, vexatious and mischievous to them, smote them in all the coasts of Israel.

Lastly, The conclusion of Jehu's reign, v. 34–36. Because he took no heed to serve God, the memorials of his mighty enterprises and achievements are justly buried in oblivion.

CHAP. XI

The affairs of the kingdom of Judah. I. Athaliah usurps the government and destroys all the seed-royal, ver. 1. II. Joash, a child of a year old, is wonderfully preserved, ver. 2, 3. III. At six years' end he is produced, and, by the agency of Jehoiada, made king, ver. 4–12. IV. Athaliah is slain, ver. 13–16. V. Both the civil and religious interests of the kingdom are well settled in the hands of Joash, ver. 17–21.

Verses 1–3

God had assured David of the continuance of his family, which is called his ordaining a lamp for his anointed. Now here we have David's promised lamp almost extinguished and yet wonderfully preserved.

I. It was almost extinguished by the barbarous malice of Athaliah, the queen-mother, who, when she heard that her son Ahaziah was slain by Jehu, arose and destroyed all the seed-royal (v. 1), all that she knew to be akin to the crown. She did it, 1. From a spirit of ambition. She thirsted after rule, and thought she could not get to it any other way. 2. From a spirit of revenge and rage against God. The house of Ahab being utterly destroyed, she resolved, as it were, by way of reprisal, to destroy the house of David. Well might she be called Athaliah, that wicked woman (2 Chron. xxiv. 7), Jezebel's own daughter.

II. It was wonderfully preserved by the pious care of one of Joram's daughters (who was wife to Jehoiada the priest), who stole away one of the king's sons, Joash by name, and hid him, v. 2, 3. The place of his safety was the house of the Lord, one of the chambers belonging to the temple, a place Athaliah seldom troubled. His aunt, by bringing him hither, put him under God's special protection, and so hid him by faith, as Moses was hidden. Now were David's words made good to one of his seed (Ps. xxvii. 5), In the secret of his tabernacle shall he hide me. With good reason did this Joash, when he grew up, set himself to repair the house of the Lord, for it had been a sanctuary to him. See the wisdom and care of Providence, and how it prepares for what it designs; and see what blessings those lay up in store for their families that marry their children to those that are wise and good.

Verses 4–12

Six years Athaliah tyrannised. While Jehu was extirpating the worship of Baal in Israel, she was establishing it in Judah, as appears, 2 Chron. xxiv. 7. All this while, Joash lay hid, entitled to a crown and intended for it, and yet buried alive in obscurity. Joash in his seventh year was ready to be shown, having served his first apprenticeship to life and arrived at his first climacterical year. By that time the people had grown weary of Athaliah's tyranny and ripe for a revolution. How that revolution was effected:

I. The manager of this great affair was Jehoiada the priest, probably the high priest. By his birth and office he was a man in authority. By marriage he was allied to the royal family, and, if all the seed-royal were destroyed, his wife, as daughter to Joram, had a better title to the crown than Athaliah had. By his eminent gifts and graces he was fitted to serve his country, and better service he could not do it than to free it from Athaliah's usurpation.

II. The management was very discreet as became so wise and good a man as Jehoiada.

1. He concerted the matter with the rulers of hundreds and the captains, the men in office, ecclesiastical, civil, and military; he got them to him to the temple, consulted with them, gave them an oath of secrecy, and showed them the king's son (v. 4). What a pleasing surprise it was to them, who feared that the house and lineage of David were quite cut off, to find such a spark as this in the embers.

2. He posted the priests and Levites, who were more immediately under his direction, in the several avenues to the temple, to keep the guard. David had divided the priests into courses. Every sabbath-day morning a new company came into waiting, but the company of the foregoing week did not go out of waiting till the sabbath evening, so that on the sabbath day, when double service was to be done, there was a double number to do it. These Jehoiada employed to attend on this great occasion; he armed them out of the magazines of the temple with David's spears and shields. Two things they were ordered to do: (1) To protect the young king from being insulted. (2) To preserve the holy temple from being profaned by the concourse of people that would come together on this occasion (v. 6).

3. When the guards were fixed, then the king was brought forth, v. 12. Jehoiada, without delay, proceeded to the coronation of this young king. This was done with great solemnity, v. 12. (1) In token of his being invested with kingly power, he put the crown upon him. (2) In token of his obligation to govern by law, and to make the word of God his rule, he gave him the testimony, Deut. xvii. 18, 19. (3) In token of his receiving the Spirit, to qualify him for this great work to which he before was called, he anointed him. (4) In token of the people's acceptance of him and subjection to his government, they clapped their hands for joy, and expressed their hearty good wishes to him: Let the king live; and thus they made him their king and concurred with the divine appointment. They had reason to bid him welcome to the crown whose right it was, and to pray, Let him live, concerning him who came to them as life from the dead and in whom the house of David was to live. With such acclamations of joy and satisfaction must the kingdom of Christ be welcomed into our hearts when his throne is set up there and Satan the usurper is deposed.

Verses 13–16

It was designed when they had finished the solemnity of the king's inauguration, to pay a visit to Athaliah, and call her to an account for her murders, usurpation, and tyranny; but, like her mother Jezebel, she went out to meet them, and hastened her own destruction. 1. Hearing the noise, she came in a fright to see what was the matter, v. 13. Jehoiada and his friends proclaimed what they were doing. When she heard the noise it was strange that she was so ill advised as to come herself, and, for aught that appears, to come alone. 2. Seeing what was done she cried out for help. She saw the king's place by the pillar possessed by one to whom the princes and people did homage (v. 14). This made her rend her clothes and cry, "Treason! treason! Come and help against the traitors." 3. Jehoiada gave orders to put her to death as an idolater, a usurper, and an enemy to the public peace. Care was taken, (1) That she should not be killed in the temple. (2) That whoever appeared for her should die with her. She endeavouring to make her escape the back way to the palace, through the stalls, they pursued her, and there killed her, v. 16.

Jehoiada had now got over the hardest part of his work, when, by the death of Athaliah, the young prince had his way to the throne cleared of all opposition.

I. The good foundations he laid, by an original contract, v. 17. Now that prince and people were together in God's house, Jehoiada took care that they should jointly covenant with God, and mutually covenant with each other, that they might rightly understand their duty both to God and to one another. 1. He endeavoured to settle and secure the interests of religion among them, by a covenant between them and God. In this covenant, the king stands upon the same level with his subjects and is as much bound as any of them to serve the Lord. By this engagement they renounced Baal, whom many of them had worshipped, and resigned themselves to God's government. By our bonds to God the bonds of every relation are strengthened. They first gave themselves to the Lord, and then to us, 2 Cor. viii. 5. 2. He then settled both the coronation-oath and the oath of allegiance, the pacta conventa—covenant, between the king and the people, by which the king was obliged to govern according to law and to protect his subjects, and they were obliged, while he did so, to obey him and to bear faith and true allegiance to him.

II. The good beginnings he raised on those foundations. 1. Pursuant to their covenant with God they immediately abolished idolatry. Every one, now that they were so well headed, would lend a hand to pull down Baal's temple, his altars, and his images. All his worshippers, it should seem, deserted him; only his priest Mattan stuck to his altar. Though all men forsook Baal, he would not, and there he was slain. Having destroyed Baal's temple, they appointed officers over the house of God, to see that the service of God was regularly performed by the proper persons, in due time, and according to the instituted manner. 2. Pursuant to their covenant with one another, (1) The king was brought in state to the royal palace, and sat there on the throne of judgment, the thrones of the house of David (v. 19), ready to receive petitions and appeals, which he would refer to Jehoiada to give answers to and to give judgment upon. (2) The people rejoiced, and Jerusalem was in quiet (v. 20).

CHAP. XII

This chapter gives us the history of the reign of Joash, which does not answer to that glorious beginning of it which we had an account of in the foregoing chapter; he was not so illustrious at forty years old as he was at seven, yet his reign is to be reckoned one of the better sort, and appears much worse in Chronicles

(2 Chron. xxiv) than it does here. Here we are only told, I. That he did well while Jehoiada lived, ver. 1–3. II. That he was careful and active to repair the temple, ver. 4–16. III. That after a mean compact with Hazael (ver. 17, 18) he died ingloriously, ver. 19–21.

Verses 1–3

The general account given of Joash is, 1. That he reigned forty years. 2. That he did that which was right as long as Jehoiada lived to instruct him, v. 2. 3. That the high places were not taken away, v. 3. Up and down the country they had altars both for sacrifice and incense, to the honour of the God of Israel only. These private altars, perhaps, had been more used in the late bad reigns than formerly, because it was not safe to go up to Jerusalem, nor was the temple-service performed as it should have been; and, it may be, Jehoiada connived at them, because he hoped that the reforming of the temple, and putting things into a good posture there, would by degrees draw people from their high places and they would dwindle of themselves.

Verses 4–16

An account of the repairing of the temple in the reign of Joash.

I. Though Solomon built it of the best materials and in the best manner, yet in time it went to decay, and there were breaches found in it (v. 5). Even temples themselves are the worse for the wearing; but the heavenly temple will never wax old. Yet it was not only the teeth of time that made these breaches, the sons of Athaliah had broken up the house of God (2 Chron. xxiv. 7).

II. The king himself was the first and forwardest man that took care for the repair of it. 1. Because he was king, and God expects and requires from those who have power that they use it for the maintenance and support of religion, the redress of grievances, and reparation of decays. 2. Because the temple had been both his nursery and his sanctuary when he was a child, in a grateful remembrance of which he now appeared zealous for the honour of it. Those who have experienced the comfort and benefit of religious assemblies will make the support of them their care, and the prosperity of them their chief joy.

III. The priests were ordered to collect money for these repairs, and to take care that the work was done. 1. He gave them orders for the levying of the money. They must not stay till it was paid in, but they must call for it where they knew it was due, in their respective districts, as redemption-money (by virtue of the law, Exod. xxx. 12), or as estimation-money (by virtue of the law, Lev. xxvii. 2, 3), or as a free-will offering, v. 4.

IV. This method did not answer the intention, v. 6. Little money was raised. Either the priests were careless, and did not call on the people to pay in their dues, or the people had so little confidence in the priests' management that they were backward to pay money into their hands. But what money was raised was not applied to the proper use: The breaches of the house were not repaired.

V. Another method was therefore taken. The king had his heart much set upon having the breaches of the house repaired, v. 7. His apostasy, at last, gives us cause to question whether he had as good an affection for the service of the temple as he had for the structure. Many have been zealous for building and beautifying churches, and for other forms of godliness, who yet have been strangers to the power of it. However, we commend his zeal. Another course was taken,

1. For raising money, v. 9, 10. The money was put into a public chest, and then people brought it in readily and in great abundance. The money that was given, (1) Was dropped into the chest through a hole in the lid, past recall, to intimate that what has been once resigned to God must never be resumed. (2) The chest was put on the right hand as they went in, which, some think, is alluded to in that rule of charity which our Saviour gives, Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth. But, while they were getting all they could for the repair of the temple, they did not break in upon that which was the stated maintenance of the priests, v. 16. Let not the servants of the temple be starved under colour of repairing the breaches of it.

2. For laying out the money that was raised.

(1) They did not put it into the hands of the priests, who were not versed in affairs of this nature, having other work to mind, but into the hands of those that did the work, or at least had the oversight of it, v. 11. [1] Carefully, purchasing materials and paying workmen, v. 12. [2] Faithfully, such a reputation they got for honesty that there was no occasion to examine their bills or audit their accounts. Those that think it is no sin to cheat the government, cheat the country, or cheat the church, will be of another mind when God shall set their sins in order before them.

(2) They did not lay it out in ornaments for the temple, in vessels of gold or silver, but in necessary repairs first (v. 13).

When Joash had revolted from God and become both an idolater and a persecutor the hand of the Lord went out against him, and his last state was worse than his first.

I. His wealth and honour became an easy prey to his neighbours. Hazael, when he had chastised Israel (ch. x. 32), threatened Judah and Jerusalem likewise, took Gath, a strong city (v. 17), and thence intended to march with his forces against Jerusalem. Joash had neither spirit nor strength to make head against him, but gave him all the hallowed things, and all the gold that was found both in his exchequer and in the treasures of the temple (v. 18), to bribe him to march another way. If he had not forsaken God, and forfeited his protection, his affairs would not have been brought to this extremity. He lost the honour of a prince and a soldier. He impoverished himself and his kingdom. He tempted Hazael to come again, when he could carry home so rich a booty without striking a stroke. And the next year the host of Syria came up against Jerusalem, destroyed the prince, and plundered the city, 2 Chron. xxiv. 23, 24.

II. His life became an easy prey to his own servants. They conspired against him and slew him (v. 20, 21), to be avenged on him for murdering the prophet, Jehoiada's son. Thus fell Joash, who began in the spirit and ended in the flesh.

CHAP. XIII

The history of the kings of Israel, and particularly of the family of Jehu. We have here an account of the reign, 1. Of his son Jehoahaz, which continued seventeen years. 1. His bad character in general (ver. 1, 2), the trouble he was brought into (ver. 3), and the low ebb of his affairs, ver. 7. 2. His humiliation before God, and God's compassion towards him, ver. 4, 5, and again, ver. 23. 3. His continuance in his idolatry notwithstanding, ver. 6. 4. His death, ver. 8, 9. II. Of his grandson Joash, which continued sixteen years. Here is a general account of his reign (ver. 10–13), but a particular account of the death of Elisha. 1. The kind visit the king made him (ver. 14), the encouragement he gave the king in his wars with Syria, ver. 15–19. 2. His death and burial (ver. 20), and a miracle wrought by his bones, ver. 21. And, lastly, the advantages Joash gained against the Syrians, according to his predictions, ver. 24, 25.

Verses 1–9

A general account of the reign of Jehoahaz, and of the state of Israel during his seventeen years.

I. The glory of Israel turned into shame. How is its crown profaned and its honour laid in the dust!

1. It was the honour of Israel that they worshipped the only living and true God, who is a Spirit, an eternal mind, and had rules by which to worship him of his own appointment; but by changing the glory of their incorruptible God into the similitude of an ox, the truth of God into a lie, they lost this honour, and levelled themselves with the nations that worshipped the work of their own hands. We find here that the king followed the sins of Jeroboam (v. 2), and the people departed not from them, but walked therein, v. 6. 2. It was the honour of Israel that they were taken under the special protection of heaven; God himself was their defence. But here, as often before, we find them stripped of this glory, and exposed to the insults of all their neighbours. They by their sins provoked God to anger, and then he delivered them into the hands of Hazael and Benhadad, v. 3. Hazael oppressed Israel, v. 22. Surely never was any nation so often plucked and pillaged by their neighbours as Israel was.

II. Some sparks of Israel's ancient honour appearing in these ashes. For, 1. It was the ancient honour of Israel that they were a praying people: and here we find somewhat of that honour revived; for Jehoahaz their king, in his distress, besought the Lord (v. 4), applied for help, not to the calves (what help could they give him?) but to the Lord. 2. It was the ancient honour of Israel that they had God nigh unto them in all that which they called upon him for (Deut. iv. 7), and so he was here. Though he might justly have rejected the prayer as an abomination to him, yet the Lord hearkened unto Jehoahaz, and to his prayer for himself and for his people (v. 4), and he gave Israel a saviour (v. 5), not Jehoahaz himself, for all his days Hazael oppressed Israel (v. 22), but his son, to whom, in answer to his father's prayers, God gave success against the Syrians, so that he recovered the cities which they had taken from his father, v. 25. This gracious answer God gave to the prayer of Jehoahaz in remembrance of his covenant with Abraham (v. 23). See how swift God is to show mercy, how willing to find out a reason to be gracious, else he would not look so far back as that ancient covenant.

Verses 10–19

Joash, the son of Jehoahaz and grandson of Jehu, upon the throne of Israel. Probably the house of Jehu intended some respect to the house of David when they gave this heir-apparent to the crown the same name with him that was then king of Judah.

I. He was none of the worst, and yet, because he kept up that ancient and politic idolatry of the house of Jeroboam, it is said, He did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord.

II. The particular account of what passed between him and Elisha:

1. Elisha fell sick, v. 14. (1) It was now about sixty years since he was first called to be a prophet. It was a great mercy to Israel, and especially to the sons of the prophets, that he was continued so long a burning and shining light. (2) All the latter part of his time, from the anointing of Jehu, which was forty-five years before Joash began his reign, we find no mention made of him, or of anything he did, till we find him here upon his death-bed.

2. King Joash visited him in his sickness, and wept over him, v. 14. This was an evidence of some good in him, that he had a value and affection for a faithful prophet. When the king heard of Elisha's sickness he came to visit him, and to receive his dying counsel and blessing. He lamented him in the same words with which Elisha had himself lamented the removal of Elijah: My father, my father.

3. Elisha gave the king great assurances of his success against the Syrians, Israel's present oppressors, and encouraged him to prosecute the war against them with vigour. I die, but God will surely visit you. He has the residue of the Spirit, and can raise up other prophets to pray for you. He gives him a sign, orders him to take bow and arrow (v. 15). God would be the agent, but he must be the instrument. And that he should be successful he gives him a token, by directing him,

(1) To shoot an arrow towards Syria, v. 16, 17. He received the words of command from the prophet: Put thy hand upon the bow—Open the window—Shoot. As if he had been a child that never drew a bow before, Elisha put his hands upon the king's hands, to signify that in all his expeditions against the Syrians he must look up to God for direction and strength. The trembling hands of a dying prophet, as they signified the concurrence and communication of the power of God, gave this arrow more force than the hands of the king in his full strength. The Syrians had made themselves masters of the country that lay eastward, ch. x. 33. Thitherward therefore the arrow was directed, and such an interpretation given by the prophet of the shooting of this arrow as made it, [1] A commission to the king to attack the Syrians. [2] A promise of success therein. It is the arrow of the Lord's deliverance, even the arrow of deliverance from Syria.

(2) To strike with the arrows, v. 18, 19. The prophet having in God's name assured him of victory over the Syrians, he will now try him and see what improvement he will make of his victories, whether he will push them on with more zeal than Ahab did when Benhadad lay at his mercy. For the trial of this he bids him smite with the arrows on the ground: Now show me what thou wilt do to them when thou hast them down. The king showed not that eagerness and flame which one might have expected upon this occasion, but smote thrice, and no more. But, by contemning the sign, he lost the thing signified, sorely to the grief of the dying prophet, who told him he should have smitten five or six times. Not being straitened in the power and promise of God, why should he be straitened in his own expectations and endeavours?

I. The sepulchre of Elisha: he died in a good old age, and they buried him. As soon as he was dead, the bands of the Moabites invaded the land—roving skulking bands, that murdered and plundered by surprise. The king was apprehensive of danger only from the Syrians, but, behold, the Moabites invade him. Elisha's dead body communicated life to another dead body, v. 21. This great miracle was a plain indication of another life after this The neighbours were carrying the dead body of a man to the grave, and, fearing to fall into the hands of the Moabites, a party of whom they saw at a distance near the place where the body was to be interred, they laid the corpse in the next convenient place, which proved to be Elisha's sepulchre. The dead man, upon touching Elisha's bones, revived, and, it is likely, went home again with his friends. Elijah was honoured in his departure. Elisha was honoured after his departure. God thus dispenses honours as he pleases, but, one way or other, the rest of all the saints will be glorious, Isa. xi. 10.

II. The sword of Joash king of Israel successful against the Syrians. 1. The cause of his success was God's favour (v. 23): The Lord was gracious to them, had compassion on them in their miseries and respect unto them. It was of the Lord's mercies that they were not consumed, because he would give them space to repent. 2. The effect of his success. He recovered out of the hands of Benhadad the cities of Israel which the Syrians were possessed of, v. 25. Thrice Joash beat the Syrians, just as often as he had struck the ground with the arrows, and then a full stop was put to the course of his victories.

CHAP. XIV

This chapter continues the history of the succession in the kingdoms both of Judah and Israel. I. In the kingdom of Judah, 1. The entire history of Amaziah's reign. (1) His good character, ver. 1–4. (2) The justice he executed on the murderers of his father, ver. 5, 6. (3) His victory over the Edomites, ver. 7. (4) His war with Joash, and his defeat in that war, ver. 8–14. (5) His fall, at last, by a conspiracy against him, ver. 17–20. 2. The beginning of the history of Azariah, ver. 21, 22. II. In the kingdom of Israel, the conclusion of the reign of Joash (ver. 15, 16), and the entire history of Jeroboam his son, the second of that name, ver. 23–29.

Verses 1–7

Amaziah, the son and successor of Joash.

I. In the temple he acted, in some measure, well, like Joash, but not like David, v. 3. He began well, but did not persevere. It is not enough to do that which our pious predecessors did, merely to keep up the usage, but we must do it as they did it, from the same principle of faith and devotion and with the same sincerity and resolution. It is here taken notice of, as before, that the high places were not taken away, v. 4.

II. On the bench we have him doing justice on the traitors that murdered his father, not as soon as ever he came to the crown, lest it should occasion some disturbance, but he prudently deferred it till the kingdom was confirmed in his hand, v. 5. The children of the murderers he slew not, because the law of Moses had expressly provided that the children should not be put to death for the fathers, v. 6.

III. In the field we find him triumphing over the Edomites, v. 7. Edom had revolted from under the hand of Judah in Joram's time, ch. viii. 22. Now he makes war upon them to bring them back to their allegiance. We shall find a larger account of this expedition, 2 Chron. xxv. 5, &c.

Verses 8–14

For several successions after the division of the kingdoms that of Judah suffered much by the enmity of Israel. After Asa's time, for several successions, it suffered more by the friendship of Israel, and by the alliance and affinity made with them. But now we meet with hostility between them again.

I. Amaziah, upon no provocation, and without showing any cause of quarrel, challenged Joash into the field (v. 8): Come, let us look one another in the face; let us try our strength in battle. Hereby he showed himself proud, presumptuous, and prodigal of blood. Some think that he had the vanity to think of subduing the kingdom of Israel, and reuniting it to Judah.

II. Joash sent him a grave rebuke for his challenge, with advice to withdraw it, v. 9, 10. 1. He mortifies his pride, by comparing himself to a cedar, a stately tree, and Amaziah to a thistle, a sorry weed, telling him he was so far from fearing him that he despised him, and scorned as much to have anything to do with him, or make any alliance with him, as the cedar would to match his daughter to a thistle. The ancient house of David he thinks not worthy to be named the same day with the house of Jehu, though an upstart. 2. He fortells his fall: A wild beast trod down the thistle, and so put an end to his treaty with the cedar; so easily does Joash think his forces can crush Amaziah. 3. He shows him the folly of his challenge. "Thou art proud of the blow thou hast given to Edom, as if that had made thee formidable to all mankind." 4. He counsels him to be content with the honour he has won, and not to hazard that, by grasping at more that was out of his reach.

III. Amaziah persisted in his resolution, and the issue was bad. 1. His army was routed and dispersed, v. 12. Josephus says, When they were to engage they were struck with such terror that they did not strike a stroke, but every one made the best of his way. 2. He himself was taken prisoner by the king of Israel, and then had enough of looking him in the face. 3. The conqueror entered Jerusalem, which tamely opened to him, and yet he broke down their wall (and, as Josephus says, drove his chariot in triumph through the breach), in reproach to them. 4. He plundered Jerusalem, took away all that was valuable, and returned to Samaria, laden with spoils, v. 14.

Here are three kings brought to their graves in these few verses:—1. Joash king of Israel, v. 15, 16. 2. Amaziah king of Judah. Fifteen years he survived his conqueror the king of Israel, v. 17. He was slain by his own subjects, who hated him for his maladministration (v. 19) and made Jerusalem too hot for him, the ignominious breach made in their walls being occasioned by his folly and presumption. He fled to Lachish. How long he continued concealed or sheltered there we are not told, but, at last, he was there murdered, v. 19. 3. Azariah succeeded Amaziah, but not till twelve years after his father's death, for he was but four years old at the death of his father, so that, for twelve years, till he came to be sixteen, the government was in the hands of protectors. He reigned very long (ch. xv. 2) and yet the account of his reign is here industriously huddled up, and broken off abruptly (v. 22): He built Elath which had belonged to the Edomites.

Verses 23–29

An account of the reign of Jeroboam the second.

I. His reign was long, the longest of all the reigns of the kings of Israel: He reigned forty-one years; yet his contemporary Azariah, the king of Judah, reigned longer, even fifty-two years. This Jeroboam reigned just as long as Asa had done (1 Kings xv. 10), yet one did that which was good and the other that which was evil. We cannot measure men's characters by the length of their lives or by their outward prosperity.

II. His character was the same with that of the rest of those kings: He did that which was evil (v. 24), for he departed not from the sins of Jeroboam; he kept up the worship of the calves. But a sin is never the less evil in God's sight for its being an ancient usage.

III. Yet he prospered more than most of them, for though, in that one thing, he did evil in the sight of the Lord, yet it is likely, in other respects, there was some good found in him and therefore God owned him, 1. By prophecy. He raised up Jonah the son of Amittai, a Galilean. It is a sign that God has not cast off his people if he continue faithful ministers among them; when Elisha, who strengthened the hands of Joash, was removed, Jonah was sent to encourage his son. It is probable that it was when he was a young man, that God sent him to Nineveh, and that he flew off and fretted as he did; and, if so, this is an undoubted evidence of the forgiveness of his faults and follies, that he was afterwards employed as a messenger of mercy to Israel. A commission amounts to a pardon. 2. By providence, The event was according to the word of the Lord: his arms were successful; he restored the coast of Israel, recovered those frontier-towns and countries that lay from Hamath in the north to the sea of the plain, v. 25. Two reasons why God blessed them with those victories:—(1) Because their distress was very great, which made them the objects of his compassion, v. 26. Those that lived in those countries which the enemies were masters of were miserably oppressed and enslaved, and the rest were much impoverished by the frequent incursions the enemy made upon them to plunder them. Let those whose case is pitiable take comfort from the divine pity: we read of God's bowels of mercy (Isa. lxiii. 15; Jer. xxxi. 20) and that he is full of compassion, Ps. lxxxvi. 15. (2) Because he had not as yet said he would blot out the name of Israel (v. 27). If this be understood of the dispersion of the ten tribes, he did say it and do it, not long after—if of the utter extirpation of the name of Israel, he never said it, nor will ever do it, for that name still remains under heaven in the gospel Israel, and will to the end of time.

IV. Here is the conclusion of Jeroboam's reign. We read (v. 28) of his might, and how he warred. Many prophets there had been in Israel, but none had left any of their prophecies in writing till those of this age began to do it, and their prophecies are part of the canon of scripture. It was in the reign of this Jeroboam that Hosea began to prophesy, and he was the first that wrote his prophecies; therefore the word of the Lord by him is called the beginning of the word of the Lord, Hos. i. 2. At the same time Amos prophesied, and wrote his prophecy, soon afterwards Micah, and then Isaiah, in the days of Ahaz and Hezekiah. Thus God never left himself without witness.

CHAP. XV

I. The history of two of the kings of Judah is briefly recorded:—1. Of Azariah, or Uzziah, ver. 1–7. 2. Of Jotham his son, ver. 32–38 II. The history of many of the kings of Israel that reigned at the same time is given in short, five in succession. 1. Zachariah, the last of the house of Jehu, reigned six months, and then was slain and succeeded by Shallum, ver. 8–12. 2. Shallum reigned one month, and then was slain and succeeded by Menahem, ver. 13–15. 3. Menahem reigned ten years, or tyrannised rather, and then died in his bed, and left his son to succeed him first, and then suffer for him, ver. 16–22. 4. Pekahiah reigned two years, and then was slain and succeeded by Pekah, ver. 23–36. 5. Pekah reigned twenty years, and then was slain and succeeded by Hoshea, the last of all the kings of Israel (ver. 27–31), for things were now hastening towards the final destruction of that kingdom.

Verses 1–7

The reign of Azariah. 1. He began young and reigned long (v. 2), did, for the most part, that which was right, v. 3, only he had not zeal and courage to take away the high places, v. 4. 2. That which is peculiar, v. 5 (that God smote him with a leprosy) is more largely related, with the occasion of it, 2. Chron. xxvi. 16, &c., where we have also a fuller account of the glories of the former part of his reign, as well as of the disgraces of the latter part of it. Here we are told, (1) That he was a leper. (2) God smote him with this leprosy, to chastise him for his presumptuous invasion of the priests' office. (3) That he was a leper to the day of his death. Though we have reason to think he repented and the sin was pardoned, yet, for warning to others, he was continued under this mark of God's displeasure. (4) That he dwelt in a separate house, as being made ceremonially unclean by the law, to the discipline of which, though a king, he must submit. (5) That his son was his viceroy in the affairs both of his court (for he was over the house) and of his kingdom (for he was judging the people of the land); and it was both a comfort to him and a blessing to his kingdom that he had such a son to fill up his room.

Verses 8–31

The best days of the kingdom of Israel were while the government was in Jehu's family. In his reign, and the next three reigns, though there were many abominable corruptions and miserable grievances in Israel, yet the crown went in succession, the kings died in their beds, and some care was taken of public affairs; but, now that those days are at an end, the history which we have in these verses of about thirty-three years represents the affairs of that kingdom in the utmost confusion imaginable.

I. These unhappy revolutions—these bad times, as they may truly be called. 1. God had tried the people of Israel both with judgments and mercies, explained and enforced by his servants the prophets, and yet they continued impenitent and unreformed, and therefore God justly brought these miseries upon them. 2. God made good his promise to Jehu, that his sons to the fourth generation after him should sit upon the throne of Israel, which was a greater favour than was shown to any of the royal families either before or after his. Thus God rewarded Jehu for his zeal in destroying the worship of Baal and the house of Ahab; and yet, when the measure of the sins of the house of Jehu was full, God avenged upon it the blood then shed, called the blood of Jezreel, Hos. i. 4. 3. All these kings did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, for they walked in the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat. Though at variance with one another, yet in this they agreed, to keep up idolatry, and the people loved to have it so. 4. Each of these (except one) conspired against his predecessor, and slew him—Shallum, Menahem, Pekah, and Hoshea, all traitors and murderers, and yet all kings awhile. One wicked man is often made a scourge to another, and every wicked man, at length, a ruin to himself. 5. The ambition of the great men made the nation miserable. Here is Tiphsah, a city of Israel, barbarously destroyed, with all the coasts thereof, by one of these pretenders (v. 16). 6. While the nation was thus shattered by divisions at home the kings of Assyria, first one (v. 19) and then another (v. 29), came against it and did what they pleased. 7. This was the condition of Israel just before they were quite ruined and carried away captive, for that was in the ninth year of Hoshea, the last of these usurpers. If they had, in these days of confusion and perplexity, humbled themselves before God and sought his face, that final destruction might have been prevented.

II. A short view of the particular reigns.

1. Zachariah, the son of Jeroboam, began to reign in the thirty-eighth year of Azariah, or Uzziah, king of Judah, v. 8. Some of the most critical chronologers reckon that between Jeroboam and his son Zachariah the throne was vacant twenty-two years through the disturbances and dissensions that were in the kingdom. Zachariah was deposed before he was well seated on the throne: he reigned but six months, and then Shallum slew him before the people, with the approbation of the people, to whom he had, some way or other, made himself odious; so ended the line of Jehu.

2. But had Shallum peace, who slew his master? No, he had not (v. 13), one month of days measured his reign and then he was cut off. Menaham, either provoked by his crime or animated by his example, soon served him as he had served his master—slew him and reigned in his stead, v. 14.

3. Menaham held the kingdom ten years, v. 17. He was so prodigiously cruel to those of his own nation who hesitated a little at submitting to him that he not only ruined a city, but ripped up all the women with child, v. 16. By these cruel methods he hoped to frighten all others into his interests; but when the king of Assyria came against him, (1) So little confidence had he in his people that he durst not meet him as an enemy, but was obliged, at a vast expense, to purchase a peace with him. (2) Such need had he of help to confirm the kingdom in his hand that he made it part of his bargain that he should assist him against his own subjects that were disaffected to him. Thus he got clear of the king of Assyria for this time; but his army now got so rich a booty with so little trouble that it encouraged them to come again, not long after, when they laid all waste.

4. Pekahiah, the son of Menahem, succeeded his father, but reigned only two years, and then was treacherously slain by Pekah.

5. Pekah, though he got the kingdom by treason, kept it twenty years (v. 27), so long it was before his violent dealing returned upon his own head, but it returned at last. This Pekah, son of Remaliah, (1) Made himself more considerable abroad than any of these usurpers, for he was a great terror to the kingdom of Judah, as we find, Isa. vii. 1, &c. (2) He lost a great part of his kingdom to the king of Assyria. By this judgment God punished him for his attempt upon Judah and Jerusalem. (3) Soon after this he forfeited his life to the resentments of his countrymen, who, it is probable, were disgusted at him for leaving them exposed to a foreign enemy, while he was invading Judah, of which Hoshea took advantage and, to gain his crown, seized his life, slew him, and reigned in his stead. Surely he was fond of a crown indeed who, at this time, would run such a hazard as a traitor did—a crown which a wise man would not have taken up in the street, yet Hoshea not only ventured upon it but ventured for it, and it cost him dear.

Verses 32–38

A short account of the reign of Jotham king of Judah, of whom we are told, 1. That he reigned very well, did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, v. 34. Josephus gives him a very high character, stating that he was pious towards God, just towards men, and laid out himself for the public good. Though the high places were not taken away, yet to draw people from them, and keep them close to God's holy place, he showed great respect to the temple, and built the higher gate to the temple. If magistrates cannot do all they would for the suppressing of vice and profaneness, let them do so much the more for the support and advancement of piety and virtue. If they cannot pull down the high places of sin, yet let them build and beautify the high gate of God's house. 2. That he died in the midst of his days, v. 33. By these accounts it appears that there was none of all the kings of Judah that reached David's age, seventy, the common age of man. Asa's age I do not find. Uzziah lived to be sixty-eight, Manasseh sixty-seven, and Jehoshaphat sixty; and these were the three oldest; many of those that were of note did not reach fifty. This Jotham died at forty-one. 3. That in his days the confederacy was formed against Judah by Rezin and Remaliah's son, the king of Syria and the king of Israel, which appeared so very formidable in the beginning of the reign of Ahaz that, upon notice of it, the heart of that prince was moved and the heart of the people, as the trees of the wood are moved with the wind, Isa. vii. 2.

CHAP. XVI

The reign of Ahaz. I. He was a notorious idolater, ver. 1–4. II. With the treasures of the temple, as well as his own, he hired the king of Assyria to invade Syria and Israel, ver. 5–9. III. He took pattern from an idol's altar which he saw at Damascus for a new altar in God's temple, ver. 10–16. IV. He abused and embezzled the furniture of the temple, ver. 17, 18.

Verses 1–4

A general character of the reign of Ahaz. 1. He did not that which was right like David (v. 2). He had no love for the temple, made no conscience of his duty to God, nor had any regard to his law. He was a reproach to that honourable name and family, which therefore was really a reproach to him. 2. He walked in the way of the kings of Israel (v. 3), who all worshipped the calves. The kings of Israel pleaded policy and reasons of state for their idolatry, but Ahaz had no such pretence. They were his enemies, and had proved enemies to themselves too by their idolatry; yet he walked in their way. 3. He made his sons to pass through the fire, to the honour of his dunghill-deities. He burnt them (2 Chron. xxviii. 3), and made others pass between two fires, or to be drawn through a flame, in token of their dedication to the idol. 4. He did according to the abominations of the heathen whom the Lord had cast out. 5. He sacrificed in the high places, v. 4. If his father had but had zeal enough to take them away, the debauching of his sons might have been prevented; but those that connive at sin know not what dangerous snares they lay for those that come after them.

Verses 5–9

1. The attempt of his confederate neighbours, the kings of Syria and Israel, upon him. They thought to make themselves masters of Jerusalem, and to set a king of their own in it, Isa. vii. 6. In this they fell short, but the king of Syria recovered Elath, a considerable port upon the Red Sea, which Amaziah had taken from the Syrians, ch. xiv. 22. 2. His project to get clear of them. Having forsaken God, he had neither courage nor strength to make head against his enemies, nor could he, with any boldness, ask help of God; but he made his court to the king of Assyria, and got him to come in for his relief. The sin itself was its own punishment; for, though it is true that he gained his point the king of Assyria hearkened to him, and, to serve his own turn, made a descent upon Damascus, whereby he gave a powerful diversion to the king of Syria (v. 9), and obliged him to let fall his design against Ahaz, carrying the Syrians captive to Kir, yet, considering all, he made but a bad bargain; for, to compass this, (1) He enslaved himself (v. 7): I am thy servant and thy son. (2) He impoverished himself; for he took the silver and gold that were laid up in the treasury both of the temple and of the kingdom, and sent it to the king of Assyria, v. 8. I know not what authority he had thus to dispose of the public stock; but it is common for those that have brought themselves into straits by one sin to help themselves out by another.

Verses 10–16

Though Ahaz had himself sacrificed in high places (v. 4), yet God's altar had hitherto continued in its place and in use, but here we have it taken away by wicked Ahaz, and another altar, an idolatrous one, put in the room of it.

I. The model of this new altar, taken from one at Damascus, by the king himself, v. 10. The king of Assyria having taken Damascus, thither Ahaz went, to congratulate him and to receive his commands. At Damascus he saw an altar that pleased his fancy extremely. He must have an altar just like this: a pattern of it must be taken immediately.

II. The making of it by Urijah the priest, v. 11. Whatever pretence he had, it was a most base wicked thing for him that was a chief priest to make this altar, in compliance with an idolatrous prince, for hereby, 1. He prostituted his authority and profaned the crown of his priesthood, making himself a servant to the lusts of men. 2. He betrayed his trust.

III. The dedicating of it. Urijah set it near the brazen altar. The king was exceedingly pleased with it and offered thereon his burnt-offering, &c., v. 12, 13. His sacrifices were not offered to the God of Israel, but to the gods of Damascus.

IV. The removal of God's altar, to make room for it. Ahaz removed God's altar to an obscure corner in the north side of the court, and put his own before the sanctuary, in the place of it. His superstitious invention, at first, jostled with God's sacred institution, but at length jostled it out. Those will soon come to make nothing of God that will not be content to make him their all. Ahaz durst not quite demolish the brazen altar. He pretends to advance it above its institution. The altar was never designed for an oracle, yet Ahaz will have it for that use. The Jews say that, afterwards, of the brass of it he made that famous dial which was called the dial of Ahaz, ch. xx. 11.

Here is, I. Ahaz abusing the temple, not the building itself, but some of the furniture of it. 1. He defaced the bases on which the lavers were set (1 Kings vii. 28, 29) and took down the molten sea, v. 17. These the priests used for washing. 2. He removed the covert for the sabbath, erected either in honour of the sabbath or for the convenience of the priests, when, on the sabbath, they officiated in greater numbers than on other days. 3. The king's entry, which led to the house of the Lord, for the convenience of the royal family (perhaps that ascent which Solomon had made, and which the queen of Sheba admired, 1 Kings x. 5), he turned another way, to show that he did not intend to frequent the house of the Lord any more.

II. Ahaz resigning his life in the midst of his days, at thirty-six years of age (v. 19) and leaving his kingdom to a better man, Hezekiah his son (v. 20), who proved as much a friend to the temple as he had been an enemy to it.

CHAP. XVII

An account of the captivity of the ten tribes finishes the history of that kingdom, after it had continued about 265 years, from the setting up of Jeroboam the son of Nebat. I. A short narrative of this destruction, ver. 1–6. II. Remarks upon it, and the causes of it, ver. 7–23. III. An account of the nations which succeeded them in the possession of their land, and the mongrel religion set up among them, ver. 24–41.

Verses 1–6

The reign and ruin of Hoshea, the last of the kings of Israel, concerning whom observe,

I. That though he forced his way to the crown by treason and murder (as we read ch. xv. 30), yet he gained not the possession of it till seven or eight years after.

II. That, though he was bad, yet not so bad as the kings of Israel had been before him (v. 2), not so devoted to the calves as they had been. And some say that this Hoshea took off the embargo which the former kings had put their subjects under, forbidding them to go up to Jerusalem to worship. But what shall we think of this dispensation of providence, that the destruction of the kingdom of Israel should come in the reign of one of the best of its kings? If Hoshea was not so bad as the former kings, yet the people were as bad as those that went before them. Their king gave them leave to do better, but they did as bad as ever, which laid the blame of their sin and ruin wholly upon themselves.

III. That the destruction came gradually.

IV. That they brought it upon themselves by the indirect course they took to shake off the yoke of the king of Assyria, v. 4. Had the king and the people of Israel applied to God, made their peace with him and their prayers to him, they might have recovered their liberty, ease, and honour; but they withheld their tribute, and trusted to the king of Egypt to assist them in their revolt, which, if it had taken effect, would have been but to change their oppressors. But Egypt became to them the staff of a broken reed.

V. That it was an utter destruction that came upon them. 1. The king of Israel was made a prisoner. 2. The land of Israel was made a prey. The army of the king of Assyria treated the people as traitors to be punished with the sword of justice rather than as fair enemies. 3. The royal city of Israel was besieged, and at length taken. Three years it held out after the country was conquered. 4. The people of Israel were carried captives into Assyria, v. 6. The generality of the people, those that were of any note, were forced away into the conqueror's country, to be slaves and beggars there. Those that forgot God were themselves forgotten. Many of the meaner sort of people were left behind, many of every tribe, who either went over to Judah or became subject to the Assyrian colonies, and their posterity were Galileans or Samaritans. But thus ended Israel as a nation; now they became Lo-ammi—not a people, and Lo-ruhamah—unpitied. James writes to the twelve tribes scattered abroad (James i. 1) and Paul speaks of the twelve tribes which instantly served God day and night (Acts xxvi. 7); so that though we never read of those that were carried captive, yet a remnant of them did escape, to keep up the name of Israel, till it came to be worn by the gospel church, the spiritual Israel, in which it will ever remain, Gal. vi. 16.

The destruction of the kingdom of the ten tribes and the reasons of it assigned. 1. It was the Lord that removed Israel out of his sight; whoever were the instruments, he was the author of this calamity. It was destruction from the Almighty; the Assyrian was but the rod of his anger, Isa. x. 5. But why would God ruin a people that were raised and incorporated, as Israel was, by miracles and oracles? Was it purely an act of sovereignty? No, it was an act of necessary justice. For, 2. They provoked him to do this by their wickedness. Was it God's doing? Nay, it was their own; by their way and their doings they procured all this to themselves, and it was their own wickedness that did correct them. This is here very movingly laid open as the cause of all the desolations of Israel.

I. What God had done for Israel, to engage them to serve him. 1. He gave them their liberty (v. 7). Thus they were bound in duty and gratitude to be his servants, for he had loosed their bonds; nor would he that rescued them out of the hand of the king of Egypt have contradicted himself so far as to deliver them into the hand of the king of Assyria, as he did, if they had not, by their iniquity, betrayed their liberty and sold themselves. 2. He gave them their law, and was himself their king. They could not plead ignorance of good and evil, sin and duty. 3. He gave them their land, for he cast out the heathen from before them (v. 8), to make room for them; and the casting out of them for their idolatries was as fair a warning as could be given to Israel not to do like them.

II. What they had done against God, notwithstanding these engagements which he had laid upon them. 1. They sinned against the Lord their God (v. 7), they did those things that were not right (v. 9), but secretly. They sold themselves to do evil in the sight of the Lord, that is, they wholly addicted themselves to sin, as slaves to the service of those to whom they are sold, and, by their obstinately persisting in sin, so hardened their own hearts that at length it had become morally impossible for them to recover themselves. Though they were guilty of many immoralities, and violated all the commands of the second table, yet nothing is here specified but their idolatry. This was the sin that did most easily beset them; this was, of all sins, most provoking to God: it was the spiritual adultery that broke the marriage-covenant, and was the inlet of all other wickedness. They feared other gods (v. 7), that is, worshipped them and paid their homage to them, as if they feared their displeasure. They built themselves high places in all their cities, v. 9. If in any place there was but the tower of the watchmen (a country town that had no walls, but only a tower to shelter the watch in time of danger), or but a lodge for shepherds, it must be honoured with a high place, and that with an altar. If there was a fenced city, it must be further fortified with a high place. They set them up images and groves—Asherim (even wooden images, so some think the term, which we translate groves, should be rendered) or Ashtaroth (so others)—directly contrary to the second commandment, v. 10. They served idols (v. 12), the works of their own hands. They burnt incense in all the high places, to the honour of strange gods, for it was to the dishonour of the true God, v. 11. Besides the molten images, even the two calves, they worshipped all the host of heaven—the sun, moon, and stars. They used divinations and enchantments, that they might receive directions from the gods.

III. What means God used with them, to bring them off from their idolatries, and to how little purpose. Though they had forsaken God's family of priests, he did not leave them without a succession of prophets, who made it their business to teach them the good knowledge of the Lord, but all in vain (v. 14).

IV. How God punished them for their sins. He was very angry with them (v. 18). He afflicted them (v. 20) and delivered them into the hand of spoilers, in the days of the judges and of Saul, and afterwards in the days of most of their kings, to see if they would be awakened by the judgments of God to consider and amend their ways; but, when all these corrections did not prevail to drive out the folly, God first rent Israel from the house of David, under which they might have been happy.

Lastly, Here is a complaint against Judah in the midst of all (v. 19): Also Judah kept not the commandments of God: though they were not as yet quite so bad as Israel, yet Israel communicated the infection to Judah.

When the children of Israel were dispossessed, and turned out of Canaan, the king of Assyria soon transplanted thither the supernumeraries of his own country, who should be servants to him and masters to the Israelites that remained: and here we have an account of these new inhabitants.

I. Concerning the Assyrians that were brought into the land of Israel we are here told, 1. That they possessed Samaria and dwelt in the cities thereof, v. 24. 2. That at their first coming God sent lions among them. They were probably insufficient to people the country, which occasioned the beasts of the field to multiply against them (Exod. xxiii. 29); yet, besides the natural cause, there was a manifest hand of God in it. God ordered them this rough welcome to check their pride. 3. That they sent a remonstrance of this grievance to the king their master, setting forth, it is likely, the loss their infant colony had sustained by the lions and the continual fear they were in of them, and stating that they looked upon it to be a judgment upon them for not worshipping the God of the land, which they could not, because they knew not how, v. 26. Herein they shamed the Israelites, who were not so ready to hear the voice of God's judgments as they were. Assyrians begged to be taught that which Israelites hated to be taught. 4. That the king of Assyria took care to have them taught the manner of the God of the land (v. 27, 28), not out of any affection to that God, but to save his subjects from the lions. He sent back one of the priests of the calves, and he came and dwelt among them, to teach them how they should fear the Lord. Being thus taught, they made a mongrel religion of it, worshipped the God of Israel for fear and their own idols for love (v. 33): They feared the Lord, but they served their own gods. If we may credit the traditions of the Jewish doctors, they tell us that Succoth-Benoth was worshipped in a hen and chickens, Nergal in a cock, Ashima in a smooth goat, Nibhaz in a dog, Tartak in an ass, Adrammelech in a peacock, Anammelech in a pheasant. Our own tell us, more probably, that Succoth-Benoth (signifying the tents of the daughters) was Venus. Nergal, being worshipped by the Cuthites, or Persians, was the fire. Adrammelech and Anammelech were only distinctions of Moloch. This medley superstition is here said to continue unto this day (v. 41), till the time when this book was written and long after, above 300 years in all, till the time of Alexander the Great, when Manasse drew over many of the Jews to him, and prevailed with the Samaritans to cast away all their idols and to worship the God of Israel only.

II. Concerning the Israelites that were carried into the land of Assyria. When the two tribes were afterwards carried into Babylon, they were cured by it of their idolatry, and therefore, after seventy years, they were brought back with joy; but the ten tribes were hardened in the furnace and therefore were justly lost in it and left to perish. When they were in the hand of their enemies, and stood in need of deliverance, they were so stupid that they did after the former manner (v. 40), they served both the true God and false gods, as if they knew no difference. Ephraim is joined to idols, let him alone. So they did, and so did the nations that succeeded them.

CHAP. XVIII

When the prophet had condemned Ephraim for lies and deceit he comforted himself that Judah yet "ruled with God, and was faithful with the Most Holy," Hos. xi. 12. This chapter shows us the affairs of Judah in a good posture, that it may appear God has not quite cast off the seed of Abraham, Rom xi 1. Hezekiah is here upon the throne, I. Reforming his kingdom, ver 1–6. II. Prospering in all his undertakings (ver 7, 8), and this at the same time when the ten tribes were led captive, ver 9–12. III. Yet invaded by Sennacherib, the king of Assyria, ver. 13. 1 His country put under contribution, ver. 14–16. 2. Jerusalem besieged, ver. 17. 3. God blasphemed, himself reviled, and his people solicited to revolt, in a virulent speech made by Rabshakeh, ver. 18–37. But how well it ended, and how much to the honour and comfort of our great reformer, we shall find in the next chapter.

Verses 1–8

A general account of the reign of Hezekiah.

I. His great piety, which was the more wonderful because his father was one of the worst of the kings, yet he was one of the best. What good there is in any is not of nature, but of grace, which, contrary to nature, grafts into the good olive that which was wild by nature (Rom. xi. 24), and also that grace gets over the greatest difficulties and disadvantages. Ahaz, it is likely, gave his son a bad education as well as a bad example; Urijah his priest perhaps had the tuition of him; his attendants and companions were such as were addicted to idolatry; and yet Hezekiah became eminently good. When God's grace will work what can hinder it?

1. He was a genuine son of David (v. 3): He did that which was right, according to all that David his father did. Hezekiah was a second David, had such a love for God's word, and God's house, as he had. Let us not be frightened with an apprehension of the continual decay of virtue, as if, when times and men are bad, they must needs, of course, grow worse and worse; that does not follow, for, after many bad kings, God raised up one that was like David himself.

2. He was a zealous reformer of his kingdom (2 Chron. xxix. 3). He found his kingdom very corrupt, the people in all things superstitious. They had always been so, but in the last reign worse than ever. Idolatry had overspread the land; his spirit was stirred against this idolatry and therefore, as soon as ever he had power in his hands, he set himself to abolish it (v. 4). (1) The images and the groves were idolatrous. These he broke and destroyed. (2) The high places, though they had sometimes been used by the prophets upon special occasions and had been hitherto connived at by the good kings, were nevertheless an affront to the temple and gave opportunity for the introducing of idolatrous usages. Hezekiah, therefore, who made God's word his rule, not the example of his predecessors, removed them, made a law for the removal of them, which law was put in execution with vigour. (3) The brazen serpent was originally of divine institution, and yet, because it had been abused to idolatry, he broke it to pieces. It seems, it had been carefully preserved, as a memorial of God's goodness to their fathers in the wilderness, Num. xxi. 9. But when they began to worship the creature more than the Creator, those that would not worship images borrowed from the heathen were drawn in by the tempter to burn incense to the brazen serpent, because that was made by order from God himself and had been an instrument of good to them. But Hezekiah, in his pious zeal for God's honour, not only forbade the people to worship it, but, that it might never be so abused any more, he showed the people that it was Nehushtan, nothing else but a piece of brass, and that therefore it was an idle wicked thing to burn incense to it; he then broke it to pieces. If any think that the just honour of the brazen serpent was hereby diminished they will find it abundantly made up again, John iii. 14, where our Saviour makes it a type of himself.

3. Two things he was eminent for in his reformation: (1) Courage and confidence in God. In abolishing idolatry, there was danger of disobliging his subjects, and provoking them to rebel; but he trusted in the Lord God of Israel to bear him out in what he did and save him from harm. (2) Constancy and perseverance in his duty.

II. His great prosperity, v. 7, 8. He was with God, and then God was with him. Finding himself successful, 1. He threw off the yoke of the king of Assyria, which his father had basely submitted to. When he had thrown out the idolatry of the nations he might well throw off the yoke of their oppression. 2. He made a vigorous attack upon the Philistines, and smote them even unto Gaza.

The kingdom of Assyria had now grown considerable.

I. Of the success of Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, against Israel, his besieging Samaria (v. 9), taking it (v. 10), and carrying the people into captivity (v. 11), with the reason why God brought this judgment upon them (v. 12): Because they obeyed not the voice of the Lord their God. This was related in the foregoing chapter, but it is here repeated, 1. As that which stirred up Hezekiah and his people to purge out idolatry, because they saw the ruin which it brought upon Israel. 2. As that which Hezekiah much lamented, but had not strength to prevent. Though the ten tribes had revolted from the house of David, yet being of the seed of Israel he could not be glad at their calamities. 3. As that which laid Hezekiah and his kingdom open to the king of Assyria, and made it much more easy for him to invade the land.

II. Of the attempt of Sennacherib, the succeeding king of Assyria, against Judah. The descent he made upon Judah was a great calamity to that kingdom, by which God would try the faith of Hezekiah and chastise the people, because they did not willingly part with their idols, but kept them up in their hearts. Even times of reformation may prove troublesome times and then the blame is laid upon the reformers. This calamity will appear great upon Hezekiah if we consider, 1. How much he lost of his country, v. 13. The king of Assyria took all or most of the fenced cities of Judah, the frontier-towns and the garrisons. 2. How dearly he paid for his peace. He saw Jerusalem itself in danger of falling into the enemies' hand, and was willing to purchase its safety at the expense, (1) Of a mean submission (v. 14). Where was Hezekiah's courage? Where his confidence in God? (2) Of a vast sum of money—300 talents of silver and thirty of gold to be paid as a present ransom. To raise this sum, he was forced not only to empty the public treasures (v. 15), but to take the golden plates off from the doors of the temple, and from the pillars, v. 16. Though the temple sanctified the gold yet, the necessity being urgent, he thought he might make as bold with that as his father David did with the shew-bread. His father Ahaz had plundered the temple in contempt of it, 2 Chron. xxviii. 24. He had repaid with interest what his father took; and now, with all due reverence, he only begged leave to borrow it in an exigency and for a greater good.

I. Jerusalem besieged by Sennacherib's army, v. 17. He sent three of his great generals with a great host against Jerusalem. Is this the great king, the king of Assyria? Let him never be named with honour that could do such a dishonourable thing as this, to take Hezekiah's money, which he gave him upon condition he should withdraw his army, and then to advance against his capital city.

II. Hezekiah, and his princes and people, railed upon by Rabshakeh, the chief speaker of the three generals, and one that had the most satirical genius. He was instructed what to say by Sennacherib, who intended to pick a new quarrel with Hezekiah. He had promised, upon the receipt of Hezekiah's money, to withdraw his army, and therefore could not for shame make a forcible attack upon Jerusalem immediately; but he sent Rabshakeh to persuade Hezekiah to surrender it, and, if he should refuse, to besiege it, and to take it by storm. Rabshakeh had the impudence to desire audience of the king himself at the conduit of the upper pool, without the walls; but Hezekiah had the prudence to decline a personal treaty, and sent three commissioners to hear what he had to say. One interruption they gave him in his discourse, which was only to desire that he would speak to them now in the Syrian language, and they would consider what he said and report it to the king, and, if they did not give him a satisfactory answer, then he might appear to the people, by speaking in the Jews' language, v. 26. Hilkiah did not consider what an unreasonable man he had to deal with, else he would not have made this request, for it did but exasperate Rabshakeh, v. 27. Against all the rules of decency and honour he menaces the soldiery, persuades them to desert or mutiny, threatens if they hold out to reduce them to the last extremities of famine, and then goes on to persuade Hezekiah, and his princes and people, to surrender the city.

1. He magnifies his master the king of Assyria. Once and again he calls him, That great king, the king of Assyria, v. 19, 28. But to those who by faith see the King of Kings in his power and glory even the king of Assyria looks mean and little. Ps. lxxxii. 6, 7.

2. He endeavours to make them believe that it will be much for their advantage to surrender. If they would capitulate, seek his favour with a present and cast themselves upon his mercy, he would give them very good treatment, v. 31. If they would surrender upon discretion, though they must expect to be prisoners and captives, yet it would really be happy for them to be so. (1) Their imprisonment would be to their advantage, for they should eat every man of his own vine (v. 31); though the property of their estates would be vested in the conquerors, yet they should have the free use of them. (2) Their captivity would be much more to their advantage: I will take you away to a land like your own land; and what the better would they be for that, when they must have nothing in it to call their own?

3. That which he aims at especially is to convince them that it is to no purpose for them to stand out: What confidence is this wherein thou trustest? v. 19. To the people he says (v. 29), "Let not Hezekiah deceive you into your own ruin, for he shall not be able to deliver you; you must either bend or break." Three things he supposes Hezekiah might trust to, and he endeavours to make out the insufficiency of these:—(1) His own military preparations: Thou sayest, I have counsel and strength for the war; and we find that so he had, 2 Chron. xxxii. 3. But this Rabshakeh turns off with a slight. With the greatest haughtiness he challenges him to produce 2,000 men that know how to manage a horse, and will venture to give him 2,000 horses if he can. He falsely insinuates that Hezekiah has no men fit to be soldiers, v. 23. (2) His alliance with Egypt. He supposes that Hezekiah trusts to Egypt for chariots and horsemen (v. 24), because the king of Israel had done so, and of this confidence he truly says, It is a broken reed (v. 21), it will not only fail a man when he leans on it, but it will run into his hand and pierce it, Ezek. xxix. 6, 7. So is the king of Egypt, says he. (3) His interest in God, v. 22. He supported himself by depending on the power and promise of God; with this he encouraged himself and his people (v. 30): The Lord will surely deliver us, and again, v. 32. This Rabshakeh was sensible was their great stay, and therefore his endeavours to shake this, as David's enemies, who used all the arts they had to drive him from his confidence in God (Ps. iii. 2; xi. 1), and thus did Christ's enemies, Matt. xxvii. 43. Three things Rabshakeh suggested to discourage their confidence in God, [1] That Hezekiah had forfeited God's protection, and thrown himself out of it, by destroying the high places and the altars, v. 22. Here he measures the God of Israel by the gods of the heathen, who delighted in the multitude of altars and temples, and concludes that Hezekiah has given a great offence to the God of Israel, in confining his people to one altar. [2] That God had given orders for the destruction of Jerusalem at this time (v. 25): Have I now come up without the lord? This is all banter and rhodomontade. He made this pretence to terrify the people that were on the wall. [3] That if Jehovah, the God of Israel, should undertake to protect them from the king of Assyria, yet he was not able to do it. With this blasphemy he concluded his speech (v. 33–35). See here, First, His pride. When he conquered a city he reckoned himself to have conquered its gods, and valued himself mightily upon it. Secondly, His profaneness. The God of Israel was not a local deity, but the God of the whole earth. The tradition of the Jews is that Rabshakeh was an apostate Jew, which made him so ready in the Jews' language; if so, his ignorance of the God of Israel was the less excusable and his enmity the less strange, for apostates are commonly the most bitter and spiteful enemies, witness Julian.

Lastly, We are told what the commissioners on Hezekiah's part did. 1. They held their peace, not for want of something to say both on God's behalf and Hezekiah's. But the king had commanded them not to answer him, and they observed their instructions. 2. They rent their clothes in detestation of his blasphemy and in grief for the despised afflicted condition of Jerusalem, the reproach of which was a burden to them. 3. They faithfully reported the matter to the king, their master, and told him the words of Rabshakeh.

CHAP. XIX

Jerusalem just ready to be swallowed up by the Assyrian army. An account of its glorious deliverance, not by sword or bow, but by prayer and prophecy, and by the hand of an angel. I. Hezekiah, in great concern, sent to the prophet Isaiah, to desire his prayers (ver. 1–5) and received from him an answer of peace, ver. 6, 7. II. Sennacherib sent a letter to Hezekiah to frighten him into a surrender, ver. 8–13. III. Hezekiah thereupon, by a very solemn prayer, recommended his case to God, the righteous Judge, and begged help from him, ver. 14–19. IV. God, by Isaiah, sent him a very comfortable message, assuring him of deliverance, ver. 20–34. V. The army of the Assyrians was all cut off by an angel and Sennacherib himself slain by his own sons, ver. 35–37. And so God glorified himself and saved his people.

Verses 1–7

The contents of Rabshakeh's speech brought to Hezekiah.

I. Hezekiah discovered a deep concern at the dishonour done to God by Rabshakeh's blasphemy. When he heard it he rent his clothes and covered himself with sackcloth, v. 1. Royal robes are not too good to be rent, nor royal flesh too good to be clothed with sackcloth, in humiliation for indignities done to God and for the perils and terrors of his Jerusalem. The king was in sackcloth, but many of his subjects were in soft clothing.

II. He went up to the house of the Lord, to meditate and pray. He was not considering what answer to return to Rabshakeh, but refers the matter to God. "Thou shalt answer, Lord, for me."

III. He sent to the prophet Isaiah, by honourable messengers, to desire his prayers, v. 2–4. Eliakim and Shebna were two of those that had heard the words of Rabshakeh and were able to acquaint Isaiah with the case. The messengers were to go in sackcloth, because they were to represent the king, who was so clothed.

1. Their errand to Isaiah was, "Lift up thy prayer for the remnant that is left, that is, for Judah, which is but a remnant now that the ten tribes are gone—for Jerusalem, which is but a remnant now that the defenced cities of Judah are taken." When we desire the prayers of others for us we must not think we are excused from praying for ourselves. When Hezekiah sent to Isaiah to pray for him he himself went into the house of the Lord to offer up his own prayers. When the interests of God's church are brought very low, so that there is but a remnant left, then it is time to lift up our prayer for that remnant.

2. Two things are urged to Isaiah, to engage his prayers for them:—(1) Their fears of the enemy (v. 3). "We are ready to perish; if thou canst do anything, have compassion upon us and help us." (2) Their hopes in God. To him they look, on him they depend, to appear for them. "He has heard and known the blasphemous words of Rabshakeh, and therefore, it may be, he will hear and rebuke them. We hope he will. Help us with thy prayers to bring the cause before him, and then we are content to leave it with him."

IV. God, by Isaiah, sent to Hezekiah, to assure him that he would glorify himself in the ruin of the Assyrians. Hezekiah sent to Isaiah, not to enquire concerning the event, but to desire his assistance in his duty. He encouraged Hezekiah, who was much dismayed: Be not afraid of the words which thou hast heard; they are but words (though swelling and fiery words), and words are but wind. He promised to frighten the king of Assyria worse than Rabshakeh had frightened him: "I will send a blast upon him" (that pestilential breath which killed his army).

under the command of the other generals, and went to the king for further orders. He found him besieging Libnah, a city that had revolted from Judah, ch. viii. 22. However, he was now alarmed with the rumour that the king of the Cushites, who bordered upon the Arabians, was coming out against him with a great army, v. 9. This made him very desirous to gain Jerusalem with all speed. To take it by force would cost him more time and men than he could well spare, and therefore he renewed his attack upon Hezekiah to persuade him tamely to surrender it.

I. Sennacherib sent a letter to Hezekiah, a railing letter, a blasphemous letter, to persuade him to surrender Jerusalem, "Let not thy God deceive thee," v. 10. To terrify Hezekiah, and drive him from his anchor, he magnifies himself and his own achievements. How proudly he boasts, 1. Of the lands he had conquered (v. 11): All lands, and destroyed utterly! So far was he from destroying all lands that at this time the land of Cush, and Tirhakah its king, were a terror to him. 2. Of the gods he had conquered, v. 12. 3. Of the kings he had conquered (v. 13), the king of Hamath and the king of Arpad. Whether he means the prince or the idol, he means to make himself appear greater than either.

II. Hezekiah was not so haughty as not to receive the letter. When he had read it he was not in such a passion as to write an answer to it in the same provoking language; but he immediately went up to the temple, presented himself, and then spread the letter before the Lord (v. 14); not as if God needed to have the letter shown to him, but hereby he signified that he acknowledged God in all his ways. In the prayer which Hezekiah prayed over this letter, 1. He adores the God whom Sennacherib had blasphemed (v. 15), calls him the God of Israel, because Israel was his peculiar people, and the God that dwelt between the cherubim, because there was the peculiar residence of his glory upon earth; but he gives glory to him as the God of the whole earth, and not, as Sennacherib fancied him to be, the God of Israel only, and confined to the temple. 2. He appeals to God concerning the insolence and profaneness of Sennacherib (v. 16). 3. He owns Sennacherib's triumphs over the gods of the heathen, but distinguishes between them and the God of Israel (v. 17, 18): He has indeed cast their gods into the fire; for they were no gods. 4. He prays that God will now glorify himself in the defeat of Sennacherib and the deliverance of Jerusalem out of his hands (v. 19): "Now therefore save us; and let all the world know, and be made to confess, that thou art the Lord God, the self-existent sovereign God, even thou only, and that all pretenders are vanity and a lie."

The gracious answer which God gave to Hezekiah's prayer. In general, God assured him that his prayer was heard, his prayer against Sennacherib, v. 20.

I. Confusion and shame to Sennacherib and his forces. It is here foretold that he should be humbled and broken. Sennacherib is here represented,

1. As the scorn of Jerusalem, v. 21. He thought himself the terror of the daughter of Zion, that chaste and beautiful virgin, and that by his threats he could force her to submit to him: "But, being a virgin in her Father's house and under his protection, she defies thee, despises thee, laughs thee to scorn. Thy impotent malice is ridiculous; he that sits in heaven laughs at thee, and therefore so do those that abide under his shadow." By this word God intended to silence the fears of Hezekiah and his people.

2. As an enemy to God. Hezekiah pleaded this: "Lord, he has reproached thee," v. 16. "He has," saith God, "and I take it as against myself (v. 22): Whom hast thou reproached? Is it not the Holy One of Israel, whose honour is dear to him, and who has power to vindicate it, which the gods of the heathen have not?"

3. As a proud vainglorious fool, that spoke great swelling words of vanity, and boasted of a false gift, by his boasts, as well as by his threats, reproaching the Lord. For, (1) He magnified his own achievements out of measure (v. 23, 24): Thou hast said so and so. What a mighty figure does Sennacherib think he makes! Driving his chariots to the tops of the highest mountains, forcing his way through woods and rivers, breaking through all difficulties, making himself master of all he had a mind to. (2) He took to himself the glory of doing these great things, whereas they were all the Lord's doing, v. 25, 26. And as for the desolations thou hast made in the earth, and particularly in Judah, thou art but the instrument in God's hand, a mere tool: it is I that have brought it to pass. Sennacherib's boasts here are expounded in Isa. x. 13, 14, By the strength of my hand I have done it, and by my wisdom, &c.; and they are answered (v. 15), Shall the axe boast itself against him that heweth therewith?

4. As under the check and rebuke of that God whom he blasphemed. All his motions were, (1) Under the divine cognizance (v. 27): "I know thy abode, and what thou dost secretly devise and design, the noise and bluster thou makest: I know it all." (2) Under the divine control (v. 28): "I will put my hook in thy nose, thou great Leviathan (Job xli. 1, 2), my bridle in thy jaws, thou great Behemoth. I will restrain thee, manage thee, turn thee where I please, send thee home like a fool as thou camest."

II. Salvation and joy to Hezekiah and his people. This shall be a sign to them of God's favour, and that he is reconciled to them, and his anger is turned away (Isa. xii. 1), that a good issue shall be put to their present distress.

1. Provisions were scarce and dear; and what should they do for food? The fruits of the earth were devoured by the Assyrian army, Isa. xxxii. 9, 10, &c. Why, they shall not only dwell in the land, but verily they shall be fed. "Eat you this year that which groweth of itself, and you shall reap what you did not sow." But the next year was the sabbatical year, when the land was to rest, and they must neither sow nor reap. What must they do that year? Why, Jehovah-jireh—The Lord will provide. And then, the third year, their husbandry should return into its former channel, and they should sow and reap as they used to do. 2. The country was laid waste, families were broken up and scattered, and all was in confusion; how should it be otherwise when it was over-run by such an army? As to this, it is promised that the remnant that has escaped of the house of Judah shall yet again be planted in their own habitations, shall increase and grow rich, v. 30. See how their prosperity is described: it is taking root downwards, and bearing fruit upwards. Such is the prosperity of the soul: it is taking root downwards by faith in Christ, and then being fruitful in fruits of righteousness. 3. The city was shut up, none went out or came in; but now the remnant in Jerusalem and Zion shall go forth freely, and there shall be none to hinder them, or make them afraid, v. 31. Great destruction had been made both in city and country, but in both there was a remnant that escaped, which typified the saved remnant of Israelites indeed (as appears by comparing Isa. x. 22, 23, which speaks of this very event, with Rom. ix. 27, 28), and they shall go forth into the glorious liberty of the children of God. 4. The Assyrians were advancing towards Jerusalem, and would in a little time besiege it in form, and it was in great danger of falling into their hands. But it is here promised that, though the enemy had now encamped before the city, yet they should never come into the city, no, nor so much as shoot an arrow into it (v. 32, 33),—that he should be forced to retire with shame. 5. The honour and truth of God are engaged for the doing of all this. These are great things, but how will they be effected? Why, the zeal of the Lord of hosts shall do this, v. 31. His zeal, (1) For his own honour (v. 34): "I will do it for my own sake, to make myself an everlasting name." God's reasons of mercy are fetched from within himself. (2) For his own truth: "I will do it for my servant David's sake; not for the sake of his merit, but the promise made to him and the covenant made with him, those sure mercies of David."

The word was no sooner spoken than the work was done.

I. The army of Assyria was entirely routed. Hezekiah had not force sufficient to sally out upon them and attack their camp, nor would God do it by sword or bow. It was not by the sword of a mighty man or of a mean man, that is, not of any man at all, but of an angel, that the Assyrian army was to fall (Isa. xxxi. 8). Josephus says it was done by a pestilential disease, which was instant death to them. The number slain was very great, 185,000 men, and Rabshakeh, it is likely, among the rest. When the besieged arose, early in the morning, behold they were all dead corpses, scarcely a living man among them. Some think the 76th Psalm was penned on this occasion, where we read that the stout-hearted were spoiled and slept their sleep, their last, their long sleep, v. 5.

II. The king of Assyria was hereby put into the utmost confusion. Ashamed to see himself, after all his proud boasts, thus defeated and disabled He departed, and went, and returned; the manner of the expression intimates the great disorder and distraction of mind he was in, v. 36. And it was not long before God cut him off too, by the hands of two of his own sons, v. 37. The God of Israel had done enough to convince him that he was the only true God, whom therefore he ought to worship; yet he persists in his idolatry, and seeks to his false god for protection against a God of irresistible power. His sons that murdered him were suffered to escape, and would be looked upon as the more excusable in what they had done if it be true (as Bishop Patrick suggested) that he was now vowing to sacrifice them to his god. His successor was another son, Esarhaddon, who did not aim, like his father, to enlarge his conquests, but rather to improve them; for he it was that first sent colonies of Assyrians to inhabit the country of Samaria, as appears, Ezra iv. 2, where the Samaritans say it was Esarhaddon that brought them thither.

CHAP. XX

. Hezekiah's sickness, and his recovery in answer to prayer, n performance of a promise, in the use of means, and confirmed with a sign, ver. 1–11. II. Hezekiah's sin, and his recovery from that, ver. 12–19. In both of these, Isaiah was God's messenger to him. III. The conclusion of his reign, ver. 20, 21.

Verses 1–11

The historian, having shown us blaspheming Sennacherib destroyed in the midst of the prospects of life, here shows us praying Hezekiah delivered in the midst of the prospects of death.

I. Here is Hezekiah's sickness. In those days, that is, in the same year in which the king of Assyria besieged Jerusalem. Some think it was at the time that the Assyrian army was besieging the city or preparing for it. Others think it was soon after the defeat of Sennacherib. Hezekiah, in the midst of his triumphs, is seized with sickness. He was sick of the plague, for we read of the boil or plague-sore, v. 7. The same disease which was killing to the Assyrians was trying to him. Hezekiah, lately favoured of heaven above most men, yet is sick unto death.

II. Warning brought him to prepare for death. It is brought by Isaiah. The prophet tells him, 1. That his disease is mortal, and, if he be not recovered by a miracle of mercy, will certainly be fatal: Thou shalt die, and not live. 2. That therefore he must, with all speed, get ready for death: Set thy house in order. Set the heart in order by renewed acts of repentance, and faith, and resignation to God, with cheerful farewells to this world and welcomes to another; and set the house in order, make thy will, settle thy estate, put thy affairs in the best posture thou canst, for the ease of those that shall come after thee.

III. His prayer hereupon: He prayed unto the Lord, v. 2. Is any sick? Let him be prayed for, let him be prayed with, and let him pray. Hezekiah had found the prayers of faith bring in answers of peace. He had now received the sentence of death within himself, and, if it was reversible, it must be reversed by prayer. If the sentence was irreversible, yet prayer is one of the best preparations for death, because by it we fetch in strength and grace from God to enable us to finish well. Observe,

1. The circumstances of this prayer. (1) He turned his face to the wall, probably as he lay in his bed. This he did perhaps for privacy; he could not retire to his closet as he used to do, but he turned from the company that were about him, to converse with God. Or, as some think, he turned his face towards the temple, to show how willingly he would have gone up thither, to pray this prayer (as he did, ch. xix. 1, 14), if he had been able. (2) He wept sorely. Some gather from this that he was unwilling to die. It is in the nature of man to have some dread of the separation of soul and body. There was also something peculiar in Hezekiah's case: he was now in the midst of his usefulness, had begun a good work of reformation, which he feared would, through the corruption of the people, fall to the ground, if he should die. Let Hezekiah's prayer interpret his tears, and in that we find nothing that intimates him to have been under any of that fear of death which has either bondage or torment.

2. The prayer itself: "Remember now, O Lord! how I have walked before thee in truth; and either spare me to live, that I may continue thus to walk, or, if my work be done, receive me to that glory which thou hast prepared for those that have thus walked." Hezekiah does not pray, "Lord, spare me," or "Lord, take me; God's will be done;" but, Lord, remember me; whether I live or die, let me be thine.

IV. The answer which God immediately gave to this prayer of Hezekiah. The prophet had got but to the middle court when he was sent back with another message to Hezekiah (v. 4, 5), to tell him that he should recover. Upon Hezekiah's prayer God did that for him which otherwise he would not have done. God here calls Hezekiah the captain of his people, to intimate that he would reprieve him for his people's sake. He calls himself the God of David, to intimate that he would reprieve him out of a regard to the covenant made with David. In this answer, 1. God honours his prayers: I have heard thy prayers, I have seen thy tears. 2. God exceeds his prayers; he only begged that God would remember his integrity, but God here promises, (1) To restore him from his illness: I will heal thee. (2) To restore him to such a degree of health that on the third day he should go up to the house of the Lord, to return thanks. (3) To add fifteen years to his life. (4) To deliver Jerusalem from the king of Assyria, v. 6. This was the thing which Hezekiah's heart was upon as much as his own recovery, and therefore the promise of this is here repeated.

V. The means which were to be used for his recovery, v. 7. Isaiah was his physician. He ordered an outward application, a very cheap and common thing: "Lay a lump of figs to the boil, to ripen it and bring it to a head, that the matter of the disease may be discharged that way." It is our duty, when we are sick, to make use of such means as are proper to help nature, else we do not trust God, but tempt him. Plain and ordinary medicines must not be despised, for many such God has graciously made serviceable to man.

VI. The sign which was given for the encouragement of his faith. 1. He begged it, not in any distrust of the power or promise of God, but because he looked upon the things promised to be very great things and worthy to be so confirmed. Hezekiah asked, What is the sign, not that I shall go up to the thrones of judgment or up to the gate, but up to the house of the Lord? He desired to recover that he might glorify God in the gates of the daughter of Zion. It is not worth while to live for any other purpose than to serve God. 2. It was put to his choice whether the sun should go back or go forward. It is supposed that the degrees were half hours, and that it was just noon when the proposal was made, and the question is, "Shall the sun go back to its place at seven in the morning or forward to its place at five in the evening?" He humbly desired the sun might go back ten degrees, because, though either would be a great miracle, yet, it being the natural course of the sun to go forward, its going back would seem more strange, and would be more significant of Hezekiah's returning to the days of his youth (Job. xxxiii. 25) and the lengthening out of the day of his life. It was accordingly done, upon the prayer of Isaiah (v. 11): God brought the sun back ten degrees, which appeared to Hezekiah by the going back of the shadow upon the dial of Ahaz, which, it is likely, he could see through his chamber window; and the same was observed upon all other dials, even in Babylon, 2 Chron. xxxii. 31. Whether this retrograde motion of the sun was gradual—which would make the day ten hours longer than usual—or whether it darted back on a sudden, and, after continuing a little while, was restored again to its usual place, so that no change was made in the state of the heavenly bodies (as the learned Bishop Patrick thinks)—we are not told.

I. An embassy sent to Hezekiah by the king of Babylon, to congratulate him on his recovery, v. 12. The kings of Babylon had hitherto been tributaries to the kings of Assyria, and Nineveh was the royal city. We find Babylon subject to the king of Assyria, ch. xvii. 24. But by degrees things were so changed that Assyria became subject to the kings of Babylon. This king of Babylon sent to compliment Hezekiah upon a double account. 1. Upon the account of religion. The Babylonians worshipped the sun, and, perceiving what honour their god had done to Hezekiah, in going back for his sake, they thought themselves obliged to do honour to him likewise. 2. Upon the account of civil interest. If the king of Babylon was now meditating a revolt from the king of Assyria, it was policy to get Hezekiah into his interest. He found himself obliged to Hezekiah, and his God, for the weakening of the Assyrian forces, and had reason to think he could not have a more powerful and valuable ally than one that had so good an interest in the upper world.

II. The kind entertainment Hezekiah gave to these ambassadors, v. 13. 1. He was too fond of them. He hearkened unto them. Though they were idolaters, yet he was forward to come into a confederacy with the king their master. 2. He was too fond of showing them his palace, his treasures, and his magazines, that they might see, and might report to their master, what a great king he was.

III. The examination of Hezekiah concerning this matter, v. 14, 15. Isaiah, who had often been his comforter, is now his reprover. "Who are these? What is their business?" Hezekiah not only submitted to the examination but made an ingenuous confession: There is nothing among my treasures that I have not shown them. Why then did he not bring them to Isaiah, and show him to them who was the best treasure, and who by his prayers had been instrumental in all those wonders which these ambassadors came to enquire into?

IV. The sentence passed upon him for his pride and vanity. The sentence is (v. 17, 18), 1. That the treasures he was so proud of should hereafter become a prey. 2. That the king of Babylon, with whom he was so fond of an alliance, should be the enemy that should make a prey of them. The sins of Manasseh, his idolatries and murders, were the cause of that calamity; but it is now foretold to Hezekiah, to convince him of the folly of his pride. Hezekiah was fond of assisting the king of Babylon to rise, and to reduce the exorbitant power of the kings of Assyria; but he is told that his royal seed shall become the king of Babylon's slaves. Babylon will be the ruin of those that are fond of Babylon.

V. Hezekiah's humble and patient submission to this sentence, v. 19. It is not only just, but good; for he will bring good out of it, and do me good by the foresight of it.

Lastly, Here is the conclusion of Hezekiah's life and story, v. 20, 21. In 2 Chron. ch. xxix–xxxii much more is recorded of Hezekiah's work of reformation and it seems that in the civil chronicles there were many things recorded of his might and the good offices he did for Jerusalem, particularly his bringing water by pipes into the city. But this historian leaves him asleep with his fathers, and a son in his throne that proved very untoward. Wicked Ahaz was the son of a godly father and the father of a godly son; holy Hezekiah was the son of a wicked father and the father of a wicked son.

CHAP. XXI

A short but sad account of the reigns of two of the kings of Judah, Manasseh and Amon. I. Concerning Manasseh, all the account we have of him here is, 1. That he devoted himself to sin, to all manner of wickedness, idolatry, and murder, ver. 1–9 and ver. 16. 2. That therefore God devoted him, and Jerusalem for his sake, to ruin, ver. 10–18. In the book of Chronicles we have an account of his troubles, and his repentance. II. Concerning Amon we are only told that he lived in sin (ver. 19–22), died quickly by the sword, and left good Josiah his successor, ver. 23–26. By these two reigns Jerusalem was much debauched and much weakened.

Verses 1–9

The beauty of Jerusalem is stained, and all her glory, all her joy, sunk and gone. These verses give such an account of this reign as make it, in all respects, the reverse of the last, and, in a manner, the ruin of it.

I. Manasseh began young. He was but twelve years old when he began to reign (v. 1), born when his father was about forty-two years old, three years after his sickness. But being young, 1. He was puffed up with his honour, and thinking himself very wise, valued himself upon his undoing what his father had done. 2. He was easily wrought upon and drawn aside by seducers. Those that were enemies to Hezekiah's reformation, and retained an affection for the old idolatries, flattered him, and used his power at their pleasure.

II. He reigned long, longest of any of the kings of Judah, fifty-five years. This was the only very bad reign that was a long one: in the beginning of his reign for some time affairs continued to move in the course that his father left them in, and in the latter end of his reign, after his repentance, religion got head again. Though he reigned long, yet some of this time he was a prisoner in Babylon.

III. He reigned very ill.

1. In general, (1) He did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord. (2) He did after the abominations of the heathen (v. 2) and as did Ahab (v. 3), nay (v. 9), he did more evil than did the nations whom the Lord destroyed.

2. More particularly, (1) He rebuilt the high places which his father had destroyed, v. 3. (2) He set up other gods, Baal and Ashtaroth (which we translate a grove), and all the host of heaven, the sun and moon, the other planets, and the constellations; these he worshipped and served (v. 3), gave their names to the images he made, and then did homage to them. To these he built altars (v. 5), and offered sacrifices, no doubt, on these altars. (3) He made his son pass through the fire, by which he dedicated him a votary to Moloch, in contempt of the seal of circumcision by which he had been dedicated to God. (4) He made the devil his oracle, and used enchantments and dealt with familiar spirits (v. 6) like Saul. Conjurers and fortune-tellers (who pretended, by the stars or the clouds, lucky and unlucky days, good and bad omens, the flight of birds, or the entrails of beasts, to foretell things to come) were his intimates. (5) We find afterwards (v. 16) that he shed innocent blood. The blood of the prophets is, in a particular manner, charged upon Jerusalem, and it is probable that he put to death many of them. The tradition of the Jews is that he caused the prophet Isaiah to be sawn asunder; and many think the apostle refers to this in Heb. xi. 37.

3. Three things are here mentioned as aggravations of Manasseh's idolatry:—(1) That he set up his images and altars in the house of the Lord (v. 4), in the two courts of the temple (v. 5), in the very house of which God had said to Solomon, Here will I put my name, v. 7. (2) That hereby he put a great slight upon the word of God, and his covenant with Israel.

Verses 10–18

Here is the doom of Judah and Jerusalem read. The prophets were sent, in the first place, to teach them the knowledge of God, to remind them of their duty. If they succeeded not in that, their next work was to reprove them for their sins, that they might repent. If in this they prevailed not, but sinners went on frowardly, their next work was to foretell the judgments of God, that the terror of them might awaken those to repentance who would not be made sensible of the obligations of his love.

I. A recital of the crime. The indictment is read upon which the judgment is grounded, v. 11.

II. A prediction of the judgment God would bring upon them for this: They have done that which was evil, and therefore I am bringing evil upon them (v. 12). It should make a great noise in the world and occasion many speculations. When God lays judgment to the plummet it shall be the plummet of the house of Ahab, marking out for the same ruin to which that wretched family was devoted. See Isa. xxviii. 17. I will wipe it as a man wipes a dish. The city should be emptied of its inhabitants, which had been the filth of it, as a dish is emptied when it is wiped: "They shall all be carried captive, the land shall enjoy her sabbaths, and be laid by as a dish when it is wiped." This should be in order to the purifying, not the destroying, of Jerusalem. The dish shall not be dropped, not broken to pieces, or melted down, but only wiped. Sin is spoken of here as the alpha and omega of their miseries.

This is all we have here of Manasseh; he stands convicted and condemned; but in the book of Chronicles we hear of his repentance, and acceptance with God. He was buried, it is likely by his own order, in the garden of his own house (v. 18); for, being truly humbled for his sins, he judged himself no more worthy to be called a son, a son of David, and therefore not worthy to have even his dead body buried in the sepulchres of his fathers. And better it is, and more honourable, for a sinner to die repenting, and be buried in a garden, than to die impenitent, and be buried in the abbey.

Verses 19–26

The short and inglorious reign of Amon, the son of Manasseh—a son not born till he was forty-five years old. 1. His reign was very wicked: He forsook the God of his fathers (v. 22), disobeyed the commands given to his fathers. He trod in the steps of his father's idolatry, and revived that which he, in the latter end of his days, had put down. 2. His end was very tragical. He having rebelled against God, his own servants conspired against him and slew him, when he had reigned but two years, v. 23. Two things the people of the land did, by their representatives, (1) They did justice on the traitors that had slain the king, and put them to death; for, though he was a bad king, he was their king, and it was a part of their allegiance to him to avenge his death. (2) They did a kindness to themselves in making Josiah his son king in his stead, encouraged, it may be, by the indications he gave, even in his early days, of a good disposition. Now they made a happy change from one of the worst to one of the best of all the kings of Judah.

CHAP. XXII

The story of the reign of good king Josiah. Here, after his general character (ver. 1, 2), we have a particular account of the respect he paid, I. To God's house, which he repaired, ver. 3–7. II. To God's book, which he was much affected with the reading of, ver. 8–11. III. To God's messengers, whom he thereupon consulted, ver. 12–14., and by whom he received from God an answer threatening Jerusalem's destruction (ver. 15–17), but promising favour to him (ver. 18–20), upon which he set about that glorious work of reformation which we have an account of in the next chapter.

Verses 1–10

Concerning Josiah we are here told,

I. That he was very young when he began to reign (v. 1), only eight years old. Our English Israel had once a king that was such a child, Edward VI. Josiah, being young, had not received any bad impressions from the example of his father and grandfather, but soon saw their errors, and God gave him grace to take warning by them. See Ezek. xviii. 14, &c.

II. That he did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, v. 2. See the sovereignty of divine grace—the father passed by and left to perish in his sin, the son a chosen vessel. Nothing is too hard for that grace to do. There are errors on both hands, but God kept him in the right way; he fell neither into superstition nor profaneness.

III. That he took care for the repair of the temple. This he did in the eighteenth year of his reign, v. 3. Compare 2 Chron. xxxiv. 8. He began much sooner to seek the Lord (as appears, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 3), but it is to be feared the work of reformation went slowly on and met with much opposition. He sent Shaphan, the secretary of state, to Hilkiah the high priest, to take an account of the money that was collected for this use by the door-keepers (v. 4), for, it seems, they took much the same way of raising the money that Joash took, ch. xii. 9. This money, so collected, he ordered him to lay out for the repair of the temple, v. 5, 6. And now, it seems, the workmen (as in the days of Joash) acquitted themselves so well that there was no reckoning made with them (v. 7), which is certainly mentioned to the praise of the workmen.

IV. That, in repairing the temple, the book of the law was happily found and brought to the king, v. 8, 10. Some think this book was the autograph, or original manuscript, of the five books of Moses, under his own hand; others think it was only an ancient and authentic copy. 1. It seems, this book of the law was lost or missing. Perhaps it was carelessly mislaid and neglected, thrown by into a corner (as some throw their Bibles), by those that knew not the value of it, and forgotten there; or it was maliciously concealed by some of the idolatrous kings who buried it, in hopes it would never see the light again; or, as some think, it was carefully laid up by some of its friends, lest it should fall into the hands of its enemies. Whoever were the instruments of its preservation, we ought to acknowledge the hand of God in it. If this was the only authentic copy of the Pentateuch then in being, we now have reason to thank God, upon our knees, for that happy providence by which Hilkiah found this book at this time, found it when he sought it not, Isa. lxv. 1. God's care of the Bible is a plain indication of his interest in it. 2. Whether this was the only authentic copy in being or no, it seems the things contained in it were new both to the king himself and to the high priest; for the king, upon the reading of it, rent his clothes. If the book of the law was lost, it seems difficult to determine what rule Josiah went by in doing that which was right in the sight of the Lord, and how the priests and people kept up the rites of their religion. I am apt to think that the people generally took up with abstracts of the law, like our abridgments of the statutes, a sort of ritual, directing them in the observances of their religion, but leaving out what they thought fit, and particularly the promises and threatenings (Lev. xxvi and Deut. xxviii &c.). These were the portions of the law which Josiah was so much affected with (v. 13), for these were new to him. No summaries, extracts, or collections, out of the Bible (though they may have their use) can be effectual to convey and preserve the knowledge of God and his will like the Bible itself. 3. It was a great instance of God's favour, and a token for good to Josiah and his people, that the book of the law was thus seasonably brought to light, to direct and quicken that blessed reformation which Josiah had begun. The translating of the scriptures into vulgar tongues was the glory, strength, and joy of the Reformation. It is observable that they were about a good work, repairing the temple, when they found the book of the law. Those that do their duty according to their knowledge shall have their knowledge increased. 4. Hilkiah the priest was exceedingly well pleased with the discovery. "O," says he to Shaphan, "rejoice with me, for I have found the book of the law, ἑυρηκα, ἑυρηκα, I have found, I have found, that jewel of inestimable value. Here, carry it to the king; it is the richest jewel of his crown. Read it before him. He walks in the way of David his father."

The book of the law is not laid up in the king's cabinet as a piece of antiquity, a rarity to be admired, but it is read before the king. Those put the truest honour upon their Bibles that study them and converse with them daily, feed on that bread and walk by that light.

I. The impressions which the reading of the law made upon Josiah. He had long thought the case of his kingdom bad, by reason of the idolatries and impieties that had been found among them, but he never thought it so bad as he perceived it to be by the book of the law now read to him. The rending of his clothes signified the rending of his heart.

II. The application he made to God hereupon: Go, enquire of the Lord for me, v. 13.

1. Two things we may suppose he desired to know:—"Enquire, (1) What we shall do; what course we shall take to turn away God's wrath and prevent the judgments which our sins have deserved." (2) "What we may expect and must provide for." He acknowledges, "Our fathers have not hearkened to the words of this book; if this be the rule of right, certainly our fathers have been much in the wrong. Certainly great is the wrath that is kindled against us; if this be the word of God, as no doubt it is, and he will be true to his word, as no doubt he will be, we are all undone."

2. This enquiry Josiah sent, (1) By some of his great men, who are named, v. 12, and again v. 14. (2) To Huldah the prophetess, v. 14. Miriam helped to lead Israel out of Egypt (Micah vi. 4), Deborah judged them, and now Huldah instructed them in the mind of God, and her being a wife was no prejudice at all to her being a prophetess; marriage is honourable in all. It was a mercy to Jerusalem that when Bibles were scarce they had prophets, as afterwards, when prophecy ceased, that they had more Bibles. The king's messengers made Huldah their oracle, probably because her husband had a place at court (for he was keeper of the wardrobe). They had, it is likely, consulted her upon other occasions, and had found that the word of God in her mouth was truth. She was near, for she dwelt at Jerusalem, in the second rank of buildings from the royal palace. The Jews say that she prophesied among the women, the court ladies, who it is probable had their apartments in that place.

III. The answer he received from God to his enquiry. Huldah returned it in the dialect of a prophetess, speaking from him before whom all stand upon the same level—Tell the man that sent you to me, v. 15.

1. She let him know what judgments God had in store for Judah and Jerusalem (v. 16, 17): My wrath shall be kindled against this place.

2. She let him know what mercy God had in store for him. (1) Notice is taken of his great tenderness and concern—Thy heart was tender. He received the impressions of God's word, trembled at it and yielded to it. This is tenderness of heart, and thus he humbled himself before the Lord. Those that most fear God's wrath are least likely to feel it. (2) A reprieve is granted till after his death (v. 20): I will gather thee to thy fathers. God promised him he should not live to see it, which would have been but a small reward for his eminent piety if there had not been another world in which he should be abundantly recompensed, Heb. xi. 16. He died in the love and favour of God, which secure such a peace as no circumstances of dying, no, not dying in the field of war, could alter the nature of, or break in upon.

CHAP. XXIII

I. The happy continuance of the goodness of Josiah's reign, and the progress of the reformation he began, reading the law (ver. 1, 2), renewing the covenant (ver. 3), cleansing the temple (ver. 4), and rooting out idols and idolatry, with all the relics thereof, in all places, as far as his power reached (ver. 5–20), keeping a solemn passover (ver. 21–23), and clearing the country of witches (ver. 24); and in all this acting with extraordinary vigour, ver. 25. II. The unhappy conclusion of it in his untimely death, as a token of the continuance of God's wrath against Jerusalem, ver. 26–30. III. The more unhappy consequences of his death, in the bad reigns of his two sons Jehoahaz and Jehoiakim, that came after him, ver. 31–37.

Josiah had received a message from God that there was no preventing the ruin of Jerusalem, but he did not therefore sit down in despair. Here we have the preparations for reformation. 1. He summoned a general assembly of the states, the elders, the magistrates or representatives of Judah and Jerusalem, to meet him in the house of the Lord, with the priests and prophets, the ordinary and extraordinary ministers, that it might become a national act. 2. Instead of making a speech to this convention, he ordered the book of the law to be read to them; nay, it should seem, he read it himself (v. 2), as one much affected with it and desirous that they should be so too. Besides the convention of the great men, he had a congregation of the men of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem to hear the law read. If the people be but as steadfastly resolved to obey by law as he is to govern by law, the kingdom will be happy. 3. Instead of proposing laws for the confirming of them in their duty, he proposed an association by which they should all jointly engage themselves to God, v. 3. The book of the law was the book of the covenant, that, if they would be to God a people, he would be to them a God; they here engage themselves to do their part, not doubting but that then God would do his. The covenanters were, in the first place, the king himself, who stood by his pillar (ch. xi. 14) and publicly declared his consent to this covenant. All the people likewise stood to the covenant.

An account of such a reformation as we have not met with in all the history of the kings of Judah, such thorough riddance made of all the abominable things and such foundations laid of a glorious good work. The generality of the people, after all, hated to be reformed.

I. What abundance of wickedness there was, and had been, in Judah and Jerusalem. 1. Even in the house of the Lord, that sacred temple which Solomon built, and dedicated to the honour and for the worship of the God of Israel, there were found vessels, all manner of utensils, for the worship of Baal, and of the grove (or Ashtaroth), and of all the host of heaven, v. 4. Though Josiah had suppressed the worship of idols, yet the utensils made for that worship were all carefully preserved, even in the temple itself. 2. Just at the entering in of the house of the Lord was a stable for horses kept for a religious use; they were holy horses, given to the sun (v. 11), as if he needed them who rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race (Ps. xix. 5), making their religion to conform to the poetical fictions of the chariot of the sun. Some say that those horses were to be led forth in pomp every morning to meet the rising sun, others that the worshippers of the sun rode out upon them to adore the rising sun; it should seem that they drew the chariots of the sun, which the people worshipped. 3. Hard by the house of the Lord there were houses of the Sodomites, where all manner of lewdness and filthiness, even that which was most unnatural, was practised, and under pretence of religion too, in honour of their impure deities. Those that dishonoured their God were justly left thus to dishonour themselves, Rom. i. 24, &c. There were women that wove hangings for the grove (v. 7), tents which encompassed the image of Venus, where the worshippers committed all manner of lewdness, and this in the house of the Lord. 4. There were many idolatrous altars found (v. 12), some in the palace, on the top of the upper chamber of Ahaz. The roofs of their houses being flat, they made them their high places, and set up altars upon them (Jer. xix. 13; Zeph. i. 5), domestic altars. 5. There was Tophet, in the valley of the son of Hinnom, very near Jerusalem, where the image of Moloch (that god of unnatural cruelty, as others were of unnatural uncleanness) was kept, to which some sacrificed their children, burning them in the fire, others dedicated them, making them to pass through the fire (v. 10), labouring in the very fire, Hab. ii. 13. It is supposed to have been called Tophet from toph, a drum, because they beat drums at the burning of the children, that their shrieks might not be heard. 6. There were high places before Jerusalem, which Solomon had built, v. 13. There were also high places all the kingdom over, from Geba to Beer-sheba (v. 8), and high places of the gates, in the entering in of the gate of the governor. 7. There were idolatrous priests, that officiated at all those idolatrous altars (v. 5), chemarim, black men, or that wore black. See Zeph. i. 4. Those that sacrificed to Osiris, or that wept for Tammuz (Ezek. viii. 14), or that worshipped the infernal deities, put on black garments as mourners. 8. There were conjurers and wizards, and such as dealt with familiar spirits, v. 24.

II. What a full destruction good Josiah made of all those relics of idolatry. 1. He ordered Hilkiah, and the other priests, to clear the temple. Away with all the vessels that were made for Baal. They must all be burnt, and the ashes of them carried to Bethel. That place had been the common source of idolatry, for there was set up one of the calves. 2. The idolatrous priests were all put down. Those of them that were not of the house of Aaron, or had sacrificed to Baal or other false gods, he put to death, according to the law, v. 20. He slew them upon their own altars, the most acceptable sacrifice that ever had been offered upon them. Those that were descendants from Aaron, and yet had burnt incense in the high places, but to the true God only, he forbade ever to approach the altar of the Lord; but he allowed them to eat of the unleavened bread among their brethren, with whom they were to reside, that unleavened bread (heavy and unpleasant as it was), was better than they deserved, and that would serve to keep them alive. 3. All the images were broken to pieces and burnt. The image of the grove (v. 6), some goddess or other, was reduced to ashes, and the ashes cast upon the graves of the common people (v. 6), the common burying-place of the city. By the law a ceremonial uncleanness was contracted by the touch of a grave, so that in casting them here he declared them most impure. He filled the places of the groves with the bones of men; as he carried the ashes of the images to the graves, to mingle them with dead men's bones, so he carried dead men's bones to the places where the images had been, and put them in the room of them, that, both ways, idolatry might be rendered loathsome, and the people kept both from the dust of the images and from the ruins of the places where they had been worshipped. 4. All the wicked houses were suppressed, those nests of impiety that harboured idolaters, the houses of the Sodomites, v. 7. The high places were in like manner broken down and levelled with the ground (v. 8). Tophet, which, contrary to other places of idolatry, was in a valley, whereas they were on hills or high places, was likewise defiled (v. 10), was made the burying-place of the city. Concerning this we have a whole sermon, Jer. xix. 1, 2, &c., where it is said, They shall bury in Tophet, and the whole city is threatened to be made like Tophet. 5. The horses that had been given to the sun were taken away and put to common use, and the chariots of the sun he burnt with fire. 6. The workers with familiar spirits and the wizards were put away, v. 24.

III. How his zeal extended itself to the cities of Israel that were within his reach. The ten tribes were carried captive and the Assyrian colonies did not fully people the country, so that, it is likely, many cities had put themselves under the protection of the kings of Judah, 2 Chron. xxx. 1; xxxiv. 6. These he here visits, to carry on his reformation.

1. He defiled and demolished Jeroboam's altar at Bethel, with the high place and the grove that belonged to it, v. 15, 16. The golden calf, it should seem, was gone (thy calf, O Samaria! has cast thee off), but the altar was there. This was, (1) Defiled, v. 16. Josiah, in his pious zeal, was ransacking the old seats of idolatry, and spied the sepulchres in the mount, in which probably the idolatrous priests were buried. These he opened, took out the bones, and burnt them upon the altar, v. 20. Thus he polluted the altar, desecrated it, and made it odious. (2) It was demolished. He broke down the altar and all its appurtenances (v. 15), burnt what was combustible, and stamped it small to powder and made it as dust before the wind.

2. He destroyed all the houses of the high places, all those synagogues of Satan that were in the cities of Samaria, v. 19.

3. He carefully preserved the sepulchre of that man of God who came from Judah to foretell this. This was that good prophet who proclaimed these things against the altar of Bethel, and yet was himself slain by a lion, but to show that God's displeasure against him went no further than his death, God so ordered it that when all the graves about his were disturbed his was safe (v. 17, 18) and no man moved his bones.

IV. We are here told what a solemn passover Josiah and his people kept after all this. When they had cleared the country of the old leaven they then applied themselves to the keeping of the feast. We have not such a particular account of this passover as of that in Hezekiah's time, 2 Chron. xxx. But, in general, we are told that there was not holden such a passover in any of the foregoing reigns, no, not from the days of the judges (v. 22). This passover, it seems, was extraordinary for the number and devotion of the communicants, their sacrifices and offerings, and their exact observance of the laws of the feast. God was pleased to recompense their zeal in destroying idolatry with uncommon tokens of his presence and favour. All this concurred to make it a distinguished passover.

Verses 25–30

I. It is here owned that Josiah was one of the best kings that ever sat upon the throne of David, v. 25. As Hezekiah was a nonsuch for faith and dependence upon God in straits (ch. xviii. 5), so Josiah was a nonsuch for sincerity and zeal in carrying on a work of reformation. 1. He turned to the Lord from whom his fathers had revolted. He did what he could to turn his kingdom also to the Lord. 2. He did this with his heart and soul. 3. He did it with all his heart, and all his soul, and all his might—with vigour, and courage, and resolution. 4. He did this according to all the law of Moses. In all he did, he walked by rule.

II. Notwithstanding this he was cut off by a violent death in the midst of his days, and his kingdom was ruined within a few years after. Consequent upon such a reformation as this, one would have expected nothing but the prosperity and glory both of king and kingdom; but, quite contrary, we find both under a cloud. 1. Even the reformed kingdom continues marked for ruin. For all this (v. 26) the Lord turned not from the fierceness of his great wrath. That is certainly true, which God spoke by the prophet (Jer. xviii. 7, 8), that if a nation, doomed to destruction, turn from the evil of sin, God will repent of the evil of punishment; and therefore we must conclude that Josiah's people, though they submitted to Josiah's power, did not heartily imbibe Josiah's principles. They were turned by force, and did not voluntarily turn from their evil way, but still continued their affection for their idols; and therefore he that knows men's hearts would not recall the sentence, which was, That Judah should be removed, as Israel had been, and Jerusalem itself cast off, v. 27. Yet even this destruction was intended to be their effectual reformation; so that we must say that the disease had come to a crisis, and was ready for a cure. 2. As an evidence of this, even the reforming king is cut off in the midst of his usefulness—in mercy to him, that he might not see the evil which was coming upon his kingdom. The king of Egypt waged war with the king of Assyria: so the king of Babylon is now called. Josiah's kingdom lay between them. He therefore thought himself concerned to oppose the king of Egypt, and check the growing, threatening, greatness of his power. Therefore Josiah went against him, and was killed in the first engagement, v. 29, 30. We must adore God's righteousness in taking away such a jewel from an unthankful people that knew not how to value it. They greatly lamented his death (2 Chron. xxxv. 25), urged to it by Jeremiah, who told them the meaning of it, and what a threatening omen it was.

Jerusalem saw not a good day after Josiah was laid in his grave, but one trouble came after another, till within twenty-two years it was quite destroyed. Of the reign of two of his sons here is a short account; the former we find a prisoner and the latter a tributary to the king of Egypt. This king of Egypt having slain Josiah, bent all his force against his family and kingdom.

I. Jehoahaz, a younger son, was first made king by the people of the land, probably because he was of a more warlike genius than his elder brother, and likely to make head against the king of Egypt and to avenge his father's death. He did ill, v. 32. He did according to all that his wicked fathers had done. Though he had not time to do much, yet he had chosen his patterns. He was but three months a prince, and was then made a prisoner and lived and died so.

II. Eliakim, another son of Josiah, was made king by the king of Egypt. The crown of Judah had hitherto always descended from a father to a son, and never, till now, from one brother to another. The king of Egypt, having used his power in making him king, further showed it in changing his name; he called him Jehoiakim, a name that had reference to Jehovah, for he had no design to make him renounce or forget the religion of his country. Of this Jehoiakim we are here told the king of Egypt made him poor, exacted from him a vast tribute of 100 talents of silver and a talent of gold (v. 33), which, with much difficulty, he squeezed out of his subjects and gave to Pharaoh, v. 35. Notwithstanding the rebukes of Providence he was under, by which he should have been convinced, humbled, and reformed, he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord (v. 37).

CHAP. XXIV

Things are hastening towards the utter destruction of Jerusalem. We left Jehoiakim on the throne, placed there by the king of Egypt: I. The troubles of his reign, how he was brought into subjection by the king of Babylon (ver. 1–6), and how Egypt also was conquered by Nebuchadnezzar, ver. 7. II. The desolations of his son's reign, which continued but three months; and then he and all his great men, being forced to surrender at discretion, were carried captives to Babylon, ver. 8–16. III. The preparatives of the next reign (which was the last of all) for the utter ruin of Jerusalem, ver. 17–20.

We have here the first mention of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon (v. 1), that head of gold. He was a potent prince, and one that was the terror of the mighty; and yet his name would not have been known in sacred writ if he had not been employed in the destruction of Jerusalem and the captivity of the Jews.

I. He made Jehoiakim his tributary and kept him in subjection three years, v. 1. Nebuchadnezzar began his reign in the fourth year of Jehoiakim. In his eighth year he made him his prisoner, but restored him upon his promise of faithfulness to him. That promise he kept about three years, but then rebelled, probably in hopes of assistance from the king of Egypt.

II. When he rebelled Nebuchadnezzar sent his forces against him to destroy his country, bands of Chaldeans, Syrians, Moabites, Ammonites, who were all now in the service and pay of the king of Babylon (v. 2), and withal retained, and now showed, their ancient enmity to the Israel of God. Two things God intended in suffering Judah to be thus harassed:— 1. The punishment of the sins of Manasseh, which God now visited upon the third and fourth generation. So long he waited before he visited them, to see if the nation would repent; but they continued impenitent. Though Manasseh repented, and we have reason to think even the persecutions and murders he was guilty of were pardoned, yet, as they were national sins, they lay still charged upon the land, crying for national judgments. Perhaps some were now living who were aiding and abetting. See what need nations have to lament the sins of their fathers, lest they smart for them.

III. The king of Egypt was likewise subdued by the king of Babylon, and a great part of his country taken from him, v. 7. He dares not come any more out of his land. Afterwards he attempted to give Zedekiah some relief, but was obliged to retire, Jer. xxxvii. 7.

IV. Jehoiakim, seeing his country laid waste and himself ready to fall into the enemy's hand, as it should seem, died of a broken heart, in the midst of his days (v. 6).

Verses 8–20

The history of king Jehoiachin's captivity, as it is called, Ezek. i. 2. He came to the crown, not to have the honour of wearing it, but the shame of losing it.

I. His reign was short and inconsiderable. He reigned but three months, and then was removed and carried captive to Babylon. Yet this young prince reigned long enough to show that he justly smarted for his fathers' sins, for he trod in their steps (v. 9).

II. The calamities that came upon him, and his family, and people, in the very beginning of his reign, 1. Jerusalem was besieged by the king of Babylon, v. 10, 11. 2. Jehoiachin immediately surrendered; wanting the faith and piety of an Israelite, he had not the resolution of a man, of a soldier, of a prince. He and his royal family delivered themselves up prisoners of war. 3. Nebuchadnezzar rifled the treasuries both of the church and of the state, and carried away the silver and gold of both, v. 13. Now the word of God by Isaiah was fulfilled (ch. xx. 17), All that is in thy house shall be carried to Babylon. 4. He carried away a great part of Jerusalem into captivity. There had been some carried away eight years before this, in the first year of Nebuchadnezzar and the third of Jehoiakim, among whom were Daniel and his fellows. See Dan. i. 1, 6. Now he carried off, (1) The young king himself and his family (v. 15), and we find (ch. xxv. 27–29) that for thirty-seven years he continued a close prisoner. (2) All the great men, the princes and officers. (3) All the military men, the mighty men of valour (v. 14), the mighty of the land (v. 15), the men of might, even all that were strong and apt for war, v. 16. (4) All the craftsmen and smiths who made weapons of war. In this captivity Ezekiel the prophet was carried away (Ezek. i. 1, 2).

III. The successor whom the king of Babylon appointed in the room of Jehoiachin. The king of Babylon made Mattaniah king, the son of Josiah; and to let all the world know, that he was his creature, he changed his name and called him Zedekiah, v. 17. This Zedekiah was the last of the kings of Judah. The name which the king of Babylon gave him signifies The justice of the Lord. He rebelled against the king of Babylon (v. 20). This was the most foolish thing he could do, and hastened the ruin of his kingdom.

CHAP. XXV

I. The utter destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, the city besieged and taken (ver. 1–4), the houses burnt (ver. 8, 9), the wall broken down (ver. 10), and the inhabitants carried away into captivity, ver. 11, 12. The glory of Jerusalem was, 1. That it was the royal city, but that glory has now departed, for the prince is made a most miserable prisoner, the seed royal is destroyed (ver. 5–7), and the principal officers are put to death, ver. 18–21. 2. That it was the holy city, where was the testimony of Israel; but that glory has departed, for Solomon's temple is burnt to the ground (ver. 9) and the sacred vessels that remained are carried away to Babylon, ver. 13–17. II. The distraction and dispersion of the remnant that was left in Judah under Gedaliah, ver. 22–26. III. The countenance which, after thirty-seven years' imprisonment, was given to Jehoiachin the captive king of Judah, ver. 27–30.

Verses 1–7

Zedekiah in rebellion against the king of Babylon (ch. xxiv. 20), contriving and endeavouring to shake off his yoke.

I. The king of Babylon's army laid siege to Jerusalem, v. 1. Two years this siege lasted; at first the army retired, for fear of the king of Egypt (Jer. xxxvii. 11), but, finding him not so powerful as they thought, they soon returned.

II. During this siege the famine prevailed (v. 3).

III. At length the city was taken by storm: it was broken up, v. 4. The besiegers made a breach in the wall, at which they forced their way into it.

IV. The king, his family, and all his great men, made their escape in the night, by some secret passages, v. 4. Intelligence was given to the Chaldeans of the king's flight, and they soon overtook him, v. 5. 1. He was brought to the king of Babylon, and tried by a council of war for rebelling against him to whom he had sworn fidelity. 2. His sons were slain before his eyes. 3. His eyes were put out, by which he was deprived of the light of the sun. Jeremiah prophesied that Zedekiah should be brought to Babylon, Jer. xxxii. 5; xxxiv. 3. Ezekiel prophesied that he should not see Babylon, Ezek. xii. 13. He was brought thither, but, his eyes being put out, he did not see it. Thus he ended his days, before he ended his life. 4. He was bound in fetters of brass and so carried to Babylon. For his greater disgrace, they led him bound.

Verses 8–21

About a month after (compare v. 8 with v. 3) Nebuzar-adan was sent with orders to complete the destruction of Jerusalem. This space God gave them to repent, after all the foregoing days of his patience, but in vain. 1. The city and temple are burnt, v. 9. That house which David prepared for, and which Solomon built at such a vast expense—that house which had the eye and heart of God perpetually upon it (1 Kings ix. 3) must be turned into ashes. By the burning of the temple God would show how little he cares for the external pomp of his worship when the life and power of religion are neglected. The people trusted to the temple, as if that would protect them in their sins (Jer. vii. 4). It is observable that the second temple was burnt by the Romans the same month, and the same day of the month, that the first temple was burnt by the Chaldeans, which, Josephus says, was the tenth of August. 2. The walls of Jerusalem are demolished (v. 10), as if the victorious army would be revenged on them for having kept them out so long. These walls were never repaired till Nehemiah's time. 3. The residue of the people are carried away captive to Babylon, v. 11. Only the poor of the land were left behind (v. 12) to till the ground and dress the vineyards for the Chaldeans. Sometimes poverty is a protection; for those that have nothing have nothing to lose. 4. The brazen vessels, and other appurtenances of the temple, are carried away, those of silver and gold being most of them gone before. Those two famous columns of brass, Jachin and Boaz, which signified the strength and stability of the house of God, were broken to pieces and the brass of them was carried to Babylon, v. 13. 5. Several of the great men are slain in cold blood. This completed the calamity: So Judah was carried away out of their land, about 860 years after they were put in possession of it by Joshua. Sin kept their fathers forty years out of Canaan, and now turned them out.

I. The dispersion of the remaining people. The city of Jerusalem was quite laid waste. Some people there were in the land of Judah (v. 22) that had weathered the storm, and had their lives given them for a prey. The king of Babylon appointed Gedaliah, one of themselves, to be their governor and protector under him, a very good man, and one that would make the best of the bad, v. 22. His father Ahikam was one that countenanced and protected Jeremiah when the princes had vowed his death, Jer. xxvi. 24. It is probable that this Gedaliah, by the advice of Jeremiah, had gone over to the Chaldeans, and had conducted himself so well that the king of Babylon entrusted him with the government. He resided not at Jerusalem, but at Mizpah, in the land of Benjamin, a place famous in Samuel's time. Thither those came who had fled from Zedekiah (v. 4) and put themselves under his protection (v. 23). Gedaliah, though he had not the pomp and power of a sovereign prince, yet might have been a greater blessing to them than many of their kings had been. Yet this hopeful settlement is dashed to pieces, not by the Chaldeans, but by some of themselves. Ishmael, who was of the royal family, envying Gedaliah's advancement and the happy settlement of the people under him, basely slew him and all his friends, both Jews and Chaldeans. The Chaldeans had reason enough to be offended at the murder of Gedaliah; but if those that remained had humbly remonstrated, alleging that it was only the act of Ishmael and his party, those who were innocent of it would not have been punished for it: but contrary to the counsel of Jeremiah, they all went to Egypt, where, it is probable, they mixed with the Egyptians by degrees, and were never heard of more as Israelites. Thus was there a full end made of them by their own folly and disobedience, and Egypt had the last of them, that the last verse of that chapter of threatenings might be fulfilled, Deut. xxviii. 68, The Lord shall bring thee into Egypt again. These events are more largely related by the prophet Jeremiah, ch. xl. to ch. xlv.

II. The reviving of the captive prince. Of Jehoiachin, or Jeconiah, who surrendered himself (ch. xxiv. 12), we are here told that as soon as Evil-merodach came to the crown, upon the death of his father Nebuchadnezzar, he released him out of prison (where he had lain thirty-seven years, and was now fifty-five years old), spoke kindly to him (v. 28), gave him princely clothing instead of his prison-garments, maintained him in his own palace (v. 29), and allowed him a pension for himself and his family in some measure corresponding to his rank, a daily rate for every day as long as he lived. To have honour and liberty after he had been so long in confinement and disgrace was like the return of the morning after a very dark and tedious night. Let none say that they shall never see good again because they have long seen little but evil; the most miserable know not what blessed turn Providence may yet give to their affairs, Ps. xc. 15. However the death of afflicted saints is to them such a change: it will release them out of their prison, shake off the body, that prison-garment, and it will send them to the throne, to the table, of the King of kings, the glorious liberty of God's children. Evil-merodach thought his father made the yoke of his captives too heavy, and therefore, with the tenderness of a man and the honour of a prince, made it lighter. The Jews say that this Evil-merodach had been himself imprisoned by his own father, when he returned from his madness, for some mismanagement at that time, and that in prison he contracted a friendship with Jehoiachin, in consequence of which, as soon as he had it in his power, he showed him this kindess as a sufferer, as a fellow-sufferer. Some suggest that Evil-merodach had learned from Daniel and his fellows the principles of the true religion. Thirty-six of the seventy years were now past, and now to see their king thus advanced would be a comfortable earnest to the captive people of their own release in due time, in the set time. When therefore we are perplexed, let us not be in despair.

THE FIRST BOOK OF CHRONICLES

These books of Chronicles are in a great measure repetition; and yet there are no vain repetitions. We could ill spare them; for there are many most excellent useful things in them, which we find not elsewhere. Abstracts, abridgments, and references, are of use in divinity as well as law. It is still of use, that out of the mouth of two witnesses every word may be established. The penman of these books is supposed to be Ezra, that ready scribe in the law of the Lord, Ezra vii. 6. These books are called in the Hebrew words of days—journals or annals, because, by divine direction, collected out of some public and authentic records. The collection was made after the captivity. The LXX. call it a book Παραλειπομένων—of things left, or overlooked, by the preceding historians. It is the rereward, the gathering host, of this sacred camp, which gathers up what remained, that nothing might be lost. In this first book we have, I. A collection of sacred genealogies, from Adam to David: and they are none of those which the apostle calls endless genealogies, but have their use and end in Christ, ch. i.–ix. Divers little passages of history are here inserted which we had not before. II. A repetition of the history of the translation of the kingdom from Saul to David, and of the triumph of David's reign, with large additions, ch. x.–xxi. III. An original account of the settlement David made of the ecclesiastical affairs, and the preparation he made for the building of the temple, ch. xxii.–xxix.

CHAP. I

These genealogies, I Were then of great use, when they were here preserved, and put into the hands of the Jews after their return from Babylon; for the captivity had put all into confusion, and they, in that dispersion, would be in danger of losing the distinctions of their tribes and families. This therefore revives the ancient landmarks even of some of the tribes that were carried captive into Assyria. 2. They are still of some use for the illustrating of the scripture-story, and especially for the clearing of the pedigrees of the Messiah, that it might appear that our blessed Saviour was, according to the prophecies which went before of him, the son of David, the son of Judah, the son of Abraham, the son of Adam. In this chapter we have an abstract of all the genealogies in the book of Genesis, till we come to Jacob. I. The descents from Adam to Noah and his sons, out of Gen. v., ver. 1–4. II. The posterity of Noah's sons, by which the earth was repeopled, out of Gen. x., ver. 5–23. III. The descents from Shem to Abraham, out of Gen. xi., ver. 24–28. IV. The posterity of Ishmael, and of Abraham's sons by Keturah, out of Gen. xxv., ver. 29–35. V. The posterity of Esau, out of Gen. xxxvi., ver. 36–43.

Verses 1–27

This paragraph has Adam for its first word and Abraham for its last. Adam was the common father of our flesh, Abraham the common father of the faithful. By the breach which the former made of the covenant of innocency, we were all made miserable; by the covenant of grace made with the latter, we all are, or may be, made happy. We all are, by nature, the seed of Adam, branches of that wild olive. Let us see to it that, by faith, we become the seed of Abraham (Rom. iv. 11, 12), that we be grafted into the good olive and partake of its root and fatness.

I. The first four verses of this paragraph, and the last four, which are linked together by Shem (v. 4, 24), contain the sacred line of Christ from Adam to Abraham, and are inserted in his pedigree, Luke iii. 34–38, the order ascending as here it descends.

II. All the verses between repeat the account of the replenishing of the earth by the sons of Noah after the flood. The historian begins with those who were strangers to the church, the sons of Japhet, who were planted in the isles of the Gentiles, those western parts of the world, the countries of Europe. The sons of Ham moved southward towards Africa and those parts of Asia which lay that way. The posterity of Shem, v. 17–23, peopled Asia, and spread themselves eastward. The Assyrians, Syrians, Chaldeans, Persians, and Arabians, descended from these. At first the originals of the respective nations were known; but at this day the nations are so mingled with one another, by the enlargement of commerce and dominion, the transplanting of colonies, the carrying away of captives, and many other circumstances, that no one nation, no, nor the greatest part of any, is descended entire from any one of these fountains. Only this we are sure of, that God has created of one blood all nations of men. The great promise of the Messiah (says Bishop Patrick) was translated from Adam to Seth, from him to Shem, from him to Eber, and so to the Hebrew nation, who were entrusted, above all nations, with that sacred treasure, till the promise was performed and the Messiah had come.

All nations but the seed of Abraham are already shaken off from this genealogy: they have no part nor lot in this matter. The Lord's portion is his people. Not that we are to conclude that therefore no particular persons of any other nation but the seed of Abraham found favour with God. There were many, very many, good people in the world, that lay out of the pale of God's covenant of peculiarity with Abraham, whose names were in the book of life, though not descended from any of the following families written in this book. The Lord knows those that are his. But Israel was a chosen nation, elect in type; and no other nation, in its national capacity, was so dignified and privileged as the Jewish nation was. That is the holy nation which is the subject of the sacred story; and therefore we are next to shake off all the seed of Abraham but the posterity of Jacob only.

I. We shall have little to say of the Ishmaelites. They were the sons of the bond-woman, that were to be cast out and not to be heirs with the child of the promise. Ishmael's twelve sons are just named here (v. 29–31), to show the performance of the promise God made to Abraham that he should become a great nation, and particularly that he should beget twelve princes, Gen. xvii. 20.

II. We shall have little to say of the Midianites, who descended from Abraham's children by Keturah. They were children of the east and were separated from Isaac, the heir of the promise (Gen. xxv. 6), and therefore they are only named here, v. 32.

III. We shall not have much to say of the Edomites. They had an inveterate enmity to God's Israel; yet because they descended from Esau, the son of Isaac, we have here an account of their families, and the names of some of their famous men, v. 35 to the end.

CHAP. II

The register of the children of Israel, that distinguished people, that were to "dwell alone, and not be reckoned among the nations." I. The names of the twelve sons of Israel, ver. 1, 2. II. An account of the tribe of Judah, which has the precedency, not so much for the sake of David as for the sake of the Son of David, our Lord, who sprang out of Judah, Heb. vii. 14. 1. The first descendants from Judah, down to Jesse, ver. 3–12. 2. The children of Jesse, ver. 13–17. 3 The posterity of Hezron, not only through Ram, from whom David came, but through Caleb (ver. 18–20), Segub (ver. 21–24), Jerahmeel (ver. 25–33, and so to ver. 41), and more by Caleb (ver. 42–49), with the family of Caleb, the son of Hur, ver. 50–55.

Verses 1–17

I. The family of Jacob. His twelve sons are here named, that illustrious number so often celebrated almost throughout the whole Bible. At every turn we meet with the twelve tribes that descended from these twelve patriarchs. The personal character of several of them was none of the best (the first four were much blemished), and yet the covenant was entailed on their seed; for it was of grace, free grace, that it was said, Jacob have I loved—not of works, lest any man should boast.

II. The family of Judah. That tribe was most praised, most increased, of any of the tribes, and therefore the genealogy of it is the first and largest of them all. In the account of the first branches of that illustrious tree, of which Christ was to be the top branch, we meet, 1. With some that were very bad. Here is Er, Judah's eldest son, that was evil in the sight of the Lord, and was cut off, in the beginning of his days, v. 3. His next brother, Onan, fared no better. Here is Tamar, with whom Judah, her father-in-law, committed incest, v. 4. And here is Achan, called Achar—a troubler, that troubled Israel by taking of the accursed thing, v. 7. 2. With some that were very wise and good, as Heman and Ethan, Calcol and Dara, who were not perhaps the immediate sons of Zerah, but descendants from him, and are named because they were the glory of their father's house, 1 Kings iv. 31. 3. With some that were very great, as Nahshon, who was prince of Judah when the camp of Israel was formed in the wilderness, and so led the van in that glorious march, and Salman, or Salmon, who was in that post of honour when they entered into Canaan, v. 10, 11.

III. The family of Jesse, of which a particular account is kept for the sake of David, and the Son of David, who is a rod out of the stem of Jesse, Isa. xi. 1. Hence it appears that David was a seventh son, and that his three great commanders, Joab, Abishai, and Asahel, were the sons of one of his sisters, and Amasa of another.

Very few of those to whom this paragraph relates are mentioned anywhere else. 1. Here we find Bezaleel, who was head-workman in building the tabernacle, Exod. xxxi. 2. 2. Hezron was one of the seventy that went down with Jacob into Egypt, Gen. xlvi. 12. The achievements of Jair, here mentioned (v. 22, 23), were long after the conquest of Canaan. The pedigree of several of these terminates, not in a person, but in a place or country, as one is said to be the father of Kirjath-jearim (v. 50), another of Bethlehem (v. 51), which was afterwards David's city, because these places fell to their lot in the division of the land. Among all these great families we are glad to find some that were families of scribes, v. 55. Would to God that all the Lord's people were prophets—all the families of Israel families of scribes, well instructed to the kingdom of heaven.

CHAP. III

Of all the families of Israel none was so illustrious as the family of David. That is the family which was mentioned in the foregoing chapter, ver. 15. Here we have a full account of it. I. David's sons, ver. 1–9. II. His successors in the throne as long as the kingdom continued, ver. 10–16. III. The remains of his family in and after the captivity, ver. 17–24. From this family, "as concerning the flesh, Christ came."

Verses 1–9

We had an account of David's sons, 2 Sam. iii. 2, &c., and v. 14, &c. Some of them were a grief to him, as Amnon, Absalom, and Adonijah; and none imitated his piety or devotion except Solomon, and he came far short of it. One of them, which Bath-sheba bore to him, he called Nathan, probably in honour of Nathan the prophet, who reproved him for his sin in that matter and was instrumental to bring him to repentance. It seems he loved him the better for it as long as he lived. It is wisdom to esteem those our best friends that deal faithfully with us. From this son of David our Lord Jesus descended, as appears Luke iii. 31. Here are two Elishamas, and two Eliphelets, v. 6, 8. Probably the two former were dead, and therefore David called two more by their names.

Verses 10–24

David having nineteen sons, we may suppose them to have raised many noble families in Israel whom we never hear of in the history. But the scripture gives us an account only of the descendants of Solomon here, and of Nathan, Luke iii. We have here, 1. The great and celebrated names by which the line of David is drawn down to the captivity, the kings of Judah in a lineal succession. Seldom has a crown gone in a direct line from father to son for seventeen descents together, as here. This was the recompence of David's piety. About the time of the captivity the lineal descent was interrupted, and the crown went from one brother to another and from a nephew to an uncle. 2. The less famous, and most of them very obscure names, in which the house of David subsisted after the captivity. The only famous man of that house that we meet with at their return from captivity was Zerubbabel. Salathiel is said to be the son of Jeconiah because adopted by him, and because, as some think, he succeeded him in the dignity to which he was restored by Evil-merodach. Otherwise Jeconiah was written childless: he was the signet God plucked from his right hand (Jer. xxii. 24), and in his room Zerubbabel was placed, and therefore God saith to him (Hag. ii. 23), I will make thee as a signet. The posterity of Zerubbabel here bear not the same names that they do in the genealogies (Matt. i, or Luke iii), but those no doubt were taken from the public registers which the priests kept of all the families of Judah, especially that of David.

CHAP. IV

In this chapter we have, I. A further account of the genealogies of the tribe of Judah, the most numerous and most famous of all the tribes. The posterity of Shobal the son of Hur (ver. 1–4), of Ashur the posthumous son of Hezron (who was mentioned, ch. ii. 24), with something particular concerning Jabez (ver. 5–10), of Chelub and others (ver. 11–20), of Shelah, ver. 21–23. II. An account of the posterity and cities of Simeon, their conquest of Gedon, and of the Amalekites in Mount Seir, ver. 24–43.

Verses 1–10

One reason, no doubt, why Ezra is here most particular in the register of the tribe of Judah is because it was that tribe which, with its appendages, Simeon, Benjamin, and Levi, made up the kingdom of Judah, which now when this was written, returned out of captivity, when the generality of the other tribes were lost in the kingdom of Assyria. The most remarkable person in this paragraph is Jabez, the founder of one of the families of Aharel, mentioned v. 8.

I. The reason of his name: his mother gave him the name with this reason, Because I bore him with sorrow, v. 9. Usually the sorrow in bearing is afterwards forgotten for joy that the child is born; but here it seems it was remembered when the child came to be circumcised, and care was taken to perpetuate the remembrance of it while he lived. 1. That it might be a continual memorandum to herself, to be thankful to God as long as she lived for bringing her through that sorrow. 2. That it might likewise be a memorandum to him what this world is into which she bore him, a vale of tears, in which he must expect few days and full of trouble. It might also remind him to love and honour his mother, and labour, in everything, to be a comfort to her who brought him into the world with so much sorrow.

II. The eminence of his character: He was more honourable than his brethren. We have most reason to think it was upon the account of his learning and piety. 1. In learning, because we find that the families of the scribes dwelt at Jabez (ch. ii. 55), a city which, it is likely, took its name from him. 2. In piety, because we find here that he was a praying man.

III. The prayer he made just when he was setting out in the world. He set himself to acknowledge God in all his ways, put himself under the divine blessing, and protection, and prospered accordingly. Observe,

1. To whom he prayed; he called on the God of Israel, a God in covenant with his people, the God with whom Jacob wrestled and prevailed and was thence called Israel.

2. What was the nature of his prayer. (1) As the margin reads it, it was a solemn vow—If thou wilt bless me indeed, &c., and then the sense is imperfect, but may easily be filled up from Jacob's vow, or some such like—then thou shalt be my God. He does, as it were, give God a blank paper, let him write what he pleases: "Lord, if thou wilt bless me and keep me, do what thou wilt with me, I will be at thy command and disposal for ever." (2) As the text reads it, it was the language of a most ardent and affectionate desire: O that thou wouldst bless me!

3. What was the matter of his prayer. Four things he prayed for:—(1) That God would bless him indeed: "That, blessing, thou wilt bless me, bless me greatly with manifold and abundant blessings." (2) That he would enlarge his coast, that he would prosper his endeavours for the increase of what fell to his lot either by work or war. (3) That God's hand might be with him. God's hand with us, to lead us, protect us, strengthen us, and to work all our works in us and for us, is indeed a hand sufficient for us, all-sufficient. (4) That he would keep him from evil, the evil of sin, the evil of trouble, all the evil designs of his enemies, that they might not hurt him, or grieve him.

4. God granted him that which he requested, prospered him remarkably, and gave him success in his undertakings, in his studies, in his worldly business, in his conflicts with the Canaanites.

Verses 11–23

1. Here is a whole family of craftsmen that applied themselves to all sorts of manufactures, in which they were ingenious and industrious above their neighbours, v. 14. There was a valley where they lived which was, from them, called the valley of craftsmen. 2. One of these married the daughter of Pharaoh (v. 18), which was the common name of the kings of Egypt. 3. Another is said to be the father of the house of those that wrought fine linen, v. 21. They were the best weavers in the kingdom, and they brought up their children, from one generation to another, to the same business. His posterity inhabited the city of Maseshah, the manufacture or staple commodity of which place was linen-cloth, with which their kings and priests were clothed. 4. Another family had had dominion in Moab, but were now in servitude in Babylon, v. 22, 23. (1) It was found among the ancient things that they had the dominion in Moab. Probably in David's time, when that country was conquered, they transplanted themselves thither. (2) Their posterity were now potters and gardeners in Babylon, where they dwelt with the king for his work, got a good livelihood and therefore cared not for returning to their own land, after the years of captivity had expired.

Verses 24–43

Some of the genealogies of the tribe of Simeon. Of this tribe it is said that they increased greatly, but not like the children of Judah, v. 27. 1. The cities allotted them (v. 28), of which see Joshua xix. 1, &c. When it is said that they were theirs unto the reign of David (v. 31) intimation is given that when the ten tribes revolted from the house of David many of the Simeonites quitted these cities, because they lay within Judah, and seated themselves elsewhere. 2. The ground they got elsewhere. It was in the days of Hezekiah that a generation of Simeonites, whose tribe had long crouched and truckled, was animated to make these bold efforts. (1) Some of them attacked a place in Arabia called the entrance of Gedor, made themselves masters of it, and dwelt there. This adds to the glory of Hezekiah's pious reign, that, as his kingdom in general prospered, so did particular families. (2) Others of them, to the number of 500, under the command of four brethren, here named, made a descent upon Mount Seir, and smote the Amalekites, and took possession of their country, v. 42, 43.

CHAP. V

The two tribes and a half that were seated on the other side Jordan. I. Of Reuben, ver. 1–10. II. Of Gad, ver. 11–17 III Of the half-tribe of Manasseh, ver. 23, 24. IV. Concerning all three acting in conjunction we are told, 1. How they conquered the Hagarites, ver. 18–22. 2. How they were, at length, themselves conquered, and made captives, by the king of Assyria, because they had forsaken God, ver. 25, 26.

Verses 1–17

An extract out of the genealogies,

I. Of the tribe of Reuben, where we have,

1. The reason why this tribe is thus postponed. Reuben the first born of Israel forfeited his birthright by defiling his father's concubine, Gen. xlix. 4. The advantages of the birthright were dominion and a double portion. Reuben having forfeited these, it was thought too much that both should be transferred to any one, and therefore they were divided. (1) Joseph had the double portion; for two tribes descended from him, Ephraim and Manasseh, each of whom had a child's part (for so Jacob by faith blessed them, Heb. xi. 21; Gen. xlviii. 15, 22), and each of those tribes was as considerable, and made as good a figure, as any one of the twelve, except Judah. But, (2) Judah had the dominion; on him the dying patriarch entailed the sceptre, Gen. xlix. 10. Of him came the chief ruler, David first, and, in the fulness of time, Messiah the Prince, Micah v. 2.

2. The genealogy of the princes of this tribe to Beerah, who was head of this clan when the king of Assyria carried them captive, v. 4–6.

3. The enlargement of the coasts of this tribe. They increasing, and their cattle being multiplied, they crowded out their neighbours the Hagarites, and extended their conquests, v. 9, 10.

II. Of the tribe of Gad. Some great families of that tribe are here named (v. 12), seven that were the children of Abihail, whose pedigree is carried upwards from the son to the father (v. 14, 15), as that v. 4, 5, is brought downwards from father to son.

Verses 18–26

The heads of the half-tribe of Manasseh, that were seated on the other side Jordan, are named here, v. 23, 24. Their lot, at first, was Bashan only; but afterwards they increased so much in wealth and power that they spread far north, even unto Hermon. Two things only are here recorded concerning these tribes on the other side Jordan, in which they were all concerned. They all shared,

I. In a glorious victory over the Hagarites, so the Ishmaelites were now called, to remind them that they were the sons of the bond-woman, that was cast out.

1. What a brave army these frontier-tribes brought into the field against the Hagarites, 44,000 men and upwards, all strong, and brave, and skilful in war.

2. What course they took to engage God for them: They cried to God, and put their trust in him, v. 20. Though they had a powerful army, they relied not on that, but on the divine power. See the like done, 2 Chron. xiii. 14. In our spiritual conflicts, we must look up to heaven for strength; and it is the believing prayer that will be the prevailing prayer.

3. If the battle be the Lord's, there is reason to hope it will be successful.

II. They shared, at length, in an inglorious captivity. Had they kept close to God and their duty, they would have continued to enjoy both their ancient lot and their new conquests; but they transgressed against the God of their fathers, v. 25. They lay upon the borders and conversed most with the neighbouring nations, by which means they learned their idolatrous usages and transmitted the infection to the other tribes. These tribes were first placed, and they were first displaced. They would have the best land, not considering that it lay most exposed. But those who are governed more by sense than by reason or faith in their choices may expect to fare accordingly.

CHAP. VI

Though Joseph and Judah shared between them the forfeited honours of the birthright, yet Levi was first of all the tribes, dignified and distinguished with an honour more valuable than either the precedency or the double portion, and that was the priesthood. That tribe God set apart for himself; it was Moses's tribe, and perhaps for his sake was thus favoured. Of that tribe we have an account in this chapter. I. Their pedigree, the first fathers of the tribe (ver. 1–3), the line of the priests, from Aaron to the captivity (ver. 4–15), and of some other of their families, ver. 16–30. II. Their work, the work of the Levites (ver. 31–48), of the priests, ver. 49–53. III. The cities appointed them in the land of Canaan, ver. 54–81.

Verses 1–30

The priests and Levites were more concerned than any other Israelites to preserve their pedigree clear and to be able to prove it, because all the honours and privileges of their office depended upon their descent. Very little is here recorded of the genealogies of this sacred tribe. 1. The first fathers of it are here named twice, v. 1, 16. Gershom, Kohath, and Merari, are three names which we were very conversant with in the book of Numbers. Aaron, and Moses, and Miriam, we have known much more of than their names, remembering that God honoured them in making them the instruments of Israel's deliverance and settlement and figures of him that was to come, Moses as a prophet and Aaron as a priest. And the mention of Nadab and Abihu cannot but remind us of the terrors of divine justice. 2. The line of Eleazar, the successor of Aaron, is here drawn down to the time of the captivity v. 4–15. It begins with Eleazar, who came out of the house of bondage in Egypt, and ends with Jehozadak, who went into the house of bondage in Babylon. All these here named were not high priests; for, in the time of the judges, that dignity was, upon some occasion or other, brought into the family of Ithamar, of which Eli was; but in Zadok it returned again to the right line. Of Azariah it is here said (v. 10), He it is that executed the priest's office in the temple that Solomon built. It is supposed that this was that Azariah who bravely opposed the presumption of king Uzziah when he invaded the priest's office (2 Chron. xxvi. 17, 18). This was done like a priest, like one that was truly zealous for his God. One of the families of Gershom (that of Libni) is here drawn down as far as Samuel, who had the honour of a prophet added to that of a Levite. One of the families of Merari (that of Mahli) is likewise drawn down for several descents, v. 29, 30.

When the Levites were first ordained in the wilderness much of the work then appointed them lay in carrying and taking care of the tabernacle and the utensils of it, while they were in their march through the wilderness. In David's time their number was increased; and, though the greater part of them were dispersed all the nation over, to teach the people the good knowledge of the Lord, yet those that attended the house of God were so numerous that there was not constant work for them all; and therefore David, by special commission and direction from God, new-modelled the Levites, as we shall find in the latter part of this book. Here we are told what the work was which he assigned them.

I. Singing-work, v. 31. David was raised up on high to be the sweet psalmist of Israel (2 Sam. xxiii. 1), not only to pen psalms, but to appoint the singing of them in the house of the Lord, and this he did after that the ark had rest. While that was in captivity, obscure, and unsettled, the harps were hung upon the willow-trees: singing was then thought unseasonable, but the harps being resumed, and the songs revived, at the bringing up of the ark, they were continued afterwards. When the service of the ark was much superseded by its rest they had other work cut out for them (for Levites should never be idle) and were employed in the service of song. These singers kept up that service in the tabernacle till the temple was built, and then they waited on their office there, v. 32. We have here an account of the three great masters who were employed in the service of the sacred song, with their respective families; for they waited with their children, that is, such as descended from them or were allied to them, v. 33. Heman, Asaph, and Ethan, were the three that were appointed to this service, one of each of the three houses of the Levites. 1. Of the house of Kohath was Heman with his family (v. 33), a man of a sorrowful spirit, if it be the same Heman that penned the 88th psalm, and yet a singer. He was the grandson of Samuel the prophet, the son of Joel, of whom it is said that he walked not in the ways of Samuel (1 Sam. viii. 2, 3); but it seems, though the son did not, the grandson did. Perhaps David, in making Heman the chief, had some respect to his old friend Samuel. 2. Of the house of Gershom was Asaph, called his brother, because in the same office and of the same tribe, though of another family. He was posted on Heman's right hand in the choir, v. 39. Several of the psalms bear his name. It is plain that he was the penman of some psalms; for we read of those that praised the Lord in the words of David and of Asaph. He was a seer as well as a singer, 2 Chron. xxix. 30. His pedigree is traced up here, through names utterly unknown, as high as Levi, v. 39–43. 3. Of the house of Merari was Ethan (v. 44), who was appointed to Heman's left hand. His pedigree is also traced up to Levi, v. 47.

II. There was serving-work, abundance of service to be done in the tabernacle of the house of God (v. 48), to provide water and fuel,—to wash and sweep, and carry out ashes,—to kill, and flay, and boil the sacrifices; and to all such services there were Levites appointed, those of other families, or perhaps those that were not fit to be singers, that had either no good voice or no good ear. As everyone has received the gift, so let him minister.

III. There was sacrificing-work, and that was to be done by the priests only, v. 49. They only were to sprinkle the blood and burn the incense; as for the work of the most holy place, that was to be done by the high priest only. Each had his work, and they both needed one another and both helped one another in it. Concerning the work of the priests we are here told, they were to make an atonement for Israel, to mediate between the people and God; not to magnify and enrich themselves, but to serve the public. They presided in God's house, yet must do as they were bidden, according to all that God commanded.

An account of the Levites' cities. They and their possessions were, in a particular manner, the care of the divine providence: as God was their portion, so God was their protection; and a cottage will be a castle to those that abide under the shadow of the Almighty. It is common for cities to have several names. Sarum and Salisbury, Salop and Shrewsbury, are more unlike than Hilen (v. 58) and Holon (Joshua xxi. 15), Ashan (v. 59) and Ain (Joshua xxi. 16), Alemeth (v. 60) and Almon (Joshua xxi. 18); and time changes names. In this appointment of cities for the Levites God took care, 1. For Jacob's prediction concerning this tribe, that it should be scattered in Israel, Gen. xlix. 7. 2. For the diffusing of the knowledge of himself and his law to all parts of the land of Israel. Every tribe had Levites' cities in it. 3. For a comfortable maintenance for those that ministered in holy things. Some of the most considerable cities of Israel fell to the Levites' lot.

CHAP. VII

The genealogies, I. Of Issachar, ver. 1–5. II. Of Benjamin, ver. 6–12. III. Of Naphtali, ver. 13. IV. Of Manasseh, ver. 14–19. V. Of Ephraim, ver. 20–29. VI. Of Asher, ver. 30–40.

Verses 1–19

A short view,

I. Of the tribe of Issachar, whom Jacob had compared to a strong ass, couching between two burdens (Gen. xlix. 14), an industrious tribe, that minded their country business very closely and rejoiced in their tents, Deut. xxxiii. 18. So fruitful their country was that they saw no danger of over-stocking the pasture, and so ingenious the people were that they could find work for all hands. Let no people complain of their numbers, provided they suffer none to be idle. The number of the respective families is here set down, amounting in the whole to above 145,000 men fit for war.

II. Of the tribe of Benjamin. Some account is here given of this tribe, but a much larger in the next chapter. The militia of this tribe scarcely reached to 60,000; but they are said to be mighty men of valour, v. 7, 9, 11. It was the honour of this tribe that it produced Saul the first king, and more its honour that it adhered to the rightful kings of the house of David when the other tribes revolted.

III. Of the tribe of Naphtali, v. 13. The first fathers only of that tribe are named, the very same that we find, Gen. xlvi. 24, only that Shillem there is Shallum here. None of their descendants are named, perhaps because their genealogies were lost.

IV. Of the tribe of Manasseh, that part of it which was seated within Jordan; for of the other part we had some account before, ch. v. 23, &c. One of them married an Aramitess, that is, a Syrian, v. 14. This was during their bondage in Egypt, so early did they begin to mingle with the nations. The father married a Syrian, Machir; the son of that marriage took to wife a daughter of Benjamin, v. 15.

Verses 20–40

An account,

I. Of the tribe of Ephraim. Great things we read of that tribe when it came to maturity. Here we have the disasters of its infancy, while it was in Egypt. 1. The great breach that was made upon the family of Ephraim. The men of Gath, Philistines, giants, slew many of the sons of that family, because they came down to take away their cattle, v. 21. It is uncertain who were the aggressors here. Some make the men of Gath the aggressors, supposing that they came down into the land of Goshen, to drive away the Ephraimites' cattle, and slew the owners, because they stood up in the defence of them. Others think that the Ephraimites made a descent upon the men of Gath to plunder them. I rather think that the men of Gath came down upon the Ephraimites, because the Israelites in Egypt were shepherds, not soldiers, abounded in cattle of their own, and therefore were not likely to venture their lives for their neighbours' cattle: and the words may be read, The men of Gath slew them, for they came down to take away their cattle. Ephraim mourned many days. Nothing brings the aged to the grave with more sorrow than their following the young that descend from them to the grave first, especially if in blood. It was a brotherly friendly office which his brethren did, when they came to comfort him. The repair of this breach, in some measure, by the addition of another son to his family in his old age (v. 23), like Seth, another seed instead of that of Abel whom Cain slew, Gen. iv. 25. When God thus restores comfort to his mourners, makes glad according to the days wherein he afflicted, setting the mercies over against the crosses, we ought therein to take notice of the kindness and tenderness of divine Providence; it is as if it repented God concerning his servants, Ps. xc. 13, 15. Yet joy that a man was born into his family could not make him forget his grief; for he gives a melancholy name to this son, Beriah—in trouble, for he was born when the family was in mourning, when it went evil with his house. It is added, as a further honour to the house of Ephraim, that a son of that tribe was employed in the conquest of Canaan, Joshua the son of Nun, v. 27.

II. Of the tribe of Asher. Some men of note of that tribe are here named. Their militia was not numerous in comparison with some other tribes, only 26,000 men in all; but their princes were choice and mighty men of valour, chief of the princes (v. 40), and perhaps it was their wisdom that they coveted not to make their trained bands numerous, but rather to have a few serviceable men.

CHAP. VIII

We had some account given us of Benjamin in the foregoing chapter; here we have a larger catalogue of the great men of that tribe. 1. Because of that tribe Saul came, the first king of Israel, ch. x. 1. 2. Because that tribe clave to Judah, inhabited much of Jerusalem, was one of the two tribes that went into captivity, and returned back, ch. ix. 1. Here is, I. Some of the heads of that tribe named, ver. 1–32. II. A more particular account of the family of Saul, ver. 33–40.

Verses 1–32

There is little or nothing of history in all these verses. In this and the foregoing genealogies some

*a*scend, others *de*scend; some have numbers affixed, others places; some have historical remarks intermixed, others have not; some are shorter, others longer; some agree with other records, other differ; some, it is likely, were torn, erased, and blotted, others more legible. Those of Dan and Reuben were entirely lost. Many things in these genealogies which to us seem intricate, abrupt, and perplexed, were plain and easy to them then (who knew how to fill up the deficiencies). Many great and mighty nations there were now in being upon earth, and many illustrious men in them, whose names are buried in perpetual oblivion, while the names of multitudes of the Israel of God are here carefully preserved in everlasting remembrance. They are Jasher, Jeshurun —just ones, and the memory of the just is blessed. This tribe of Benjamin was once brought to a very low ebb, in the time of the judges, upon the occasion of the iniquity of Gibeah, when only 600 men escaped the sword of justice; and yet, in these genealogies, it makes as good a figure as almost any of the tribes. Here is mention of one Ehud (v. 6), in the preceding verse of one Gera (v. 5) and (v. 8) of one that descended from him, that begat children in the country of Moab, who was the second of the judges of Israel; for he is said to be the son of Gera and a Benjamite (Judges iii. 15), and he delivered Israel from the oppression of the Moabites by killing the king of Moab. Here is mention of some of the Benjamites that drove away the inhabitants of Gath (v. 13), perhaps those that had slain the Ephraimites (ch. vii. 21) and one of those that did this piece of justice was named Beriah. Particular notice is taken of those that dwelt in Jerusalem (v. 28 and again v. 32), that those whose ancestors had had their residence there might thereby be induced, at their return from captivity, to settle there and therefore we find (Neh. xi. 2) the people blessed those that willingly offered themselves to dwell at Jerusalem.

Verses 33–40

Among all the genealogies of the tribes there is no mention of any of the kings of Israel after their defection from the house of David, much less of their families; not a word of Jeroboam's house or Baasha's, or Omri's or Jehu's; for they were all idolaters. But of the family of Saul, which was the royal family before the elevation of David, we have here a particular account. 1. Before Saul, Kish and Ner only are named, his father and grandfather, v. 33. He was in truth the son of Ner but the grandson of Abiel, as appears by 1 Sam. xiv. 51. 2. After Saul, divers of his sons are named, but the posterity of none of them, save Jonathan only, for the sake of his sincere kindness to David. This genealogy ends in Ulam, whose family became famous in the tribe of Benjamin for the number of its valiant men. Of that one man's posterity, there were at one time 150 archers.

CHAP. IX

This chapter intimates to us that one end of recording all these genealogies was to direct the Jews, now that they had returned, out of captivity, with whom to incorporate and where to reside; for here we have an account of those who first took possession of Jerusalem after their return from Babylon, and began the rebuilding of it upon the old foundation. I. The Israelites, ver. 2–9. II. The priests, ver. 10–13. III. The Levites and other Nethinim, ver. 14–26. IV. Here is the particular charge of some of the priests and Levites, ver. 27–34. V. A repetition of the genealogy of king Saul, ver. 35–44.

Verses 1–13

The first verse tells us of the books of the kings of Israel and Judah. Mentioning Israel and Judah, the historian takes notice of their being carried away to Babylon for their transgression. Then follows an account of the first inhabitants, after their return from captivity, that dwelt in their cities, especially in Jerusalem. 1. The Israelites. That general name is used (v. 2) because with those of Judah and Benjamin there were many of Ephraim and Manasseh, and the other ten tribes (v. 3), such as had escaped to Judah when the body of the ten tribes were carried captive or returned to Judah upon the revolutions in Assyria, and so went into captivity with them. It was foretold that the children of Judah and of Israel should be gathered together and come up out of the land (Hosea i. 11), and that they should be one nation again, Ezek. xxxvii. 22. Pieces of metal that had been separated will run together again when melted in the same crucible. Many both of Judah and Israel stayed behind in captivity. 2. The priests, v. 10. It was their praise that they came with the first. (1) It is said of one of them that he was the ruler of the house of God (v. 11) not the chief ruler, for Joshua was then the high priest, but the sagan, the next under him. (2) It is said of many of them that they were very able men for the service of the house of God, v. 13. In the house of God there is service to be done, constant service; and it is well for the church when those are employed in that service who are qualified for it, able ministers of the New Testament, 2 Cor. iii. 6. The service of the temple required great courage and vigour of mind, as well as strength of body; and therefore they are praised as mighty men of valour.

Verses 14–34

The good posture which the affairs of religion were put into immediately upon the return of the people out of Babylon. The late want of ordinances made them very zealous in setting up the worship of God among them; and so they began their worship of God at the right end.

I. Before the house of the Lord was built they had the house of the tabernacle, a plain and movable tent. Those that cannot yet reach to have a temple must not be without a tabernacle, but be thankful for that and make the best of it. Never let God's work be left undone for want of a place to do it in.

II. In allotting to the priests and Levites their respective employments, they had the model that was drawn up by David, and Samuel the seer, v. 22. Samuel, in his time, had drawn the scheme of it, and laid the foundation, though the ark was then in obscurity, and David afterwards finished it, and both acted by immediate direction from God.

III. The most of them dwelt at Jerusalem (v. 34), yet there were some that dwelt in the villages (v. 16, 22), because, it may be, there was not yet room for them in Jerusalem. However they were employed in the service of the tabernacle (v. 25).

IV. Many of the Levites were employed as porters at the gates of the house of God, four chief porters (v. 26), and, under them, others, to the number of 212, v. 22. They had the oversight of the gates (v. 23), were keepers of the thresholds, as in the margin (v. 19), and keepers of the entry. This seemed a mean office; and yet David would rather have it than dwell in the tents of wickedness, Ps. lxxxiv. 10. Their office was, 1. To open the doors of God's house every morning (v. 27) and shut them at night. 2. To keep off the unclean, and hinder those from thrusting in that were forbidden by the law. 3. To direct and introduce into the courts of the Lord those that came thither to worship. Ministers have work to do of this kind.

V. Here is one Phinehas, a son of Eleazar, that is said to be a ruler over them in time past (v. 20), not the famous high priest of that name, but an eminent Levite, of whom it is here said that the Lord was with him, or (as the Chaldee reads it) the Word of the Lord was his helper.

VI. It is said of some of them that they lodged roundabout the house of God, v. 27. The Levites pitched about the tabernacle when they marched through the wilderness. Then they were porters in one sense, bearing the burdens of the sanctuary, now porters in another sense, attending the gates and the doors—in both instances keeping the charge of the sanctuary.

VII. Every one knew his charge. Some were entrusted with the ministering vessels, to bring them in and out, v. 28. Others were appointed to prepare the fine flour, wine, oil, &c., v. 29. Others, that were priests, made up the holy anointing oil, v. 30. Others took care of the meat-offerings, v. 31. Others of the shewbread, v. 32. God is the God of order: but that which is everybody's work will be nobody's work.

VIII. The singers were employed in that work day and night, v. 33. They were the chief fathers of the Levites that made a business of it, not mean singing-men that made a trade of it. They remained in the chambers of the temple, that they might closely and constantly attend it, and were therefore excused from all other services. It should seem, some companies were continually singing, at least at stated hours, both day and night. Thus was God continually praised.

Verses 35–44

These verses are the very same with ch. viii. 29–38, giving an account of the ancestors of Saul and the posterity of Jonathan. There it is the conclusion of the genealogy of Benjamin; here it is an introduction to the story of Saul.

CHAP. X

In this chapter we have, I. The fatal rout which the Philistines gave to Saul's army, and the fatal stroke which he gave himself, ver. 1–7. II. The Philistines' triumph therein, ver. 8–10. III. The respect which the men of Jabesh-Gilead showed the royal corpse, ver. 11, 12. IV. The reason of Saul's rejection, ver. 13, 14.

Verses 1–7

This account of Saul's death is the same which we had, 1 Sam. xxxi. 1, &c. Only let us observe, 1. Princes sin and the people suffer for it. 2. Parents sin and the children suffer for it. When the measure of Saul's iniquity was full, and his day came to fall (which David foresaw, 1 Sam. xxvi. 10), he not only descended into battle and perished himself, but his sons (all but Ishbosheth) perished with him, and Jonathan among the rest, that gracious, generous man; for all things come alike to all.

Verses 8–14

I. From the triumph of the Philistines over the body of Saul we may learn, 1. That the greater dignity men are advanced to the greater disgrace they are in danger of falling into. 2. That, if we give not to God the glory of our successes, even the Philistines will rise up in judgment against us and condemn us; for, when they had obtained a victory over Saul, they sent tidings to their idols—poor idols, that knew not what was done a few miles off till the tidings were brought them, nor then either! They also put Saul's armour in the house of their gods, v. 10.

II. From the triumph of the men of Jabesh-Gilead in the rescue of the bodies of Saul and his sons we learn that there is a respect due to the remains of the deceased. We must treat the dead body as those who remember it has been united to an immortal soul and must be so again.

III. From the divine Justice in the ruin of Saul we may learn, 1. That the sin of sinners will certainly find them out. 2. That no man's greatness can exempt him from the judgments of God.

CHAP. XI

In this chapter is repeated, I. The elevation of David to the throne, immediately upon the death of Saul, by common consent, ver. 1–3. II. His gaining the castle of Zion out of the hands of the Jebusites, ver. 4–9. III. The catalogue of the worthies and great men of his kingdom, ver. 10–47.

Verses 1–9

David is here brought to the possession,

I. Of the throne of Israel, after he had reigned seven years in Hebron, over Judah only. In consideration of his relation to them (v. 1), his former good services, and especially the divine designation (v. 2), they anointed him their king: he covenanted to protect them, and they to bear faith and true allegiance to him, v. 3.

II. Of the stronghold of Zion, which was held by the Jebusites till David's time. Whether David had a particular eye upon it as a place fit to make a royal city, or whether he had a promise of it from God, it seems that one of his first exploits was to make himself master of that fort; and, when he had it, he called it the city of David, v. 7. To this reference is had, Ps. ii. 6. I have set my king upon my holy hill of Zion.

Verses 10–47

An account of David's worthies, the great men of his time that served him and were preferred by him. The first edition of this catalogue we had, 2 Sam. xxiii. 8, &c. This is much the same, only that those named here from v. 41 to the end are added.

I. The connexion of this catalogue with that which is said concerning David, v. 9. The Lord of hosts was with him, and these were the mighty men which he had. God was with him and wrought for him, but by men and means and the use of second causes.

II. The title of this catalogue (v. 10): These are the men who strengthened themselves with him. In strengthening him they strengthened themselves and their own interest; for his advancement was theirs.

III. That which made all these men honourable was the good service that they did to their king and country; they helped to make David King (v. 10)—a good work. They slew the Philistines, and other public enemies, and were instrumental to save Israel. The honours of Christ's kingdom are prepared for those that fight the good fight of faith, that labour and suffer, and are willing to venture all, even life itself, for Christ and a good conscience.

IV. Among all the great exploits of David's mighty men, here is nothing great mentioned concerning David himself but his pouring out water before the Lord which he had longed for, v. 18, 19. Four very honourable dispositions of David appeared in that action. 1. Repentance for his own weakness. 2. Denial of his own appetite. He longed for the water of the well of Bethlehem; but, when he had it, he would not drink it, because he would not so far humour himself and gratify a foolish fancy. 3. Devotion towards God. That water which he thought too good, too precious, for his own drinking, he poured out to the Lord for a drink-offering. 4. Tenderness of his servants. It put him into the greatest confusion imaginable to think that three brave men should hazard their lives to fetch water for him.

V. In the wonderful achievements of these heroes the power of God must be acknowledged.

VI. One of these worthies is said to be an Ammonite (v. 39), another a Moabite (v. 46), and yet the law was that an Ammonite and a Moabite should not enter into the congregation of the Lord, Deut. xxiii. 3. These, it is likely, had approved themselves so hearty for the interest of Israel that in their case it was thought fit to dispense with that law, and the rather because it was an indication that the Son of David would have worthies among the Gentiles.

CHAP. XII

It was not all at once, but gradually, that David ascended the throne. His kingdom was to last; and therefore, like fruits that keep longest, it ripened slowly. I. What help came in to him to Ziklag, to make him king of Judah, ver. 1–22. II. What help came in to him in Hebron, to make him king over all Israel, above seven years after, ver. 23–40.

Verses 1–22

An account of those that appeared and acted as David's friends, upon the death of Saul, to bring about the revolution. All the force he had, while he was persecuted, was but 600 men, but, when the time had come that he must begin to act offensively, Providence brought in more to his assistance. Even while he kept himself close, because of Saul (v. 1), while he did not appear, to invite or encourage his friends and well wishers to come in to him (not foreseeing that the death of Saul was so near), God was inclining and preparing them to come over to him. Those that trust God to do his work for them in his own way and time shall find his providence outdoing all their forecast and contrivance.

I. Some even of Saul's brethren, of the tribe of Benjamin, and a-kin to him, came over to David, v. 2. These Benjamites are described to be men of great dexterity, that were trained up in shooting and slinging, and used both hands alike—ingenious active men. See Judges xx. 16.

II. Some of the tribe of Gad, though seated on the other side Jordan, had such a conviction of David's title and fitness that they separated themselves from their brethren to go to David, though he was in the hold in the wilderness (v. 8). They were but few, eleven in all, here named, but they added much to David's strength. Those that had hitherto come were most of them men of broken fortunes, distressed, discontented, and soldiers of fortune, that came to him rather for protection than to do him any service, 1 Sam. xxii. 2. But these Gadites were brave men, men of war, and fit for the battle, v. 8. They were disciplined men in their own tribe (v. 14). What enemies those were that they met with in the valleys, when they had passed Jordan, does not appear; but they put them to flight with their lion-like faces, and pursued them with matchless fury, both towards the east and towards the west.

III. Some of Judah and Benjamin came to him, v. 16. Their leader was Amasai, whether the same with that Amasa that afterwards sided with Absalom (2 Sam. xvii. 25) does not appear.

1. David's prudent treaty with them, v. 17. He was surprised to see them, having been so often in danger by the treachery of the men of Ziph and the men of Keilah, who yet were all men of Judah. No marvel that he meets these men of Judah with caution.

(1) How fairly he deals with them. [1] If they be faithful and honourable, he will be their rewarder. But, [2] If they be false, and come to betray him into the hands of Saul, under colour of friendship, he leaves them to God to be their avenger. Never was man more violently run upon, and run down, than David was (except the Son of David himself), and yet he had the testimony of his conscience that there was no wrong in his hands.

(2) In this appeal observe, [1] He calls God the God of our fathers, both his fathers and theirs. Thus he reminded them not to deal ill with him; for they were both descendants from the same patriarchs, and both dependents on the same God. [2] He does not imprecate any fearful judgment upon them.

2. Their hearty closure with him, v. 18. Amasai was their spokesman, on whom the Spirit of the Lord came. Nothing could be said finer, more lively, or more pertinent to the occasion. Thine are we, David, and on thy side, thou son of Jesse. In calling him son of Jesse they reminded themselves that he was lineally descended from Nahshon and Salmon, who in their days were princes of the tribe of Judah. Saul called him so in disdain (1 Sam. xx. 27; xxii. 7), but they looked upon it as his honour. "Peace, peace, be unto thee, all the good thy heart desires, and peace be to thy helpers, among whom we desire to be reckoned, that peace may be on us." He assured him of help from heaven: "For thy God helpeth thee." From these expressions of Amasai we may take instruction how to testify our affection and allegiance to the Lord Jesus.

3. David's cheerful acceptance of them into his interest and friendship. David received them, and preferred them to be captains of the band.

IV. Some of Manasseh likewise joined in with him, v. 19. Providence gave them a fair opportunity to do so when he and his men marched through their country upon this occasion. We have the story, 1 Sam. xxix. 4, &c. In his return some great men of Manasseh struck in with David to help him against the band of Amalekites who had plundered Ziklag.

Verses 23–40

An account of those who were active in perfecting the settlement of David upon the throne, after the death of Ishbosheth. The quota which every tribe brought in ready armed to war, in case there should be any opposition, v. 23.

I. Those tribes that lived nearest brought in the fewest—Judah but 6,800 (v. 24), Simeon but 7,100 (v. 25); whereas Zebulun, that lay remote, brought 50,000, Asher 40,000, and the two tribes and a half on the other side Jordan 120,000. Not as if the adjacent tribes were cold in the cause; but they showed prudence in bringing few, since all the rest lay within call.

II. The Levites themselves, and the priests (called here the Aaronites), appeared very hearty in this cause, and were ready, if there were occasion, to fight for David, as well as pray for him, because they knew he was called of God to the government, v. 26–28.

III. Even some of the kindred of Saul came over to David (v. 29).

IV. It is said of most of these that they were mighty men of valour (v. 25, 28, 30), of others that they were expert in war (v. 35, 36), and of them all that they could keep rank, v. 38.

V. Some were so considerate as to bring with them arms.

VI. The men of Issachar were the fewest of all, only 200, and yet as serviceable to David's interest as those that brought in the greatest numbers, these few being in effect the whole tribe. They were weather-wise. They understood public affairs, the temper of the nation, and the tendencies of the present events. We read of the princes of Issachar, Judges v. 15. They knew how to rule, and the rest knew how to obey.

VII. It is said of them all that they engaged in this enterprise with a perfect heart (v. 38).

VIII. The men of Judah, and others of the adjacent tribes, prepared for the victualling of their respective camps when they came to Hebron, v. 39, 40.

CHAP. XIII

In this chapter care is taken about religion. I. David consults with the representatives of the people about bringing up the ark out of its obscurity into a public place, ver. 1–4. II. With a great deal of solemnity and joy, it is carried from Kirjath-jearim, ver. 5–8. III. Uzza is struck dead for touching it, ver. 9–14.

Verses 1–8

I. David's pious proposal to bring up the ark of God to Jerusalem, that the royal city might be the holy city, v. 1–3.

1. As soon as David was well seated on his throne he had thoughts concerning the ark of God: Let us bring the ark to us, v. 3. (1) To do honour to God, by showing respect to his ark, the token of his presence. (2) To have the comfort and benefit of that sacred oracle. "Let us bring it to us, not only that we may be a credit to it, but that it may be a blessing to us." It is the wisdom of those who are setting out in the world to take God's ark with them, to make his oracles their counsellors and his laws their rule.

2. He consulted with the leaders of the people about it, v. 1. (1) That he might show respect to the great men of the kingdom and put honour upon them. No prince that is wise will covet to be absolute. (2) That he might be advised by them in the manner of doing it.

3. He would have all the people summoned to attend on this occasion, both for the honour of the ark and for the people's satisfaction and edification, v. 2. (1) He calls the common people brethren, which bespeaks his humility and condescension. (2) He speaks of the people as a remnant that had escaped: Our brethren that are left in all the land of Israel. They had been under scattering providences. (3) He takes care that the priests and Levites especially should be summoned to attend the ark.

4. All this is upon supposition that it is of the Lord their God.

5. Thus it was requisite they should amend what had been amiss in the last reign: "For we enquired not at it in the days of Saul, and David makes no peevish reflections upon Saul, but, in general, We enquired not at it, making himself with others guilty of the neglect.

II. The people's ready agreement to this proposal (v. 4): The thing was right in the eyes of all the people.

III. The solemnity of bringing up the ark, v. 5, &c., which we read before, 2 Sam. vi. 1, &c.

Verses 9–14

This breach upon Uzza, which caused all the joy to cease, we had an account of, 2 Sam. vi. 6, &c. Let the sin of Uzza warn us all to take heed of presumption, rashness, and irreverence, in dealing about holy things (v. 9), and not to think that a good intention will justify a bad action.

CHAP. XIV

I. David's kingdom established, ver. 1, 2. II. His family built up, ver. 3–7. III. His enemies, the Philistines, routed in two campaigns, ver. 8–17. This is repeated here from 2 Sam. v. 11, &c.

Verses 1–7

1. There is no man that has such a sufficiency in himself but he has need of his neighbours and has reason to be thankful for their help: David had a very large kingdom, Hiram a very little one; yet David could not build himself a house to his mind unless Hiram furnished him with both workmen and materials, v. 1. 2. It is a great satisfaction to a wise man to be settled, and to a good man to see the special providence of God in his settlement. The people had made David king; but he could not be easy till he perceived that the Lord had confirmed him king over Israel, v. 2. 3. We must look upon all our advancements as designed for our usefulness. We are blessed in order that we may be blessings. See Gen. xii. 2.

Verses 8–17

This narrative of David's triumph over the Philistines is much the same with that, 2 Sam. v. 17, &c. Let the attack which the Philistines made upon David forbid us to be secure in any settlement or advancement. When we are most easy something or other may come to be a terror or vexation to us. Christ's kingdom will thus be insulted by the serpent's seed, especially when it makes any advances. Let David's thankful acknowledgment of the hand of God in his successes direct us to bring all our sacrifices of praise to God's altar. Not unto us, O Lord! not unto us, but to thy name give glory.

CHAP. XV

The bringing in of the ark to the city of David was a very good work; it was attempted, but not perfected; it lay in the house of Obed-edom. Now this chapter gives us an account of the completing of that good work. I. How it was done more regularly than before. 1. A place was prepared for it, ver. 1. 2. The priests were ordered to carry it, ver. 2–15. 3. The Levites had their offices assigned them in attending on it, ver. 16–24. II. How it was done more successfully than before, ver. 25. 1. The Levites made no mistake in their work, ver. 26. 2. David and the people met with no damp upon their joy, ver. 27, 28.

Verses 1–24

Preparation is here made for the bringing of the ark home to the city of David from the house of Obed-edom. 1. David now prepared a place for the reception of the ark, before he brought it to him. He had not time to build a house, but he pitched a tent for it (v. 1), probably according to the pattern shown to Moses in the mount, or as near it as might be, of curtains and boards. Wherever we build for ourselves, we must be sure to make room for God's ark, for a church in the house. 2. David now ordered that the Levites or priests should carry the ark upon their shoulders. The Kohathites carried it in their ordinary marches, and therefore had no waggons allotted them, because their work was to bear upon their shoulders, Num. vii. 9. But upon extraordinary occasions, as when they passed Jordan and compassed Jericho, the priests carried it. This rule was express, and yet David himself forgot it, and put the ark upon a cart. David now took care not only to summon the Levites to the solemnity, as he did all Israel (v. 3) and had done before (ch. xiii. 2), but to see that they assembled (v. 4), especially the sons of Aaron, v. 11. To them he gives that solemn charge (v. 12): You are the chief of the fathers of the Levites, therefore do you bring up the ark of the Lord. 3. The Levites and Priests sanctified themselves (v. 14) and were ready to carry the ark on their shoulders, according to the law, v. 15. 4. Officers were appointed to be ready to bid the ark welcome, with every possible expression of joy, v. 16. Heman, Asaph, and Ethan, were now first appointed, v. 17. They undertook to sound with symbols (v. 19), others with psalteries (v. 20), others with harps, on the Sheminith, or eighth, eight notes higher or lower than the rest, according to the rules of concert, v. 21. Some that were priests blew with the trumpet (v. 24), as was usual at the removal of the ark (Num. x. 8) and at solemn feasts, Ps. lxxxi. 3. And one was appointed for song (v. 22), for he was skilful in it, could sing well himself and instruct others.

Verses 25–29

All things being got ready for the carrying of the ark to the city of David, and its reception there, we have here an account of the solemnity of this conveyance thither from the house of Obed-edom.

I. God helped the Levites that carried it. If God did not help us, we could not stir a step. The Levites, remembering the breach upon Uzza, were probably ready to tremble when they took up the ark; but God helped them, silenced their fears, and strengthened their faith. God's ministers that bear the vessels of the Lord have special need of divine help in their ministrations, that God in them may be glorified and his church edified.

II. When they experienced the tokens of God's presence with them they offered sacrifices of praise to him, v. 26.

III. There were great expressions of rejoicing used: the sacred music was played, David danced, the singers sang, and the common people shouted, v. 27, 28. This we had before, 2 Sam. vi. 14, 15.

CHAP. XVI

This chapter concludes the settlement of the public worship of God during the reign of David. I. The solemnity with which the ark was fixed, ver. 1–6. II. The psalm David gave to be sung on this occasion, ver. 7–36. III. The settling of the stated public worship of God in order thenceforward, ver. 37–43.

Verses 1–6

It was a glorious day when the ark of God was safely lodged in the tent David had pitched for it.

I. The ark had been obscure in a country town, in the fields of the wood; now it was removed to a public place, to the royal city. It had been neglected, as a despised broken vessel; now it was attended with veneration, and God was enquired of by it. This was but a tent, a poor mean dwelling; yet this was the tabernacle, the temple, which David in his psalms often speaks of with so much affection. David, who pitched a tent for the ark and continued steadfast to it, did far better than Solomon, who built a temple for it and yet in his latter end turned his back upon it. The church's poorest times were its purest.

II. Now David was easy in his mind, the ark was fixed, and fixed near him. He takes care, 1. That God shall have the glory of it. (1) By sacrifices (v. 1), burnt-offerings in adoration of his perfections, peace-offerings in acknowledgment of his favours. (2) By songs; he appointed Levites to record this story in a song for the benefit of others. 2. That the people shall have the joy of it. They shall fare the better for this day's solemnity; for he gives them all not only a royal treat but also a blessing in the name of the Lord, as a father, as a prophet, v. 2.

The thanksgiving psalm which David, by the Spirit, composed, and delivered to the chief musician, to be sung upon occasion of the public entry the ark made into the tent prepared for it. It is gathered out of several psalms (from the beginning to v. 23 is taken from Ps. cv. 1, &c.; and then v. 23 to v. 34 is the whole 96th psalm, with little variation; v. 34 is taken from Ps. cxxxvi. 1 and divers others; and then the last two verses are taken from the close of Ps. cvi.), which some think warrants us to do likewise, and make up hymns out of David's psalms, a part of one and a part of another put together so as may be most proper to express and excite the devotion of Christians. In the midst of our praises we must not forget to pray for the succour and relief of those saints and servants of God that are in distress (v. 35): Save us, gather us, deliver us from the heathen, those of us that are scattered and oppressed. When we are rejoicing in God's favours to us we must remember our afflicted brethren, and pray for their salvation, and deliverance as our own. We are members one of another; and therefore when we mean, "Lord, save them," it is not improper to say, "Lord, save us." Let us make God the Alpha and Omega of our praises. David begins with (v. 8), Give thanks to the Lord; he concludes (v. 36), Blessed be the Lord. And whereas in the place whence this doxology is taken (Ps. cvi. 48) it is added, Let all the people say, Amen, Hallelujah, here we find they did according to that directory: All the people said, Amen, and praised the Lord.

The worship of God is not only to be the work of a solemn day now and then, brought in to grace a triumph; but it ought to be the work of every day. David therefore settles it here for a constancy. 1. At Jerusalem, where the ark was, Asaph and his brethren were appointed to attend, to minister before the ark continually, with songs of praise, as every day's work required, v. 37. No sacrifices were offered there, nor incense burnt, because the altars were not there, but David's prayers were directed as incense, and the lifting up of his hands as the evening sacrifice (Ps. cxli. 2), so early did spiritual worship take place of ceremonial. 2. Yet the ceremonial worship, being of divine institution, must by no means be omitted; and therefore at Gibeon were the altars where the priests attended, for their work was to sacrifice and burn incense, which they did continually, morning and evening, according to the law of Moses, v. 39, 40. These must be kept up, because, however in their own nature they were inferior to the moral services of prayer and praise, yet, as they were types of the mediation of Christ, they had a great deal of honour put upon them, and the observance of them was of great consequence. At Gibeon, where the altars were, David also appointed singers to give thanks to the Lord, and the burden of all their songs must be, For his mercy endureth for ever, v. 41. (1) The people were satisfied, and went home pleased. (2) David returned to bless his house, resolving to keep up his family worship still, which public worship must not supersede.

CHAP. XVII

This chapter is the same with 2 Sam. vii. It will be worth while to look back upon what was there said upon it. Two things in general we have:—I. God's gracious acceptance of David's purpose to build him a house, and the promise he made thereupon, ver. 1–15. II. David's gracious acceptance of God's good promise to build him a house, and the prayer he made thereupon, ver. 16–27.

Verses 1–15

I. David could not be easy in a house of cedar while the ark was lodged within curtains, v. 1. Those that are contriving where to bestow their fruits and their goods would do well to enquire what condition the ark is in, and whether some may not be well bestowed upon it.

II. How ready God's prophets should be to encourage every good purpose (v. 2).

III. How little God affects external pomp and splendour in his service. His ark was content with a tabernacle (v. 5). He commanded the judges to feed his people, but never bade them build him a house, v. 6.

IV. How graciously God accepts his people's good purposes, yea, though he himself prevents the performance of them. David must not build this house, v. 4. He must prepare for it, but not do it; as Moses must bring Israel within sight of Canaan, but must then leave it to Joshua to put them in possession of it. Yet David must not think that, because he was not permitted to build the temple, 1. His preferment was in vain; no, "I took thee from the sheep-cote, though not to be a builder of the temple, yet to be ruler over my people Israel." Nor, 2. Must he think that his good purpose was in vain, and that he should lose the reward of it; he shall be as fully recompensed as if he had done it: "The Lord will build thee a house, and annex the crown of Israel to it," v. 10. If there be a willing mind, it shall not only be accepted, but thus rewarded. Nor, 3. Must he think that because he might not do this good work therefore it would never be done, and that it was in vain to think of it; no, I will raise up thy seed, and he shall build me a house, v. 11, 12. Nor, 4. Must he confine his thoughts to the temporal prosperity of his family, but must entertain himself with the prospect of the kingdom of the Messiah, who should descend from his loins, and whose throne should be established for evermore, v. 14.

Verses 16-27

David's solemn address to God, in answer to the gracious message he had now received from him. By faith he receives the promises, embraces them, and is persuaded of them, as the patriarchs, Heb. xi. 13. What an example is this to us of humble, believing, fervent prayer! Observe only those few expressions in which the prayer, as we find it here, differs from the record of it in 2 Sam. vii.

I. That which is there expressed by way of question (Is this the manner of men, O Lord God?) is here an acknowledgment: "Thou hast regarded me according to the estate of a man of high degree." God, by the covenant-relations into which he admits believers, regards them according to the estate of men of high degree, though they are mean and vile.

II. After the words What can David say more unto thee, it is here added, for the honour of thy servant? v. 18. The honour God puts upon his servants, by taking them into covenant and communion with himself, is so great that they need not, they cannot, desire to be more highly honoured.

III. It is very observable that what in Samuel is said to be for thy word's sake is here said to be for thy servant's sake, v. 19. Jesus Christ is both the Word of God (Rev. xix. 13) and the servant of God (Isa. xlii. 1), and it is for his sake, upon the score of his mediation, that the promises are both made and made good to all believers.

IV. In Samuel, the Lord of hosts is said to be the God over Israel; here he is said to be the God of Israel, even a God to Israel, v. 24. There were those that were called gods of such and such nations, gods of Assyria and Egypt, gods of Hamad and Arpad; but they were no gods to them, for they stood them in no stead at all, were mere ciphers, nothing but a name. But the God of Israel is a God to Israel; all his attributes and perfections redound to their real benefit and advantage.

V. The closing words in Samuel are, With thy blessing let the house of thy servant be blessed for ever. That is the language of a holy desire. But the closing words here are the language of a most holy faith: For thou blessest, O Lord! and it shall be blessed for ever, v. 27. David's prayer concludes as God's promise did (v. 14) with that which is for ever. God's word looks at things eternal, and so should our desires and hopes.

CHAP. XVIII

Those that seek first the kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof, as David did, shall have other things added to them. I. His prosperity abroad. He conquered the Philistines (ver. 1), the Moabites (ver. 2), the king of Zobah (ver 3, 4), the Syrians (ver. 5-8), made the king of Hamath his tributary (ver. 9-11), and the Edomites, ver. 12, 13. II. His prosperity at home. His court and kingdom flourished, ver. 14-17. All this we had an account of before, 2 Sam. viii.

Verses 1-8

After this, it is said (v. 1), David did great exploits. After the sweet communion he had had with God by the word and prayer, he went on in his work with extraordinary vigour and courage, conquering and to conquer. The Philistines had, for several generations, been vexatious to Israel, but now David subdued them, v. 1. Such is the uncertainty of this world that frequently men lose their wealth and power when they think to confirm it. Hadarezer was smitten as he went to establish his dominion, v. 3. The Syrians of Damascus were smitten when they came to help Hadarezer.

Verses 9-17

What God blesses us with we must honour him with. It was said before (v. 6) and here it is repeated (v. 13) that the Lord preserved David whithersoever he went. God gives men power, not that they may look great with it, but that they may do good with it.

CHAP. XIX

The story is here repeated of David's war with the Ammonites and the Syrians their allies, which we read in 2 Sam. x. I. David's civility to the king of Ammon, in sending an embassy of condolence to him on occasion of his father's death, ver. 1, 2. II. His great incivility to David, in the base usage he gave to his ambassadors, ver. 3, 4. III. David's just resentment of it, and the war which broke out thereupon, in which the Ammonites acted with policy in bringing the Syrians to their assistance (ver. 6, 7), Joab did bravely (ver. 8-13), and Israel was once and again victorious, ver. 14-19.

Verses 1-5

It becomes good people to be neighbourly, and especially to be grateful. David will pay respect to Hanun because he is his neighbour; and religion teaches us to be civil and to be ready to do all offices of kindness to those we live among; nor must difference in religion be any obstruction to this. But, besides this, David remembered the kindness which his father showed to him. Those that are base, and design ill themselves, are apt to be jealous and to suspect ill of others without cause. Hanun's servants suggested that David's ambassadors came as spies, as if so great and mighty a man as David needed to do so mean a thing. Yet Hanun, against the law of nations, treated David's ambassadors villainously.

Verses 6-19

The hearts of sinners are hardened to their destruction. The children of Ammon saw that they had made themselves odious to David (v. 6); it would have been their wisdom to desire conditions of peace, to humble themselves and offer any satisfaction for the injury they had done him. But, instead of this, they prepared for war, and so brought upon themselves, by David's hand, those desolations which he never intended them. The courage of brave men is heightened and invigorated by difficulties. When Joab saw that the battle was set against him before and behind (v. 10), instead of meditating a retreat, he doubled his resolution; and not only spoke, but acted, like a gallant man, that had great presence of mind when he saw himself surrounded. He engaged with his brother for mutual assistance (v. 12), excited himself and the rest of the officers to act vigorously in their respective posts, and then left the issue to God: Let the Lord do that which is right in his sight. The Ammonites did their utmost to make the best of their position: they brought as good a force into the field, yet, having a bad cause, they were put to the worst. Right will prevail and triumph at last. The Syrians, though in no way concerned in the merits of the cause, but serving only as mercenaries to the Ammonites, when they were beaten, thought themselves concerned to retrieve their honour, and therefore called in the assistance of the Syrians on the other side Euphrates; but to no purpose, for still they fled before Israel (v. 18). The Syrians, finding that Israel was the conquering side, not only broke off their alliance with the Ammonites and would help them no more (v. 19), but made peace with David and became his servants.

CHAP. XX

Here is a repetition of the story of David's wars. I. With the Ammonites, and the taking of Rabbah, ver. 1-3. II. With the giants of the Philistines, ver. 4-8.

Verses 1-3

The destruction of Rabbah, the metropolis of their kingdom (v. 1), the putting of their king's crown upon David's head (v. 2), and the great severity that was used towards the people, v. 3. Of this we had a more full account in 2 Sam. xi, xii. While Joab was besieging Rabbah David fell into that greater sin in the matter of Uriah.

Verses 4–8

The Philistines were nearly subdued (ch. xviii. 1); but the giants of Gath were last brought down. In the conflicts between grace and corruption there are some sins which, like these giants, are not mastered without much difficulty and a long struggle. 1. We never read of giants among the Israelites, as we do of giants among the Philistines—giants of Gath, but not giants of Jerusalem. The growth of God's plants is in usefulness, not in bulk. 2. The servants of David, though men of ordinary stature, were too hard for the giants of Gath in every encounter, because they had God on their side. We need not fear great men against us while we have the great God for us. What will a finger more on each hand do, or a toe more on each foot, in contest with Omnipotence?

CHAP. XXI

David's sin, in numbering the people, is here related, because, in the atonement made for that sin, an intimation was given of the spot of ground on which the temple should be built Here is, I David's sin, in forcing Joab to number the people, ver. 1–6. II. David's sorrow for what he had done, as soon as he perceived the sinfulness of it, ver. 7, 8 III. The sad dilemma (or trilemma rather) he was brought to, when it was put to him to choose how he would be punished for this sin, and what rod he would be beaten with, ver. 9–13. IV. The woeful havoc which was made by the pestilence in the country, and the narrow escape which Jerusalem had from being laid waste by it, ver. 14–17. V David's repentance, and sacrifice, upon this occasion, and the staying of the plague thereupon, ver 18–30. This story we met with, and meditated upon, 2 Sam. xxiv.

Verses 1–6

Numbering the people, one would think, was no bad thing. Why should not the shepherd know the number of his flock? He did it in the pride of his heart; and there is no sin that has in it more of contradiction and therefore more of offence to God than pride. The sin was David's.

I. How active the tempter was in it (v. 1): Satan stood up against Israel, and provoked David to do it. It is said (2 Sam. xxiv. 1) that the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel, and he moved David to do it. When it is said that he moved David to do it, it must be explained by what is intimated here, that, for wise and holy ends, he permitted the devil to do it. Now, when Satan meant to do Israel a mischief, what course did he take? He did not move God against them to destroy them, but he provoked David, the best friend they had, to number them, and so to offend God, and set him against them. The devil does us more mischief by tempting us to sin against our God than he does by accusing us before our God.

II. Joab, the person whom David employed, was an active man in public business; but to this he was perfectly forced, and did it with the greatest reluctance imaginable. No man more forward than he in anything that really tended to the honour of the king or the welfare of the kingdom; but in this matter he would gladly be excused. It was a needless thing. There was no occasion at all for it. It was a dangerous thing. In doing it he might be a cause of trespass to Israel, and might provoke God against them. There was a general disgust at these orders, which confirmed Joab in his dislike of them. He left two tribes unnumbered (v. 5, 6), two considerable ones, Levi and Benjamin, and perhaps was not very exact in numbering the rest, because he did not do it with any pleasure, which might be one occasion of the difference between the sums here and 2 Sam. xxiv. 9.

David is here under the rod for numbering the people, that rod of correction which drives out the foolishness that is bound up in the heart, the foolishness of pride.

I. How he was corrected. God takes notice of, and is displeased with, the sins of his people; and no sin is more displeasing to him than pride of heart. David must have the people numbered: Bring me the number of them, says he, that I may know it. But now God numbers them after another manner, and David had another number of them brought, more to his confusion than to his satisfaction, namely, a black bill of mortality. He sees the destroying angel, with his sword drawn against Jerusalem, v. 16. Pestilences make the greatest devastations in the most populous places.

II. How he bore the correction. He owned that he had sinned, had done foolishly, and he entreated that, however he might be corrected for it, the iniquity of it might be done away. I submit to the rod, only let me be the sufferer, for I am the sinner. 1. He cast himself upon the mercy of God (though he knew he was angry with him) and did not entertain any hard thoughts of him. However it be, Let us fall into the hands of the Lord, for his mercies are great, v. 13. Good men, even when God frowns upon them, think well of him. Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him. 2. He expressed a very tender concern for the people, and it went to his heart to see them plagued for his transgression: These sheep, what have they done?

Verses 18–30

Upon David's repentance, his peace made with God. When David repented of the sin God repented of the judgment, and ordered the destroying angel to stay his hand and sheath his sword, v. 27. Direction was given to David to rear an altar in the threshing-floor of Ornan, v. 18. The commanding of David to build an altar was a blessed token of reconciliation. David immediately made a bargain with Ornan for the threshing-floor. Ornan generously offered it to him gratis. God testified his acceptance of David's offerings on this altar: He answered him from heaven by fire, v. 26. He continued to offer his sacrifices upon this altar. The brazen altar which Moses made was at Gibeon (v. 29), and there all the sacrifices of Israel were offered: but David was so terrified at the sight of the sword of the angel that he could not go thither, v. 30. The business required haste, when the plague was begun. And therefore God, in tenderness to him, bade him build an altar in that place. The symbols of unity were not so much insisted on as unity itself. When the present distress was over, David, as long as he lived, sacrificed there, though the altar at Gibeon was still kept up. "Here God has graciously met me, and therefore I will still expect to meet with him."

CHAP. XXII

"Out of the eater comes forth meat." It was upon occasion of the terrible judgment inflicted on Israel for the sin of David that God gave intimation of the setting up of another altar, and of the place where he would have the temple to be built. I. Directed him to the place, ver. 1. II. Encouraged and quickened him to the work. 1. He set himself to prepare for the building, ver. 2–5. 2. He instructed Solomon, and gave him a charge concerning this work, ver. 6–16. 3. He commanded the princes to assist him in it, ver. 17–19. There is a great deal of difference between the frame of David's spirit in the beginning of the former chapter and in the beginning of this. There, in the pride of his heart, he was numbering the people; here, in his humility, preparing for the service of God.

Verses 1–5

I. The place fixed for the building of the temple (v. 1). The ground was a threshing-floor; for the church of the living God is his floor, his threshing, and the corn of his floor, Isa. xxi. 10. Christ's fan is in his hand, thoroughly to purge his floor. This is to be the house because this is the altar. The temple was built for the sake of the altar. There were altars long before there were temples.

II. Preparation made for that building. David must not build it, but he would do all he could towards it: He prepared abundantly before his death, v. 5.

1. What induced him to make such preparation. (1) Solomon was young and tender, and not likely to apply with any great vigour to this business at first; so that, unless he found the wheels set a-going, he would be in danger of losing a great deal of time at first. (2) The house must be very stately and sumptuous, strong and beautiful, everything about it the best in its kind, since it was intended for the honour of the Lord of the whole earth, and was to be a type of Christ, in whom all fulness dwells and in whom are hid all treasures. The grandeur of the house would help to affect the worshippers with a holy awe and reverence of God, and would invite strangers to come to see it, as the wonder of the world, who thereby would be brought acquainted with the true God.

2. What preparation he made. In general, he prepared abundantly cedar and stones, iron and brass, v. 2–4. Cedar he had from the Tyrians and the Zidonians. He also got workmen together, the strangers that were in the land of Israel.

Verses 6–16

Solomon was to build a house for the Lord God of Israel, v. 6.

I. David tells him why he did not do it himself. It was in his mind to do it (v. 7), but God forbade him, because he had shed much blood, v. 8. Some think this refers to the blood of Uriah, but that honour was forbidden him before he had shed that blood; therefore it must be meant of the blood he shed in his wars.

II. He gives him the reason why he imposed this task upon him. 1. Because God had nominated him as the man that should do it: A son shall be born to thee, that shall be called Solomon, and he shall build a house for my name, v. 9, 10. 2. Because he would have leisure and opportunity to do it. He should have rest from his enemies abroad and he should have peace and quietness at home; and therefore let him build the house.

III. He delivers him an account of the vast preparations he had made for this building (v. 14), as an encouragement to Solomon to engage cheerfully in the work, for which so solid a foundation was laid. The treasure here mentioned of 100,000 talents of gold, and 1,000,000 talents of silver, amounts to such an incredible sum that most interpreters either allow an error in the copy or think the talent here signifies no more than a plate or piece: ingots we call them.

IV. He charges him to keep God's commandments, v. 13. He must not think by building the temple to purchase a dispensation to sin.

V. He encourages him to go about this great work, and to go on in it (v. 13): It is God's work, and it shall come to perfection.

VI. He quickens him not to rest in the preparations he had made, v. 14. He prays for him: The Lord give thee wisdom and understanding, and give thee charge concerning Israel, v. 12. He concludes (v. 16), Up and be going, and the Lord be with thee.

Verses 17–19

David here engages the princes of Israel to assist Solomon in the great work he had to do. God had given them victory, and rest, and a good land for an inheritance, v. 18. He presses that upon them which should make them zealous in it (v. 19).

CHAP. XXIII

David, having given charge concerning the building of the temple, settles the method of the temple-service and puts into order the offices and officers of it. In the late irregular times, and during the wars in the beginning of his reign, though the Levitical ordinances were kept up, yet it was not with the beauty and exactness, that were desirable. Now David, being a prophet, as well as a prince, "set in order the things that were wanting." I. He declared Solomon to be his successor, ver. 1. II. He numbered the Levites, and appointed them to their respective offices, ver. 2–5. III. He took an account of the several families of the Levites, ver. 6–23. IV. He made a new reckoning of them from twenty years old, and appointed them their work, ver. 24–32.

Verses 1–23

David made Solomon king, not to reign with him, or reign under him, but only to reign after him. He did it in a solemn assembly of all the princes of Israel, which made Adonijah's attempt to break in upon Solomon's title and set it aside, the more impudent and ridiculous.

II. The Levites numbered, according to the rule in Moses's time, from thirty years old to fifty, Num. iv. 2, 3. Their number in Moses's time, by this rule, was 8,580 (Num. iv. 47, 48), but the serviceable men of Levi's tribe were now 38,000.

III. The Levites distributed to their respective posts (v. 4, 5), that every hand might be employed (for, of all men, an idle Levite makes the worst figure). The work assigned the Levites was four-fold:—1. Some, and indeed far the greater number, were to set forward the work of the house of the Lord: 24,000, almost two-thirds, were appointed for this service, to attend the priests in killing the sacrifices, washing them, burning them, to have the meat-offerings and drink-offerings ready, to keep all the vessels of the temple clean, and everything in its place. These served 1,000 a week, and so went round in twenty-four courses. Perhaps while the temple was in building some of these were employed to set forward that work, to assist the builders. 2. Others were officers and judges, not in the affairs of the temple, but in the country. They were magistrates, to give the laws of God in charge, to resolve difficulties, and to determine controversies. Of these there were 6,000, in the several parts of the kingdom, that assisted the princes and elders of every tribe in the administration of justice. 3. Others were porters, to guard all the avenues of the house of God, to examine those that desired entrance, and to resist those that would force an entrance. 4. Others were singers and players on instruments, whose business it was to keep up that part of the service; this was a new-erected office.

IV. The Levites mustered into their respective families and kindreds, that an account of them might the better be kept by calling over the roll, which each family might do for itself. In this account of the families of the Levites the posterity of Moses stood upon the level with common Levites, whilst the posterity of Aaron were advanced to the priest's office, to sanctify the most holy things, v. 13. The levelling of Moses's family with the rest is an evidence of his self-denial. He was no self-seeking man, as appears from his leaving to his children no marks of distinction, which was a sign that he had the spirit of God and not the spirit of the world. The elevation of Aaron's family above the rest was a recompence for his self-denial. When Moses (his younger brother) was made a god to Pharaoh, and he only his prophet or spokesman, to observe his orders and do as he was bidden, Aaron never disputed it. Because he thus submitted himself, in his own person, to his junior, in compliance with the will of God, God highly exalted his family.

Verses 24–32

I. An alteration made in the computation of the effective men of the Levites—that whereas, in Moses's time, they were not enlisted, or taken into service, till they were thirty-years old, nor admitted as probationers till twenty-five (Num. viii. 24), David ordered, by direction from God, that they should be numbered for the service of the house of the Lord, from the age of twenty years and upwards, v. 24. Perhaps the young Levites, having no work appointed them till twenty-five years old, had many of them got a habit of idleness, to prevent which they are set to work, and brought under discipline, at twenty years old. There was no more occasion to carry the tabernacle and the vessels thereof, the service was much easier, and what would not over-work them nor over-load them if they entered upon it at twenty years old. Now it was requisite there should be more hands employed in the temple-service, that every Israelite who brought an offering might find a Levite ready to assist him.

II. The work of the priests was (v. 13): To sanctify the most holy things, to burn incense before the Lord, and to bless in his name; that work the Levites were not to meddle with, and yet they had work enough to which they were appointed, v. 4, 5. 1. Those that were to set forward the work of the house of God (v. 4) were therein to wait on the sons of Aaron (v. 28), were to do the drudgery-work of the house of God, to keep the courts and chambers clean, set things in their places. They were to prepare the shew-bread which the priests were to set on the table, to provide the flour and cakes for the meal-offerings, that the priests might have everything ready to their hands. 2. The standards of all weights and measures were kept in the sanctuary; and the Levites had the care of them, to see that they were exact, and to try other weights and measures by them when they were appealed to. 3. The work of the singers was to thank and praise the Lord (v. 30), at the offering of the morning and evening sacrifices, and other oblations on the sabbaths, new moons, &c., v. 31. Moses appointed that they should blow trumpets over their burnt offerings and other sacrifices, and on their solemn days, Num. x. 10. The sound of the trumpet was awful, and might be affecting to the worshippers, but was not articulate, nor such a reasonable service as this which David appointed, of singing psalms on those occasions. As the Jewish church grew up from its infancy, it grew more and more intelligent in its devotions. 4. The work of the porters (v. 5) was to keep the charge of the tabernacle and of the holy place, that none might come nigh but such as were allowed, v. 32.

CHAP. XXIV

A more particular account of the distribution of the priests and Levites into their respective classes, for the more regular discharge of the duties of their offices, according to their families. I. Of the priests, ver. 1–19. II. Of the Levites, ver. 20–31.

Verses 1–19

The particular account of these establishments, when Ezra published it, was of great use to direct their church affairs after their return from captivity. The title of this record we have v. 1—These are the divisions of the sons of Aaron, the distribution of them in order to the dividing of their work among themselves. 1. This distribution was made for the more regular discharge of the duties of their office. In the mystical body, every member has its use, for the good of the whole, Rom. xii. 4, 5; 1 Cor. xii. 12. 2. It was made by lot, that the disposal thereof might be of the Lord, and so all quarrels and contentions might be prevented. As God is the God of order, so he is the God of peace. 3. The lot was cast publicly, and with great solemnity, in the presence of the king, princes, and priests, that there might be no room for any fraudulent practices or the suspicion of them. 4. What those priests were chosen to was to preside in the affairs of the sanctuary (v. 5), in their several courses and turns. That which was to be determined by the lot was only the precedency, not who should serve but who should serve first, and who next. Of the twenty-four chief men of the priests sixteen were of the house of Eleazar and eight of Ithamar. The method of drawing the lots is intimated (v. 6), one chief household being taken for Eleazar, and one for Ithamar. The sixteen chief names of Eleazar were put in one urn, the eight for Ithamar in another, and they drew out of them alternately, as long as those for Ithamar lasted, and then out of those only for Eleazar, or two for Eleazar, and then one for Ithamar, throughout. 5. Among these twenty-four courses the eighth is that of Abijah or Abia (v. 10), which is mentioned (Luke i. 5) as the course which Zechariah was of, the father of John Baptist, by which it appears that these courses which David now settled, though interrupted perhaps in the bad reigns and long broken off by the captivity, yet continued in succession till the destruction of the second temple by the Romans.

Verses 20–31

Most of the Levites here named were mentioned before, ch. xxiii. 16, &c. But they are here mentioned as heads of the twenty-four courses of Levites who were to attend the twenty-four courses of the priests. The principal fathers cast lots over against their younger brethren; that is, those that were of the elder house came upon the level with those of the younger families, and took their place, not by seniority, but as God by the lot directed. The younger brethren, if they be faithful and sincere, shall be no less acceptable to Christ than the principal fathers.

CHAP. XXV

David, having settled the courses of these Levites that were to attend the priests in their ministrations, proceeds to put those into a method that were appointed to be singers and musicians in the temple. I. The persons that were to be employed, Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun (ver. 1), their sons (ver. 2–6), and other skilful persons, ver. 7. II. The order in which they were to attend determined by lot, ver. 8–31.

Verses 1–7

I. Singing the praises of God is here called prophesying (v. 1–3), not that all those who were employed in this service were honoured with visions of God. Heman indeed is said to be the king's seer in the words of God (v. 5); but the psalms they sang were composed by prophets, and many of them were prophetical. In Samuel's time singing the praises of God went by the name of prophesying (1 Sam. x. 5; xix. 20).

II. This is here called a service, and the persons employed in it workmen, v. 1. In our present state of corruption and infirmity, it will not be done as it should be done without labour and struggle.

III. Here were a great variety of musical instruments used, harps, psalteries, cymbals (v. 1, 6), and here was one that lifted up the horn (v. 5), that is, used wind-music.

IV. The glory and honour of God were principally intended in all this temple-music, whether vocal or instrumental. The intention of the perpetuating of psalmody in the gospel-church, is to make melody with the heart, in conjunction with the voice, unto the Lord, Eph. v. 19.

V. The order of the king is likewise taken notice of, v. 2 and again v. 6. His taking care for the due and regular observance of divine institutions, both ancient and modern, is an example to all in authority to use their power for the promoting of religion, and the enforcing of the laws of Christ.

VI. The fathers presided in this service, Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun (v. 1), and the children were under the hands of their father, v. 2, 3, 6. It is probable that Heman, Asaph, and Jeduthun, were bred up under Samuel, and had their education in the schools of the prophets which he was the founder and president of; then they were pupils, now they came to be masters. Solomon perfects what David began, so David perfects what Samuel began.

VII. There were others also, besides the sons of these three great men, who are called their brethren who were instructed in the songs of the Lord, and were cunning or well skilled therein, v. 7. They were all Levites and were in number 288. Yet these were but a small number in comparison with the 4,000 whom David appointed thus to praise the Lord, ch. xxiii. 5, and were disposed of, all the kingdom over, to preside in the country congregations, in this good work: for, though the sacrifices instituted by the hand of Moses might be offered but at one place, the psalms penned by David might be sung everywhere, 1 Tim. ii. 8.

Verses 8–31

Twenty-four persons are named in the beginning of this chapter as sons of those three great men, Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun. Ethan was the third (ch. vi. 44), but probably he was dead before the establishment was perfected and Jeduthun came in his room. [Or perhaps Ethan and Jeduthun were two names for the same person]. All twenty-four (who were named, v. 2–4), were qualified for the service and called to it. In what order must they serve? This was determined by lot.

I. The lot was thrown impartially. They were placed in twenty-four companies, twelve in a company, in two rows, twelve companies in a row, and so they cast lots, ward against ward, putting them all upon a level, small and great, teacher and scholar.

II. God determined it as he pleased. The respective merits of the persons are of much more importance than seniority of age or priority of birth.

III. Probably twelve, some for the voice and others for the instrument, made up the concert. Let us learn with one mind and one mouth to glorify God, and that will be the best concern.

CHAP. XXVI

An account of the business of the Levites. That tribe had made but a very small figure all the time of the judges, till Eli and Samuel appeared. But when David revived religion the Levites were, of all men, in the greatest reputation. And happy it was that they had Levites who were men fit to support the honour of their tribe. We have here an account, I. Of the Levites that were appointed to be porters, ver. 1–19. II. Of those that were appointed to be treasurers and storekeepers, ver. 20–28. III. Of those that were officers and judges in the country, and were entrusted with the administration of public affairs, ver. 29–32.

I. There were porters appointed to attend the temple, who guarded all the avenues that led to it, opened and shut all the outer doors to direct and instruct those who were going to worship in the courts of the sanctuary in the decorum they were to observe, to encourage those that were timorous, to send back the strangers and unclean, and to guard against enemies of the house of God. In allusion to this office, ministers are said to have the keys of the kingdom of heaven committed to them (Matt. xvi. 19), that they may admit, and exclude, according to the law of Christ.

II. Of several of those that were called to this service, it is taken notice of that they were mighty men of valour (v. 6), strong men (v. 7), able men (v. 8), and one of them that he was a wise counsellor (v. 14). Whatever service God calls men to he either finds them fit or makes them so.

III. The sons of Obed-edom were employed in this office, sixty-two of that family. This was he that entertained the ark with reverence and cheerfulness; and see how he was rewarded for it. 1. He had eight sons (v. 5), for God blessed him. 2. His sons were preferred to places of trust in the sanctuary. They had faithfully attended the ark in their own house, and now were called to attend it in God's house. He that keeps God's ordinances in his own tent is fit to have the custody of them in God's tabernacle, 1 Tim. iii. 4, 5.

IV. It is said of one here that though he was not the first-born his father made him the chief (v. 10), either because he was very excellent, or because the elder son was very weak.

V. The porters, as the singers, had their post assigned them by lot, so many at such a gate, and so many at such a one, that every one might know his post and make it good, v. 13.

Verses 20–28

1. There were treasures of the house of God. A great house cannot be well kept without stores of all manner of provisions. These treasures typified the plenty there is in our heavenly Father's house, enough and to spare. In Christ, the true temple, are hid treasures of wisdom and knowledge, and unsearchable riches. 2. There were treasures of dedicated things as a grateful acknowledgment of the divine protection. Abraham gave Melchisedec the tenth of the spoils, Heb. vii. 4. In Moses's time the officers of the army, when they returned victorious, brought of their spoils an oblation to the Lord, Num. xxxi. 50. Of late this pious custom had been revived; and not only Samuel and David, but Saul, and Abner, and Joab, had dedicated of their spoils to the honour and support of the house of God, v. 28.

Verses 29–32

The magistracy is an ordinance of God for the good of the church as truly as the ministry is. And here we are told, 1. That the Levites were employed in the administration of justice in concurrence with the princes and elders of the several tribes, who could not be supposed to understand the law so well as the Levites, who made it their business to study it. None of those Levites who were employed in the service of the sanctuary, none of the singers or porters, were concerned in this outward business; either one was enough to engage the whole man or it was presumption to undertake both. 2. Their charge was both in all business of the Lord, and in the service of kings, v. 30 and again v. 32. They managed the affairs of the country, as well ecclesiastical as civil, took care both of God's tithes and the king's taxes, punished offences committed immediately against God and his honour and those against the government and the public peace, guarded both against idolatry and against injustice, and took care to put the laws in execution against both. 3. There were more Levites employed as judges with the two tribes and a half on the other side Jordan than with all the rest of the tribes; there were 2,700; whereas on the west side of Jordan there were 1,700, v. 30, 32. Either those remote tribes were not so well furnished as the rest with judges of their own, or because they, lying furthest from Jerusalem and on the borders of the neighbouring nations, were most in danger of being infected with idolatry, and most needed the help of Levites to prevent it.

CHAP. XXVII

The civil list, including the military. I. The twelve captains for every separate month of the year, ver. 1–15. II. The princes of the several tribes, ver. 16–24. III. The officers of the court, ver. 25–34.

Verses 1–15

An account of the regulation of the militia of the kingdom. David was himself a man of war. He contrived to keep up a constant force, and yet not a standing army. 1. He kept up 24,000 constantly in arms. This was a sufficient strength for the securing of the public peace and safety. 2. He changed them every month; so that the whole number of the militia amounted to 288,000, perhaps about a fifth part of the able men of the kingdom. 3. Every course had a commander-in-chief over it. All these twelve great commanders are mentioned among David's worthies and champions, 2 Sam. xxiii. and 1 Chron. xi. Benaiah is here called a chief priest, v. 5. But, cohen signifying both a priest and a prince, it might better be translated here a chief ruler, or (as in the margin) a principal officer. When his wars were over he revived this method, for the peaceable reign of his son Solomon.

Verses 16-34

An account,

I. Of the princes of the tribes. Something of the ancient order instituted by Moses in the wilderness was still kept up, that every tribe should have its prince or chief. Whether these princes were of the nature of lord-lieutenants that guided them in their military affairs, or chief-justices that presided in their courts of judgment, does not appear. Their power, we may suppose, was much less now that all the tribes were united under one king than it had been when, for the most part, they acted separately.

II. Of the numbering of the people, v. 23, 24. It is here said, 1. That when David ordered the people to be numbered he forbade the numbering of those under twenty years old. 2. That that account which David took of the people, in the pride of his heart, turned to no good account; for it was never perfected, nor done with exactness, nor was it ever recorded as an authentic account. Joab was disgusted with it, and did it by halves; David was ashamed of it, and willing it should be forgotten, because there fell wrath for it against Israel.

III. Of the officers of the court. 1. The rulers of the king's substance (as they are called, v. 31), such as had the oversight and charge of the king's tillage, his vineyards, his olive-yards, his herds, his camels, his asses, his flocks. Here are officers all for service, agreeable to the simplicity and plainness of those times. David was a great soldier, a great scholar, and a great prince, and yet a great husband of his estate. 2. The attendants on the king's person were such as were eminent for wisdom. His uncle, who was a wise man and a scribe, not only well skilled in politics, but well read in the scriptures, was his counsellor, v. 32. Hushai, an honest man, was his companion and confidant.

CHAP. XXVIII

The account of David's exit, in the beginning of the first book of Kings, does not make his sun nearly so bright as that given in this and the following chapter, where we have his solemn farewell both to his son and his subjects. I. A general convention of the states summoned to meet, ver. 1. II. A solemn declaration of the divine entail both of the crown and of the honour of building the temple upon Solomon, ver. 2–7. III. An exhortation both to the people and to Solomon to make religion their business, ver. 8–10. IV. The model and materials delivered to Solomon for the building of the temple, ver. 11–19. V. Encouragement given him to undertake it and proceed in it, ver. 20, 21.

Verses 1-10

David had served his generation according to the will of God, Acts xiii. 36. But now the time draws nigh that he must die, and, as a type of the Son of David, the nearer he comes to his end the more busy he is.

I. He summoned all the great men to attend him, that he might take leave of them all together, v. 1. Thus Moses did (Deut. xxxi. 28), and Joshua, ch. xxiii. 2; xxiv. 1.

II. He addressed them with a great deal of respect and tenderness. He not only exerted himself to rise from his bed, but he rose out of his chair, and stood up upon his feet (v. 2), in reverence to God whose will he was to declare, and in reverence to this solemn assembly of the Israel of God, as if he looked upon himself, though major singulis—greater than any individual among them, yet minor universis—less than the whole of them together. It had been too much his pleasure that they were all his servants (ch. xxi. 3), but now he calls them his brethren, whom he loved, his people, whom he took care of, not his servants, whom he had the command of: Hear me, my brethren, and my people.

III. He declared the purpose he had formed to build a temple for God, and God's disallowing that purpose, v. 2, 3. He must serve the public with the sword; another must do it with the line and plummet. Times of rest are building times, Acts ix. 31.

IV. He produced his own title first, and then Solomon's, to the crown; both were undoubtedly jure divino—divine. 1. Judah was not the eldest son of Jacob, yet God chose that tribe to be the ruling tribe; Jacob entailed the sceptre upon it, Gen. xlix. 10. 2. It does not appear that the family of Jesse was the senior house of that tribe. 3. David was the youngest son of Jesse, yet God liked him to make him king; so it seemed good unto him. 4. Solomon was one of the youngest sons of David, and yet God chose him to sit upon the throne, because he was the likeliest of them all to build the temple, the wisest and best inclined.

V. He opened to them God's gracious purposes concerning Solomon (v. 6, 7): I have chosen him to be my son. Of him God said, as a figure of him that was to come, 1. He shall build my house. Christ is both the founder and the foundation of the gospel temple. 2. I will establish his kingdom for ever. This must have its accomplishment in the kingdom of the Messiah, which shall continue in his hands through all the ages of time (Isa. ix. 7; Luke i. 33) and shall then be delivered up to God, even the Father, yet perhaps to be delivered back to the Redeemer for ever. As to Solomon, this promise of the establishment of his kingdom is here made conditional: If he be constant to do my commandments, as at this day.

VI. He charged them to adhere steadfastly to God and their duty, v. 8. The matter of this charge: Keep, and seek for all the commandments of the Lord your God. The Lord was their God; his commandments must be their rule; they must be inquisitive concerning their duty, search the scriptures, take advice, seek the law at the mouth of those whose lips were to keep this knowledge, and pray to God to teach and direct them. God's commandments will not be kept without great care. 2. The solemnity of it. He charged them in the sight of all Israel, "God is witness, and this congregation is witness, that they have good counsel given them, and fair warning; if they do not take it, it is their fault, and God and man will be witnesses against them." See 1 Tim. v. 21; 2 Tim. iv. 1. 3. The motive to observe this charge. It was the way to be happy, to have the peaceable possession of this good land themselves and to preserve the entail of it upon their children.

VII. He concluded with a charge to Solomon himself, v. 9, 10. He was much concerned that Solomon should be religious.

1. The charge he gives him. He was born in God's house and therefore bound in duty to be his, brought up in his house and therefore bound in gratitude. Thy own friend, and thy father's friend, forsake not.

2. The arguments to enforce this charge.

(1) Two arguments of general inducement:—[1] That the secrets of our souls are open before God;

he searches all hearts, even the hearts of kings, which to men are unsearchable, Prov. xxv. 3. [2] That we are happy or miserable here, and for ever, according as we do, or do not, serve God. If we seek him diligently, he will be found of us, and that is enough to make us happy, Heb. xi. 6. God never casts any off till they have first cast him off.

(2) One argument peculiar to Solomon (v. 10): "Thou art to build a house for the sanctuary; therefore seek and serve God, that that work may be done from a good principle, in a right manner, and may be accepted."

3. The means prescribed, and they are prescribed to us all. (1) Caution: Take heed; beware of everything that looks like, or leads to, that which is evil. (2) Courage: Be strong, and do it. We cannot do our work as we should unless we put on resolution, and fetch in strength from divine grace.

Verses 11–21

As for the general charge that David gave his son to seek God and serve him, the book of the law was, in that, his only rule, and there needed no other; but, in building the temple, David was now to give him three things:—1. A model of the building, because it was to be such a building as neither he nor his architects ever saw. Moses had a pattern of the tabernacle shown him in the mount (Heb. viii. 5), so had David of the temple, by the immediate hand of God upon him, v. 19. It is said (v. 12), He had this pattern by the Spirit. The contrivance either of David's devotion or of Solomon's wisdom must not be trusted to in an affair of this nature. The temple must be a sacred thing and a type of Christ; it was a kind of sacrament, and therefore it must not be left to man's art or invention to contrive it, but must be framed by divine institution. This pattern David gave to Solomon, that he might know what to provide and might go by a certain rule. He gave him a table of the courses of the priests, patterns of the vessels of service (v. 13), and a pattern of the chariot of the cherubim, v. 18. Besides the two cherubim over the mercy-seat, there were two much larger, whose wings reached from wall to wall (1 Kings vi. 23, &c.), and of these David here gave Solomon the pattern, called a chariot; for the angels are the chariots of God, Ps. lxviii. 17. 2. Materials for the most costly of the utensils of the temple. That they might not be made any less than the patterns, he weighed out the exact quantity for each vessel both of gold and silver, v. 14. In the tabernacle there was but one golden candlestick; in the temple there were ten (1 Kings vii. 49), besides silver ones, which, it is supposed, were hand-candlesticks, v. 15. In the tabernacle there was but one table; but in the temple, besides that on which the shew-bread was set, there were ten others for other uses (2 Chron. iv. 8), besides silver tables; for, this house being much larger than that, it would look bare if it had not furniture proportionable. The gold for the altar of incense is particularly said to be refined gold (v. 18), purer than any of the rest; for that was typical of the intercession of Christ, than which nothing is more pure and perfect. 3. Directions which way to look for help in this great undertaking. God will help thee, and thou must look up to him in the first place (v. 20): The Lord God, even my God, whom I have chosen and served, who has all along been present with me and prospered me, and to whom, from my own experience of his power and goodness, I recommend thee, he will be with thee, to direct, strengthen, and prosper thee; he will not fail thee nor forsake thee. We may be sure that God, who owned our fathers and carried them through the services of their day, will, in like manner, if we be faithful to him, go along with us in our day, and will never leave us, while he has any work to do in us or by us. "Good men will help thee, v. 21. The priests and Levites will advise thee, and thou mayest consult them. Thou hast good workmen, who are both willing and skilful;" and these are two very good properties in a workman, especially in those that work at the temple. And, lastly, "The princes and the people will be so far from opposing or retarding the work that they will be wholly at thy command, every one in his place ready to further it."

CHAP. XXIX

David had said what he had to say to Solomon. But he had something more to say to the congregation before he parted with them. I. He pressed them to contribute, according to their ability, towards the building and furnishing of the temple, ver. 1–5. II. They made their presents accordingly with great generosity, ver. 6–9. III. David offered up solemn prayers and praises to God upon that occasion (ver. 10–20), with sacrifices, ver. 21, 22. IV. Solomon was hereupon enthroned, with great joy and magnificence, ver. 23–25. V. David, soon after this, finished his course, ver. 26–30. And it is hard to say which shines brighter here, the setting sun or the rising sun.

Verses 1–9

I. David spoke to the great men of Israel, to engage them to contribute towards the building of the temple. Though David would not impose on them, as a tax, what they should give towards it, he would recommend the present as a fair occasion for a free-will offering, because what is done in works of piety and charity should be done willingly and not by constraint; for God loves a cheerful giver. 1. He would have them consider that Solomon was young, and needed help; but that he was the person whom God had chosen to do this work. 2. That the work was great, and all hands should contribute to the carrying of it on. 3. He tells them what great preparations had been made for this work. He did not intend to throw all the burden upon them, but that they should show their goodwill, by adding to what was done (v. 2): I have prepared with all my might. 4. He sets them a good example. He had, out of his own share, offered largely for the beautifying and enriching of it, 2,000 talents of gold and 7,000 talents of silver (v. 4, 5), and this because he had set his affection on the house of his God. 5. He stirs them up to do as he had done (v. 5): And who then is willing to consecrate his service this day unto the Lord? We must make the service of God our business, must fill our hands to the Lord, so the Hebrew phrase is. The filling of our hands with the service of God intimates that we must serve him only, serve him liberally, and serve him in the strength of grace derived from him.

II. How handsomely they all contributed towards the building of the temple when they were thus stirred up to it. How generous they were appears by the sum total of the contributions, v. 7, 8. They gave like princes of Israel. The people rejoiced: they were glad of the opportunity of honouring God thus with their substance, and glad of the prospect of bringing this good work to perfection. David rejoiced with great joy that his son and successor would have those about him that were so well affected to the house of God, and that this work, upon which his heart was so much set, was likely to go on.

I. The solemn address which David made to God: Wherefore David blessed the Lord before all the congregation. David's psalms, towards the latter end of the book, are most of them psalms of praise. The nearer we come to the world of everlasting praise the more we should speak the language and do the work of that world. In this address,

1. He adores God, and ascribes glory to him as the God of Israel, blessed for ever and ever. Our Lord's prayer ends with a doxology much like this which David here begins with—for thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory. This is properly praising God—with holy awe and reverence, acknowledging, (1) His infinite perfections. He is the fountain and centre of everything that is bright and blessed. His is the greatness; his greatness is immense and incomprehensible. His is the power, and it is almighty and irresistible. His is the glory; for his glory is his own end and the end of the whole creation. His is the victory; he transcends and surpasses all, and is able to conquer and subdue all things to himself. And his is the majesty, real and personal, inexpressible and inconceivable. (2) His sovereign dominion, as rightful owner and possessor of all: "All that is in heaven, and in the earth, is thine: thine is the kingdom, and all kings are thy subjects; for thou art head, and art to be exalted and worshipped as head above all." (3) His universal influence and agency. All that are rich and honourable among the children of men have their riches and honours from God. What they had returned to him was but a small part of what they had received from him.

2. He acknowledges with thankfulness the grace of God enabling him to contribute so cheerfully towards the building of the temple (v. 13, 14): Now therefore, our God, we thank thee. It is a great instance of the power of God's grace in us to be able to do the work of God willingly.

3. He speaks very humbly of himself, and his people, and the offerings they had now presented to God. (1) For himself, and those that joined with him, though they were princes, he wondered that God should take such notice of them and do so much for them (v. 14): Who am I, O Lord? for (v. 15) we are strangers before thee, and sojourners, poor despicable creatures. Our days on the earth are as a shadow, which intimates that our life is a vain life, a dark life, a transient life, and a life that will have its period either in perfect light or perfect darkness. The next words explain it: There is no abiding, Heb. vii. 3, no expectation. We cannot expect any great matters from it, nor can we expect any long continuance of it, which forbids us to boast of the service we do to God. Alas! it is confined to a scantling of time. (2) As to their offerings, Lord, says he, of thy own have we given thee (v. 14), and again (v. 16), It cometh of thy hand, and is all thy own. Let him that glories therefore glory in the Lord.

4. He appeals to God concerning his own sincerity in what he did, v. 17. It is a great satisfaction to a good man to think that God tries the heart and has pleasure in uprightness. It was David's comfort that God knew with what pleasure he both offered his own and saw the people's offering. He was neither proud of his own good work nor envious of the good works of others.

5. He prays to God both for the people and for Solomon, that both might hold on as they began. In this prayer he addresses God as the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, a God in covenant with them and with us for their sakes. (1) For the people he prays (v. 18) that what good God had put into their minds he would always keep there, that they might always have the same thoughts of things as they now seemed to have. Great consequences depend upon what is innermost, and what uppermost, in the imagination of the thoughts of our heart, what we aim at and what we love to think of. If any good have got possession of our hearts, or the hearts of our friends, it is good by prayer to commit the custody of it to the grace of God: "Lord, keep it there, keep it for ever there. Confirm their resolutions. They are in a good mind; keep them so when I am gone, them and theirs for ever." (2) For Solomon he prays (v. 19), Give him a perfect heart. He does not pray, "Lord, make him a rich man, a great man, a learned man;" but, "Lord, make him an honest man;" for that is better than all. Yet his building the house would not prove him to have a perfect heart unless he made conscience of keeping God's commandments. It is not helping to build churches that will save us if we live in disobedience to God's law.

II. The cheerful concurrence of this great assembly in this great solemnity. 1. They joined with David in the adoration of God. (Now bless the Lord your God, v. 20), which accordingly they did, by bowing down their heads, a gesture of adoration. Whoever is the mouth of the congregation, those only have the benefit who join with him, not by bowing down the head so much as by lifting up the soul. 2. They paid their respects to the king, looking upon him as an instrument in God's hand of much good to them; and, in honouring him, they honoured God. 3. The next day they offered abundance of sacrifices to God (v. 21). 4. They feasted and rejoiced before God, v. 22. 5. They made Solomon king the second time. He having been before anointed in haste, upon occasion of Adonijah's rebellion, it was thought fit to repeat the ceremony, for the greater satisfaction of the people. They anointed him to the Lord.

These verses bring king Solomon to his throne and king David to his grave.

I. Here is Solomon rising (v. 23): Solomon sat on the throne of the Lord. The throne of Israel is called the throne of the Lord because not only is he King of all nations, and all kings rule under him, but he was in a peculiar manner King of Israel, 1 Sam. xii. 12. Solomon's kingdom typified the kingdom of the Messiah, and his is indeed the throne of the Lord. Solomon prospered; for, 1. His people paid honour to him, as one to whom honour is due: All Israel obeyed him, that is, were ready to swear allegiance to him (v. 23). God inclined their hearts to do so, that his reign might, from the first, be peaceable. His father was a better man that he, and yet came to the crown with much difficulty, after long delay, and by many and slow steps. David had more faith, and therefore had it more tried. They submitted themselves (Heb. They gave the hand under Solomon), that is, bound themselves by oath to be true to him (putting the hand under the thigh was a ceremony anciently used in swearing). 2. God put honour upon him; for those that honour him he will honour: The Lord magnified Solomon exceedingly, v. 25. None of all the judges or kings of Israel, his predecessors, made such a figure as he did nor lived in such splendour.

II. Here is David's setting, that great man going off the stage. The historian here brings him to the end of his day, leaves him asleep, and draws the curtains about him.

1. He gives a summary account of the years of his reign, v. 26, 27.

2. He gives a short account of his death (v. 28), that he died full of days, riches, and honour. Honoured both of God and man. He had been a man of war from his youth, but was preserved through all the dangers of a military life, lived to a good old age, and died in peace, died in his bed, and yet in the bed of honour. For a fuller account of David's life and reign he refers to the histories or records of those times, which were written by Samuel while he lived, and continued, after his death, by Nathan and Gad, v. 29.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE SECOND BOOK OF CHRONICLES

This book begins with the reign of Solomon and the building of the temple and continues the history of the kings of Judah thenceforward to the captivity and so concludes with the fall of that illustrious monarchy and the destruction of the temple. That monarchy of the house of David, as it was prior in time, so it was superior in worth and dignity to all those four celebrated ones of which Nebuchadnezzar dreamed. The succession was kept up in a lineal descent throughout the whole monarchy, which continued between 400 and 500 years, and, after a long eclipse, shone forth again in the kingdom of the Messiah, of the increase of whose government and peace there shall be no end. We had the story of the house of David before, in the first and second books of Kings, intermixed with that of the kings of Israel, which there took more room than that of Judah; but here we have it entire. Much is repeated here which we had before, yet many of the passages of the story are enlarged upon, and divers added, especially relating to the affairs of religion; for it is a church-history. All along the good kings prospered and the wicked kings suffered. The peaceable reign of Solomon we have (ch. i.–ix.), the blemished reign of Rehoboam (ch. x.–xii.), the short but busy reign of Abijah (ch. xiii.), the long and happy reign of Asa (ch. xiv.–xvi.), the pious and prosperous reign of Jehoshaphat (ch. xvii.–xx.), the impious and infamous reigns of Jehoram and Ahaziah (ch. xxi.–xxii.), the unsteady reigns of Joash and Amaziah (ch. xxiv., xxv.), the long and prosperous reign of Uzziah (ch. xxvi.), the regular reign of Jotham (ch. xxvii.), the profane and wicked reign of Ahaz (ch. xxviii.), the gracious glorious reign of Hezekiah (ch. xxix.–xxxii.), the wicked reigns of Manasseh and Amon (ch. xxxiii.), the reforming reign of Josiah (ch. xxxiv., xxxv.), the ruining reigns of his sons, ch. xxxvi. Put all these together, and the truth of that word of God will appear, Those that honour me I will honour, but those that despise me shall be lightly esteemed.

CHAP. I

In the foregoing book we read how God magnified Solomon and Israel obeyed him. Now here we have an account, I. How he honoured God by sacrifice (ver. 1–6) and by prayer, ver. 7–12. II. How he honoured Israel by increasing their strength, wealth, and trade, ver. 13–17.

Verses 1 12

I. Solomon's great prosperity, v. 1. God being with him, he was strengthened in his kingdom.

II. His great piety and devotion.

1. All his great men must thus far be good men that they must join with him in worshipping God. He spoke to the captains and judges, the governors and chief of the fathers, to go with him to Gibeon, v. 2, 3. Solomon began his reign with this public pious visit to God's altar, and it was a very good omen. Magistrates are then likely to do well for themselves and their people when they thus take God along with them at their setting out.

2. He offered abundance of sacrifices to God there (v. 6). His father David had left him flocks and herds in abundance (1 Chron. xxvii. 29, 31), and thus he gave God his dues out of them. The ark was at Jerusalem (v. 4), but the altar was at Gibeon (v. 5), and thither he brought his sacrifices.

3. He prayed a good prayer to God: this, with the answer to it, we had before, 1 Kings iii. 5, &c. (1) God bade him ask what he would; not only that he might put him in the right way of obtaining the favours that were intended him, but that he might discover what was in his heart. Men's characters appear in their choices and desires. What wouldst thou have? tries a man as much as, What wouldst thou do? (2) Like a genuine son of David, he chose spiritual blessings rather than temporal. His petition here is, Give me wisdom and knowledge. God gave the faculty of understanding, and to him we must apply for the furniture of it. Two things are here pleaded which we had not in Kings. [1] Thou hast made me reign in my father's stead, v. 8. Must I reign in my father's stead? Lord, give me my father's spirit." [2] Let thy promise to David my father be established, v. 9. The promise was, He shall build a house for my name, I will establish his throne, he shall be my son, and my mercy shall not depart from him. "Now, Lord, unless thou give me wisdom, thy house will not be built, nor my throne established; therefore, Lord, give me wisdom."

4. He received a gracious answer to this prayer, v. 11, 12. (1) God gave him the wisdom that he asked for because he asked for it. God's grace shall never be wanting to those who sincerely desire to know and do their duty. (2) God gave him the wealth and honour which he did not ask for because he asked not for them. Those that make this world their end come short of the other and are disappointed in this too; but those that make the other world their end shall not only obtain that, and full satisfaction in it, but shall enjoy as much as is convenient of this world in their way.

Verses 13–17

Here is, 1. Solomon's entrance upon the government (v. 13): He came from before the tabernacle, and reigned over Israel. He would not do any acts of government till he had done his acts of devotion, would not take honour to himself till he had given honour to God—first the tabernacle, and then the throne. 2. The magnificence of his court (v. 14): He gathered chariots and horsemen. He made silver and gold very cheap and common, v. 15. The increase of gold lowers the value of it; but the increase of grace advances its price; the more men have of that the more they value it. How much better therefore is it to get wisdom than gold! He opened also a trade with Egypt, whence he imported horses and linen-yarn, which he exported again to the kings of Syria, with great advantage no doubt, v. 16, 17. This we had before, 1 Kings x. 28, 29.

CHAP. II

Solomon's trading, which we read of in the close of the foregoing chapter, and the encouragement he gave both to merchandise and manufactures, were very commendable. But building was the work he was designed for, and to that business he is here applying himself. Here is, I. Solomon's determination to build the temple and a royal palace, and his appointing labourers to be employed herein, ver. 1, 2, 17, 18. II. His request to Huram, king of Tyre to furnish him both with artists and materials, ver. 3–10. III. Huram's obliging answer to, and compliance with, his request, ver. 11–16.

Verses 1–10

Solomon's wisdom was given him, not merely for speculation, nor merely for conversation, to entertain his friends, but for action; and therefore to action he immediately applies himself.

I. His resolution concerning his business (v. 1): He determined to build, in the first place, a house for the name of the Lord. It is fit that he who is the first should be first served—first a temple and then a palace, a house not so much for his own convenience and magnitude, as for the kingdom, for the honour of it among its neighbours and for the decent reception of the people whenever they had occasion to apply to their prince; so that in both he aimed at the public good. We are not born for ourselves, but for God and our country.

II. His embassy to Huram, king of Tyre. The purport of his errand to him is much the same here as we had it 1 Kings v. 2, &c.

1. The reasons why he makes this application to Huram are here more fully represented, (1) He pleads his father's interest in Huram, and the kindness he had received from him (v. 3): As thou didst deal with David, so deal with me. (2) He represents his design in building the temple: he intended it for a place of religious worship (v. 4). The house was built that it might be dedicated to God and used in his service. He mentions various particular services that were there to be performed, for the instruction of Huram. (3) He endeavours to inspire Huram with very great and high thoughts of the God of Israel, by expressing the mighty veneration he had for his holy name: Great is our God above all gods, above all idols, above all princes. Therefore, [1] "The house must be great; not in proportion to the greatness of that God to whom it is to be dedicated (for between finite and infinite there can be no proportion), but in some proportion to the great value and esteem we have for this God." [2] "Yet, be it ever so great, it cannot be a habitation for the great God. Let not Huram think that the God of Israel, like the gods of the nations, dwells in temples made with hands, Acts xvii. 24. No, the heaven of heavens cannot contain him. It is intended only for the convenience of his priests and worshippers, that they may have a fit place wherein to burn sacrifice before him." [3] He looked upon himself, though a mighty prince, as unworthy the honour of being employed in this great work: Who am I that I should build him a house?

2. The requests he makes to him are more particularly set down here. (1) He desired Huram would furnish him with a good hand to work (v. 7): Send me a man. "There are ingenious men in Jerusalem, but not such engravers as are in Tyre; and therefore, since temple-work must be the best in its kind, let me have the best workmen that can be got." (2) With good materials to work on (v. 8), cedar and other timber in abundance (v. 8, 9); for the house must be wonderfully great.

3. Here is Solomon's engagement to maintain the workmen (v. 10), to give them so much wheat and barley, so much wine and oil. He did not feed his workmen with bread and water, but with plenty, and everything of the best.

Verses 11–18

I. The return which Huram made to Solomon's embassy, in which he shows a great respect for Solomon and a readiness to serve him. 1. He congratulates Israel on having such a king as Solomon was (v. 11): Because the Lord loved his people, he has made thee king. 2. He blesses God for raising up such a successor to David, v. 12. Huram was not only very well affected to the Jewish nation, and well pleased with their prosperity, but worshipped Jehovah, the God of Israel (who was now known by that name to the neighbouring nations). Now that the people of Israel kept close to the law and worship of God, and so preserved their honour, the neighbouring nations were as willing to be instructed by them in the true religion as Israel had been, in the days of their apostasy, to be infected with the idolatries and superstitions of their neighbours. 3. He sent him a very ingenious curious workman, that would not fail to answer his expectations in everything, one that had both Jewish and Gentile blood meeting in him; for his mother was an Israelite, his father a Tyrian. 4. He engaged for the timber, as much as he would have occasion for, and undertook to deliver it at Joppa, and withal signified his dependence upon Solomon for the maintenance of the workmen as he had promised, v. 15, 16.

II. The orders which Solomon gave about the workmen. He would not employ the free-born Israelites in the drudgery work of the temple itself, not so much as to be overseers of it. In this he employed the strangers who were proselyted to the Jewish religion. There were, at this time, vast numbers of them in the land (v. 17), who fell under the law, of the Gibeonites, to be hewers of wood for the congregation. The distribution of them we have here (v. 2, and again v. 18), in all 150,000. Mr. Fuller suggests that the expedient peculiar to this structure, of framing all beforehand, must needs increase the work.

CHAP. III

In this chapter we have, I. The place and time of building the temple, ver. 1, 2. II. The dimensions and rich ornaments of it, ver. 3–9. III. The cherubim in the most holy place, ver 10–13. IV. The veil, ver. 14. V. The two pillars, ver. 15–17. Of all this we have already had an account, 1 Kings vi, vii.

Verses 1–9

I. The place where the temple was built. It was before determined (1 Chron. xxii. 1). 1. It must be at Jerusalem; for that was the place God had chosen. The royal city must be the holy city. 2. It must be on Mount Moriah, which, some think, was that very place in the land of Moriah where Abraham offered Isaac, Gen. xxii. 2. 3. It must be where the Lord appeared to David, and answered him by fire, 1 Chron. xxi. 18, 26. There atonement was made once; and therefore, in remembrance of that, there atonement must still be made. 4. It must be in the place which David had prepared, not only which he had purchased with his money, but which he had pitched upon by divine direction. 5. It must be in the threshing-floor of Ornan.

II. The time when it was begun; not till the fourth year of Solomon's reign, v. 2. The first three years were employed in the necessary preparations for it, wherein three years would be soon gone, considering how many hands were to be got together and set to work.

III. The dimensions of it, in which Solomon was instructed (v. 3), as he was in other things, by his father. This was the foundation (so it may be read) which Solomon laid for the building of the house. This was the rule he went by, so many cubits the length and breadth, after the first measure, that is, according to the measure first fixed, for the dimensions were given by divine wisdom.

IV. The ornaments of the temple. The timber-work was very fine, and yet, within, it was overlaid with pure gold (v. 4), with fine gold (v. 5), and that embossed with palm-trees and chains. It was gold of Parvain (v. 6), the best gold. The beams and posts, the walls and doors, were overlaid with gold, v. 7. The most holy place, which was ten yards square, was all overlaid with fine gold (v. 8), even the upper chambers, or rather the upper floor or roof—top, bottom, and sides, were all overlaid with gold. Every nail, or screw, or pin, with which the golden plates were fastened to the walls that were overlaid with them, weighed fifty shekels, or was worth so much workmanship and all. A great many precious stones were dedicated to God (1 Chron. xxix. 2, 8), and these were set here and there, where they would show to the best advantage.

Verses 10–17

1. The two cherubim, which were set up in the holy of holies. There were two already over the ark, which covered the mercy-seat with their wings; these were small ones. Now that the most holy place was enlarged, though these were continued (being appurtenances to the ark, which was not to be made new, as all the other utensils of the tabernacle were), yet those two large ones were added. These cherubim are said to be of image-work (v. 10), to represent the angels who attend the divine Majesty. Each wing extended five cubits, so that the whole was twenty cubits (v. 12, 13), which was just the breadth of the most holy place, v. 8. They stood on their feet, as servants, their faces inward towards the ark (v. 13), that it might appear they were not set there to be adored (for then they would have been made sitting, as on a throne, and their faces towards their worshippers), but rather as themselves attendants on the invisible God. We must not worship angels, but we must worship with angels; for we have come into communication with them (Heb. xii. 22), and must do the will of God as the angels do it. Compare 1 Cor. xi. 10 with Isa. vi. 2. 2. The veil that parted between the temple and the most holy place, v. 14. This denoted the darkness of that dispensation, and the distance which the worshippers were kept at; but, at the death of Christ, this veil was rent; for through him we are made nigh, and have boldness not only to look, but to enter, into the holiest. On this he wrought cherubim. Heb. he caused them to ascend, that is, they were made in raised work, embossed. 3. The two pillars which were set up before the temple. Both together were somewhat above thirty-five cubits in length (v. 15), about eighteen cubits high a-piece: See 1 Kings vii. 15, &c., where we took a view of those pillars, Jachin and Boaz.

CHAP. IV

A further account of the furniture of God's house. I. Those things that were of brass. The altar for burnt-offerings (ver. 1), the sea and lavers to hold water (ver. 2–6), the plates with which the doors of the court were overlaid (ver. 9), the vessels of the altar, and other things, ver. 10–18. II. Those that were of gold. The candlesticks and tables (ver. 7, 8), the altar of incense (ver. 19), and the appurtenances of each of these, ver. 20–22.

Verses 1–10

David often speaks with much affection both of the house of the Lord and of the courts of our God.

I. Things in the open court, in the view of all the people, which were very significant.

1. There was the brazen altar, v. 1. On this all the sacrifices were offered, and it sanctified the gift. This altar was much larger than that which Moses made in the tabernacle; that was five cubits square, this was twenty cubits square. God had greatly enlarged their borders; it was therefore fit that they should enlarge his altars. Our returns should bear some proportion to our receivings. It was ten cubits high, so that the people who worshipped in the courts might see the sacrifices burnt, and their eye might affect their heart with sorrow for sin. And with the smoke of the sacrifices their hearts might ascend to heaven in holy desires towards God and his favour. In all our devotions we must keep the eye of faith fixed upon Christ, the great propitiation.

2. There was the molten sea, a very large brass pan, in which they put water for the priests to wash in, v. 2, 6. (1) There is a fulness of merit in Jesus Christ for all those that by faith apply to him for the purifying of their consciences, that they may serve the living God, Heb. ix. 14. (2) Our great gospel duty, which is to cleanse ourselves by true repentance. Our hearts must be sanctified, or we cannot sanctify the name of God. Those that draw nigh to God must cleanse their hands, and purify their hearts, James iv. 8.

3. There were ten lavers of brass, in which they washed such things as they offered for the burnt offerings, v. 6. As the priests must be washed, so must the sacrifices. We must not only purify ourselves but carefully put away all those vain thoughts which cleave to our performances themselves and pollute them.

4. The doors of the court were overlaid with brass (v. 9), both for strength and beauty, and that they might not be rotted with the weather.

II. There were those things in the house of the Lord (into which the priests alone went to minister) that were very significant. All was of gold there. The nearer we come to God the purer we must be, the purer we shall be. 1. There were ten golden candlesticks, according to the form of that one which was in the tabernacle, v. 7. The written word is a lamp and a light, shining in a dark place. In Moses's time they had but one candlestick, the Pentateuch; but the additions which, in process of time, were to be made of other books of scripture might be signified by this increase of the number of the candlesticks. Light was growing. The candlesticks are the churches, Rev. i. 20. Moses set up but one, the church of the Jews; but, in the gospel temple, not only believers, but churches, are multiplied. 2. There were ten golden tables (v. 8), tables whereon the shew-bread was set, v. 19. To those tables belonged 100 golden basins, or dishes. 3. There was a golden altar (v. 19), on which they burnt incense.

Verses 11–22

A summary both of the brass-work and the gold-work of the temple. 1. Huram the workman was very punctual: He finished all that he was to make (v. 11). Huram his father, he is called, v. 16. Probably it was a sort of a nickname, for the king of Tyre called him Huram Abi, my father, he being a great artist and father of the artificers in brass and iron. 2. Solomon was very generous. He made all the vessels in great abundance (v. 18), that some might be laid up for use when others were worn out.

CHAP. V

The temple being built and furnished for God, we have here, I. Possession given to him, by bringing in the dedicated things (ver. 1), but especially the ark, the token of his presence, ver. 2–10. II. Possession taken by him, in a cloud, ver. 11–14.

Verses 1–10

This agrees with what we had 1 Kings viii. 2, &c., where an account was given of the solemn introduction of the ark into the new-erected temple. 1. There needed no great solemnity for the bringing in of the dedicated things, v. 1. They added to the wealth, and perhaps to the beauty of it; but they could not add to the holiness for it was the temple that sanctified the gold, Matt. xxiii. 17. See how just Solomon was both to God and to his father. Whatever David had dedicated to God he put it among the treasures of the temple. When Solomon had made all the vessels of the temple in abundance (ch. iv. 18), many of the materials were left, which he would not convert to any other use, but laid up in the treasury for a time of need. 2. But it was fit that the ark should be brought in with great solemnity; and so it was. All the other vessels were made new, and larger, in proportion to the house, than they had been in the tabernacle. But the ark, with the mercy-seat and the cherubim, was the same; for the presence and the grace of God are the same in little assemblies as they are in large ones. Wherever two or three are gathered together in Christ's name there is he as truly present with them as if there were 2,000 or 3,000. The ark was brought in attended by a very great assembly of the elders of Israel, who came to grace the solemnity, v. 2–4. It was carried by the priests (v. 7), brought into the most holy place, and put under the wings of the great cherubim which Solomon had set up there, v. 7, 8. There they are unto this day (v. 9), not the day when this book was written after the captivity, but when that was written out of which this story was transcribed. The ark was a type of Christ, and, as such, a token of the presence of God. The temple itself, if Christ leave it, is a desolate place, Matt. xxiii. 38. 3. With the ark they brought up the tabernacle and all the holy vessels that were in the tabernacle, v. 5. 4. This was done with great joy. They kept a holy feast upon the occasion (v. 3), and sacrificed sheep and oxen without number, v. 6. When Christ is formed in a soul, the law written in the heart, the ark of the covenant settled there, so that it becomes the temple of the Holy Ghost, there is true satisfaction in that soul.

Solomon, and the elders of Israel, had done what they could to grace the solemnity of the introduction of the ark; but God, by testifying his acceptance of what they did, put the greatest honour upon it. The cloud of glory that filled the house beautified it more than all the gold with which it was overlaid or the precious stones with which it was garnished; and yet that was no glory in comparison with the glory of the gospel dispensation, 2 Cor. iii. 8–10.

I. How God took possession of the temple: He filled it with a cloud, v. 13. 1. Thus he signified his acceptance of this temple to be the same to him that the tabernacle of Moses was, Exod. xl. 34. 2. Thus he considered the weakness and infirmity of those to whom he manifested himself, who could not bear the dazzling lustre of the divine light. Christ revealed things unto his disciples as they were able to bear them, and in parables, which wrapped up divine things as in a cloud.

II. When he took possession of it. 1. When the priests had come out of the holy place, v. 11. This is the way of giving possession. All must come out, that the rightful owner may come in. Would we have God dwell in our hearts? We must leave room for him; let everything else give way. 2. When the singers and musicians praised God, then the house was filled with a cloud. This is very observable; it was not when they offered sacrifices, but when they sang the praises of God, that God gave them this token of his favour; for the sacrifice of praise pleaseth the Lord better than that of an ox or bullock, Ps. lxix. 31. Where unity is the Lord commands the blessing. God's goodness is his glory, and he is pleased when we give him the glory of it.

III. What was the effect of it. The priests themselves could not stand to minister, by reason of the cloud (v. 14). The Word was made flesh; and when he comes to his temple, like a refiner's fire, who may abide the day of his coming? And who shall stand when he appeareth? Mal. iii. 1, 2.

CHAP. VI

The glory of the Lord, in the vehicle of a thick cloud, having filled the house, Solomon immediately improves the opportunity, and addresses God. I. He makes a solemn declaration of his intention in building this house, to the satisfaction of the people and the honour of God, both of whom he blessed, ver. 1–11. II. He makes a solemn prayer to God that he would please graciously to accept and answer all the prayers that should be made in that house, ver. 12–42. This whole chapter we had before, with very little variation (1 Kings viii. 12–53), to which it may not be amiss here to look back.

Verses 1–11

It is of great consequence, in all our religious actions, that we design well, and that our eye be single. If Solomon had built this temple in the pride of his heart it would not have turned at all to his account. 1. He did it for the glory and honour of God; this was his highest and ultimate end in it. It was for the name of the Lord God of Israel (v. 10), to be a house of habitation for him, v. 2. 2. He did it in compliance with the choice God had been pleased to make of Jerusalem, to be the city in which he would record his name (v. 6): I have chosen Jerusalem. 3. He did it in pursuance of his father's good intentions, which he never had an opportunity to put in execution: "It was in the heart of David my father to build a house for God;" the project was his, be it known, to his honour (v. 7), and God approved of it, though he permitted him not to put it in execution (v. 8), Thou didst well that it was in thy heart. Temple-work is often thus done; one sows and another reaps (John iv. 37, 38), one age begins that which the next brings to perfection. Every good piece is not an original. 4. He did it in performance of the word which God had spoken. God had said, Thy son shall build the house for my name; and now he had done it, v. 9, 10.

Verses 12–41

Solomon had, in the foregoing verses, signed and sealed, as it were, the deed of dedication, by which the temple was appropriated to the honour and service of God. Now here he prays the consecration-prayer, by which it was made a figure of Christ, the great Mediator, through whom we are to offer all our prayers.

I. Here are some doctrinal truths laid down. As, 1. That the God of Israel is a being of incomparable perfection. We cannot describe him; but this we know, there is none like him in heaven or in earth, v. 14. 2. That he is, and will be, true to every word that he has spoken; and all that serve him in sincerity shall certainly find him both faithful and kind. 3. That he is a being infinite and immense, whom the heaven, and heaven of heavens, cannot contain, and to whose felicity nothing is added by the utmost we can do in his service, v. 18. He is infinitely beyond the bounds of the creation and infinitely above the praises of all intelligent creatures. 4. That he, and he only, knows the hearts of the children of men, v. 30. All men's thoughts, aims, and affections, are naked and open before him; and the imaginations and intents of our hearts cannot be hidden from God, who knows not only what is in the heart, but the heart itself and all the beatings of it. 5. That there is no such thing as a sinless perfection to be found in this life (v. 36).

II. Here are some suppositions. 1. He supposed that if doubts and controversies arose between man and man both sides would agree to appeal to God, and lay an oath upon the person whose testimony must decide the matter, v. 22. 2. He supposed that, though Israel enjoyed a profound peace and tranquillity, yet troublesome times would come. 3. He supposed that those who had not called upon God at other times, yet, in their affliction, would seek him early and earnestly. Trouble will drive those to God who have said to him, Depart, v. 24, 26, 28. 4. He supposed that strangers would come from afar to worship the God of Israel and to pay homage to him.

III. Here are petitions. 1. That God would own this house, v. 20. 2. That God would hear and accept the prayers which should be made in or towards that place, v. 21. He prayed that God would hear from his dwelling-place, even from heaven. Heaven is his dwelling-place still, not this temple; and thence help must come. When thou hearest forgive. Note, The forgiveness of our sins is that which makes way for all the other answers to our prayers. 3. That God would give judgment according to equity upon all the appeals that should be made to him, v. 23, 30. 4. That God would return in mercy to his people when they repented, and reformed, and sought unto him, v. 25, 27, 38, 39. 5. That God would bid the strangers welcome to this house, and answer their prayers (v. 33). 6. That God would, upon all occasions, own and plead the cause of his people Israel, against all the opposers of it (v. 35): Maintain their cause; and again, v. 39. 7. He concludes this prayer with some expressions which he had learned of his good father, and borrowed from one of his psalms. We had them not in the Kings, but here we have them, v. 41, 42. He prayed (v. 41), (1) That God would take possession of the temple, and keep possession, that he would make it his resting-place: Thou and the ark; what will the ark do without the God of the ark—ordinances without the God of the ordinances? (2) That he would make the ministers of the temple public blessings: Clothe them with salvation, that is, not only save them, but make them instrumental to save others, by offering the sacrifices of righteousness. (3) That the service of the temple might turn abundantly to the joy and satisfaction of all the Lord's people.

CHAP. VII

God's answer to Solomon's prayer. I. His public answer by fire from heaven, which consumed the sacrifices (ver. 1), with which the priests and people were much affected, ver. 2, 3. By that token of God's acceptance they were encouraged to continue the solemnities of the feast for fourteen days, and Solomon was encouraged to pursue all his designs for the honour of God, ver. 4–11. II. His private answer by word of mouth, in a dream or vision of the night, ver. 12–22. Most of these things we had before, 1 Kings viii. and ix.

Verses 1–11

I. The gracious answer which God immediately made to Solomon's prayer: The fire came down from heaven and consumed the sacrifice, v. 1. In this way God testified his acceptance of Moses (Lev. ix. 24), of Gideon (Judges vi. 21), of David (1 Chron. xxi. 26), of Elijah (1 Kings xviii. 38); and, in general, to accept the burnt-sacrifice is, in the Hebrew phrase, to turn it to ashes, Ps. xx. 3. Let us apply this, 1. To the sufferings of Christ. When it pleased the Lord to bruise him, and put him to grief, in that he showed his goodwill to men, having laid on him the iniquity of us all. His death was our life, and he was made sin and a curse that he might inherit righteousness and a blessing. 2. To the sanctification of the Spirit, who descends like fire, burning up our lusts and corruptions, those beasts that must be sacrificed or we are undone, and kindling in our souls a holy fire of pious and devout affections, always to be kept burning on the altar of the heart.

II. The grateful return made to God for this gracious token of his favour.

1. The people worshipped and praised God, v. 3. with reverence adoring the glory of God: They bowed their faces to the ground and worshipped, thus expressing their awful dread of the divine majesty, their cheerful submission to the divine authority, and the sense they had of their unworthiness to come into God's presence. Even when the fire of the Lord came down they praised him, saying, He is good, for his mercy endureth for ever. This is a song never out of season, and for which our hearts and tongues should be never out of tune.

2. The king and all the people offered sacrifices in abundance, v. 4, 5.

3. The priests did their part; they waited on their offices, and the singers and musicians on theirs (v. 6), with the instruments that David made, and the hymn that David had put into their hand, as some think it may be read (1 Chron. xvi. 7), or, as we read it, when David praised by their ministry.

4. The whole congregation expressed the greatest joy and satisfaction imaginable. They kept the feast of the dedication of the altar seven days, from the second to the ninth; the tenth day was the day of atonement, when they were to afflict their souls for sin, and that was not unseasonable in the midst of their rejoicings; on the fifteenth day began the feast of tabernacles, which continued to the twenty-second, and they did not separate till the twenty-third.

God appeared to Solomon in the night, as he did once before (ch. i. 7), and after a day of sacrifice too, as then, and gave him a particular answer to his prayer. We had the substance of it before, 1 Kings ix. 2–9.

I. He promised to own this house for a house of sacrifice to Israel and a house of prayer for all people (Isa. lvi. 7): My name shall be there for ever (v. 12, 16).

II. He promised to answer the prayers of his people that should at any time be made in that place, v. 13–15. 1. National judgments are here supposed (v. 13), famine, and pestilence, and perhaps war, for by the locusts devouring the land may be meant enemies as greedy as locusts, and laying all waste. 2. National repentance, prayer, and reformation, are required, v. 14. 3. National mercy is then promised, that God will forgive their sin, which brought the judgment upon them, and then heal their land, redress all their grievances. Pardoning mercy makes way for healing mercy, Ps. ciii. 3; Matt. ix. 2.

III. He promised to perpetuate Solomon's kingdom, upon condition that he persevered in his duty, v. 17, 18. But he set before him death as well as life, the curse as well as the blessing. 1. He supposed it possible that though they had this temple built to the honour of God, yet they might be drawn aside to worship other gods, v. 19. 2. He threatened it as certain that, if they did so, it would certainly be the ruin of both church and state.

CHAP. VIII

In this chapter we are told, I. What cities Solomon built, ver. 1–6. II. What workmen Solomon employed, ver. 7–10. III. What care he took about a proper settlement for his wife, ver. 11. IV. What a good method he put the temple-service into, ver. 12–16. V. What trading he had with foreign countries, ver. 17, 18.

Verses 1–11

There is a similar account in 1 Kings ix. 10–24.

I. Though Solomon was a man of great learning and knowledge, yet he spent his days, not in contemplation, but in action, in building cities and fortifying them.

II. He employed a great many hands, kept abundance of people to work. A great many strangers there were in Israel, many that remained of the Canaanites; and they were welcome to live there, but not to live and do nothing.

III. When Solomon had begun with building the house of God, and made good work and quick work of that, he prospered in all his undertakings, so that he built all that he desired to build, v. 6. He knew how to set bounds to his desires. He finished all he desired, and then he desires no more.

IV. One reason why Solomon built a palace on purpose for the queen, and removed her and her court to it, was because he thought it by no means proper that she should dwell in the house of David (v. 11). She was proselyted, it is likely, to the Jewish religion; but it is a question whether all her servants were. Perhaps they had among them the idols of Egypt. Now, though Solomon had not zeal and courage enough to suppress and punish what was amiss there, yet he so far consulted the honour of his father's memory that he would not suffer that place to be thus profaned where the ark of God had been and where holy David had prayed many a good prayer and sung many a sweet psalm.

Verses 12–18

I. Solomon's devotion. The building of the temple was in order to the service of the temple. Whatever cost he was at in rearing the structure, if he had neglected the worship that was to be performed there, it would all have been to no purpose. When Solomon had built the temple, 1. He kept up the holy sacrifices there, according to the law of Moses, v. 12, 13. Those are spiritual sacrifices that are now required of us, which we are to bring daily and weekly; and it is good to be in a settled method of devotion. 2. He kept up the holy songs there, according to the law of David, who is here called the man of God, as Moses was, because he was both instructed and authorised of God to make these establishments; and Solomon took care to see them observed as the duty of every day required, v. 14. None departed from the commandment of the king concerning any matter, v. 15. When the service of the temple was put into this good order, The house of the Lord was perfected, v. 16.

II. Solomon's merchandise. He did himself in person visit the sea-port towns of Eloth and Eziongeber. Canaan was a rich country, and yet must send to Ophir for gold; the Israelites were a wise and understanding people, and yet must be beholden to the king of Tyre for men that had knowledge of the seas, v. 18. Yet Canaan was God's peculiar land, and Israel God's peculiar people. This teaches us that grace, and not gold, is the best riches, and acquaintance with God and his law the best knowledge.

CHAP. IX

Solomon here continues to appear great both at home and abroad. 1 Kings x. Nothing is here added; but his defection towards his latter end, which we have there (ch. xi.), is here omitted, and the close of this chapter brings him to the grave with an unstained reputation. I. The honour which the Queen of Sheba did to Solomon, in the visit she made to hear his wisdom, ver. 1–12. II. Many instances given of the riches and splendour of Solomon's court, ver. 13–28. III. The conclusion of his reign, ver. 29–31.

Verses 1–12

This passage of story has been largely considered in the Kings. Our Saviour has proposed it as an example to us in our enquiries after him (Matt. xii. 42). 1. Those who honour God he will honour, 1 Sam. ii. 30. Solomon had greatly honoured God, in building, beautifying, and dedicating the temple; all his wisdom and all his wealth were employed for the making of that a consummate piece: and now God made his wisdom and wealth to redound greatly to his reputation. 2. Those who know the worth of true wisdom will grudge no pains nor cost to obtain it. The queen of Sheba put herself to a great deal of trouble and expense to hear the wisdom of Solomon; and yet, learning from him to serve God and do her duty, she thought herself well paid for her pains. Heavenly wisdom is that pearl of great price which it is a good bargain to purchase by parting with all that we have. 3. As every man has received the gift so he ought to minister the same for the edification of others, as he has opportunity. Solomon was communicative of his wisdom and willing to teach others what he knew himself. The queen of Sheba was exceedingly affected to see the propriety with which Solomon's servants attended him and with which both he and they attended in the house of God. 5. Those are happy who have the opportunity of a constant converse with such as are knowing, wise, and good. The queen of Sheba thought Solomon's servants happy who continually heard his wisdom; it is observable that the posterity of those who had places in his court thought themselves sufficiently distinguished and dignified when they were called the children of Solomon's servants (Ezra ii. 55; Neh. vii. 57). It becomes those that are wise and good to be generous according to their place and power. The queen of Sheba was so to Solomon, Solomon was so to her, v. 9, 12. They both knew how to value wisdom, and therefore were neither of them covetous of their money, but cultivated the acquaintance and confirmed the friendship they had contracted by mutual presents.

Verses 13–30

I. Here is Solomon reigning in wealth and power, in ease and fulness, such as could never since be paralleled by any king whatsoever. The most illustrious of them were famed for their wars, whereas Solomon reigned forty years in profound peace. Some of those that might be thought to vie with Solomon affected retirement, kept people in awe by keeping them at a great distance; but Solomon went much abroad, and appeared in public business. The promise was fulfilled, that God would give him riches, and wealth, and honour, such as no kings have had, or shall have, ch. i. 12. 1. Never any prince appeared in public with greater splendour than Solomon did, which to those that judge by the sight of the eye, as most people do, would very much recommend him. He had 200 targets and 300 shields, all of beaten gold, carried before him (v. 15, 16), and sat upon a most stately throne, v. 17–19. There was not the like in any kingdom. 2. Never any prince had greater plenty of gold and silver, though there were no gold or silver mines in his own kingdom. 3. Never any prince had such presents brought him by all his neighbours as Solomon had: All the kings of Arabia, and governors of the country, brought him gold and silver (v. 14), not as tribute which he extorted from them, but as freewill offerings to procure his favour, or in a way of exchange for some of the productions of his husbandry, corn or cattle. Herein he was a type of Christ, to whom, as soon as he was born, the wise men of the east brought presents, gold, frankincense, and myrrh (Matt. ii. 11), and to whom all that are about him must bring presents, Ps. lxxvi. 11; Rom. xii. 1. 4. Never any prince was so renowned for wisdom, so courted, so consulted, so admired (v. 23).

II. Here is Solomon dying, stripped of his pomp, and leaving all his wealth and power, not to one concerning whom he knew not whether he would be a wise man or a fool (Eccles. ii. 19), but who he knew would be a fool. This was not only vanity but vexation of spirit, v. 29–31. Though he fell, yet he was not utterly cast down. His sin is not again recorded, because it was repented of, and pardoned, and so became as if it had never been. Scripture-silence sometimes speaks. I am willing to believe that its silence here concerning the sin of Solomon is an intimation that none of the sins he committed were mentioned against him, Ezek. xxxiii. 16. When God pardons sin he casts it behind his back and remembers it no more.

CHAP. X

This chapter is copied almost verbatim from 1 Kings xii. 1–19. Solomon's defection from God was not repeated, but the defection of the ten tribes from his family is, in this chapter, where we find, I. How foolish Rehoboam was in his treating with them, ver. 1, 5–14. II. How wicked the people were in complaining of Solomon (ver. 2–4) and forsaking Rehoboam, ver. 16–19. III. How just and righteous God was in all this, ver. 15. His counsel was thereby fulfilled.

Verses 1–11

1. The wisest and best cannot give everybody content. Solomon enriched and advanced his kingdom, did all that could be done to make them happy and easy; and yet was indiscreet in burdening them with the imposition of taxes and services. No man is perfectly wise. It is probable that it was when Solomon had declined from God and his duty that his wisdom failed him, and God left him to himself to act in this impolitic manner. Even Solomon's treasures were exhausted by his love of women; and probably it was to maintain them, and their pride, luxury, and idolatry, that he burdened his subjects. 2. Turbulent and ungrateful spirits will find fault with the government, and complain of grievances. Had they not peace in Solomon's time? They were never plundered by invaders, as formerly, never put in fear by the alarms of war, nor obliged to hazard their lives in the high places of the field. Had they not plenty—meat enough, and money enough? And yet they complain that Solomon made their yoke grievous. 3. Many ruin themselves and their interests by trampling upon and provoking their inferiors. Rehoboam thought that because he was king he might assume as much authority as his father had done. But, though he wore his father's crown, he wanted his father's brains. Such a wise man as Solomon may do as he will, but such a fool as Rehoboam must do as he can. Rehoboam paid dearly for threatening, and talking big, and thinking to carry matters with a high hand. A tender consideration of those in subjection, and a forwardness to make them easy, will be the comfort and praise of all in authority, in the church, in the state, and in families. 4. Moderate counsels are generally wisest and best. Gentleness will do what violence will not do. Rehoboam's old experienced counsellors directed him to this method (v. 7): "Be kind to this people, and please them, and speak good words to them, and thou art sure of them for ever." Good words cost nothing but a little self-denial, and yet they purchase great things.

Verses 12–19

1. When public affairs are in a ferment violent proceedings do but make bad worse. Rough answers (such as Rehoboam here gave) do but stir up anger and bring oil to the flames. 2. Whatever the devices and designs of men are, God is, by all, doing his own work, and fulfilling the word which he has spoken, no iota or tittle of which shall fall to the ground. 3. Worldly wealth, honour, and dominion, are very uncertain things. Solomon reigned over all Israel, and, one would think, had done enough to secure the monarchy entire to his family for many ages; and yet he is scarcely cold in his grave before ten of the twelve tribes finally revolt from his son. All the good services he had done for Israel were now forgotten. 4. God often visits the iniquities of the fathers upon the children. Solomon forsakes God, and therefore his son after him, is forsaken by the greatest part of his people. Thus God, by making the penal consequences of sin to last long and visibly to continue after the sinner's death, would give an indication of its malignity, and perhaps some intimation of the perpetuity of its punishment. He that sins against God not only wrongs his soul, but perhaps wrongs his seed more than he thinks. 5. When God is fulfilling his threatenings, he will take care that, at the same time, promises do not fall to the ground. When Solomon's iniquity is remembered, and for it his son loses ten tribes, David's piety is not forgotten, nor the promise made to him; but for the sake of that his grandson had two tribes preserved to him.

CHAP. XI

I. Rehoboam's attempt to recover the ten tribes he had lost, and the letting fall of that attempt in obedience to the divine command, ver. 1–4. II. His successful endeavours to preserve the two tribes that remained, ver. 5–12. III. The resort of the priests and Levites to him, ver. 13–17. IV. An account of his wives and children, ver. 18–23.

Verses 1–12

How the ten tribes deserted the house of David we read in the foregoing chapter. They had formerly sat loose to that family (2 Sam. xx. 1, 2), and now they quite threw it off, not considering how much it would weaken the common interest. But thus the kingdom must be corrected as well as the house of David. 1. Rehoboam at length, like a bold man, raises an army, with a design to reduce the revolters, v. 1. Judah and Benjamin were ready to give him the best assistance they could for the recovery of his right. Judah was his own tribe, that owned him some years before the rest did; Benjamin was the tribe in which Jerusalem, or the greatest part of it, stood. 2. Yet, like a conscientious man, when God forbade him to prosecute this design, in obedience to him he let it fall, either because he reverenced the divine authority or because he knew that he should not prosper if he should go contrary to God's command. They obeyed the words of the Lord; and though it looked mean, and would turn to their reproach among their neighbours, yet, because God would have it so, they laid down their arms. 3. Like a discreet man, he fortified his own country. Now, his aged and experienced counsellors were hearkened to, and they advised him to submit to the will of God concerning what was lost, and to make it his business to keep what he had. It was probably by their advice that, (1) He fortified his frontiers, and many of the principal cities of his kingdom. (2) He furnished them with good store of victuals and arms, v. 11, 12. Because God forbade him to fight he prudently provided against an attack. Those that may not be conquerors, yet may be builders.

Verses 13–23

I. Rehoboam strengthened by the priests and Levites, and all the devout and pious Israelites.

1. Jeroboam set up such a way of worship as obliged them to withdraw from his altar, and he would not allow them to go up to Jerusalem to worship at the altar there; so that he totally cast them off from executing the priest's office, v. 14. And very willing he was that room might be made for those mean and scandalous persons whom he ordained priests for the high places, v. 15. Compare 1 Kings xii. 31.

2. They thereupon left their suburbs and possessions, v. 14. They were driven out of all their cities except those in Judah and Benjamin. But why did they leave their possessions? (1) Because they saw they could do no good among their neighbours, in whom (now that Jeroboam set up his calves), the old proneness to idolatry revived. (2) Because they themselves would be in continual temptation. (3) Because, they had reason to expect persecution from Jeroboam and his sons.

3. They came to Judah and Jerusalem (v. 14) and presented themselves to Rehoboam, v. 13, margin.

(1) It was a mercy that when Jeroboam cast them off there were those so near that would bid them welcome. (2) It was an evidence that they loved their work better than their maintenance, in that they left their suburbs because they were restrained from serving God there, and cast themselves upon God's providence and the charity of their brethren. Better live upon alms, or die in a prison, with a good conscience, than roll in wealth and pleasure with a prostituted one. (3) Rehoboam and his people bade them welcome. Conscientious refugees will bring a blessing along with them to the countries that entertain them, as they leave a curse behind them with those that expel them.

4. When the priests and Levites came to Jerusalem all the devout pious Israelites of every tribe followed them.

5. They strengthened the kingdom of Judah (v. 17) by their piety and their prayers. See Zech. xii. 5. They made him and his people strong three years; for so long they walked in the way of David and Solomon, their good way. But when they forsook that, the best friends they had could no longer help to strengthen them.

II. Rehoboam was weakened by indulging himself in his pleasures. He desired many wives, as his father did (v. 23), yet, 1. In this he was more wise than his father, that he does not appear to have married strange wives. The wives mentioned here were daughters of Israel, of the family of David. 2. In this he was more happy than his father, that he had many sons and daughters; whereas we read not of more than one son that his father had. Several of Rehoboam's sons are here named (v. 19, 20) as men of note, and such active men that he thought it his wisdom to disperse them throughout the countries of Judah and Benjamin (v. 23). He could repose confidence in them for the preserving of the public peace and could trust them with fenced cities, that they might stand him in stead in case of an invasion.

CHAP. XII

A more full account of the reign of Rehoboam than we had before in Kings. I. Rehoboam and his people did evil in the sight of the Lord, ver. 1. II. God thereupon sold them into the hands of Shishak, king of Egypt, who greatly oppressed them, ver. 2–4. III. God sent a prophet to them, to expound to them the judgment and to call them to repentance, ver. 5. IV. They thereupon humbled themselves, ver. 6. V. God, upon their repentance, turned from his anger (ver. 7, 12) and yet left them under the marks of his displeasure, ver. 8–11. Lastly, Here is a general character of Rehoboam and his reign, with the conclusion of it, ver. 13–16.

Verses 1–12

Israel was disgraced and weakened by being divided into two kingdoms; yet the kingdom of Judah, having both the temple and the royal city, might have done very well if they had continued in the way of their duty.

I. Rehoboam and his people left God, v. 1. He walked in the way of David and Solomon (ch. xi. 17), but he grew remiss in the worship of God. As long as he thought his throne tottered he kept to his duty, that he might make God his friend; but, when he found it stood pretty firmly, he thought he had no more occasion for religion; he was safe enough without it.

II. God quickly brought troubles upon them, to recover them to repentance, before their hearts were hardened. It was in the fourth year of Rehoboam that they began to corrupt themselves, and in the fifth year the king of Egypt came up against them with a vast army, took the fenced cities of Judah, and came against Jerusalem, v. 2, 3, 4. This great calamity coming upon them so soon after they begun to desert the worship of God, by a hand they had little reason to suspect (having had a great deal of friendly correspondence with Egypt in the last reign), plainly showed that it was from the Lord, because they had transgressed against him.

III. Lest they should not rightly understand the meaning of this providence, God by the word explains the rod, v. 5. When the princes of Judah had all met at Jerusalem in a council of war, he sent a prophet to them, the same that had brought them an injunction from God not to fight against the ten tribes (ch. xi. 2), Shemaiah by name; he told them plainly that the reason why Shishak prevailed against them was because they had forsaken God.

IV. The rebukes both of the word and of the rod being thus joined, the king and princes humbled themselves before God for their iniquity, and patiently accepted the punishment, saying, The Lord is righteous, v. 6.

V. Upon the profession they made of repentance God saved them from ruin, and yet left them under some remaining fears of the judgment, to prevent their revolt again.

1. Such a vast and now victorious army as Shishak had what could be expected but that the whole country, and even Jerusalem itself, would in a little time be theirs? But when God saith, Here shall the proud waves be stayed, the most threatening force strangely dwindles and becomes impotent. The destroying angel, when he comes to Jerusalem, is forbidden to destroy it: "My wrath shall not be poured out upon Jerusalem," v. 7, 12. So ready is the God of mercy to take the first occasion to show mercy.

2. He granted them some deliverance, not complete, but in part. They reformed but partially, and for a little while, soon relapsing again; and, as their reformation was, so was their deliverance. Yet it is said (v. 12), in Judah things went well. (1) In respect of piety. There were good things in Judah (so it is in the margin), good ministers, good people, good families. (2) In respect of prosperity. In Judah things went ill when all the fenced cities were taken (v. 4), but when they repented their affairs altered and things went well.

3. Yet he left them to smart sorely by the hand of Shishak, both in their liberty and in their wealth.

(1) In their liberty (v. 8): They shall be his servants that they may know my service, and the service of the kingdoms of the countries. They complained, it may be, of the strictness of their religion. Let them better themselves if they can; let the neighbouring princes rule them awhile. The more God's service is compared with other services the more reasonable and easy it will appear. Are the laws of temperance thought hard? The effects of intemperance will be much harder. The service of virtue is perfect liberty; the service of lust is perfect slavery.

(2) In their wealth. The king of Egypt plundered both the temple and the exchequer, the treasuries of both which Solomon left very full; but he took them away; yea, he took all, all he could lay his hands on, v. 9. This was what he came for.

Verses 13–16

The story of Rehoboam's reign concluded. Two things especially are observable. 1. That he was at length well fixed in his kingdom, v. 13. He strengthened himself in Jerusalem, and there he reigned seventeen years. He had his royal seat in the holy city, which yet was but an aggravation of his impiety—near the temple, but far from God. Frequent skirmishes there were between his subjects and Jeroboam's, such as amounted to continual wars (v. 15), but he held his own, and did not so grossly forsake the law of God as he had done (v. 1) in his fourth year. 2. That he was never rightly fixed in his religion, v. 14. He did not serve the Lord because he did not seek the Lord. He did not pray, as Solomon did, for wisdom and grace. If we prayed better, we should be every way better. He did evil because he was never determined for that which is good.

CHAP. XIII

A much fuller account of the reign of Abijah, the son of Rehoboam, than we had in the Kings. Here we find him more brave and successful in war than his father was. He reigned but three years, and was chiefly famous for a glorious victory he obtained over the forces of Jeroboam. I. The armies brought into the field on both sides, ver. 3. II. The remonstrance which Abijah made before the battle, setting forth the justice of his cause, ver. 4–12. III. The distress which Judah was brought into by the policy of Jeroboam, ver. 13, 14. IV. The victory they obtained notwithstanding, by the power of God, ver. 15–20. V. The conclusion of Abijah's reign, ver. 21, 22.

Verses 1–12

Abijah's mother was called Maachah, the daughter of Absalom, ch. xi. 20; here she is called Michaiah, the daughter of Uriel. It is most probable that she was a granddaughter of Absalom, by his daughter Tamar (2 Sam. xiv. 27), and that her immediate father was this Uriel.

I. God gave Abijah leave to engage with Jeroboam, and owned him in the conflict. Jeroboam, it is probable, was now the aggressor, and what Abijah did was in his own necessary defence. Jeroboam claimed the crown of Judah. Against these impudent pretensions it was brave in Abijah to take up arms, and God stood by him. Abijah is allowed to chastise him.

II. Jeroboam's army was double in number to that of Abijah (v. 3), for he had ten tribes, while Abijah had but two. The inferior number however proved victorious.

III. Abijah, before he fought them, reasoned with them, to desist from fighting against the house of David. It is good to try reason before we use force. We must never fly to violent methods till all the arts of persuasion have been tried in vain. War must be the ultima ratio regum—the last resort of kings. Fair reasoning may do a great deal of good and prevent a great deal of mischief. Abijah had got with his army into the heart of their country; for he made this speech upon a hill in Mount Ephraim. Two things Abijah undertakes to make out,

1. That he had right on his side, a jus divinum—a divine right: "You know that God gave the kingdom to David and his sons for ever" (v. 5), by a covenant of salt, a lasting covenant, a covenant made by sacrifice, which was always salted; so Bishop Patrick. All Israel had owned that David was a king of God's making, and that God had entailed the crown upon his family; so that Jeroboam's taking the crown of Israel at first was not justifiable. Abijah shows, (1) That there was a great deal of dishonesty in Jeroboam's first setting himself up: He rebelled against his lord (v. 6) who had preferred him (1 Kings xi. 28), and basely took advantage of Rehoboam's weakness. Those that supported him are here called vain men (a character perhaps borrowed from Judges xi. 3). (2) That there was a great deal of impiety in his present attempt; for, in fighting against the house of David, he fought against the kingdom of the Lord.

2. That he had God on his side. This he insisted much upon, that the religion of Jeroboam and his army was false and idolatrous, but that he and his people, the men of Judah, had the pure worship of the true and living God among them. It appears from the character given of Abijah (1 Kings xv. 3) that he was not himself truly religious, and yet here he encouraged himself in this war chiefly from the religion of his kingdom. Whatever he was otherwise, it should seem that he was no idolater. Whatever corruptions there were in the kingdom of Judah, the state of religion among them was better than in the kingdom of Israel, with which they were now contending. It was the cause of his kingdom that he was pleading; and, though he was not himself so good as he should have been, yet he hoped that, for the sake of the good men and good things that were in Judah, God would now appear for them. "We keep his charge, v. 10, 11. We worship no images, have no priests but what he has ordained, no rites of worship but what he has prescribed. He is our captain, and we may therefore be sure that he is with us, because we are with him, v. 12. And in the day of battle we shall be remembered before the Lord our God and saved from our enemies." He concludes with fair warning to his enemies. "Fight not against the God of your fathers."

Jeroboam resolved not to heed, and therefore heard as though he heard not. He came to fight, not to dispute. The longest sword, he thought, would determine the matter, not the better cause.

I. Jeroboam, who trusted to his politics, was beaten. He was so far from fair reasoning that he was not for fair fighting. A parley, it is probable, was agreed on, yet Jeroboam basely takes advantage of it, and, while he was treating, laid his ambushment behind Judah, against all the laws of arms.

II. Abijah and his people, who trusted in their God, came off conquerors, notwithstanding the disproportion of their strength and numbers.

1. They were brought into a great strait, put into a great fright, for the battle was before and behind. A good cause may for a season be involved in embarrassment and distress.

2. In this distress, when danger was on every side, which way should they look but upwards for deliverance? It is an unspeakable comfort that no enemy, no stratagem or ambushment, can cut off our communication with heaven; our way thitherward is always open. (1) They cried unto the Lord, v. 14. (2) They relied on the God of their fathers, and committed themselves to him, v. 18. The prayer of faith is the prevailing prayer, and this is that by which we overcome the world, even our faith, 1 John v. 4. (3) The priests sounded the trumpets to put life into their faith. (4) They shouted in confidence of victory: "The day is our own, for God is with us." To the cry of prayer they added the shout of faith, and so became more than conquerors.

3. Thus they obtained a complete victory: As the men of Judah shouted for joy in God's salvation, God smote Jeroboam and his army with such terror that they fled with the greatest precipitation imaginable, and the conquerors gave no quarter, but the battle was the Lord's, who would thus chastise the idolatry of Israel and own the house of David.

4. The consequence of this was that the children of Israel, though they were not brought back to the house of David, yet, for that time, were brought under, v. 18. Many cities were taken, and remained in the possession of the kings of Judah; as Bethel particularly, v. 19.

Lastly, The death both of the conquered and of the conqueror, not long after. 1. Jeroboam never looked up after this defeat, though he survived it two or three years. He could not recover strength again, v. 20. 2. Abijah waxed mighty upon it. But soon after his triumphs, death conquered the conqueror.

CHAP. XIV

In this and the two following chapters we have the history of the reign of Asa, a good reign and a long one. I. His piety, ver. 1–5. II. His policy, ver. 6–8. III. His prosperity, and particularly a glorious victory he obtained over a great army of Ethiopians that came out against him, ver. 9–15.

Verses 1–8

I. Asa's general character (v. 2): He did that which was good and right in the eyes of the Lord his God. 1. He aimed at pleasing God, studied to approve himself to him. 2. He saw God's eye always upon him, and that helped much to keep him to what was good and right.

II. A blessed work of reformation which he set on foot immediately upon his accession to the crown. 1. He removed and abolished idolatry. Since Solomon admitted idolatry, in the latter end of his reign, nothing had been done to suppress it. Strange gods were worshipped and had their altars, images, and groves; and the temple service, though kept up by the priests (ch. xiii. 10), was neglected by many of the people. Asa, as soon as he had power in his hands, made it his business to destroy all those idolatrous altars and images (v. 3, 5). He hoped by destroying the idols to reform the idolaters, which he aimed at, rather than to ruin them. 2. He revived and established the pure worship of God; and, since the priests did their part in attending God's altars, he obliged the people to do theirs (v. 4): He commanded Judah to seek the Lord God of their fathers, and not the gods of the heathen, and to do the law and the commandments. In doing this, the land was quiet before him, v. 5.

III. The tranquillity of his kingdom, after constant alarms of war during the last two reigns: In his days the land was quiet ten years (v. 1), no war with the kingdom of Israel. Abijah's victory laid a foundation for Asa's peace, which was the reward of his piety and reformation. Though Abijah had little religion himself, he was instrumental to prepare the way for one that had much.

IV. The improvement he made of that tranquillity: The land had rest, for the Lord had given him rest. 1. Asa, takes notice of the rest they had as the gift of God, and as the reward of the reformation begun: Because we have sought the Lord our God, he has given us rest. We find by experience that it is good to seek the Lord; it gives us rest. 2. He consults with his people, by their representatives, how to make a good use of the peace they enjoyed, and concludes with them, (1) That they must not be idle, but busy. In the years when he had no war he said, "Let us build; still let us be doing." When the churches had rest they were built up, Acts ix. 31. When the sword is sheathed take up the trowel. (2) In times of peace we must be getting ready for trouble, expect it and lay up in store for it. [1] He fortified his principal cities with walls, towers, gates, and bars, v. 7. He speaks as if he expected that trouble would arise, when it would be too late to fortify, and when they would wish they had done it. So they built and prospered. [2] He had a good army ready to bring into the field (v. 8). Judah and Benjamin were mustered severally; and Benjamin had almost as many soldiers as Judah. These two tribes were differently armed, both offensively and defensively. The men of Judah guarded themselves with targets, the men of Benjamin with shields, the former of which were much larger than the latter, 1 Kings x. 16, 17. The men of Judah fought with spears; the men of Benjamin drew bows, to reach the enemy at a distance.

I. Disturbance given to the peace of Asa's kingdom by a formidable army of Ethiopians that invaded them, v. 9, 10.

II. The application Asa made to God on occasion of the threatening cloud which now hung over his head, v. 11. He that sought God in the day of his prosperity could with holy boldness cry to God in the day of his trouble, and call him his God. His prayer is short, but has much in it. 1. He gives to God the glory of his infinite power and sovereignty: It is nothing with thee to help and save by many or few. God works in his own strength, not in the strength of instruments. "We do not say, Lord, take our part, for we have a good army for thee to work by; but, take our part, for without thee we have no power." 2. He takes hold of their covenant-relation to God as theirs. O Lord our God! 3. He pleads their dependence upon God. He was well prepared for it, yet trusted not to his preparations; but, "Lord, we rest on thee, and in thy name we go against this multitude, by warrant from thee, aiming at thy glory, and trusting to thy strength." 4. He interests God in their cause: "Let not man" (mortal man, so the word is) "prevail against thee." The enemy is a mortal man; make it to appear what an unequal match he is for an immortal God.

III. The glorious victory God gave him over his enemies. 1. God defeated the enemy, and put their forces into disorder (v. 12): The Lord smote the Ethiopians with terror so that they fled, and knew neither why nor whither. 2. Asa and his soldiers took the advantage God gave them against the enemy. (1) They destroyed them. (2) They took the plunder of their camp. (3) They smote the cities that were in league with them, to which they fled for shelter (v. 14). (4) They fetched away the cattle out of the enemy's country, in vast numbers, v. 15.

CHAP. XV

Asa and his army were now returning in triumph from the battle, laden with spoils and adorned with the trophies of victory. He knew that the work of reformation, which he had begun in his kingdom, was not perfected; his enemies abroad were subdued, but there were more dangerous enemies at home—idols in Judah and Benjamin. 1. The message which God sent to him, by a prophet, to encourage him in the prosecution of reformation, ver. 1–7. II. The life which this message put into that good cause, and their proceedings in pursuance of it. Idols removed, ver. 8. The spoil dedicated to God, ver. 9–11. A covenant made with God, and a law for the punishing of idolaters, ver. 12–15. A reformation at court, ver. 16. Dedicated things brought into the house of God, ver. 18.

Verses 1–7

Here was a prophet sent to Asa and his army, when they returned victorious from the war with the Ethiopians, not to congratulate them on their success, but to quicken them to their duty; this is the proper business of God's ministers. The Spirit of God came upon the prophet (v. 1), both to instruct him what he should say and to enable him to say it with clearness and boldness.

I. He told them plainly upon what terms they stood with God. Let them not think that, having obtained this victory, all was their own for ever. Let them do well, and it will be well with them, otherwise not. 1. The Lord is with you while you are with him. 2. If you seek him, he will be found of you. 3. If you forsake him and his ordinances, he is not tied to you, but will certainly forsake you.

II. He set before them the consequence of forsaking God and his ordinances, and that there was no way of having grievances redressed, but by repenting, and returning unto God. When Israel forsook their duty they were over-run with a deluge of atheism, impiety, irreligion, and all irregularity (v. 3), and were continually embarrassed with wars, foreign and domestic, v. 5, 6. But when their troubles drove them to God they found it not in vain to seek him, v. 4. But the question is, What time does this refer to? 1. Some think it looks as far back as the days of the Judges. These were sad times, when they were frequently oppressed by one enemy or other and grievously harassed by Moabites, Midianites, Ammonites, and other nations. When, in their perplexity, they turned to God by repentance, prayer, and reformation, he raised up deliverers for them. 2.

Others think it describes the state of the ten tribes (who were now properly called Israel) in the days of Asa. In those times there was no peace, v. 5. Their war with Judah gave them frequent alarms; so did the late insurrection of Baasha. They provoked God with all iniquity, and then he vexed them with all adversity; yet, when they turned to God, he was entreated for them. 3. Others think the whole passage may be read in the future tense: Hereafter Israel will be without the true God and a teaching priest, and they will be destroyed by one judgment after another till they return to God and seek him. See Hos. iii. 4.

III. Upon this he grounded his exhortation to prosecute the work of reformation with vigour (v. 7): Be strong, for your work shall be rewarded.

Verses 8–19

The good effect the foregoing sermon had upon Asa.

I. He grew more bold for God than he had been. Now he took courage. He saw how necessary a further reformation was, and what assurance he had of God's presence with him in it. Now he ventured to destroy all the abominable idols. He also renewed the altar of the Lord.

II. He extended his influence further than before, v. 9. He summoned a solemn assembly, and brought the strangers to it, who had come over to him from the ten tribes. Their coming was a great encouragement to him; for the reason of their coming was because they saw that the Lord his God was with him. The invitation he gave them to the general assembly was a great encouragement to them. This meeting was held in the third month, probably at the feast of Pentecost, which was in that month.

III. He and his people offered sacrifices to God, as his share of the spoil they had got, v. 11. These sacrifices were intended by way of thanksgiving for the favours they had received, and supplication for further favours. Prayers and praises are now our spiritual sacrifices. He brought into the house of God all the dedicated things, v. 18. It is honesty to render to God the things that are his.

IV. They entered into covenant with God, repenting that they had violated their engagements to him and resolving to do better for the future. It is proper for penitents, for converts, to renew their covenants.

1. What was this covenant. It would help to increase their sense of the obligation, to arm them against temptations, and would be a testimony. And, by joining all together in this covenant, they strengthened the hands one of another. Two things they engaged themselves to:—(1) That they would diligently seek God themselves, seek his precepts, seek his favour. What is religion but seeking God, enquiring after him, applying to him, upon all occasions? (2) That they would, to the utmost of their power, oblige others to seek him, v. 13. They agreed that whosoever would not seek the Lord God of Israel (that is, an obstinate idolater or an obstinate atheist) he should be put to death.

2. In what manner they made this covenant. (1) With great cheerfulness, and all possible expressions of joy: They swore unto the Lord with a loud voice, and they all rejoiced at the oath, v. 14, 15. Every honest Israelite was pleased with his own engagements to God, and they were all pleased with one another's. They rejoiced in it as a hopeful expedient to prevent their apostasy from God and a happy indication of God's presence with them. It is an honour and happiness to be in bonds to God. (2) They did it with great sincerity, zeal, and resolution: They swore to God with all their hearts, and sought him with their whole desire. If God has the heart, we have the joy.

V. The effect of this their solemn covenanting with God. 1. God did well for them: He was found of them, and gave them rest round about (v. 15), so that there was no war for a long time after (v. 19), though there were constant bickerings between Judah and Israel upon the frontiers, 1 Kings xv. 16. 2. They did, on the whole, well for him. They carried on the reformation so far that Maachah the queen-mother was deposed for idolatry and her idol destroyed, v. 16. Asa knows he must honour God more than his grandmother, and dares not leave an idol in an apartment of his palace while he is destroying idols in the cities of his kingdom. We may suppose Maachah was convinced of her sin and therefore was not put to death. But because she had been an idolater Asa thought fit to divest her of the dignity and authority she had. But the reformation was not complete; the high places were not all taken away, though many of them were, ch. xiv. 3, 5. There may be defects in some particular duties where yet the heart, in the main, is upright with God. Sincerity is something less than sinless perfection.

CHAP. XVI

This chapter concludes the history of the reign of Asa. I. Here is a foolish treaty with Benhadad king of Syria, ver. 1–6. II. The reproof which God sent him for it by a prophet, ver. 7–9. III. Asa's displeasure against the prophet for his faithfulness, ver. 10. IV. The sickness, death, and burial of Asa, ver. 11–14.

Verses 1–6

This passage we had before (1 Kings xv. 17, &c.) and Asa was in several ways faulty in it. 1. He did not do well to make a league with Benhadad, a heathen king, v. 3. Had he relied more upon his covenant, and his father's, with God, he would not have boasted so much of his league, and his fathers, with the royal family of Syria. 2. If he had had a due regard to the honour of Israel in general, he would have found some other expedient to give Baasha a diversion than by calling in a foreign force, and inviting into the country a common enemy, who, in process of time, might be a plague to Judah too. 3. It was doubtless a sin in Benhadad to break his league with Baasha upon no provocation, but merely through the influence of a bribe; and, if so, certainly it was a sin in Asa to move him to it, especially to hire him to do it. 4. To take silver and gold out of the house of the Lord for this purpose was a great aggravation of the sin. 5. Perhaps Asa intended not that they should carry the matter so far. However the project succeeded. Benhadad gave Baasha a powerful diversion, obliged him to leave off building Ramah and betake himself to the defence of his own country northward, which gave Asa an opportunity, not only to demolish his fortifications, but to sieze the materials and convert them to his own use.

Verses 7–14

1. A plain and faithful reproof given to Asa by a prophet of the Lord, for making this league with Baasha. The reprover was Hanani the seer, the father of Jehu, another prophet, whom we read of 1 Kings xvi. 1; 2 Chron. xix. 2. That which the prophet here charges upon him as the greatest fault is his relying on the king of Syria and not on the Lord his God, v. 7. He plainly tells the king that herein he had done foolishly, v. 9. It is a foolish thing to lean on a broken reed, when we have the rock of ages to rely upon. To convince him of his folly he shows him,

1. That he acted against his experience, v. 8. He, of all men, had no reason to distrust God, who had found him such a present powerful helper. "What!" said the prophet, "Were not the Ethiopians and the Lubim a huge host, enough to swallow up a kingdom? And yet, because thou didst rely on the Lord, he delivered them into thy hand; and was not he sufficient to help thee against Baasha?" But see how deceitful our hearts are! We trust in God when we have nothing else to trust to, but, when we have other things to stay on, we are apt to stay too much on them.

2. That he acted against his knowledge of God and his providence, v. 9. Asa could not trust God and therefore made court to Benhadad.

3. That he acted against his interest. (1) He had lost an opportunity of checking the growing greatness of the king of Syria (v. 7): His host has escaped out of thy hand, which otherwise would have joined with Baasha's and fallen with it. (2) He had incurred God's displeasure and henceforth must expect no peace, but the constant alarms of war, v. 9.

II. Asa's displeasure at this reproof. Though it came from God by one that was known to be his messenger, yet he was wroth with the seer for telling him of his folly; he was in a rage with him, v. 10. 1. In his rage he committed the prophet to the jail, put him in a prison-house, as a malefactor, in the stocks (so some read it), or into little-ease. 2. Having proceeded thus far, he oppressed some of the people, probably such as owned the prophet in his sufferings, or were known to be his particular friends.

III. His sickness. Two years before he died he was diseased in his feet (v. 12), afflicted with the gout in a high degree. He had put the prophet in the stocks, and now God put him in the stocks; so his punishment answered his sin. His making use of physicians was his duty; but trusting to them, and expecting that from them which was to be had from God only, were his sin and folly.

IV. His death and burial. His funeral had something of extraordinary solemnity in it, v. 14. They made a very magnificent burying for him. This funeral pomp was an expression of the great respect his people retained for him, notwithstanding the failings and infirmities of his latter days. The eminent piety and usefulness of good men ought to be remembered to their praise, though they have had their blemishes. Let their faults be buried in their graves, while their services are remembered over their graves.

CHAP. XVII

The life and reign of Jehoshaphat, who was one of the best that swayed the sceptre of Judah since David's head was laid. He was the good son of a good father, so that, at this time, grace ran in the blood. I. His accession to and establishment in the throne, ver. 1, 2, 5. II. His personal piety, ver. 3, 4, 6. III. The course he took to promote religion in his kingdom, ver. 7–9. IV. The mighty sway he bore among the neighbours, ver. 10, 11. V. The great strength of his kingdom, both in garrisons and standing forces, ver. 12–19.

Verses 1–9

Concerning Jehoshaphat,

I. What a wise man he was. As soon as he came to the crown he strengthened himself against Israel, v. 1. Ahab, an active warlike prince, had been three years upon the throne of Israel. The first thing Jehoshaphat had to do was to check the growing greatness of the king of Israel, which he did so effectually, and without bloodshed, that Ahab soon courted his alliance. Jehoshaphat strengthened himself not to act offensively against Israel or invade them, but only to maintain his own, which he did by fortifying the cities that were on his frontiers, and putting garrisons, stronger than had been, in the cities of Ephraim.

II. What a good man he was. 1. He walked in the ways of his father David. In the characters of the kings, David's ways are often made the standard, as 1 Kings xv. 3, 11; 2 Kings xiv. 3; xvi. 2; xviii. 3. Jehoshaphat followed David as far as he followed God and no further. The words here will admit another reading; they run thus: He walked in the ways of David his father (Hareshonim), those first ways, or those ancient ways. He proposed to himself, for his example, the primitive times of the royal family, those purest times, before the corruptions of the late reigns came in. It is good to be cautious in following the best men, lest we step aside after them. 2. He sought not to Baalim, but sought to the Lord God of his father, v. 3, 4. 3. He walked in God's commandments, not only worshipped the true God, but worshipped him according to his own institution, and not after the doings of Israel, v. 4. 4. His heart was lifted up in the ways of the Lord (v. 6), or he lifted up his heart. He was lively and affectionate in his religion, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord, cheerful and pleasant in it; he went on in his work with alacrity, as Jacob, who, after his vision of God at Bethel, lifted up his feet, Gen. xxix. 1, margin.

III. What a useful man he was, not only a good man, but a good king. He not only was good himself, but did good. 1. He took away the teachers of lies, so images are called (Hab. ii. 18), the high places and the groves, v. 6. It is meant of those in which idols were worshipped. 2. He sent forth teachers of truth. When he enquired into the state of religion in his kingdom he found his people generally very ignorant: they knew not that they did evil. Jehoshaphat resolves to begin his work at the right end, will not lead them blindfold, no, not into a reformation, but endeavours to have them well taught, knowing that that was the way to have them well cured. In this good work he employed, (1) His princes. He ordered them, in the administration of justice, not only to correct the people when they did ill, but to teach them how to do better, and to give a reason for what they did. (2) The Levites and priests went with the princes, and taught in Judah, having the book of the law with them, v. 8, 9. They were teachers by office, Deut. xxxiii. 10.

What an abundance of good may be done when Moses and Aaron thus go hand in hand in the doing of it, when princes with their power, and priests and Levites with their scripture learning, agree to teach the people the good knowledge of God and their duty! These itinerant judges and itinerant preachers together were instrumental to diffuse a blessed light throughout the cities of Judah. They had the book of the law of the Lord with them for the conviction of the people, that they might see that they had a divine warrant for what they said and delivered to them that only which they received from the Lord.

IV. What a happy man he was. The Lord was with him (v. 3); the word of the Lord was his helper (so the Chaldee paraphrase); the Lord established the kingdom in his hand, v. 5. All Judah brought him presents, in acknowledgment of his kindness in sending preachers among them. The more there is of true religion among a people the more there will be of conscientious loyalty. Riches and honour in abundance prove to many a hindrance, an occasion of pride, but they had a quite contrary effect upon Jehoshaphat; his abundance was oil to the wheels of his obedience, and the more he had of the wealth of this world the more was his heart lifted up in the ways of the Lord.

Verses 10–19

A further account of Jehoshaphat's great prosperity and the flourishing state of his kingdom.

I. He had good interest in the neighbouring princes and nations. Though he was not perhaps so great a soldier as David, nor so great a scholar as Solomon, yet the fear of the Lord fell so upon them that they had all a reverence for him, v. 10. And, 1. None of them made war against him. 2. Many of them brought presents to him (v. 11), to secure his friendship.

II. He had very considerable stores laid up in the cities of Judah.

III. He had the militia in good order. Five lord-lieutenants are here named, with the numbers of those under their command. It is said of one of these great commanders, Amasiah, that he willingly offered himself unto the Lord (v. 16), not only to the king, to serve him in this post, but to the Lord, to glorify him in it. It was usual for great generals then to offer of their spoils to the Lord, 1 Chron. xxvi. 26. But this good man offered himself first to the Lord, and then his dedicated things. The armies, we may suppose, were dispersed all the country over, and each man resided for the most part on his own estate; but they appeared often, to be mustered and trained, and were ready at call whenever there was occasion.

But, lastly, observe, It was not this formidable army that struck a terror upon the neighbouring nations, but the fear of God which fell upon them when Jehoshaphat reformed his country and set up a preaching ministry in it, v. 10.

CHAP. XVIII

The story of this chapter we had just as it is here related in the story of the reign of Ahab king of Israel, 1 Kings xxii. I. The alliance he contracted with Ahab, ver. 1. II. His consent to join with him in his expedition for the recovery of Ramoth-Gilead out of the hands of the Syrians, ver. 2, 3. III. Their consulting with the prophets, false and true, before they went, ver. 4–27. IV. The success of their expedition. Jehoshaphat hardly escaped (ver. 28–32) and Ahab received his death's wound, ver. 33, 34.

Verses 1–3

I. Jehoshaphat growing greater.

II. Not growing wiser, else he would not have joined with Ahab, that degenerate Israelite, who had sold himself to work wickedness. With him he joined in affinity, that is, married his son Jehoram to Ahab's daughter Athaliah.

1. This was the worst match that ever was made by any of the house of David. (1) Perhaps pride made the match. His religion forbade him to marry his son to a daughter of any of the heathen princes that were about him, and, having riches and honour in abundance, he thought it a disparagement to marry him to a subject. A king's daughter it must be, and therefore Ahab's, little considering that Jezebel was her mother. (2) Some think he did it in policy, hoping by this expedient to unite the kingdoms in his son.

2. This match drew Jehoshaphat, (1) Into an intimate familiarity with Ahab. He paid him a visit at Samaria, and Ahab, proud of the honour which Jehoshaphat did him, gave him entertainment, according to the splendour of those times. (2) Into a league with Ahab against the Syrians. Ahab persuaded him to join forces with him in an expedition for the recovery of Ramoth-Gilead, a city in the tribe of Gad, on the other side Jordan. Did not Ahab know that that, and all the other cities of Israel, did of right belong to Jehoshaphat, as heir of the house of David? The feast Ahab made for Jehoshaphat was designed only to wheedle him into this expedition.

Verses 4–27

This is almost word for word the same with 1 Kings xxii. 1. Of the great duty of acknowledging God in all our ways and enquiring at his word, whatever we undertake. Jehoshaphat was not willing to proceed till he had done this, v. 4. 2. Of the great danger of bad company even to good men. Jehoshaphat here, in complaisance to Ahab, sits in his robes, and dares not rebuke that false prophet who basely abused the faithful seer nor oppose Ahab who committed him to prison. 3. Of the unhappiness of those who are surrounded with flatterers, especially flattering prophets, who cry peace to them and prophesy nothing but smooth things. Thus was Ahab cheated into his ruin, and justly; for he hearkened to such, and preferred those that humoured him before a good prophet that gave him fair warning of his danger. 4. Of the power of Satan, by the divine permission, in the children of disobedience. One lying spirit can make 400 lying prophets and make use of them to deceive Ahab, v. 21. 5. Of the justice of God in giving those up to strong delusions, to believe a lie, who will not receive the love of the truth, but rebel against it, v. 21. 6. Of the hard case of faithful ministers, whose lot it has often been to be hated, and persecuted, and ill-treated, for being true to their God and just and kind to the souls of men. Micaiah, for discharging a good conscience, was buffeted, imprisoned, and condemned to the bread and water of affliction. But he could with assurance appeal to the issue, as all those may do who are persecuted for their faithfulness, v. 27.

Verses 28–34

1. Good Jehoshaphat exposing himself in his robes, thereby endangered, and yet delivered. We have reason to think that Ahab, while he pretended friendship, really aimed at Jehoshaphat's life, else he would never have advised him to enter into the battle with his robes on, which was but to make himself an easy mark to the enemy. The enemy had soon an eye upon the robes, and vigorously attacked the unwary prince who now, when it was too late, wished himself in the habit of the poorest soldier, rather than in his princely raiment. The Lord helped him out of his distress, by moving the captains to depart from him, v. 31. God has all men's hearts in his hand, and turns them as he pleases, contrary to their own first intentions, to serve his purposes. Many are moved unaccountably both to themselves and others, but an invisible power moves them. 2. Wicked Ahab disguising himself, thereby as he thought securing himself, and yet slain, v. 33. Jehoshaphat is safe in his robes, Ahab killed in his armour.

CHAP. XIX

A further account of the good reign of Jehoshaphat. I. His return in peace to Jerusalem, ver. 1. II. The reproof given him for his league with Ahab, and his acting in conjunction with him, ver. 2, 3. III. The great care he took thereupon to reform his kingdom, ver. 4. IV. The instructions he gave to his judges, both those in the country towns that kept the inferior courts (ver. 5–7), and those in Jerusalem that sat in the supreme judicature of the kingdom, ver. 8–11.

Verses 1–4

I. The great favour God showed to Jehoshaphat,

1. In bringing him back in safety from his dangerous expedition with Ahab, which had like to have cost him dearly (v. 1): He returned to his house in peace. Whenever we return in peace to our houses we ought to acknowledge God's providence in preserving our going out and our coming in. He fared better than he deserved.

2. In sending him a reproof for his affinity with Ahab. It is a great mercy to be told in time wherein we have erred, that we may repent and amend the error before it be too late. The prophet by whom the reproof is sent is Jehu the son of Hanani. The father was an eminent prophet in the last reign, as appeared by Asa's putting him in the stocks for his plain dealing; yet the son was not afraid to reprove another king. The prophet told him plainly that he had done very ill in joining with Ahab: Shouldst thou love those that hate the Lord? God was displeased with him for doing this: "There is wrath upon thee from before the Lord, and thou must, by repentance, make thy peace with him, or it will be the worse for thee." He did so, and God's anger was turned away. Yet he took notice of that which was praiseworthy, as it is proper for us to do when we give a reproof (v. 3): "There are good things found in thee; and therefore, though God be displeased with thee, he does not, he will not, cast thee off."

II. Jehoshaphat took the reproof well, was not wroth with the seer as his father was, but submitted. He dwelt at Jerusalem (v. 4), minded his own business at home, and would not expose himself by paying any more such visits to Ahab. To atone for the visit he had paid to Ahab, he made a pious profitable visitation of his own kingdom: He went out through the people in his own person from Beersheba in the south to Mount Ephraim in the north, and brought them back to the Lord God of their fathers, that is, did all he could towards recovering them. His late affinity with the idolatrous house of Ahab had had a bad influence upon his own kingdom. Many were emboldened to revolt to idolatry when they saw even their reforming king so intimate with idolaters; and therefore he thought himself doubly obliged to do all he could to restore them.

Jehoshaphat, having done what he could to make his people good, is here providing, if possible, to keep them so by the influence of a settled magistracy. He had sent preachers among them, to instruct them (ch. xvii. 7–9), but now he saw it further requisite to send judges among them, to see the laws put in execution, and to be a terror to evil-doers.

I. He erected inferior courts of justice in the several cities of the kingdom, v. 5. The judges of these courts were to keep the people in the worship of God, to punish the violations of the law, and to decide controversies between man and man. Here is the charge he gave them (v. 6): Take heed what you do, v. 6. And again, "Take heed and do it (v. 7). Mind your business; take heed of making any mistakes." Judges of all men, have need to be cautious, because so much depends upon the correctness of their judgment. "Let the fear of God be upon you, and that will be a restraint upon you to keep you from doing wrong and an engagement to you to be active in doing the duty of your place." The powers that be are ordained by God and for him: "You judge not for man, but for the Lord; your business is to glorify him, and serve the interests of his kingdom among men." "He is with you in the judgment, to take notice what you do and call you to an account if you do amiss."

II. He erected a supreme court at Jerusalem, which was appealed to, in all the difficult causes that occurred in the inferior courts. This court sat in Jerusalem; for there were set the thrones of judgment; there they would be under the inspection of the king himself.

1. The causes cognizable in this court were of two kinds, (1) Pleas of the crown, called here the judgment of the Lord, because the law of God was the law of the realm. All criminals were charged with the breach of some part of his law and were said to offend against his peace, his crown and dignity. (2) Common pleas, between party and party, called here controversies (v. 8) and causes of their brethren (v. 10), differences between blood and blood (this refers to Deut. xvii. 8). Since the revolt of the ten tribes all the cities of refuge, except Hebron, belonged to the kingdom of Israel; and therefore, we may suppose, the courts of the temple, or the horns of the altar, were chiefly used as sanctuaries in that case, and hence the trial of homicides was reserved for the court at Jerusalem.

2. The judges of this court were some of the Levites and priests that were most learned in the law, eminent for wisdom, and of approved integrity, and some of the chief of the fathers of Israel, or persons of age and experience.

3. The two chiefs, or presidents, of this court. Amariah, the high priest, was to preside in ecclesiastical causes. Zebadiah, the prime-minister of that state, was to preside in all civil causes, v. 11.

4, The inferior officers of the court. "Some of the Levites shall be officers before you," v. 11.

5. They must see to it that they acted from a good principle; they must do all in the fear of the Lord, and with a perfect upright heart, v. 9. They must act with resolution. "Deal courageously, and fear not the face of man; be bold and daring in the discharge of your duty, and, whoever is against you, God will protect you."

CHAP. XX

I. The great danger and distress that Jehoshaphat and his kingdom were in from a foreign invasion, ver. 1, 2. II. The pious course he took for their safety, by fasting, and praying, and seeking God, ver. 3–13. III. The assurance which God, by a prophet, immediately gave them of victory, ver. 14–17. IV. Their thankful believing reception of those assurances, ver. 18–21. V. The defeat which God gave to their enemies thereupon, ver. 22–25. VI. A solemn thanksgiving which they kept for their victory, and for the happy consequences of it, ver. 26–30. VII. The conclusion of the reign of Jehoshaphat, ver. 31–37.

Jehoshaphat in distress, which was followed by such a glorious deliverance as was an abundant recompence for his piety.

I. A formidable invasion of Jehoshaphat's kingdom by the Moabites and Ammonites, v. 1. Jehoshaphat was surprised when the enemy entered his country, v. 2. What pretence they had to quarrel with Jehoshaphat does not appear; they are said to come from beyond the sea, meaning the Dead Sea, where Sodom had stood. The neighbouring nations had feared Jehoshaphat (ch. xvii. 10), but perhaps his affinity with Ahab had lessened him in their esteem.

II. The preparation Jehoshaphat made against the invaders. No mention is made of his mustering his forces, which yet it is most probable he did. But his great care was to obtain the favour of God. But he is of the mind of his father David. If we must be corrected, yet let us not fall into the hands of man. Consciousness of guilt made him fear. He set himself to seek the Lord, and, in the first place, to make him his friend. He proclaimed a fast throughout all Judah, appointed a day of humiliation and prayer, that they might join together in confessing their sins and asking help of the Lord. The people readily assembled out of all the cities of Judah in the court of the temple to join in prayer (v. 4). Jehoshaphat himself was the mouth of the congregation to God. The prayer Jehoshaphat prayed is here recorded. He acknowledges the sovereign dominion of the divine Providence, gives to God the glory of it and takes to himself the comfort of it (v. 6): "Art not thou God in heaven? Control these heathen then; set bounds to their daring threatening insults." He lays hold on their covenant-relation to God. "Thou that art God in heaven art the God of our fathers (v. 6) and our God, v. 7. Whom should we seek to, whom should we trust to, for relief, but to the God we have chosen and served?" "We hold this land by grant from thee. Suffer us not to be cast out of thy possession." v. 11. He makes mention of the temple they had built for God's name (v. 8), not as if that merited anything at God's hand, for of his own they gave him, but it was a token of God's favourable presence with them, v. 8, 9. "Lord, when it was built it was intended for the encouragement of our faith at such a time as this. Here thy name is; here we are. Lord, help us, for the glory of thy name." He professes his entire dependence upon God for deliverance. Though he had a great army on foot, and well disciplined, yet he said, "We have no might against this great company, but our eyes are upon thee. In thee, O God! do we put our trust; our souls wait on thee."

Verses 14–19

God's gracious answer to Jehoshaphat's prayer. While he was yet speaking God heard: before the congregation was dismissed they had assurance given them that they should be victorious; for it is never in vain to seek God. 1. The spirit of prophecy came upon a Levite in the midst of the congregation, v. 14. He was of the sons of Asaph, and therefore one of the singers; on that office God would put an honour. There needed no sign, the thing itself was to be performed the very next day, and that would be confirmation enough to his prophecy. 2. He encouraged them to trust in God, though the danger was very threatening (v. 15): "Be not afraid. The battle is not yours; the battle is God's." 3. He gives them intelligence of the motions of the enemy, and orders them to march towards them, with particular directions where they should find them. To-morrow (the day after the fast) go you down against them, v. 16, 17. 4. He assures them that they should be, not the glorious instruments, but the joyful spectators, of the total defeat of the enemy: "You shall not need to strike a stroke; the work shall be done to your hands; only stand still and see it," v. 17. Let but the Christian soldier go out against his spiritual enemies, and the God of peace will tread them under his feet and make him more than a conqueror. 5. Jehoshaphat and his people received these assurances with faith, reverence, and thankfulness. They bowed their heads, Jehoshaphat first, and then all the people fell before the Lord, and worshipped. They lifted up their voices in praise to God, v. 19.

Verses 20–30

The foregoing prayer answered and the foregoing promise performed, in the total overthrow of the enemies' forces and the triumph of Jehoshaphat's forces over them.

I. Never was army drawn out to the field of battle as Jehoshaphat's army was. He had soldiers ready prepared for war (ch. xvii. 18), but here is no notice taken of their military equipment, their swords or spears, their shields or bows. But Jehoshaphat took care, 1. That faith should be their armour. As they went forth, instead of calling them to handle their arms, he bade them believe in the Lord God and give credit to his word in the mouth of his prophets, and assured them that then they should prosper and be established, v. 20. 2. That praise and thanksgiving should be their vanguard, v. 21. Jehoshaphat called a council of war, and it was resolved to appoint singers to go out before the army to praise God, with that ancient and good doxology which eternity itself will not wear thread-bare, Praise the Lord; for his mercy endureth for ever. By this strange advance towards the field of battle, Jehoshaphat intended to express his firm reliance upon the word of God.

II. Never was army so unaccountably destroyed as that of the enemy; not by thunder, or hail, or the sword of an angel, not by dint of sword, but the Lord set ambushments against them, as Bishop Patrick thinks, their own ambushments, whom God struck with such confusion that they fell upon their own friends as if they had been enemies, and everyone helped to destroy another, so that none escaped. This God did when his people began to sing and to praise (v. 22). When they did but begin the work of praise God perfected the work of their deliverance.

III. Never was spoil so cheerfully divided, for Jehoshaphat's army had nothing to do besides; the rest was done for them. The spoil was more than they could carry away at once, and they were three days in gathering it, v. 25.

IV. Never was victory celebrated with more solemn and enlarged thanksgivings. They kept a day of praise in the camp, before they drew their forces out of the field. On the fourth day they assembled in a valley, where they blessed God with so much zeal and fervency that that day's work gave a name to the place, the valley of Berechah, that is, of blessing, v. 26. Yet they did not think this enough, but came in solemn procession, and Jehoshaphat at the head of them, to Jerusalem, that the country, as they passed along, might join with them in their praises, and that they might give thanks for the mercy where they had by prayer obtained it, in the house of the Lord, v. 27, 28. Public mercies call for public acknowledgments in the courts of the Lord's house, Ps. cxvi. 19.

V. Never did victory turn to a better account than this; for, 1. Jehoshaphat's kingdom was hereby made to look very great and considerable abroad, v. 29. It begat in the neighbours a reverence of God and a cautious fear of doing any injury to his people. 2. It was made very easy and quiet at home, v. 30. They were quiet from the fear of insults from their neighbours, God having given them rest round about. And, if he give rest, who can give disturbance?

The close of the history of Jehoshaphat's reign. This was the general character of his reign, that he did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, kept close to the worship of God himself and did what he could to keep his people close to it. But two things are to be lamented:—1. The people still retained a partiality for the high places, v. 33. Those that were erected to the honour of strange gods were taken away (ch. xvii. 6); but those where the true God was worshipped, being less culpable, were thought allowable. 2. Jehoshaphat himself still retained a partiality for the house of Ahab, because he had married his son to a daughter of that family, though he had been plainly reproved for it and had like to have smarted for it. He joined himself with him, not in war, as with his father, but in trade, became his partner in a fleet bound for Tarshish, v. 35, 36. God sends to him, to show him his error and bring him to repentance, (1) By a prophet, who foretold the blasting of his project, v. 37. And, (2) By a storm, which broke the ships in the port before they set sail, by which he was warned to break off his alliance with Ahaziah; and it seems he took the warning, for, when Ahaziah afterwards pressed him to join with him, he would not, 1 Kings xxii. 49.

CHAP. XXI

Jehoram, one of the vilest, succeeded Jehoshaphat, one of the best. Thus were they punished for not making a better use of Jehoshaphat's good government, and his reformation, ch. xx. 33. I. Jehoram's elevation to the throne, ver. 1–3. II. The wicked course he took to establish himself in it, by the murder of his brethren, ver. 4. III. The idolatries and other wickedness he was guilty of, ver. 5, 6, 11. IV. The prophecy of Elijah against him, ver. 12–15. V. The judgments of God upon him, in the revolt of his subjects from him (ver. 8–10) and the success of his enemies against him, ver. 16, 17. VI. His miserable sickness and inglorious exit, ver. 18–20. VII. The preservation of the house of David notwithstanding, ver. 7.

Verses 1–11

I. Jehoshaphat was a very careful indulgent father to Jehoram. He had many sons, who are here named (v. 2), and it is said (v. 13) that they were better than Jehoram, and any of them more fit for the crown than he; and yet, because he was the firstborn (v. 3), his father secured the kingdom to him. His birthright entitled him to a double portion of his father's estate, Deut. xxi. 17. But if he appeared utterly unfit for government (the end of which is the good of the people), and likely to undo all that his father had done, it would have been better perhaps to have set him aside, and taken the next that was hopeful, and not inclined as he was to idolatry.

II. Jehoram was a most barbarous brother to his father's sons. As soon as he had settled himself in the throne he slew all his brethren with the sword, either by false accusation, under colour of law, or by assassination. With them he slew divers of the princes of Israel, who adhered to them, or were likely to avenge their death.

III. Jehoram was a most wicked king, who corrupted and debauched his kingdom, and ruined the reformation that his good father and grandfather had carried on: He walked in the way of the house of Ahab (v. 6), made high places, and did his utmost to set up idolatry again, v. 11. 1. As for the inhabitants of Jerusalem, where he kept his court, he easily drew them into his spiritual whoredom. 2. The country people seem to have been brought to it with more difficulty; but those that would not be corrupted by flatteries were driven by force to partake in his abominable idolatries.

IV. When he forsook God and his worship his subjects withdrew from their allegiance to him. 1. Some of the provinces abroad that were tributaries to him did so. The Edomites revolted (v. 8), and, though he chastised them (v. 9), yet he could not reduce them, v. 10. 2. One of the cities of his own kingdom did so. Libnah revolted (v. 10) and set up for a free state, as of old it had a king of its own, Joshua xii. 15.

V. God was tender of his covenant with the house of David, and therefore would not destroy the royal family, though it was so wretchedly corrupted and degenerated, v. 7.

I. A warning from God sent to Jehoram by a writing from Elijah the prophet. By this it appears that Jehoram came to the throne, and showed himself what he was, before Elijah's translation. We will suppose that the time of his departure was at hand, so that he could not go in person to Jehoram; but that, hearing of his great wickedness in murdering his brethren, he left this writing with Elisha, to be sent him by the first opportunity, that it might either be a means to reclaim him or a witness against him.

1. His crimes are plainly charged upon him—his departure from the good ways of God, in which he had been educated (v. 12)—his conformity to the ways of the house of Ahab, his setting up and enforcing idolatry in his kingdom—and his murdering his brethren, v. 13. 2. Judgment is given against him for these crimes; he is plainly told that his sin should certainly be the ruin, (1) Of his kingdom and family (v. 14). His people justly suffer because they had complied with his idolatry, and his wives because they had drawn him to it. (2) Of his health and life. And now, if he had learned to humble himself upon the receipt of his threatening message from Elijah, who knows but he might have obtained at least a reprieve? But it does not appear that he took any notice of it; Elijah seemed to him as one that mocked.

II. The threatened judgments brought upon him because he slighted the warning.

1. Jehoram stripped of all his comforts. God stirred up the spirit of his neighbours against him. Some occasion or other they took to quarrel with him, invaded his country, but fought against the king's house only; they made directly to that, and carried away all the substance that was found in it. They carried away his sons; but we find (ch. xxii. 1) that they slew all the eldest. Now all his sons are slain but one. If he had not been of the house of David, that one would not have escaped.

2. His disease was very grievous. Two years he continued ill, and could get no relief. These sore diseases seized him just after his house was plundered and his wives and children were carried away. Perhaps his grief and anguish of mind for that calamity might occasion his sickness. To be sick and poor, sick and solitary, but especially to be sick and in sin, sick and destitute of grace to bear the affliction, and of comfort to counter-balance it—is a most deplorable case.

3. He reigned but eight years, and then departed without being desired, v. 20. To show what little affection or respect they had for him, they would not bury him in the sepulchres of the kings, as thinking him unworthy. This further disgrace they put upon him, that they made no burning for him, like the burning of his fathers, v. 19. They did not honour him with any sweet odours or precious spices.

CHAP. XXII

The carrying away of Jehoram's sons and his wives; but one of his sons and one of his wives left to be the shame and plague of his family. I. Ahaziah was the shame of it as a partaker, 1. In the sin, and, 2. In the destruction, of the house of Ahab, ver. 1–9. II. Athaliah was the plague of it, for she destroyed all the seed-royal, and usurped the throne, ver. 10–12.

Verses 1–9

An account of the reign of Ahaziah, a short reign (of one year only). He was called Jeho-ahaz (ch. xxi. 17); here he is called Ahaz-iah, the same name transposed. He is here said to be forty-two years old when he began to reign (v. 2), but it is said (2 Kings viii. 26) that he was twenty-two years old. Some make this forty-two to be the age of his mother Athaliah, for in the original it is, he was the son of forty-two years.

The history of Ahaziah's reign is briefly summed up in two clauses, v. 3, 4.

I. He did wickedly, walked in the way of the house of Ahab, did evil in the sight of the Lord like them (v. 3, 4), that is, he worshipped the same false gods that they worshipped, Baalim and Ashtaroth. These Baalim encouraged in their worshippers all manner of lewdness and sensuality, which the God of Israel strictly forbade.

II. He was counselled by his mother and her relations to do so. She was his counsellor (v. 3) and so were they, after the death of his father, v. 4. The counsel of the ungodly is the ruin of many young persons when they are setting out in the world. This young prince might have had better advice from the princes and the judges, the priests and the Levites, that had been famous in his good grandfather's time for teaching the knowledge of God; but the house of Ahab humoured him, and he walked after their counsel.

III. He was counselled by them to his destruction. It was bad enough that they exposed him to the sword of the Syrians, drawing him in to join with Joram king of Israel in an expedition to Ramoth-Gilead, where Joram was wounded, an expedition that was not for his honour. But that was not all: by engaging him in an intimacy with Joram king of Israel, they involved him in the common ruin of the house of Ahab. He came on a visit to Joram (v. 6) just at the time that Jehu was executing the judgment of God upon that idolatrous family, and so was cut off with them, v. 7–9.

Verses 10–12

1. A wicked woman endeavouring to destroy the house of David, that she might set up a throne for herself upon the ruins of it. Athaliah barbarously cut off all the seed-royal (v. 10), perhaps intending to transmit the crown of Judah after herself to some of her own relations. 2. A good woman effectually preserving it from being wholly extirpated. One of the late king's sons, a child of a year old, was rescued from among the dead, and saved alive by the care of Jehoiada's wife (v. 11, 12).

CHAP. XXIII

Six years Athaliah had tyrannised; in this chapter we have her deposed and slain, and Joash, the rightful heir, enthroned. The story before related, 2 Kings xi. 4, &c. I. Jehoiada prepared the people for the king, acquainted them with his design, armed them, and appointed them their posts, ver. 1–10. II. He produced the king to the people, crowned him, and anointed him, ver. 11. III. He slew the usurper, ver. 12–15. IV. He reformed the kingdom, re-established religion, and restored the civil government, ver. 16–21.

Verses 1–11

Imagine the bad position of affairs in Jerusalem during Athaliah's six years' usurpation. After such a dark and tedious night the returning day in this revolution was the brighter and the more welcome. The continuance of David's seed and throne was what God had sworn by his holiness (Ps. lxxxix. 35), and the stream of government here runs again in the right channel. The instrument and chief manager of the restoration is Jehoiada. 1. A man of great prudence, who reserved the young prince for so many years till he was fit to appear in public, who prepared his work beforehand, and then effected it with admirable secrecy and expedition. 2. A man of great interest. The captains joined with him, v. 1. The Levites and the chief of the fathers of Israel came at his call to Jerusalem (v. 2). The Levites and all Judah did as Jehoiada commanded (v. 8). 3. A man of great faith. The king's son shall reign, must reign, as the Lord hath said. 4. A man of great religion. He gave special order that none of the people should come into the house of the Lord, but the priests and Levites only, who were holy, upon pain of death, v. 6, 7. Never let sacred things be profaned, no, not for the support of civil rights. 5. A man of great resolution. When he had undertaken this business he went through with it, brought out the king, crowned him, and gave him the testimony, v. 11.

Verses 12–21

I. The people pleased, v. 12, 13. When the king stood at his pillar, whose right it was to stand there, all the people of the land rejoiced to see a rod sprung out of the stem of Jesse, Isa. xi. 1.

II. Athaliah slain. She ventured into the house of the Lord at that time, and cried, Treason, treason! But nobody seconded her, or sided with her. Jehoiada, as protector in the king's minority, ordered her to be slain (v. 14), which was done immediately (v. 15).

III. The original contract agreed to, v. 16. In the Kings it is said that Jehoiada made a covenant between the Lord, the people, and the king, 2 Kings xi. 17. Here it is said to be between himself, the people, and the king; for he, as God's priest, was his representative in this transaction, or a sort of mediator, as Moses was. Let us look upon ourselves and one another as the Lord's people, and this will have a powerful influence upon us in the discharge of all our duty both to God and man.

IV. Baal destroyed, v. 17. They would not have done half their work if they had only destroyed the usurper of the king's right, and not the usurper of God's right—if they had asserted the honour of the throne, and not that of the altar. Down with Baal's house, his altars, his images; down with them all, Deut. xiii. 5, 6.

V. The temple service revived, v. 18, 19. Jehoiada restored the offices of the house of the Lord. 1. He appointed the priests to their courses, for the due offering of sacrifices. 2. The singers to theirs, according to the appointment of David. 3. The porters were put in their respective posts as David ordered (v. 19), to take care that none who were ceremonially unclean should be admitted into the courts of the temple.

VI. The civil government re-established, v. 20. They brought the king in state to his own palace, and set him upon the throne of the kingdom, to give law, and give judgment, either in his own person or by Jehoiada his tutor. Thus was this happy revolution perfected.

CHAP. XXIV

The history of the reign of Joash. How wonderfully he was preserved for the throne, and placed in it, we read before; now here we are told how he began in the spirit, but ended in the flesh. I. In the beginning of his time, while Jehoiada lived, he did well; particularly, he took care to put the temple in good repair, ver. 1–14. II. In the latter end of his time, after Jehoiada's death, he apostatized from God, and his apostasy was his ruin. 1. He set up the worship of Baal again (ver. 15–18). 2. He put Zechariah the prophet to death because he reproved him for what he had done, ver. 20–22. 3. The judgments of God came upon him for it. The Syrians invaded him, ver. 23, 24. He was struck with sore diseases; his own servants conspired against him and slew him.

Verses 1–14

An account of Joash's good beginnings. 1. It is a happy thing for young people, when they are setting out in the world, to be under the direction of those that are wise and good and faithful to them, as Joash was under the influence of Jehoiada, during whose time he did that which was right. Let those that are young reckon it a blessing to have those that will caution them against that which is evil and quicken them to that which is good; and let them reckon it not a mark of weakness to hearken to such. He that will not be counselled cannot be helped. It is especially prudent for young people to take advice in their marriages. 2. Men may go far in the external performances of religion, merely by the power of their education and the influence of their friends, who are not actuated by a living principle of grace in their hearts. 3. In the outward expressions of devotion it is possible that those who have only the form of godliness may out-strip those who have the power of it. Joash is more solicitous and more zealous about the repair of the temple than Jehoiada himself, whom he reproves for his remissness in that matter, v. 6. It is easier to build temples than to be temples to God. 4. The repairing of churches is a good work. When Joash found that money did not come in as he expected in one way he tried another. The throwing of money into a chest, through a hole in the lid of it, was a way that had not been used before, and perhaps the very novelty of the thing made it a successful expedient for the raising of money; a great deal was thrown in and with a great deal of cheerfulness: they all rejoiced, v. 10.

Verses 15–26

A sad account of the degeneracy and apostasy of Joash. God had done great things for him; he had done something for God; but now he proved ungrateful to his God.

I. The occasions of his apostasy. He never was sincere, never acted from principle, but in compliance to Jehoiada, who had helped him to the crown, and because he had been protected in the temple and rose upon the ruins of idolatry; and therefore, when the wind turned, he turned with it. 1. His good counsellor left him, and was by death removed from him. They buried him among the kings, with this honourable encomium, that he had done good in Israel. Judah is called Israel because, the other tribes having revolted from God, they only were Israelites indeed. Jehoiada finished his course with honour; but the little religion that Joash had was all buried in his grave, and, after his death, both king and kingdom miserably degenerated. See how necessary it is that, as our Saviour speaks, we have salt in ourselves, that we act in religion from an inward principle, which will carry us on through all changes. Then the loss of a parent, a minister, a friend, will not involve the loss of our religion. 2. Bad counsellors got about him, insinuated themselves into his affections, and, instead of condoling, congratulated him upon the death of his old tutor, as his release from discipline. They tell him he must be priest-ridden no longer, he may do as he pleases: and the princes of Judah were industrious to debauch him, v. 17. His father and grandfather were corrupted by the house of Ahab, from whom no better could be expected. But that the princes of Judah should be seducers to their king was very sad. And he hearkened to them: their discourse pleased him, and was more agreeable than Jehoiada's dictates used to be.

II. The apostasy itself: They left the house of God, and served groves and idols, v. 18. The princes had a request to the king that they may set up the groves and idols again which were thrown down in the beginning of his reign, for they hate to be always confined to the dull old-fashioned service of the temple. And he not only gave them leave to do it themselves, but he joined with them.

III. The aggravations of this apostasy. God sent prophets to them (v. 19) to reprove them. It is the work of ministers to bring people, not to themselves, but to God—to bring those again to him who have gone a-whoring from him. They slighted all the prophets and slew one of the most eminent, Zechariah the son of Jehoiada. The people were assembled in the court of the temple when this Zechariah, being filled with the spirit of prophecy, stood up and plainly told the people of their sin and what would be the consequences of it. He did not impeach any particular persons, but reminded them of what was written in the law. "You transgress the commandments of the Lord, you know you do so, in serving groves and idols: and why will you so offend God and wrong yourselves?" By the conspiracy of the princes, or some of their party, and by the commandment of the king, they stoned him to death immediately, not under colour of law, accusing him as a blasphemer, a traitor, or a false prophet, but in a popular tumult, in the court of the house of the Lord. The person was sacred—a priest, the place sacred—the court of the temple (the inner court, between the porch and the altar), the message yet more sacred. The reproof was just, the warning fair, both backed with scripture, and the delivery very gentle and tender. The Jews say there were seven transgressions in this; for they killed a priest, a prophet, a judge, they shed innocent blood, and polluted the court of the temple, the sabbath, and the day of expiation: for on that day, their tradition says, this happened. This Zechariah, who suffered martyrdom for his faithfulness to God and his country, was the son of Jehoiada, who had done so much good in Israel, and particularly had been as a father to Joash, v. 22. The dying martyr's prophetic imprecation upon his murderers: The Lord look upon it, and require it! This came not from a spirit of revenge, but a spirit of prophecy: He will require it. This precious blood was quickly reckoned for in the judgments that came upon this apostate prince; it came into the account afterwards in the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans (ch. xxxvi. 16); nay, our Saviour makes the persecutors of him and his gospel answerable for the blood of this Zechariah; so loud, so long, does the blood of the martyrs cry. See Matt. xxiii. 35.

IV. The judgments of God which came upon Joash for this aggravated wickedness of his. 1. A small army of Syrians made themselves masters of Jerusalem, destroyed the princes, plundered the city, and sent the spoil of it to Damascus, v. 23, 24. 2. God smote him with great diseases, of body, or mind, or both. 3. His own servants conspired against him. They slew him in his bed for the blood of the sons of Jehoiada, by which it should seem that he did not only slay Zechariah, but others of the sons of Jehoiada for his sake. 4. His people would not bury him in the sepulchres of the kings because he had stained his honour by his mal-administration.

CHAP. XXV

Amaziah's reign, recorded in this chapter, was not one of the worst and yet far from good. Most of the passages in this chapter we had before more briefly related, 2 Kings xiv. Amaziah, I. A just revenger of his father's death, ver. 1–4. II. An obedient observer of the command of God, ver. 5–10. III. A cruel conqueror of the Edomites, ver. 11–13. IV. A foolish worshipper of the gods of Edom and impatient of reproof for it, ver. 14–16. V. Rashly challenging the king of Israel, and smarting for his rashness, ver. 17–24. And, lastly, ending his days ingloriously, ver. 25–28.

I. The general character of Amaziah: He did that which was right in the eyes of the Lord, worshipped the true God, kept the temple service going, and countenanced religion in his kingdom; but he did not do it with a perfect heart (v. 2), that is, he was not a man of serious piety or devotion himself. He was no enemy to it, but a cool and indifferent friend. Such is the character of too many in this Laodicean age: they do that which is good, but not with a perfect heart.

II. A necessary piece of justice which he did upon the traitors that murdered his father: he put them to death, v. 3. Though they intended to avenge on their king the death of the prophet, they presumptuously took God's work out of his hands: and therefore Amaziah did what became him in calling them to an account for it, v. 4.

III. An expedition of his against the Edomites.

1. The great preparation he made for this expedition. (1) He mustered his own forces (v. 5), and found Judah and Benjamin in all but 300,000 men fit for war, whereas, in Jehoshaphat's time they were four times as many. Sin weakens a people, diminishes them, dispirits them, and lessens their number. (2) He hired auxiliary troops out of the kingdom of Israel, v. 6.

2. The command which God sent him by a prophet to dismiss the forces of Israel, v. 7, 8. If he made sure of God's presence, the army he had of his own was sufficient. But particularly he must not take in their assistance: For the Lord is not with the children of Ephraim, because they are not with him, but worship the calves.

3. The objection which Amaziah made against this command, and the satisfactory answer which the prophet gave to that objection, v. 9. The king had remitted 100 talents to the men of Israel for advance-money. "Now," says he, "if I send them back, I shall lose that: But what shall we do for the 100 talents?" This is an objection men often make against their duty: they are afraid of losing by it. "Regard not that," says the prophet: "The Lord is able to give thee much more than this; and, thou mayest depend upon it, he will not see thee lose by him." What is it to trust in God, but to be willing to venture the loss of anything for him, in confidence of the goodness of the security he gives us that we shall not lose by him, but that whatever we part with for his sake shall be made up to us in kind or kindness. He is just, and he is good, and he is solvent. The king lost 100 talents by his obedience; and we find just that sum given to his grandson Jotham as a present (ch. xxvii. 5); then the principal was repaid, and, for interest, 10,000 measures of wheat and as many of barley.

4. His obedience to the command of God, which is upon record to his honour. He separated the army of Ephraim, to go home again, v. 10. And they went home in great anger.

5. His triumphs over the Edomites, v. 11, 12. He left dead upon the spot, in the field of battle, 10,000 men; 10,000 more he took prisoners, and barbarously killed them all by throwing them down some steep and craggy precipice. What provocation he had to exercise this cruelty towards them we are not told.

6. The mischief which the disbanded soldiers of Israel did to the cities of Judah, either in their return or soon after, v. 13. They were so enraged at being sent home that, if they might not go to share with Judah in the spoil of Edom, they would make a prey of Judah. Several cities that lay upon the borders they plundered, killing 3,000 men that made resistance. But why should God suffer this to be done? Doubtless God intended hereby to chastise those cities of Judah for their idolatries, which were found most in those parts that lay next to Israel.

Verses 14–16

I. The revolt of Amaziah from the God of Israel to the gods of the Edomites. Egregious folly! Ahaz worshipped the gods of those that had conquered him, for which he had some little colour, ch. xxviii. 23. But to worship the gods of those whom he had conquered, who could not protect their own worshippers, was the greatest absurdity that could be. If he had cast the idols down from the rock and broken them to pieces, instead of the prisoners, he would have manifested more of the piety as well as more of the pity of an Israelite; but perhaps for that barbarous inhumanity he was given up to this ridiculous idolatry.

II. The reproof which God sent to him, by a prophet, for this sin. The prophet reasoned with him very fairly and very mildly: Why hast thou sought the favour of those gods which could not deliver their own people? v. 15.

III. The check he gave to the reprover, v. 16. He could say nothing in excuse of his own folly; but he fell into a passion. 1. He taunted him as meddling with that which did not belong to him: Art thou made of the king's counsel? 2. He silenced him, bade him say not a word more to him. He said to the seer, See not, Isa. xxx. 10. 3. He threatened him. He seems to remind him of Zechariah's fate in the last reign, who was put to death for making bold with the king; and bids him take warning by him.

IV. The doom which the prophet passed upon him for this. He had made to say to him by way of instruction and advice; but, finding him obstinate in his iniquity, he forbore. Miserable is the condition of that man with whom the blessed Spirit, by ministers and conscience, forbears to strive, Gen. vi. 3. And both the reprovers in the gate and that in the bosom, if long brow-beaten and baffled, will at length forbear. So I gave them up to their own heart's lusts.

Verses 17–28

This degenerate prince mortified by his neighbour and murdered by his own subjects.

I. Never was proud prince more thoroughly mortified than Amaziah was by Joash king of Israel.

1. This part of the story (which was as fully related 2 Kings xiv. 8, &c., as it is here)—embracing the foolish challenge which Amaziah sent to Joash (v. 17), his haughty scornful answer to it (v. 18), with the friendly advice he gave him to sit still and know when he was well off (v. 19),—his wilfully persisting in his challenge (v. 20, 21) the defeat that was given him (v. 22), and the calamity he brought upon himself and his city thereby (v. 23, 24),—verifies two of Solomon's proverbs:—(1) That a man's pride will bring him low, Prov. xxix. 23. (2) That he that goes forth hastily to strive will probably not know what to do in the end thereof, when his neighbour has put him to shame, Prov. xxv. 8.

2. But there are two passages in this story not in the Kings. (1) That Amaziah took advice before he challenged the king of Israel, v. 17. But of whom? Not of the prophet but of his statesmen that would flatter him and bid him go up and prosper. (2) Amaziah's imprudence is here made the punishment of his impiety (v. 20).

II. Never was poor prince more violently pursued by his own subjects. From the time that he departed from the Lord (so it may be read, v. 27) the hearts of his subjects departed from him, and they began to form a design against him in Jerusalem. At length the ferment grew so high, and he perceived the plot to be laid so deeply, that he thought fit to quit his royal city and flee to Lachish, but they sent after him thither, and slew him there.

CHAP. XXVI

An account of the reign of Uzziah (Azariah he was called, 2 Kings xiv. 21; xv. 1, &c.). I. His good character in general, ver. 1–5. II. His great prosperity in his wars, his buildings, and all the affairs of his kingdom, ver. 6–15. III. His presumption in invading the priests' office, for which he was struck with a leprosy, and confined by it (ver. 16–21) even to his death, ver. 22, 23.

Verses 1–15

An account of two things concerning Uzziah:—

I. His piety. In this he was not very eminent or zealous; yet he did that which was right in the sight of the Lord. He kept up the pure worship of the true God as his father did, and was better than his father, inasmuch as he never worshipped idols as his father did. It is said (v. 5), He sought God in the days of Zechariah, who, some think, was the son of that Zechariah whom his grandfather Joash slew. This Zechariah was one that had understanding in the visions of God, and had great influence with Uzziah.

II. His prosperity.

1. In general, as long as he sought the Lord, and minded religion, God made him to prosper.

2. Here are several particular instances of his prosperity:—(1) His success in his wars: God helped him (v. 7), and then he triumphed over the Philistines, demolished the fortifications of their cities, and put garrisons of his own among them, v. 6. He obliged the Ammonites to pay him tribute, v. 8. (2) The greatness of his fame and reputation. His name was celebrated throughout all the neighbouring countries (v. 8) and it was a good name, a name for good things with God and good people. (3) His buildings. While he acted offensively abroad, he did not neglect the defence of his kingdom at home, but built towers in Jerusalem and fortified them, v. 9. Much of the wall of Jerusalem was in his father's time broken down (ch. xxv. 23); and he built a tower at the corner gate. But his best fortification of Jerusalem was his close adherence to the worship of God. While he fortified the city, he did not forget the country, but built towers in the desert too (v. 10), to protect the country people from the inroads of the plunderers, ch. xxi. 16. (4) His husbandry. He dealt much in cattle and corn for he loved husbandry (v. 10). (5) His standing armies. He had, as it should seem, two military establishments. [1] A host of fighting men that were to make excursions abroad. These went out to war by bands, v. 11. They fetched in spoil from the neighbouring countries by way of reprisal for the depredations they had so often made upon Judah, [2] Another army for guards and garrisons, that were ready to defend the country in case it should be invaded, v. 12, 13. Uzziah furnished himself with a great armoury (v. 14), spears, bows, and slings, shields, helmets, and habergeons: swords are not mentioned, because it is probable that every man had a sword of his own. Engines were invented, in his time, for annoying besiegers with darts and stones shot from the towers and bulwarks, v. 15. What a pity it is that the wars and fightings which come from men's lusts have made it necessary for cunning men to employ their skill in inventing instruments of death.

The only blot we find on the name of king Uzziah.

I. His sin was invading the priest's office. The transgression of his predecessors was forsaking the temple of the Lord (ch. xxiv. 18), and burning incense upon idolatrous altars, ch. xxv. 14. His was intruding into the temple of the Lord further than was allowed him, and attempting himself to burn incense upon the altar of God.

1. That which was at the bottom of his sin was pride of heart (v. 16): When he was strong (and he was marvellously helped by the good providence of God till he was so, v. 15), when he had grown very great and considerable in wealth and power, instead of lifting up the name of God in gratitude his heart was lifted up to his destruction.

2. His sin was going into the temple of the Lord to burn incense, probably when he himself had some special occasion for supplicating the divine favour. (1) Perhaps he fancied the priests did not do their office so devoutly, as they ought, and he could do it better. Or, (2) He observed that the idolatrous kings did themselves burn incense at the altars of their gods; his father did so, and Jeroboam (1 Kings xiii. 1), and he, being resolved to cleave to God's altar, would try to come as near it as the idolatrous kings did to their altars. But it is called a transgression against the Lord his God.

3. He was opposed in this attempt by the chief priest and other priests that attended and assisted him, v. 17, 18. They were ready to burn incense for the king, according to the duty of their place; but, when he offered to do it himself, they plainly let him know that he meddled with that which did not belong to him, and that it was at his peril. "It appertaineth not to thee, O Uzziah! but to the priests, whose birthright it is, as sons of Aaron, and who are consecrated to the service." Aaron and his sons were appointed by the law to burn incense, Exod. xxx. 7. See Deut. xxxiii. 10; 1 Chron. xxiii. 13. David had blessed the people and Solomon and Jehoshaphat had prayed with them and preached to them. Uzziah might have done this, and it would have been to his praise; but, as for burning incense, that service was to be performed by the priests only. Korah and his accomplices, though Levites, paid dearly for offering to burn incense, which was the work of the priests only, Num. xvi. 35. The incense of our prayers must be by faith put into the hands of our Lord Jesus, the great high priest of our profession, else we cannot expect it should be accepted by God, Rev. viii. 3.

4. He fell into a passion with the priests that reproved him (v. 19): Uzziah was wroth, and would not part with the censer out of his hand.

II. His punishment was an incurable leprosy, which rose up in his forehead while he was contending with the priests. When the leprosy appeared, they were emboldened to thrust him out of the temple; nay, he himself hasted to go out, because the Lord had smitten him with a disease which was in a particular manner a token of his displeasure, and which he knew secluded him from common converse with men, much more from the altar of God. 2. It remained a lasting punishment of his transgression; for he continued a leper to the day of his death, v. 21. 3. It was a punishment that answered the sin as face does face in a glass. (1) Pride was at the bottom of his transgression, and thus God humbled him and put dishonour upon him. (2) He invaded the office of the priests in contempt of them, and God struck him with a disease which in a particular manner made him subject to the inspection and sentence of the priests; for to them pertained the judgment of the leprosy, Deut. xxiv. 8. (3) He must himself into the temple of God, whither [illegible] only had admission, and for that was [illegible] of the very courts of the temple, into which [illegible] meanest of his subjects that was ceremonially clean had free access.

CHAP. XXVII

A very short account of the reign of Jotham, a pious prosperous prince, of whom one would wish to have known more. I. Of the date and continuance of this reign, ver. 1, 8. II. The general good character of it, ver. 2, 6. III. The prosperity of it, ver. 3–5. IV. The period of it, ver. 7, 9.

Verses 1–9

Concerning Jotham.

I. He reigned well. He did that which was right in the sight of the Lord; he prepared his ways before the Lord his God (v. 6). He walked steadily and constantly in the way of his duty, not like some of those that went before him, who, though they had some good in them, lost their credit by their inconstancy and inconsistency with themselves. Two things are observed here in his character:—1. What was amiss in his father he amended in himself (v. 2). 2. What was amiss in his people he could not prevail to amend: The people did yet corruptly,

II. He prospered. 1. He built. He began with the gate of the house of the Lord, which he repaired, beautifully, and raised. He then fortified the wall of Ophel, and built cities in the mountains of Judah (v. 3, 4). 2. He conquered. He prevailed against the Ammonites, who had invaded Judah in Jehoshaphat's time, ch. xx. 1. 3. He became mighty (v. 6) in wealth and power, and influence upon the neighbouring nations, who courted his friendship and feared his displeasure; and this he got by preparing his ways before the Lord his God.

III. He finished his course too soon, but finished it with honour. He died when he was but forty-one years of age (v. 8); but his wars and his ways, his wars abroad and his ways at home, were so glorious that they were recorded in the book of the kings of Israel, as well as of the kings of Judah, v. 7.

CHAP. XXVIII

This chapter is the history of the reign of Ahaz the son of Jotham; a bad reign it was. I. His great wickedness, ver. 1–4. II. The trouble he brought by it, ver. 5–8. III. The reproof which God sent by a prophet to the army of Israel for trampling upon their brethren of Judah, and the obedient ear they gave to that reproof, ver. 9–15. IV. The many calamities that followed to Ahaz and his people (ver. 16–21). V. The continuance of his idolatry notwithstanding (ver. 22–25), and so his story ends, ver. 26, 27.

Verses 1–5

Never surely had a man greater opportunity of doing well than Ahaz had, and yet here we have him in these few verses, 1. Wretchedly corrupted and debauched. He had had a good education given him, but He did not that which was right in the sight of the Lord (v. 1), nay, he did a great deal that was wrong, a wrong to God, to his own soul, and to his people; he walked in the way of the revolted Israelites and the Canaanites, made molten images and worshipped them. He forsook the temple of the Lord and sacrificed and burnt incense on the hills, as if they would place him nearer heaven, and under every green tree, as if they would signify the protection and influence of heaven by their shade and dropping. To complete his wickedness, as one perfectly divested of all natural affection as well as religion, he burnt his children in the fire to Moloch (v. 3). 2. Wretchedly spoiled. (1) The Syrians insulted him and triumphed over him, beat him in the field and carried away a great many of his people into captivity. (2) The king of Israel, though an idolater, too was made a scourge to him, and smote him with a great slaughter.

Verses 6–15

I. Treacherous Judah under the rebukes of God's justice and providence. Never was such bloody work made in the land among them since they were a kingdom, all by the hands of their own Israelites too. It is just with God to make those our plagues whom we make our patterns or make ourselves partners with in sin. A war broke out between Judah and Israel, in which Judah was worsted. 1. There was a great slaughter of men in the field of battle. Vast numbers were slain (v. 6) and some of the first rank, the king's son for one. The kingdom of Israel was not strong at this time, and yet strong enough to bring this great destruction upon Judah. 2. There was a great captivity of women and children, v. 8.

II. Even victorious Israel under the rebuke of God's word.

1. The message which God sent them by a prophet, who went out to meet them, not to applaud their valour, but in God's name to tell them of their faults.

(1) He told them how they came by this victory of which they were so proud. Not for your righteousness, be it known to you, but for their wickedness (Deut. ix. 5) they are broken off; therefore be not you high-minded but fear, lest God also spare not you, Rom. xi. 20, 21.

(2) He charged them with the abuse of the power God had given them over their brethren. The conquerors are here reproved, [1] For the cruelty of the slaughter they had made in the field. They had indeed shed the blood of war in war; they did it from a bad principle of enmity to their brethren and after a bad manner, with a barbarous fury. The wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God. [2] For the imperious treatment they gave their prisoners. "You now purpose to keep them under, to use them or sell them as slaves, though they are your brethren and free-born Israelites."

(3) He reminded them of their own sins, by which they also were obnoxious to the wrath of God: Are there not with you, even with you, sins against the Lord your God? v. 10. This is intended as a check, [1] To their triumph in their success. "You are sinners, and it ill becomes sinners to be proud; for, if judgment begin thus with those that have the house of God among them, what shall be the end of such as worship the calves?" [2] To their severity towards their brethren. It ill becomes sinners to be cruel. You have transgressions enough to answer for already, and need not add this to the rest.

(4) He commanded them to release the prisoners, and to send them home again carefully (v. 11); "for you having sinned, the fierce wrath of God is upon you, and there is no other way of escaping it than by showing mercy."

2. The resolution of the princes thereupon not to detain the prisoners. They stood up against those that came from the war, though flushed with victory, and told them plainly that they should not bring their captives into Samaria, v. 12, 13.

3. The armed men acquiesced, and left their captives and the spoil to the disposal of the princes (v. 14), and herein they showed more truly heroic bravery than they did in taking them. It is a great honour for any man to yield to the authority of reason and religion against his interest. The princes generously sent home the poor captives well accommodated, v. 15.

Verses 16–27

I. The great distress which the kingdom of Ahaz was reduced to for his sin. In general, 1. The Lord brought Judah low, v. 19. They had lately been very high in wealth and power; but God found means to bring them down, and make them as despicable as they had been formidable. 2. Ahaz made Judah naked. As his sin debased them, so it exposed them. It made them naked to their shame; for it exposed them to contempt, as a man unclothed. It made them naked to their danger; for it exposed them to assaults, as a man unarmed, Exod. xxxii. 25. Sin strips men. In particular, the Edomites, to be revenged for Amaziah's cruel treatment of them (ch. xxv. 12), smote Judah, and carried off many captives, v. 17. The Philistines also insulted them, took and kept possession of several cities and villages that lay near them (v. 18), and so they were revenged for the incursions which Uzziah had made upon them, ch. xxvi. 6.

II. The addition which Ahaz made both to the national distress and the national guilt.

1. He added to the distress, by making court to strange kings, in hopes they would relieve him. When the Edomites and Philistines were vexatious to him, he sent to the kings of Assyria to help him (v. 16). He pillaged the house of God, and the king's house, and squeezed the princes for money to hire these foreign forces into his service, v. 21. But what did Ahaz get by the king of Assyria? Why, he came to him, but he distressed him, and strengthened him not (v. 20), helped him not, v. 21. The forces of the Assyrian quartered upon his country, and so impoverished and weakened it.

2. He added to the guilt, by making court to strange gods, in hopes they would relieve him. (1) He abused the house of God; for he cut in pieces the vessels of it, that the priests might not perform the service of the temple for want of vessels; and, at length, he shut up the doors, that the people might not attend it, v. 24. (2) He confronted the altar of God, for he made himself altars in every corner of Jerusalem; so that, as the prophet speaks, they were like heaps in the furrows of the fields, Hos. xii. 11. And in the cities of Judah he erected high places for the people to burn incense to what idols they pleased, as if on purpose to provoke the God of his fathers, v. 25. (3) He cast off God himself; for he sacrificed to the gods of Damascus (v. 23), because he feared them, thinking that they helped his enemies, and that, if he could bring them into his interest, they would help him. And what comes of it? The gods of Syria befriend Ahaz no more than the kings of Assyria did; they were the ruin of him and of all Israel. This sin debauched the people so that the reformation of the next reign could not prevail to cure them of their inclination to idolatry, but they retained that root of bitterness till the captivity in Babylon plucked it up.

For aught that appears, he died impenitent, and therefore died inglorious; for he was not buried in the sepulchres of the kings.

CHAP. XXIX

A pleasant scene, the good and glorious reign of Hezekiah, in which we shall find more of God and religion than perhaps in any of the good reigns we have yet met with; for he was a very zealous, devout, good man, none like him. In this chapter we have an account of the work of reformation which he set about with vigour immediately after his accession to the crown. I. His exhortation to the priests and Levites, when he put them in possession of the house of God again, ver. 1–11. II. The care and pains which the Levites took to cleanse the temple, and put things in order there, ver. 12–19. III. A solemn revival of God's ordinances that had been neglected, in which atonement was made for the sins of the last reign, and the wheels were set a-going again, to the great satisfaction of king and people, ver. 20–36.

Verses 1–11

I. Hezekiah was twenty-five years old. Joash, who came to the crown after two bad reigns, was but seven years old; Josiah, who came after two bad reigns, was but eight, which occasioned the delay of the reformation; but Hezekiah had come to years, and so applied himself immediately to it.

II. His general character. He did that which was right like David, v. 2. Of several of his predecessors it had been said that they did that which was right, but not like David, not with David's integrity and zeal. But here was one that had as hearty an affection for the ark and law of God as ever David had.

III. His speedy application to the great work of restoring religion. The first thing he did was to open the doors of the house of the Lord, v. 3. He found Judah low and naked, yet did not make it his first business to revive the civil interests of his kingdom, but to restore religion. Those that begin with God begin at the right end of their work.

IV. His speech to the priests and Levites. Hezekiah's exhortation to the Levites is very pathetic.

1. He laid before them the desolations of religion and the deplorable state to which it was brought among them (v. 6, 7): Our fathers have trespassed. He complained, (1) That the house of God had been deserted: They have forsaken God, and turned their backs upon his habitation. (2) That the instituted worship of God there had been let fall. The lamps were not lighted, and incense was not burnt. There are still such neglects as these, and they are no less culpable, when the word is not duly read and opened (for that was signified by the lighting of the lamps) and when prayers and praises are not duly offered up, for that was signified by the burning of incense.

2. He showed the sad consequences of the neglect and decay of religion among them, v. 8, 9.

3. He declared his own full purpose and resolution to revive religion and make it his business to promote it (v. 10): "It is in my heart to make a covenant with the Lord God of Israel (that is, to worship him only, and in that way which he has appointed)." This covenant he would not only make himself, but bring his people into the bond of.

4. He engaged and excited the Levites and priests to do their duty on this occasion. This he begins with (v. 5); this he ends with, v. 11. He called them Levites to remind them of their obligation to God, called them his sons to remind them of their relation to himself, that he expected that, as a son with the father, they should serve with him in the reformation of the land. (1) He told them what was their duty, to sanctify themselves first by repenting of their neglects, and renewing their covenants with God, and then to sanctify the house of God, as his servants, to make it clean and to set it up for the purposes for which it was made. (2) He stirred them up to do it (v. 11): Be not deceived, so the margin. Those that by their negligence in the service of God think to mock God, do but deceive themselves. God expected work from them. They were not chosen to be idle, to enjoy the dignity and leave the duty to be done by others, but to serve him and to minister to him.

Busy work, good work, and needful work, the cleansing of the house of the Lord.

I. The persons employed in this work were the priests and Levites, who should have kept the temple clean. Several of the Levites are here named, two of each of the three principal houses, Kohath, Gershon, and Merari (v. 12), and two of each of the three families of singers, Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun, v. 13, 14, because they were more zealous and active than the rest. When God has work to do he will raise up leading men to preside in it. And it is not always that the first in place and rank are most fit for service or most forward to it.

II. The work was cleansing the house of God. 1. From the common dirt it had contracted while it was shut up—dust, and cobwebs, and the rust of the vessels. 2. From the idols and idolatrous altars that were set up in it, which, though kept ever so neat, were a greater pollution to it than if it had been made the common sewer of the city. The priests were none of them mentioned as leading men in this work, yet [illegible] but they durst go into the inner part of the house, to cleanse it, which they did, and perhaps the high priest into the holy of holies, to cleanse that. What filth the priests brought into the court the Levites carried to the brook Kidron.

III. The expedition with which they did this work was remarkable. They began on the first day of the first month, a happy beginning of the new-year, and one that promised a good year. Thus should every year begin with the reformation of what is amiss, and the purging away, by true repentance, of all the defilements contracted the foregoing year. In eight days they cleared and cleansed the temple, and in eight days more the courts of the temple, v. 17.

IV. The report they made of it to Hezekiah was very agreeable, v. 18, 19. They knew the good king had set his heart upon God's altar, and longed to be attending that, and therefore they insisted most upon the readiness they had put that into—that the vessels of the altar were scoured and brightened. Those vessels which Ahaz, in his transgression, had cast away as vessels in which there was no pleasure, they gathered them together, sanctified them, and laid them in their place before the altar.

A solemn assembly was called to meet the king at the temple, the very next day (v. 20); and very glad, no doubt, all the good people in Jerusalem were, when it was said, Let us go up to the house of the Lord, Ps. cxxii. 1. As soon as Hezekiah heard that the temple was ready for him he lost no time, but was ready for it. He rose early to go up to the house of the Lord, earlier on that day than on other days, to show that his heart was upon his work there.

I. Atonement must be made for the sins of the last reign. They thought it not enough to lament and forsake those sins, but they brought a sin-offering. Even our repentance and reformation will not obtain pardon but in and through Christ, who was made sin (that is, a sin-offering) for us. No peace but through his blood, no, not for penitents. 1. The sin-offering was for the kingdom, for the sanctuary, and for Judah (v. 21), that is, to make atonement for the sins of princes, priests, and people, for they had all corrupted their way. The law of Moses appointed sacrifices to make atonement for the sins of the whole congregation (Lev. iv. 13, 14; Num. xv. 24, 25), that the national judgments which their national sins deserved might be turned away. For this purpose we must now have an eye to Christ the great propitiation, as well as for the remission and salvation of particular persons. 2. The law appointed only one goat for a sin-offering, as on the day of atonement (Lev. xvi. 15) and on such extraordinary occasions as this, Num. xv. 24. But they here offered seven (v. 21), because the sins of the congregation had been very great and long continued in. Seven is a number of perfection. Our great sin-offering is but one, yet that one perfects for ever those that are sanctified. 3. The king and the congregation (that is, the representatives of the congregation) laid their hands on the heads of the goats that were for the sin-offering (v. 23), thereby owning themselves guilty before God and expressing their desire that the guilt of the sinner might be transferred to the sacrifice. By faith we lay our hands on the Lord Jesus, and so receive the atonement, Rom. v. 11. 4. Burnt-offerings were offered with the sin-offerings, seven bullocks, seven rams, and seven lambs. The intention of the burnt-offerings was to give glory to the God of Israel, whom they owned as the only true God, which it was proper to do at the same time that they were by the sin-offering making atonement for their offences. The blood of those, as well as of the sin-offering, was sprinkled upon the altar (v. 22), to make reconciliation for all Israel (v. 24), and not for the men of Judah only. Christ is a propitiation, not for theirs only, but of the whole world, 1 John ii. 2. 5. While the offerings were burning upon the altar the Levites sang the song of the Lord (v. 27), the Psalms composed by David and Asaph (v. 30), accompanied by the musical instruments which God by his prophets had commanded the use of (v. 25), and which had been long neglected. Even sorrow for sin must not put us out of tune for praising God. 6. The king and all the congregation testified their consent to and concurrence in all that was done, by bowing their heads and worshipping. This is taken notice of, v. 28–40.

II. The solemnities of this day did likewise look forward. The temple service was to be set up again that it might be continually kept up; and this Hezekiah calls them to, v. 31. "Now that you have consecrated yourselves to the Lord—have both made an atonement and made a covenant by sacrifice, are solemnly reconciled and engaged to him—now come near, and bring sacrifices." Having consecrated ourselves, in the first place, to the Lord, we must bring the sacrifices of prayer, and praise, and alms, to his house. Now, in this work, it was found,

1. That the people were free. Being called to it by the king, they brought in their offerings, though not in such abundance as in the glorious days of Solomon, but according to what they had, considering their poverty and the great decay of piety among them. (1) Some were so generous as to bring burnt-offerings, which were wholly consumed to the honour of God, and of which the offerer had no part. (2) Others brought peace-offerings and thank-offerings, the fat of which was burnt upon the altar, and the flesh divided between the priests and the offerers, v. 35.

2. That the priests were few, too few for the service, v. 34.

3. That the Levites were forward. They had been more upright in heart to sanctify themselves than the priests (v. 34), were better affected to the work and better prepared and qualified for it. This was their praise, and, in recompence for it, they had the honour to be employed in that which was the priests' work: they helped them to flay the offerings. This was not according to the law (Lev. i. 5, 6), but the irregularity was dispensed with in cases of necessity, and thus encouragement was given to the faithful zealous Levites and a just disgrace put upon the careless priests.

4. That all were pleased. The king and all the people rejoiced in this blessed turn of affairs and the new face of religion which the kingdom had put on, v. 36. Two things in this matter pleased them:—(1) That it was soon brought about: The thing was done suddenly, in a little time, with a great deal of ease, and without any opposition. (2) That the hand of God was plainly in it: God had prepared the people by the secret influences of his grace, so that many of those who had in the last reign doted on the idolatrous altars were now as much in love with God's altar.

CHAP. XXX

An account of the solemn passover which Hezekiah kept in the first year of his reign. I. The consultation about it, and the resolution he and his people came to for the observance of it, ver. 2–5. II. The invitation he sent to Judah and Israel to come and keep it, ver. 1, 6–12. III. The joyful celebration of it, ver. 13–27. By this the reformation, set on foot in the foregoing chapter, was greatly advanced and established.

Verses 1–12

I. A passover resolved upon. Shall we revive it? The time has elapsed for this year; the priests are not prepared, v. 3. Many, it is likely, were for deferring it; but Hezekiah finding a proviso in the law of Moses that particular persons who were unclean in the first month might keep the passover the fourteenth day of the second month (Num. ix. 11), doubted not but what it might be extended to the congregation. Whereupon they resolved to keep the passover in the second month.

II. A proclamation to give notice of this passover and to summon the people to it.

1. An invitation was sent to the ten revolted tribes to stir them up to come and attend this solemnity. Letters were written to Ephraim and Manasseh to invite them to Jerusalem to keep this passover (v. 1), with a pious design to bring them back to the Lord God of Israel. "Let them take whom they will for their king," says Hezekiah, "so they will but take him for their God."

(1) The contents of the letters that were despatched upon this occasion, in which Hezekiah discovers a great concern both for the honour of God and for the welfare of the neighbouring kingdom. "Yield yourselves unto the Lord. Before you can come into communion with him you must come into covenant with him," Give the hand to the Lord (so the word is), that is, "Consent to take him for your God." "The doors of the sanctuary are now opened, and you have liberty to enter; the temple service is now revived, and you are welcome to join in it. You are children of Israel. The God you are called to return to is the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, a God in covenant with your first fathers. Your late fathers that forsook him and trespassed against him have been given up to desolation; their apostasy and idolatry have been their ruin, as you see (v. 7). You yourselves are but a remnant narrowly escaped out of the hands of the kings of Assyria (v. 6). If you return to God in a way of duty, he will return to you in a way of mercy." This he begins with (v. 6) and concludes with, v. 9. Could anything be expressed more pathetically, more movingly? Could there be a better cause, or could it be better pleaded?

(2) The entertainment which Hezekiah's messengers and message met with. It does not appear that Hoshea, who was now king of Israel, forbade his subjects to accept the invitation. They might go to Jerusalem to worship if they pleased; for, though he did evil, yet not like the kings of Israel that were before him, 2 Kings xvii. 2. The generality of them slighted the call and turned a deaf ear to it. The messengers went from city to city, but they laughed them to scorn, and mocked them (v. 10). The destruction of the kingdom of the ten tribes was now at hand. It was but two or three years after this that the king of Assyria laid siege to Samaria, which ended in the captivity of those tribes. Yet there were some few that accepted the invitation. In the worst of times God has had a remnant; so he had here, many of Asher, Manasseh, and Zebulun (here is no mention of any out of Ephraim, though some of that tribe are mentioned, v. 18), humbled themselves, and came to Jerusalem.

2. A command was given to the men of Judah to attend this solemnity; and they universally obeyed it, v. 12. They did it with one heart, were all of a mind in it, and the hand of God gave them that one heart.

Verses 13–20

The time appointed for the passover having arrived, a very great congregation came together upon the occasion, v. 13.

I. The preparation they made for the passover, and good preparation it was: They took away all the idolatrous altars that were found, not only in the temple, but in Jerusalem, v. 14. The best preparation we can make for the gospel passover is to cast away our iniquities, our spiritual idolatries.

II. The celebration of the passover. In this the people were so forward and zealous that the priests and Levites blushed to see them more ready to bring sacrifices than they were to offer them. This put them upon sanctifying themselves (v. 15).

III. The irregularities they were guilty of in this solemnity. 1. The Levites killed the passover, which should have been done by the priests only, v. 17. 2. Many were permitted to eat the passover who were not purified according to the strictness of the law, v. 18. Grotius observes from this that ritual institutions must give way, not only to a public necessity, but to a public benefit and advantage.

IV. Hezekiah's prayer to God for the forgiveness of this irregularity.

1. A short prayer, but to the purpose: The good Lord pardon every one in the congregation that has prepared his heart to those services, though the ceremonial preparation be wanting. For this is the one thing needful, that we seek God, his favour, his honour, and that we set our hearts to do it. Where this sincerity and fixedness of heart are there may still be many defects and infirmities. These defects need pardoning healing grace; for omissions in duty are sins as well as omissions of duty. The way to obtain pardon for our deficiencies in duty is to seek it of God by prayer.

2. A successful prayer: The Lord hearkened to Hezekiah and, in answer to his prayer, healed the people (v. 20), not only did not lay their sin to their charge, but graciously accepted their services, for healing denotes not only forgiveness (Isa. vi. 10; Ps. ciii. 3), but comfort and peace, Isa. lvii. 18; Mal. iv. 2.

Verses 21–27

After the passover followed the feast of unleavened bread, which continued seven days. 1. Abundance of sacrifices were offered to God in peace-offerings, by which they both acknowledged and implored the favour of God. 2. Many good prayers were put up to God with the peace-offerings, v. 22. They made confession to the Lord God of their fathers, in which the intent and meaning of the peace-offerings were directed and explained. 3. There was a great deal of good preaching. The Levites (whose office it was, Deut. xxxiii. 10) taught the people the good knowledge of the Lord. Hezekiah did not himself preach, but he spoke comfortably to the Levites that did, attended their preaching, commended their diligence, and assured them of his protection and countenance. 4. They sang psalms every day (v. 21): The Levites and priests praised the Lord day by day. 5. Having kept the seven days of the feast in this religious manner they had so much comfort in the service that they kept other seven days, v. 23. The case was extraordinary: they had been long without the ordinance; guilt had been contracted by the neglect of it; they had now got a very great congregation together, and were in a devout serious frame; they knew not when they might have such another opportunity, and therefore could not now find in their hearts to separate till they had doubled the time. How unlike those who snuffed at God's service, and said, What a weariness is it! Or those who asked, When will the sabbath be gone? 6. All this they did with gladness (v. 23); they all rejoiced, and particularly the strangers, v. 25. So there was great joy in Jerusalem, v. 26. Never was the like since the dedication of the temple in Solomon's time. 7. The congregation was at length dismissed with a solemn blessing, v. 27. (1) The priests pronounced it; for it was part of their office to bless the people (Num. vi. 22, 23), in which they were both the people's mouth to God by way of prayer and God's mouth to the people by way of promise; for their blessing included both. What a comfort is it to a congregation to be sent home thus crowned! (2) God said Amen to it. The prayer that comes up to heaven will come down again to this earth in showers of blessings.

CHAP. XXXI

A further account of that blessed reformation of which Hezekiah was a glorious instrument, and of the happy advances he made in it. 1. All the remnants of idolatry were destroyed and abolished, ver. 1. II. The priests and Levites were set to work again, every man in his place, ver. 2. III. Care was taken for their maintenance. 1. The royal bounty to the clergy, and for the support of the temple service, was duly paid, ver. 3. 2. Orders were given for the raising of the people's quota, ver. 4. 3. The people, thereupon, brought in their dues abundantly, ver. 5–10. 4. Commissioners were appointed for the due distribution of what was brought in, ver. 11–19. Lastly, The general praise of Hezekiah's sincerity in all his undertakings, ver. 20, 21.

Verses 1–10

An account of what was done after the passover. What was wanting in the solemnities of preparation for it before was made up in that which is better, a due improvement of it after

I. They applied themselves with vigour to destroy all the monuments of idolatry, v. 1. 1. This was done immediately after the passover. If our hearts have been made to burn within us at an ordinance, that spirit of burning will consume the dross of corruption. Hoshea king of Israel not forbidding it, their zeal carried them out to the destruction of idolatry even in many parts of his kingdom. At least those that came out of Ephraim and Manasseh to keep the passover (as many did, ch. xxx. 18) destroyed all their own images and groves, and did the like for many more. 2. They destroyed all: though ever so ancient, ever so costly, ever so beautiful, and ever so well patronised, yet they must all be destroyed.

II. Hezekiah revived and restored the courses of the priests and Levites, which David had appointed and which had of late been put out of course, v. 2. And all this in the gates or courts of the tents of the Lord. The temple is here called a tent because the temple privileges are movable things and this temple was shortly to be removed.

III. He appropriated a branch of the revenue of his crown to the maintenance and support of the altar. It was a generous act of piety, wherein he consulted both God's honour and his people's ease, as a faithful servant to him and a tender father to them.

IV. He issued out an order to the inhabitants of Jerusalem first, v. 4, but afterwards extended to the cities of Judah, that they should carefully pay in their dues, according to the law, to the priests and Levites.

V. The people thereupon brought in their tithes very readily. What the priests had occasion for, for themselves and their families, they made use of, and the overplus was laid in heaps, v. 6. All harvest-time they were increasing these heaps, as the fruits of the earth were gathered in; for God was to have his dues out of them all. When harvest ended they finished their heaps, v. 7. Hezekiah questioned the priests and Levites concerning them, why they did not use what was paid in, but hoarded it up thus (v. 9), to which it was answered that they had made use of all they had occasion for, for the maintenance of themselves and their families and for their winter store, and that this was that which was left over and above, v. 10. They did not hoard these heaps for covetousness, but to show what plentiful provision God had made for them. See the acknowledgment which the king and princes made of it, v. 8. They gave thanks to God for his good providence, which gave them something to bring, and his good grace, which gave them hearts to bring it.

I. Two particular instances of the care of Hezekiah concerning church matters. The tithes and other holy things being brought in, he provided, 1. That they should be carefully laid up, and not left exposed in loose heaps, liable to be wasted and embezzled. He ordered chambers to be made ready in some of the courts of the temple for store-chambers (v. 11), and into them the offerings were brought. 2. That they should be faithfully laid out, according to the uses they were intended for. Church treasures are not to be hoarded any longer than till there is occasion for them. Out of the offerings of the Lord distribution was made, (1) To the priests in the cities (v. 15), who stayed at home while their brethren went to Jerusalem, and did good there in teaching the good knowledge of the Lord. (2) To those that entered into the house of the Lord, all the males from three years old and upwards; for the male children even at that tender age, were allowed to come into the temple with their parents, and shared with them in this distribution, v. 16. (3) Even the Levites from twenty years old and upwards had their share, v. 17. (4) The wives and children of the priests and Levites had a comfortable maintenance out of those offerings, v. 18. In maintaining ministers, regard must be had to their families.

II. A general character of Hezekiah's services for the support of religion, v. 20, 21. 1. His pious zeal reached to all the parts of his kingdom: Thus he did throughout all Judah. 2. He sincerely designed to please God, and approved himself to him in all he did: He wrought that which was good before the Lord his God.

CHAP. XXXII

This chapter concludes the history of the reign of Hezekiah I. The descent which Sennacherib made upon him, and the care he took to fortify himself, his city, and the minds of his people against that enemy, ver. 1–8. II. The insolent blasphemous letters and messages which Sennacherib sent him, ver. 9–19. III The real answer God gave to Sennacherib's blasphemies, and to Hezekiah's prayers, in the total rout of the Assyrian army, to the shame of Sennacherib and the honour of Hezekiah, ver. 20–23. IV. Hezekiah's sickness and his recovery from that, his sin and his recovery from that, with the honours that attended him living and dead, ver. 24–33

Verses 1–8

I. The formidable design of Sennacherib against Hezekiah's kingdom. Sennacherib was now, as Nebuchadnezzar was afterwards, the terror and scourge of that part of the world. He aimed to raise a boundless monarchy for himself upon the ruins of all his neighbours. His predecessor Shalmaneser had lately made himself master of the kingdom of Israel, and carried the ten tribes captives. Sennacherib thought, in like manner, to win Judah for himself. It is observable that, just about this time, Rome, a city which afterwards came to reign more than any other had done over the kings of the earth, was built by Romulus. Sennacherib invaded Judah immediately after the re-establishment of religion in it: After these things he entered into Judah, v. 1. Perhaps he intended to chastise Hezekiah for destroying that idolatry to which he himself was devoted. One would have expected to hear of nothing but perfect peace, and that none durst meddle with a people thus qualified for the divine favour; yet the next news we hear is that a threatening destroying army enters the country, and is ready to lay all waste. The little opposition which Sennacherib met with in entering Judah induced him to imagine that all was his own. He thought to win all the fenced cities (v. 1), and purposed to fight against Jerusalem, v. 2. See 2 Kings xviii. 7, 13.

II. The preparation which Hezekiah made against this storm that threatened him: He took counsel with his princes, v. 3. With their advice he provided, 1. That the country should give him a cold reception, for he took care that he should find no water in it. All hands were set immediately to work to stop up the fountains, and the brook that ran through the midst of the land. Such as this is the policy commonly practised now-a-days of destroying the forage before an invading army. 2. That the city should give him a warm reception. In order to do this he repaired the wall, raised towers, and made darts and shields in abundance (v. 5), and appointed captains, v. 6.

III. The encouragement which he gave to his people to depend upon God in this distress. He gathered them together in a broad open street, and spoke comfortably to them, v. 6. With what he said he put life into his people, his captains especially, and spoke to their heart, as the word is. 1. He endeavoured to keep down their fears: "Be strong and courageous"; do not think of surrendering the city or capitulating, but resolve to hold it out to the last man. The prophet had thus encouraged them from God (Isa. x. 24): Be not afraid of the Assyrians; and here the king from him. 2. He endeavoured to keep up their faith, in order to the silencing and suppressing of their fears. "Sennacherib has a multitude with him, and yet there are more with us than with him; for we have God with us, and how many do you reckon him for? With our enemy is an arm of flesh, which he trusts to; but with us is the Lord, whose power is irresistible, our God, whose promise, is inviolable, a God in covenant with us, to help us, and to fight our battles." God will raise us above the prevailing fear of man. He that feareth the fury of the oppressor forgetteth the Lord his Maker, Isa. li. 12, 13. It is probable that Hezekiah said more concerning the presence of God with them and his power to relieve them. Let the good subjects and soldiers of Jesus Christ rest thus upon his word, and boldly say, Since God is for us, who can be against us?

This story of the rage and blasphemy of Sennacherib, Hezekiah's prayer, and the deliverance of Jerusalem by the destruction of the Assyrian army, we had more at large in the book of Kings, 2 Kings xviii and xix.

I. Sennacherib has his hands full in besieging Lachish (v. 9), but hears that Hezekiah is fortifying Jerusalem and encouraging his people to stand it out; and therefore, before he come in person to besiege it, he sends messengers, and writes letters to frighten Hezekiah and his people into a surrender of the city. He did not treat with Hezekiah as a man of honour, nor propose fair terms to him, but used mean and base artifices, to terrify the common people and persuade them to desert him. He represented Hezekiah as one who designed to betray them to famine and thirst (v. 11), as one who had exposed them already to the divine displeasure by taking away the high places and altars (v. 12). This proud blasphemer compared the great Jehovah, the Maker of heaven and earth, with the dunghill gods of the nations, the work of men's hands, and thought him no more able to deliver his worshippers than they were to deliver theirs (v. 19), as if an infinite and eternal Spirit had no more wisdom and power than a stone or the stock of a tree. He boasted of his triumphs over the gods of the nations, that they could none of them protect their people (v. 13–15), and thence inferred as if he were inferior to them all, How much less shall your God deliver you? All this was intended to frighten the people from their hope in God. Thus they hoped to take the city by weakening the hands of those that should defend it. Satan, in his temptations, aims to destroy our faith in God's all-sufficiency, knowing that he shall gain his point if he can do that; as we keep our ground if our faith fail not, Luke xxii. 32.

II. The duty is in the day of distress to pray and cry to Heaven. So Hezekiah did, and the prophet Isaiah, v. 20. It was a happy time when the king and the prophet joined thus in prayer.

III. The power and goodness of God. He is able both to control his enemies, be they ever so high, and to relieve his friends, be they ever so low.

1. As the blasphemies of his enemies engage him against them (Deut. xxxii. 27), so the prayers of his people engage him for them. The army of the Assyrians was cut off by the sword of an angel, which triumphed particularly in the slaughter of the mighty men of valour. The king of the Assyrians, having received this disgrace, was cut off by the sword of his own sons.

2. By this work of wonder God was glorified, as the protector of his people. Thus he saved Jerusalem, not only from the hand of Sennacherib, but from the hand of all others, v. 22; for such a deliverance as this was an earnest of much mercy in store; and he guided them, that is, he guarded them, on every side.

The story of Hezekiah concluded:

I. His sickness and his recovery from it, v. 24. The account of his sickness is but briefly mentioned here; we had a large narrative of it, 2 Kings xx. His disease seemed likely to be mortal. In the extremity of it he prayed. God answered him, and gave him a sign that he should recover, the going back of the sun ten degrees.

II. His sin and his repentance for it, which were also more largely related, 2 Kings xx. 12, &c. The occasion of it was the king of Babylon's sending an honourable embassy to him to congratulate him on his recovery. But here it is added that they came to enquire of the wonder that was done in the land (v. 31), either the destruction of the Assyrian army or the going back of the sun. The Assyrians were their enemies; they came to enquire concerning their fall, that they might triumph in it. The sun was their god; they came to enquire concerning the favour he had shown to Hezekiah, that they might honour him whom their god honoured, v. 31. His sin was that his heart was lifted up, v. 25. He was proud of the honour God had put upon him in so many instances, the honour his neighbours did him in bringing him presents, and now that the king of Babylon should send an embassy to him to caress and court him: this exalted him above measure. When Hezekiah had destroyed other idolatries he began to idolize himself. Though we cannot render an equivalent, or the payment of a debt, we must render the acknowledgment of a favour. His repentance for this sin: He humbled himself for the pride of his heart.

III. Here is the honour done to Hezekiah, while he lived. He had exceeding much riches and honour (v. 27). Among his great performances, his turning the water-course of Gihon is mentioned (v. 30), which was done upon occasion of Sennacherib's invasion, v. 3, 4. The water had come into that which is called the old pool (Isa. xxii. 11) and the upper pool (Isa. vii. 3); but he gathered the waters into a new place, for the greater convenience of the city, called the lower pool, Isa. xxii. 9. And, in general, he prospered in all his works, for they were good works. The prophet Isaiah wrote his life and reign (v. 132), his acts and his goodness or piety. The people did him honour at his death (v. 33), buried him in the chief of the sepulchres, made as great a burning for him as for Asa, or, which is a much greater honour, made great lamentation for him, as for Josiah.

CHAP. XXXIII

In this chapter we have the history, I. Of Manasseh, who reigned long. 1. His wretched apostasy from God, and revolt to idolatry and all wickedness, ver. 1–10. 2. His happy return to God in his affliction; his repentance (ver. 11–13), his reformation (ver. 15–17), and prosperity (ver. 14), with the conclusion of his reign, ver. 18–20. II. Of Amon, who reigned wickedly (ver. 21–23), and soon ended his days unhappily, ver. 24, 25.

Verses 1–10

An account of the great wickedness of Manasseh. It is the same almost word for word with that which we had, 2 Kings xxi. 1–9. This foolish young prince, in contradiction to the good example and good education his father gave him, abandoned himself to all impiety, transcribed the abominations of the heathen (v. 2), ruined the established religion, unravelled his father's glorious reformation (v. 3), profaned the house of God with his idolatry (v. 4, 5), dedicated his children to Moloch, and made the devil's lying oracles his guides and his counsellors, v. 6. We may here admire the grace of God in speaking to them, and their obstinacy in turning a deaf ear to him, that either their badness did not quite turn away his goodness, but still he waited to be gracious, or that his goodness did not turn them from their badness, but still they hated to be reformed. Corruptions in worship are such diseases of the church as it is very apt to relapse into again even when they seem to be cured. The god of this world has strangely blinded men's minds, and has a wonderful power over those that are led captive by him; else he could not draw them from God, their best friend, to depend upon their sworn enemy.

Manasseh by his wickedness undid the good that his father had done; by repentance undid the evil that he himself had done. A memorable instance it is of the riches of God's pardoning mercy and the power of his renewing grace.

I. The occasion of Manasseh's repentance was his affliction. God brought a foreign enemy upon him; the king of Babylon, that courted his father who faithfully served God, invaded him now that he had treacherously departed from God. He is here called king of Assyria, because he had made himself master of Assyria, which he would the more easily do for the defeat of Sennacherib's army, and its destruction before Jerusalem. The captain took Manasseh among the thorns, in some bush or other, perhaps in his garden, where he had hid himself. Or it is spoken figuratively: he was perplexed in his counsels and embarrassed in his affairs. He was, as we say, in the briers, and knew not which way to extricate himself, and so became an easy prey to the Assyrian captains, who no doubt plundered his house and took away what they pleased, as Isaiah had foretold, 2 Kings xx. 17, 18. What was Hezekiah's pride was their prey. They bound Manasseh, who had been held before with the cords of his own iniquity, and carried him prisoner to Babylon.

II. The expressions of his repentance (v. 12, 13): When he was in affliction he had time to bethink himself and reason enough too. 1. He was convinced that Jehovah is the only living and true God. Had he been a prince in the palace of Babylon, it is probable he would have been confirmed in his idolatry; but, being a captive in the prisons of Babylon, he was convinced of it and reclaimed from it. 2. He applied to him as his God now, renouncing all others, and resolving to cleave to him only, the God of his fathers, and a God in covenant with him. 3. He humbled himself greatly before him. 4. He prayed to him for the pardon of sin and the return of his favour. That is a good prayer, and very pertinent in this case, which we find among the apocryphal books, entitled, The prayer of Manasses, king of Judah, when he was holden captive in Babylon.

III. God's gracious acceptance of his repentance: God was entreated of him, and heard his supplication. Though affliction drive us to God, he will not therefore reject us if in sincerity we seek him, for afflictions are sent on purpose to bring us to him. Let not great sinners despair, when Manasseh himself, upon his repentance, found favour with God; in whom God showed forth a pattern of longsuffering, as 1 Tim. i. 16; Isa. i. 18.

IV. The fruits meet for repentance which he brought forth after his return to his own land, v. 15, 16. He took away the strange gods, the images of them, and that idol (whatever it was) which he had set up with so much solemnity in the house of the Lord. He returned to his duty; for he repaired the altar of the Lord. He sacrificed thereon peace-offerings to implore God's favour, and thank-offerings to praise him for his deliverance.

V. His prosperity, in some measure, after his repentance. When he returned to God in a way of duty, God returned to him in a way of mercy. Josephus says that all the rest of his time he was so changed for the better that he was looked upon as a very happy man.

Concerning Amon,

I. His great wickedness. He did as Manasseh had done in the days of his apostasy, v. 22. Manasseh, when he cast out the images, did not utterly deface and destroy them, according to the law which required Israel to burn the images with fire, Deut. vii. 5. How necessary that law was this instance shows; for the carved images being only thrown by, and not burnt, Amon knew where to find them, soon set them up, and sacrificed to them It is added, He trespassed more and more, v. 23. He humbled not himself before the Lord, as his father had humbled himself. He fell like him, but did not get up again like him. It is not so much sin as impenitence in sin that ruins men.

II. His speedy destruction. He reigned but two years and then his servants conspired against him and slew him, v. 24.

CHAP. XXXIV

In this chapter we have, I. A general account of Josiah's character, ver. 1, 2. II. His zeal to root out idolatry, ver. 3–7. III. His care to repair the temple, ver. 8–13. IV. The finding of the book of the law and the good use made of it, ver. 14–28. V. The public reading of the law to the people and their renewing their covenant with God thereupon, ver. 29–33. Much of this we had, 2 Kings xxii.

Verses 1–7

Josiah came to the crown when he was very young, only eight years old and he reigned thirty-one years (v. 1). In the beginning of his reign things went much as they had done in his father's time, because, being a child, he must have left the management of them to others; so that it was not till his twelfth year that the reformation began, v. 3. He reigned very well (v. 2), approved himself to God, trod in the steps of David, and did not decline either to the right hand or to the left. While he was young, about sixteen years old, he began to seek after God, v. 3. In the twelfth year of his reign, when it is probable he took the administration of the government entirely into his own hands, he began to purge his kingdom from the remains of idolatry; he destroyed the high places, groves, images, altars, all the utensils of idolatry, v. 3, 4. He not only cast them out as Manasseh did, but broke them to pieces, and made dust of them. This destruction of idolatry is here said to be in his twelfth year, but it was said (2 Kings xxiii. 23) to be in his eighteenth year. Something was probably done towards it in his twelfth year; then he began to purge out idolatry, but that good work met with opposition, so that it was not thoroughly done till they had found the book of the law six years afterwards.

Verses 8–13

Orders are given by the king for the repair of the temple, v. 8. When he had purged the house of the corruptions of it he began to fit it up for the services that were to be performed in it. Those that truly love God will love the habitation of his house. The Levites went about the country and gathered money towards it, which was returned to the three trustees mentioned, v. 8. They brought it to Hilkiah the high priest (v. 9), and he and they put it into the hands of workmen, both overseers and labourers, v. 10, 11. It is observed that the workmen were industrious and honest: They did the work faithfully (v. 12). It is also intimated that the overseers were ingenious; for it is said that all those were employed to inspect this work who were skilful in instruments of music; not that their skill in music could be of any use in architecture, but it was an evidence that they were men of sense and ingenuity. They had need of one another, and the work needed both. Let not the overseers of the work despise the bearers of burdens, nor let those that work in the service grudge at those whose office it is to direct; but let each esteem and serve the other in love, and let God have the glory and the church the benefit of the different gifts and dispositions of both.

Verses 14–28

This whole paragraph we had, just as it is here related, 2 Kings xxii. 8–20, and have nothing to add here to what was there observed. We take occasion to bless God that we have plenty of Bibles, and that they are, or may be, in all hands,—that the book of the law and gospel is not lost, is not scarce. Bibles are jewels, but, thanks be to God, they are not rarities. Were the things contained in the scripture new to us, as they were here to Josiah, surely they would make deeper impressions upon us than commonly they do; but they are not the less weighty, and therefore should not be the less considered by us, for their being well known. We are here directed when we are under convictions of sin, and apprehensions of divine wrath, to enquire of the Lord; so Josiah did, v. 21. It concerns us to ask (as they did, Acts ii. 37), Men and brethren, what shall we do? and more particularly (as the jailor), What must I do to be saved? Acts xvi. 30. Blessed be God, we have the lively oracles to which to apply with these enquiries. We are here encouraged to humble ourselves before God and seek unto him, as Josiah did.

Verses 29–33

An account of the further advances which Josiah made towards the reformation of his kingdom upon the hearing of the law read and the receipt of the message God sent him by the prophetess. Happy the people that had such a king. They were well taught. He did not go about to force them to do their duty, till he had first instructed them in it. He called all the people together, great and small, young and old, rich and poor, high and low. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear the words of the book of the covenant. The king himself read the book to the people (v. 30). The articles of agreement between God and Israel being read, that they might intelligently covenant with God, both king and people with great solemnity did as it were subscribe the articles. He caused all that were present to stand to it (v. 32), and made them all to serve, even to serve the Lord their God (v. 33). All his days they departed not from following the Lord; he kept them, with much ado, from running into idolatry again. All his days were days of restraint upon them; but this intimated that there was in them a bent to backslide, a strong inclination to idolatry. Josiah was sincere in what he did, but the generality of the people were averse to it and hankered after their idols still. This God saw, and therefore from that time, when one would have thought the foundations had been laid for a perpetual security and peace, from that very time did the decree go forth for their destruction.

CHAP. XXXV

I. To the temple, where we see Josiah's religious care for the due observance of the ordinance of the passover, according to the law, ver. 1–19. II. To the field of battle, where we see his rashness in engaging with the king of Egypt, and how dearly it cost him, ver. 20–23. III. To the grave, where we see him bitterly lamented, ver. 24–27.

Verses 1–19

The destruction which Josiah made of idols and idolatry was more largely related in the Kings, and but just mentioned here in the foregoing chapter (v. 33); but his solemnizing the passover, which was touched upon there (2 Kings xxiii. 21), is very particularly related here. Many were the feasts of the Lord, appointed by the ceremonial law, but the passover was the chief. In the celebration of it Hezekiah and Josiah, those two great reformers, revived religion in their day. The ordinance of the Lord's supper resembles the passover; and the due observance of that ordinance is an instance and means both of the growing purity and beauty of churches and of the growing piety and devotion of particular Christians.

In the account we had of Hezekiah's passover the great zeal of the people was observable, and the transport of devout affection that they were in; but little of the same spirit appears here. It was more in compliance with the king that they all kept the passover (v. 17, 18) than from any great inclination they had to it themselves. Some pride they took in this form of godliness, but little pleasure in the power of it.

I. The king exhorted and directed, quickened and encouraged, the priests and Levites to do their office in this solemnity. Let us see how this good king managed his clergy upon this occasion. 1. He reduced them to the office they were appointed to by the law of Moses (v. 6) and the order they were put into by David and Solomon, v. 4. 2. He ordered the ark to be put in its place. 3. He charged them to serve God and his people Israel, v. 3. 4. He charged them to sanctify themselves, and prepare their brethren, v. 6. Ministers' work must begin at home. But it must not end there; they must do what they can to prepare their brethren by admonishing, instructing, exhorting, quickening, and comforting them. 5. He encouraged them to the service, v. 2. He spoke comfortably to them, as Hezekiah did, ch. xxx. 22.

II. The king and the princes, influenced by his example, gave liberally for the bearing of the charges of this passover. Josiah, at his own proper cost, furnished the congregation with paschal lambs, and other sacrifices, to be offered during the seven days of the feast. The chief of the priests contributed towards the priests' charges, as Josiah did towards the people's.

III. The priests and Levites performed their office very readily, v. 10. The priests and Levites took care to honour God by eating of the passover themselves, v. 14.

IV. The singers expressed the joy of the congregation, and the porters at the gates took care that there should be no breaking in of anything to defile or disquiet the assembly, nor going out of any from it, that none should steal away till the service was done.

V. The whole solemnity was performed according to the law (v. 16, 17), there was none like it since Samuel's time (v. 18).

Verses 20–27

It was thirteen years from Josiah's famous passover to his death. During this time things went well in his kingdom, and religion flourished. The next news we hear of Josiah is that he is cut off in the midst of his days and usefulness, before he is full forty years old. We had this sad story, 2 Kings xxiii. 29, 30.

I. Josiah was a very good prince, yet he was to be blamed for his rashness in going out to war against the king of Egypt without cause. It was bad enough, as it appeared in the Kings, that he meddled with strife which belonged not to him. But here it looks worse; for the king of Egypt sent ambassadors to him, to warn him against this enterprise, v. 21.

1. The king of Egypt argued with Josiah, (1) From principles of justice. If even a righteous man engage in an unrighteous cause, let him not expect to prosper. (2) From principles of religion: "God is with me; nay, He commanded me to make haste, and therefore, it thou retard my motions, thou meddlest with God." It cannot be that the king of Egypt only pretended this, hoping thereby to make Josiah desist, for it is said here (v. 22) that the words of Necho were from the mouth of God. Either by a dream, or by a strong impulse which he had reason to think was from God, or by Jeremiah or some other prophet, he had ordered him to make war upon the king of Assyria. (3) From principles of policy: "That he destroy thee not; it is at thy peril if thou engage against one that has not only a better army and a better cause, but God on his side."

2. Josiah, whose heart was upright with the Lord his God, in wrath to a hypocritical nation, was so far infatuated as not to hearken to these fair reasonings and desist from his enterprise. He would not turn his face from him, but went in person and fought the Egyptian army in the valley of Megiddo, v. 22. In this matter he walked not in the ways of David his father; for, had it been his case, he would have enquired of the Lord, Shall I go up? Wilt thou deliver them into my hands?

II. The people were a wicked people, yet they were to be commended for lamenting the death of Josiah as they did. All Judah and Jerusalem, that stupid senseless people, mourned for him (v. 24). Elegies were inserted in the collections of state poems; they are written in the Lamentations. It appeared, 1. That they had some respect to their good prince, and that, though they did not cordially comply with him in all his good designs, they could not but greatly honour him. 2. That they had some sense of their own danger now that he was gone. They lamented the death of him that was their defence. Many will shed tears for their troubles, but will not be prevailed upon to part with their sins.

CHAP. XXXVI

I. A short but sad account of the utter ruin of Judah and Jerusalem within a few years after Josiah's death. 1. The history of it in the unhappy reigns of Jehoahaz for three months (ver. 1–4), Jehoiakim (ver. 5–8) for eleven years, Jehoiachin three months (ver. 9, 10), and Zedekiah eleven years, ver. 11. The destruction was, at length, completed in the slaughter of multitudes (ver. 17), the plundering and burning of the temple and all the palaces, the desolation of the city (ver. 18, 19), and the captivity of the people that remained, ver. 20. 2. Herein sin was punished, Zedekiah's wickedness (ver. 12, 13), the idolatry the people were guilty of (ver. 14), and their abuse of God's prophets, ver. 15, 16. The word of God was herein fulfilled, ver. 21. II. The dawning of the day of their deliverance in Cyrus's proclamation, ver. 22, 23.

Verses 1–10

The destruction of Judah and Jerusalem by degrees. God gives them both time and inducement to repent and waits to be gracious. The history of these reigns was more largely recorded in the last three chapters of the second of Kings. 1. Jehoahaz was set up by the people (v. 1), but was deposed by Pharaoh-necho, and carried a prisoner to Egypt, v. 2–4. Of this young prince we hear no more. 2. Jehoiakim was set up by the king of Egypt, and reigned eleven years. How low was Judah brought when the king of Egypt, an old enemy to their land, gave what king he pleased to the kingdom and what name he pleased to the king! v. 4. He made Eliakim king, and called him Jehoiakim, in token of his authority over him. Jehoiakim did that which was evil (v. 5), we read of the abominations which he did (v. 8). We hear no more of the king of Egypt, but the king of Babylon came up against him (v. 6), seized him, and bound him with a design to carry him to Babylon; but, it seems, he either suffered him to reign as his vassal, or death released the prisoner before he was carried away. However, the best and most valuable vessels of the temple were now carried away and made use of in Nebuchadnezzar's temple in Babylon (v. 7). As the carrying away of these vessels to Babylon began the calamity of Jerusalem, so Belshazzar's daring profanation of them there filled the measure of the iniquity of Babylon; for, when he drank wine in them to the honour of his gods, the handwriting on the wall presented him with his doom, Dan. v. 3, &c. In the reference to the book of the Kings concerning this Jehoiakim mention is made of that which was found in him (v. 8), which seems to be meant of the treachery that was found in him towards the king of Babylon; but some of the Jewish writers understand it of certain private marks or signatures found in his dead body, in honour of his idol, such cuttings as God had forbidden, Lev. xix. 28. 3. Jehoiachin, or Jeconiah, the son of Jehoiakim, attempted to reign in his stead, and reigned long enough to show his evil inclination; but, after three months and ten days, the king of Babylon sent and fetched him away captive, with more of the goodly vessels of the temple.

An account of the destruction of the kingdom of Judah and the city of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans. Abraham, God's friend, was called out of that country, from Ur of the Chaldees, when God took him into covenant and communion with himself; and now his degenerate seed were carried into that country again, to signify that they had forfeited all that kindness wherewith they had been regarded for the father's sake.

I. The sins that brought this desolation.

1. Zedekiah, the king in whose days it came, brought it upon himself by his own folly. (1) If he had but made God his friend, that would have prevented the ruin. Jeremiah brought him messages from God, but it is here charged upon him that he humbled not himself before Jeremiah, v. 12. Because he would not thus make himself a servant to God, he was made a slave to his enemies. (2) If he had but been true to his covenant with the king of Babylon, that would have prevented his ruin; but he rebelled against him, though he had sworn to be his faithful tributary, v. 13. It was this that provoked the king of Babylon to deal so severely with him as he did. The thing that ruined Zedekiah was not only that he turned not to the Lord God of Israel, but that he stiffened his neck and hardened his heart from turning to him, and so, in effect, he would not be healed, he would not live.

2. The great sin that brought this destruction was idolatry. The priests, the chief of the priests, who should have opposed idolatry, were ring-leaders in it.

3. The great aggravation of their sin was the abuse they gave to God's prophets, who were sent to call them to repentance, v. 15, 16. (1) God's tender compassion towards them in sending prophets to them. The reason given why God by his prophets did thus strive with them is because he had compassion on his people and on his dwelling-place, and would by these means have prevented their ruin. The methods God takes to reclaim sinners by his word, by ministers, by conscience, by providences, are all instances of his compassion towards them and his unwillingness that any should perish. (2) They mocked the messengers of God, despised his word in their mouths, and misused the prophets, treating them as their enemies. The ill usage they gave Jeremiah who lived at this time, and which we read much of in the book of his prophecy, is an instance of this. This brought wrath upon them without remedy, for it was sinning against the remedy. Nothing is more provoking to God than abuses given to his faithful ministers; for what is done against them he takes as done against himself. Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? Persecution was the sin that brought upon Jerusalem its final destruction by the Romans. See Matt. xxiii. 34–37.

II. The desolation itself, and some few of the particulars of it, which we had more largely, 2 Kings xxv. 1. Multitudes were put to the sword, even in the house of their sanctuary (v. 17), whither they fled for refuge, hoping that the holiness of the place would be their protection. The Chaldeans not only paid no reverence to the sanctuary, but showed no natural pity either to the tender sex or to venerable age. 2. All the remaining vessels of the temple, great and small, and all the treasures, sacred and secular, the treasures of God's house and of the king and his princes, were seized, and brought to Babylon, v. 18. 3. The temple was burnt, the walls of Jerusalem were demolished, the houses (called here the palaces, as Ps. xlviii. 3, so stately, rich, and sumptuous were they) laid in ashes, and all the furniture, called here the goodly vessels thereof, destroyed, v. 19. 4. The remainder of the people that escaped the sword were carried captives to Babylon (v. 20), impoverished, enslaved, insulted, and exposed to all the miseries of a strange and barbarous land. Now they sat down by the rivers of Babylon, with the streams of which they mingled their tears, Ps. cxxxvii. 1. And though there, it should seem, they were cured of idolatry, yet, as appears by the prophet Ezekiel, they were not cured of mocking the prophets. 5. The land lay desolate while they were captives in Babylon, v. 21. Now this may be considered, (1) As the just punishment of their former abuse of it. They had served Baal with its fruits; cursed therefore is the ground for their sakes. Now the land enjoyed her sabbaths (v. 21); as God had threatened by Moses, Lev. xxvi. 34. (2) Yet we may consider it as giving some encouragement to their hopes that they should, in due time, return to it again. Had others come and taken possession of it, they might have despaired of ever recovering it; but, while it lay desolate, it did, as it were, lie waiting for them again.

These last two verses of this book have a double aspect. 1. They look back to the prophecy of Jeremiah, and show how that was accomplished, v. 22. God had, by him, promised the restoring of the captives and the rebuilding of Jerusalem, at the end of seventy years; and that time to favour Sion, that set time, came at last. After a long and dark night the day-spring from on high visited them. 2. They look forward to the history of Ezra, which begins with the repetition of these last two verses. They are there the introduction to a pleasant story; here they are the conclusion of a very melancholy one; and so we learn from them that, though God's church be cast down, it is not cast off, though his people be corrected, they are not abandoned, though thrown into the furnace, yet not lost there, nor left there any longer than till the dross be separated. It may be long, but the vision is for an appointed time, and at the end it shall speak and not lie; therefore, though it tarry, wait for it.

THE BOOK OF EZRA

The history of this book is the accomplishment of Jeremiah's prophecy concerning the return of the Jews out of Babylon at the end of seventy years, and a type of the accomplishment of the prophecies of the Apocalypse concerning the deliverance of the gospel church out of the New Testament Babylon. Ezra preserved the records of that great revolution and transmitted them to the church in this book. His name signifies a helper; and so he was to that people. A particular account concerning him we shall meet with, ch. vii., where he himself enters upon the stage of action. The book gives us an account, I. Of the Jews' return out of their captivity, ch. i., ii. II. Of the building of the temple, the opposition it met with, and yet the perfecting of it at last, ch. iii.–vi. III. Of Ezra's coming to Jerusalem, ch. vii., viii. IV. Of the good service he did there, in obliging those that had married strange wives to put them away, ch. ix., x.

CHAP. I

I The proclamation which Cyrus, king of Persia, issued for the release of all the Jews that he found captives in Babylon, and the building of their temple in Jerusalem, ver. 1–4. II. The return of many, ver. 5, 6. III. Orders given for the restoring of the vessels of the temple, ver. 7–11. And this is the dawning of the day of deliverance.

Verses 1–4

I. What was the state of the captive Jews in Babylon. They were under the power of those that hated them, had nothing they could call their own; no temple, no altar; if they sang psalms, their enemies ridiculed them; and yet they had prophets among them. Some of them were preferred at court, others had comfortable settlements in the country, and they were all borne up with hope that, in due time, they should return to their own land again, in expectation of which they preserved among them the distinction of their families, the knowledge of their religion, and an aversion to idolatry. 2. What was the state of the government under which they were. Nebuchadnezzar carried many of them into captivity in the first year of his reign, which was the fourth of Jehoiakim; he reigned forty-five years, his son Evil-merodach twenty-three, and his grandson Belshazzar three years, which make up the seventy years. It is charged upon Nebuchadnezzar that he opened not the house of his prisoners, Isa. xiv. 17. And, if he had shown mercy to the poor Jews, Daniel told him it would have been the lengthening of his tranquillity, Dan. iv. 27. But the measure of the sins of Babylon was at length full, and then destruction was brought upon them by Darius the Mede and Cyrus the Persian, which we read of, Dan. v. Darius, being old, left the government to Cyrus, and he was employed as the instrument of the Jews' deliverance, as soon as ever he was master of the kingdom of Babylon, perhaps in a pious regard to the prophecy of Isaiah, where he was expressly named as the man that should do this for God, and for whom God would do great things (Isa. xliv. 28; xlv. 1, &c.). His name (some say) in the Persian language signifies the sun, for he brought light and healing to the church of God, and was an eminent type of Christ the Sun of righteousness.

I. The Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus. It is said of Cyrus that he knew not God, nor how to serve him; but God knew him, and how to serve himself by him, Isa. xlv. 4. God governs the world by his influence on the spirits of men, and whatever good is done at any time, it is God that stirs up the spirit to do it, puts thoughts into the mind, gives to the understanding to form a right judgment, and directs the will which way he pleases.

II. The reference it had to the prophecy of Jeremiah, by whom God had not only promised that they should return, but had fixed the time. What Cyrus now did was long since said to be the confirming of the word of God's servants, Isa. xliv. 26. Jeremiah, while he lived, was hated and despised; yet thus did Providence honour him long after, that a mighty monarch was influenced to act in pursuance of the word of the Lord by his mouth.

III. The date of this proclamation. It was in his first year, not the first of his reign over Persia, the kingdom he was born to, but the first of his reign over Babylon, the kingdom he had conquered.

IV. The publication of it, both by word of mouth and also in black and white: he put it in writing, that it might be the more satisfactory, and might be sent to those distant provinces where the ten tribes were scattered in Assyria and Media, 2 Kings xvii. 6.

V. The purport of this proclamation of liberty.

1. The preamble shows the causes and considerations by which he was influenced, v. 2. His mind was enlightened with the knowledge of Jehovah, the God of Israel, as the only living and true God, the God of heaven, who is the sovereign Lord and disposer of all the kingdoms of the earth; of him he says (v. 3), He is the God, God alone, God above all. He professes that he does it, (1) In gratitude to God for the favours he had bestowed upon him: The God of heaven has given me all the kingdoms of the earth. He means that God had given him all that was given to Nebuchadnezzar, whose dominion, Daniel says, was to the end of the earth, Dan. iv. 22; v. 19.

2. He gives free leave to all the Jews that were in his dominions to go up to Jerusalem, and to build the temple of the Lord there, v. 3.

3. He subjoins a brief for a collection to bear the charges of such as were poor and not able to bear their own, v. 4. "Whosoever remaineth, because he has not the means to bear his charges to Jerusalem, let the men of his place help him." Cyrus not only gave his good wishes with those that went (Their God be with them, v. 3), but took care also to furnish them with such things as they needed.

Verses 5–11

I. How Cyrus's proclamation succeeded with others. 1. He having given leave to the Jews to go up to Jerusalem, many of them went up accordingly, v. 5. The same God that had raised up the spirit of Cyrus to proclaim this liberty raised up their spirits to take the benefit of it; for it was done, not by might, nor by power, but by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts, Zech. iv. 6. The temptation perhaps was strong to some of them to stay in Babylon. The discouragements of their return were many and great, the journey long, their wives and children unfit for travelling, their own land was to them a strange land, the road to it an unknown road. Go up to Jerusalem! And what should they do there? It was all in ruins, and in the midst of enemies to whom they would be an easy prey. Many were wrought upon by these considerations to stay in Babylon, at least not to go with the first. But there were some that got over these difficulties, and they were those whose spirits God raised. He, by his Spirit and grace, filled them with a generous ambition of liberty, a gracious affection to their own land, and a desire of the free and public exercise of their religion. The call and offer of the gospel are like Cyrus's proclamation. Deliverance is preached to the captives, Luke iv. 18. Those that are bound under the unrighteous dominion of sin, and bound over to the righteous judgment of God, may be made free by Jesus Christ. Whoever will, by repentance and faith, return to God, Jesus Christ has opened the way for him, and let him go up out of the slavery of sin into the glorious liberty of the children of God. The offer is general to all. Christ makes it, in pursuance of the grant which the Father has made him of all power both in heaven and in earth and of the charge given him to build God a house, to set him up a church in the world, a kingdom among men, Many that hear this joyful sound choose to sit still in Babylon, are in love with their sins and will not venture upon the difficulties of a holy life; but some there are that break through the discouragements, and resolve to build the house of God, to make heaven of their religion, whatever it cost them. Thus will the heavenly Canaan be replenished, though many perish in Babylon; and the gospel-offer will not be made in vain. 2. Cyrus having given order that their neighbours should help them, they did so, v. 6. All those that were about them furnished them with plate and goods to bear the charges of their journey, and to help them in building and furnishing both their own houses and God's temple. As the tabernacle was made of the spoils of Egypt, and the first temple built by the labours of the strangers, so the second by the contributions of the Chaldeans, all intimating the admission of the Gentiles into the church in due time.

II. How this proclamation was seconded by Cyrus himself. To give proof of the sincerity of his affection to the house of God, he not only released the people of God, but restored the vessels of the temple, v. 7, 8.

Judah had a prince, even in captivity. Sheshbazzar, supposed to be the same with Zerubbabel, is here called prince of Judah; the Chaldeans called him Sheshbazzar, which signifies joy in tribulation; but among his own people he went by the name of Zerubbabel—a stranger in Babylon; so he looked upon himself, and considered Jerusalem his home, though, as Josephus says, he was captain of the life-guard to the king of Babylon. He took care of the affairs of the Jews. To him the sacred vessels were numbered out (v. 8), and he took care for their safe conveyance to Jerusalem, v. 11.

CHAP. II

A catalogue of the several families that returned, ver. 1. I. The leaders, ver. 2. II. The people, ver. 3–35. III. The priests, Levites, and retainers to the temple, ver. 36–63. IV. The sum total, with an account of their retinue, ver. 64–67. V. Their offerings to the service of the temple, ver. 68–70.

Verses 1–35

1. An account was kept in writing of the families that came up out of captivity, and the numbers of each family. This was done for their honour, as part of their recompence for their faith and courage, and their affection to their own land, and to stir up others to follow their good example. The names of all those Israelites indeed that accept the offer of deliverance by Christ shall be found, to their honour, in a more sacred record than this, even in the Lamb's book of life. The account that was kept of the families that came up from the captivity was intended also for the benefit of posterity, that they might know from whom they descended and to whom they were allied. 2. They are called children of the province. Judah, which had been an illustrious kingdom, to which other kingdoms had been made provinces, subject to it and dependent on it, was now itself made a province, to receive laws and commissions from the king of Persia and to be accountable to him. 3. They are said to come every one to his city, that is, the city appointed them, in which appointment an eye, no doubt, was had to their former settlement by Joshua; and to that, as near as might be, they returned. 4. That the leaders are first mentioned, v. 2. Zerubbabel and Jeshua were their Moses and Aaron, the former their chief prince, the latter their chief priest. 5. Some of these several families are named from the persons that were their ancestors, others from the places in which they had formerly resided. Here are two families that are called the children of Elam (one v. 7, another v. 31), and, which is strange, the number of both is the same, 1,254. The children of Bethlehem (v. 21) were but 123, though it was David's city; for Bethlehem was little among the thousands of Judah, yet there must the Messiah arise, Micah v. 2. Anathoth had been a famous place in the tribe of Benjamin and yet here it numbered but 128 (v. 23), which is to be imputed to the divine curse which the men of Anathoth brought upon themselves by persecuting Jeremiah, who was of their city. Jer. xi. 21, 23.

Verses 36–63

An account, I. Of the priests that returned, and they were a considerable number, about a tenth part of the whole company: for the whole were above 42,000 (v. 64), and four families of priests made up above 4,200 (v. 36–39).

II. Of the Levites. The small number of them, for, taking in both the singers and the porters (v. 40–42), they did not make 350.

III. Of the Nethinim, the Gibeonites, given (so their name signifies) by Joshua first (Joshua ix. 27), and again by David (Ezra viii. 20), when Saul had expelled them, to be employed by the Levites in the work of God's house as hewers of wood and drawers of water.

IV. Of some that were looked upon as Israelites by birth, and others as priests, and yet could not make out a clear title to the honour. 1. There were some that could not prove themselves Israelites (v. 59, 60), a considerable number, who presumed they were of the seed of Jacob, but could not produce their pedigrees, and yet would go up to Jerusalem, having an affection to the house and people of God. 2. There were others that could not prove themselves priests, and yet were supposed to be of the seed of Aaron.

I. The sum total of the company that returned out of Babylon. The before mentioned amount not quite to 30,000 (29,818), so that there were above 12,000 who, it is probable, were of the rest of the tribes of Israel, besides Judah and Benjamin. This was more than double the number that were carried captive into Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, so that, as in Egypt, the time of their affliction was the time of their increase.

II. Their retinue. Their servants were comparatively few (v. 65) and their beasts of burden about as many, v. 66, 67. But notice is taken of 200 singing-men and women whom they had among them, who were intended (as those 2 Chron. xxxv. 25) to excite their mourning.

III. Their oblations. It is said (v. 68, 69), 1. That they came to the house of the Lord at Jerusalem; and yet that house, that holy and beautiful house, was now in ruins. 2. That they offered freely towards the setting of it up in its place. That, it seems, was the first house they talked of setting up. Their offering was nothing in comparison with the offerings of the princes in David's time; then they offered by talents (1 Chron. xxix. 7), now by drams, yet these drams, being after their ability, were as acceptable to God as those talents, like the widow's two mites. 3. That they dwelt in their cities, v. 70. Though their cities were out of repair, yet, because they were their cities, such as God had assigned them, they were content to dwell in them. Their poverty was a bad cause, but their unity and unanimity were a good effect of it.

CHAP. III

The ground untilled, the cities in ruins, all out of order; but here we have an account of the early care they took about the re-establishment of religion among them. Thus did they lay the foundation well, and begin their work at the right end. I. They set up an altar, and offered sacrifices upon it, kept the feasts, and contributed towards the rebuilding of the temple, ver. 1–7. II. They laid the foundation of the temple with a mixture of joy and sorrow, ver. 8–13.

Verses 1–7

I. A general assembly of the returned Israelites at Jerusalem, in the seventh month, v. 1. We may suppose that they came from Babylon in the spring. The seventh month therefore soon came, in which many of the feasts of the Lord were to be solemnized. Such was their zeal for religion that they left all their business in the country, to attend God's altar; and they came as one man. Let worldly business be postponed to the business of religion and it will prosper the better.

II. The care which their leading men took to have an altar ready for them to attend upon.

1. Joshua and his brethren the priests, Zerubbabel and his brethren the princes, built the altar of the God of Israel (v. 2), in the same place where it had stood, v. 3. They could not immediately have a temple, but they would not be without an altar. Abraham, wherever he came, built an altar; and wherever we come, though we may perhaps want the benefit of the candlestick of preaching, and the showbread of the eucharist, yet, if we bring not the sacrifices of prayer and praise, we are wanting in our duty, for we have an altar that sanctifies the gift ever ready.

2. The reason here given why they hastened to set up the altar: Fear was upon them, because of the people of the land. They were in the midst of enemies that bore ill will to them and their religion. Because they were so, therefore they set up the altar. Apprehension of danger should stir us up to our duty. This good use we should make of our fears, we should be driven by them to our knees.

III. The sacrifices they offered upon the altar. Let not those that have an altar starve it.

1. They began on the first day of the seventh month, v. 6.

2. Having begun, they kept up the continual burnt-offering (v. 5), morning and evening, v. 3. They had known by sad experience what it was to want the comfort of the daily sacrifice to plead in their daily prayers.

3. They observed all the set feasts of the Lord, and offered the sacrifices appointed for each, and particularly the feast of tabernacles, v. 4, 5. Now that they were beginning to settle in their cities it might serve well to remind them of their fathers dwelling in tents in the wilderness.

4. They offered every man's free-will offering, v. 5. The law required much, but they brought more; for, though they had little wealth to support the expense of their sacrifices, they had much zeal, and, we may suppose, spared at their own tables that they might plentifully supply God's altar.

IV. The preparation they made for the building of the temple, v. 7. Tyre and Sidon must now, as of old, furnish them with workmen, and Lebanon with timber, orders for both which they had from Cyrus.

Verses 8–13

There was no dispute among the returned Jews whether they should build the temple or no. An account of the beginning of that good work.

I. When it was begun—as soon as ever the season of the year would permit (v. 8), and when they had ended the solemnities of the passover. They took little more than half a year for making preparation of the ground and materials.

II. Who began it—Zerubbabel, and Jeshua, and their brethren. Then the work of God is likely to go on well when magistrates, ministers, and people, are hearty for it.

III. They appointed the Levites to set forward the work (v. 8), and they did it by setting forward the workmen (v. 9), and strengthening their hands with good and comfortable words.

IV. How God was praised at the laying of the foundation of the temple (v. 10, 11); the priests with the trumpets appointed by Moses, and the Levites with the cymbals appointed by David to assist the singing of that everlasting hymn which will never be out of date, and to which our tongues should never be out of tune, God is good, and his mercy endureth for ever. Let all the streams of mercy be traced up to the fountain. However it be, yet God is good to Israel (Ps. lxxiii. 1), good to us. Let the reviving of the church's interests, when they seemed dead, be ascribed to the continuance of God's mercy for ever, for therefore the church continues.

V. How the people were affected. Different sentiments there were among the people of God, and each expressed himself according to his sentiments, and yet there was no disagreement among them. 1. Those that only knew the misery of having no temple at all praised the Lord with shouts of joy when they saw but the foundation of one laid, v. 11. To them even this foundation seemed great, and was as life from the dead. They shouted, so that the noise was heard afar off. 2. Those that remembered the glory of the first temple which Solomon built, and considered how far this was likely to be inferior to that, perhaps in dimensions, certainly in magnificence and sumptuousness, wept with a loud voice, v. 12. If we date the destruction of the first temple 586 B.C., and the return from Babylon 537 B.C., the foundation of the new temple was laid in 536 B.C., fifty years after the temple was burnt. So that many now alive might remember it standing. These lamented the disproportion between this temple and the former. And, (1) There was some reason for it; and if they turned their tears into the right channel, and bewailed the sin that was the cause of this melancholy change, they did well. (2) Yet it was their infirmity to mingle those tears with the common joys and so to cast a damp upon them. In the harmony of public joys, let not us be jarring strings. They were priests and Levites, who should have known and taught others how to be duly affected under various providences, and not to let the remembrance of former afflictions drown the sense of present mercies. This mixture of sorrow and joy here is a representation of this world. We can scarcely discern the shouts of joy from the noise of the weeping.

CHAP. IV

The good work of rebuilding the temple was no sooner begun than it met with opposition; the Samaritans were enemies to the Jews and their religion, and they set themselves to obstruct it. I. They offered to be partners in the building of it, that they might have it in their power to retard it; but they were refused, ver. 1–3. II. They discouraged them in it, and dissuaded them from it, ver. 4, 5. III. They basely misrepresented the undertaking, and the undertakers, to the king of Persia, by a memorial they sent him, ver. 6–16. IV. They obtained from him an order to stop the building (ver. 17–22), which they immediately put in execution, ver. 23, 24.

Verses 1-5

An instance of the old enmity that was put between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent. God's temple cannot be built, but Satan will rage, and the gates of hell will fight against it. The gospel kingdom was, in like manner, to be set up with much struggling and contention.

I. The children of the captivity (v. 1) had newly come out of captivity, were born in captivity, had still the marks of their captivity upon them; though they were not now captives, they were under the control of those whose captives they had lately been. Israel was God's son, his first-born; but by their iniquity the people sold and enslaved themselves, and so became children of the captivity.

II. The opposers of the undertaking are here said to be the adversaries of Judah and Benjamin, not the Chaldeans or Persians, but the relics of the ten tribes, and the foreigners that had joined themselves to them, and patched up that mongrel religion we had an account of, 2 Kings xvii. 33. They feared the Lord, and served their own gods too. They are called the people of the land, v. 4.

III. The opposition they gave had in it much of the subtlety of the old serpent. When they heard that the temple was in building they were immediately aware that it would be a fatal blow to their superstition, and set themselves to oppose it.

1. They offered their service to build with the Israelites only that thereby they might get an opportunity to retard the work, while they pretended to further it. Their offer was plausible enough, and looked kind: "We will build with you, will help you to contrive, and will contribute towards the expense; for we seek your God as you do," v. 2. This was false, for, though they sought the same God, they did not seek him only, nor seek him in the way he appointed. The chief of the fathers of Israel were soon aware that they meant them no kindness, whatever they pretended, but really designed to do them a mischief, and therefore told them plainly, "You have nothing to do with us, have no part nor lot in this matter, are not true-born Israelites nor faithful worshippers of God; you worship you know not what, John iv. 22. You are none of those with whom we dare hold communion, and therefore we ourselves will build it."

2. When this plot failed they did what they could to divert them from the work and discourage them in it. Those that were cool and indifferent were by these artifices drawn off from the work, which wanted their help, v. 4. Wonder not at the restlessness of the church's enemies in their attempts against the building of God's temple. He whom they serve, and whose work they are doing, is unwearied in walking to and fro through the earth to do mischief.

Verses 6–16

Cyrus steadfastly adhered to the Jews' interest. His successor was Ahasuerus (v. 6), called also Artaxerxes (v. 7), supposed to be the same that in heathen authors is called Cambyses, who had never taken such cognizance of the despised Jews as to concern himself for them. To him these Samaritans applied for an order to stop the building of the temple; and they did it in the beginning of his reign, being resolved to lose no time when they thought they had a king for their purpose. See how watchful the church's enemies are to take the first opportunity of doing it a mischief; let not its friends be less careful to do it a kindness.

I. The general purport of the letter which they sent to the king, to inform him of this matter. It is called (v. 6) an accusation against the inhabitants of Judah and Jerusalem.

II. The persons concerned in writing this letter. The contrivers are named (v. 7) that plotted the thing, the writers (v. 8) that put it into form, and the subscribers (v. 9) that concurred in it and joined with them. The rulers take counsel together against the Lord and his temple. The building of the temple would do them no harm, yet they appear against it with the utmost concern and virulence, perhaps because the prophets of the God of Israel had foretold the famishing and perishing of all the gods of the heathen, Zeph. ii. 11; Jer. x. 11. The people concurred with them in imagining this vain thing. All the several colonies from the cities or countries of Assyria, Chaldea, Persia, &c., whence they came, set their hands, by their representatives, to this letter.

III. A copy of the letter itself, which Ezra inserts here out of the records of the kingdom of Persia.

1. They represent themselves as very loyal to the government, and greatly concerned for the honour and interest of it. Because we are salted with the salt of the palace (so it is in the margin), we have our salary from the court, and could no more live without it than flesh could be preserved without salt. Now, in consideration of this, "it is not meet for us to see the king's dishonour;" and therefore they urge him to stop the building of the temple.

2. They represent the Jews as disloyal, and dangerous to the government, that Jerusalem was the rebellious and bad city (v. 12), hurtful to kings and provinces, v. 15.

(1) Their history of what was past was invidious, that within this city sedition had been moved of old time, and, for that cause, it was destroyed, v. 15. There was some colour given for this suggestion by the attempts of Jehoiakim and Zedekiah to shake off the yoke of the king of Babylon. But their efforts to recover their rights would have been justifiable had they taken the right method and made their peace with God first. Though these Jews, and their princes, had been guilty of rebellion, yet it was unjust therefore to fasten this as an indelible brand upon this city. The Jews, in their captivity, had given such specimens of good behaviour as were sufficient, with any reasonable men, to roll away that one reproach.

(2) Their information concerning what was now doing was grossly false in matter of fact. Very careful they were to inform the king that the Jews had set up the walls of this city. They had only begun to build the temple, which Cyrus commanded them to do, but, as for the walls, there was nothing done nor designed towards the repair of them, as appears by the condition they were in many years after (Neh. i. 3), all in ruins.

(3) Their prognostics of the consequences were altogether groundless and absurd. They were very confident that if this city should be built, not only the Jews would pay no toll, tribute, or custom (v. 13), but that all the countries on this side Euphrates would instantly revolt, drawn in to do so by their example; and, if the prince in possession should connive at this, he would wrong, not only himself, but his successors: Thou shalt endamage the revenue of the kings. See how every line in this letter breathes both the subtlety and malice of the old serpent.

I. The orders which the king of Persia gave, in answer to the information sent him by the Samaritans against the Jews. He suffered himself to be imposed upon by their falsehood, but was very willing to gratify them with an order to stay proceedings. He consulted the records concerning Jerusalem, and found that it had indeed rebelled against the king of Babylon, and therefore that it was, as they called it, a bad city (v. 19), and that in times past kings had reigned there, to whom all the countries on that side the river had been tributaries (v. 20). He appointed these Samaritans to stop the building of the city immediately, v. 21, 22. Neither they, in their letter, nor he, in his order, make any mention of the temple, and the building of that, because both they and he knew that they had a command from Cyrus to rebuild that. They spoke only of the city: "Let not that be built," that is, as a city with walls and gates.

II. The use which the enemies of the Jews made of these orders, so fraudulently obtained. The order was only to prevent the walling of the city, but, having force and power on their side, they construed it as relating to the temple, for it was that to which they had an ill will. The consequence was that the work of the house of God ceased for a time, through the power and insolence of its enemies.

CHAP. V

The temple-work at a full stop; but, being God's work, it shall be revived, and here we have an account of the reviving of it. The blessed Spirit, I. Warmed its cool-hearted friends, and excited them to build, ver. 1, 2. II. Cooled its hot-headed enemies, and brought them to better tempers; for, though they secretly disliked the work as much as those in the foregoing chapter, yet, 1. They were more mild towards the builders, ver. 3–5. 2. They were more fair in their representation of the matter to the king, of which we have here an account, ver 6–17.

During this time they had an altar and a tabernacle. But the counsellors that were hired to hinder the work (ch. iv. 5) told them that the time had not come for the building of the temple (Hag. i. 2), urging that it was long ere the time came for the building of Solomon's temple; and thus the people were made easy in their own ceiled houses, while God's house lay waste.

I. They had two good ministers, who, in God's name, earnestly persuaded them to put the wheel of business in motion again. Haggai and Zechariah both began to prophesy in the second year of Darius, as appears, Hag. i. 1; Zech. i. 1. The temple of God among men is to be built not by secular force but by the word of God. As the weapons of our warfare, so the instruments of our building are not carnal, but spiritual. It is the business of God's prophets to stir up God's people to that which is good, and to help them in it, to strengthen their hands, and, by suitable considerations fetched from the word of God, to quicken them to their duty and encourage them in it. They prophesied in the name, or (as some read it) in the cause, or for the sake, of the God of Israel; they spoke by commission from him, and argued from his authority.

II. They had two good magistrates, who were forward and active in this work. Zerubbabel their chief prince, and Jeshua their chief priest, v. 2. These great men thought it no disparagement to them, but a happiness, to be taught and prescribed to by the prophets of the Lord, and were glad of their help in reviving this good work. Read the first chapter of the prophecy of Haggai here (for that is the best comment on these two verses) and see what great things God does by his word, which he magnifies above all his name, and by his Spirit working with it.

I. The cognizance which their neighbours soon took of the reviving of this good work. No sooner did the Spirit of God stir up the friends of the temple to appear for it than the evil spirit stirred up its enemies to appear against it. While the people built and ceiled their own houses their enemies gave them no molestation (Hag. i. 4), but when they fell to work again at the temple then the alarm was taken, and all heads were at work to hinder them, v. 3, 4. The adversaries are here named: Tatnai and Shetharboznai. These, though real enemies to the building of the temple, made some conscience of telling truth. If all men have not faith (2 Thess. iii. 2), it is well some have, and a sense of honour. The church's enemies are not all equally wicked and unreasonable.

II. The care which the divine Providence took of this good work (v. 5): The eye of their God was upon the elders of the Jews, who were active in the work, so that their enemies could not cause them to cease, as they would have done, till the matter came to Darius. They desired they would only cease till they had instructions from the king about it. But they would not so much as yield them that, for the eye of God was upon them, even their God. The elders of the Jews saw the eye of God upon them, to observe what they did and own them in what they did well, and then they had courage enough to face their enemies and to go on vigorously with their work, notwithstanding all the opposition they met with.

III. The account they sent to the king of this matter.

1. How fully the elders of the Jews gave the Samaritans an account of their proceedings. They put these questions to them:—"By what authority do you do these things, and who gave you that authority?" To this they answered: "We are the servants of the God of heaven and earth. The God we worship is not a local deity, and therefore we cannot be charged with making a faction, or setting up a sect, in building this temple, to his honour: but we pay our homage to a God on whom the whole creation depends, and therefore ought to be protected and assisted by all and hindered by none. . . . It was to punish us for our sins that we were, for a time, put out of the possession of this house; not because the gods of the nations had prevailed against our God, but because we had provoked him (v. 12), for which he delivered us and our temple into the hands of the king of Babylon. We have the royal decree of Cyrus to justify us."

This is the account they give of their proceedings, not asking what authority they had to examine them, nor upbraiding them with their idolatry, and superstitions, and medley religion. Let us learn hence with meekness and fear to give a reason of the hope that is in us (1 Peter iii. 15), rightly to understand, and then readily to declare, what we do in God's service and why we do it.

2. How fairly the Samaritans represented this to the king. They called the temple at Jerusalem the house of the great God (v. 8); for though the Samaritans had yet gods many and lords many, they owned the God of Israel to be the great God, who is above all gods. They told him truly what was done, not stating, as their predecessors did, that they were fortifying the city as if they intended war, but only that they were rearing the temple as those that intended worship, v. 8. God's people could not be persecuted if they were not belied, could not be baited if they were not dressed up in bears' skins. Let but the cause of God and truth be fairly stated, and fairly heard, and it will keep its ground.

CHAP. VI

How solemnly the foundation of the temple was laid, ch. iii. How slowly the building went on, and with how much difficulty, ch. iv and v. But how gloriously the topstone was at length brought forth with shoutings in this chapter. As for God, his work is perfect; it may be slow work, but it will be sure work. We have here, I. A recital of the decree of Cyrus for the building of the temple, ver. 1–5. II. The enforcing of that decree by a new order from Darius for the perfecting of that work, ver. 6–12. III. The finishing of it, ver. 13–15. IV. The solemn dedication of it when it was built (ver. 16–18), and the handselling of it with the celebration of the passover, ver. 19–22.

Verses 1–12

I. The decree of Cyrus for the building of the temple repeated. Search was ordered to be made for it among the records. It was looked for in Babylon (v. 1). But it was not found there. At length it was found at Achmetha, in the province of the Medes, v. 2. It is here inserted, v. 3–5. 1. Here is a warrant for the building of the temple: Let the house of God at Jerusalem, yea, let that house be built within such and such dimensions, and with such and such materials. 2. A warrant for the taking of the expenses of the building out of the king's revenue, v. 4. We do not find that they had received what was here ordered them, the face of things at court being changed. 3. A warrant for the restoring of the vessels and utensils of the temple, which Nebuchadnezzar had taken away (v. 5), with an order that the priests, the Lord's ministers, should return them all to their places in the house of God.

II. The confirmation of it by a decree of Darius, grounded upon it and in pursuance of it.

1. The decree of Darius is very explicit and satisfactory.

(1) He forbids his officers to do anything in opposition to the building of the temple. The manner of expression intimates that he knew they had a mind to hinder it: Be you far hence (v. 6); let the work of this house of God alone, v. 7.

(2) He orders them out of his own revenue to assist the builders with money. I. For carrying on the building, v. 8. Herein he pursues the example of Cyrus, v. 4. II. For maintaining the sacrifices there when it was built, v. 9. See here how he gives honour, First, To Israel's God, whom he calls once and again the God of heaven. Secondly, To his ministers, in ordering his commissioners to give out supplies for the temple service at the appointment of the priests. Thirdly, To prayer: That they may pray for the life of the king.

(3) He enforces his decree with a penalty (v. 11).

(4) He entails a divine curse upon all those kings and people that should ever have any hand in the destruction of this house, v. 12.

2. The heart of kings is in the hand of God, and he turns it which way soever he pleases; what they are he makes them to be, for he is King of kings. When God's time has come for the accomplishing of his gracious purposes concerning his church he will raise up instruments to promote them from whom such good service was not expected. The earth sometimes helps the woman (Rev. xii. 16), and those are made use of for the defence of religion, who have little religion themselves. The enemies of the Jews, in appealing to Darius, hoped to get an order to suppress them, but, instead of that, they got an order to supply them.

I. The Jews' enemies made their friends. When they received this order from the king they came with as much haste to encourage and assist the work as their predecessors had done to put a stop to it, ch. iv. 23.

II. The building of the temple carried on, and finished in a little time, v. 14, 15. Now the elders of the Jews built with cheerfulness. They found themselves bound to it by the commandment of the God of Israel. They found themselves shamed into it by the commandment of the heathen kings, Cyrus formerly, Darius now, and Artaxerxes some time after. They found themselves encouraged in it by the prophesying of Haggai and Zechariah. And now the work went on so prosperously that, in four years' time, it was brought to perfection. The gospel church, that spiritual temple, is long in the building, but it will be finished at last, when the mystical body is completed. Every believer is a living temple, building up himself in his most holy faith. Much opposition is given to this work by Satan and our own corruptions. We trifle, and proceed in it with many stops and pauses; but he that has begun the good work will see it performed, and will bring forth judgment unto victory.

III. The dedication of the temple. When it was built, being designed only for sacred uses, they showed by an example how it should be used, which (says Bishop Patrick) is the proper sense of the word dedicate. They entered upon it with solemnity and probably with a public declaration of the separating of it from common uses and the surrender of it to the honour of God, to be employed in his worship. 1. The persons employed in this service were not only the priests and Levites who officiated, but the children of Israel, some of each of the twelve tribes, though Judah and Benjamin were the chief, and the rest of the children of the captivity. 2. The sacrifices that were offered upon this occasion were bullocks, rams, and lambs (v. 17), for burnt-offerings and peace-offerings; not to be compared, in number, with what had been offered at the dedication of Solomon's temple, but, being according to their present ability, they were accepted. These hundreds were more to them than Solomon's thousands were to him. 3. This service was performed with joy. 4. When they dedicated the house they settled the household. Though the temple service could not now be performed with so much pomp and plenty as formerly, because of their poverty, yet perhaps it was performed with as much purity and close adherence to the divine institution as ever, which was the true glory of it. No beauty like the beauty of holiness.

IV. The celebration of the passover in the newly-erected temple. Now that they were newly delivered out of their bondage in Babylon it was seasonable to commemorate their deliverance out of their bondage in Egypt. Fresh mercies should put us in mind of former mercies. Now they made a joyful festival of it, it falling out in the next month after the temple was finished and dedicated, v. 19. Notice is here taken, 1. Of the purity of the priests and Levites that killed the passover, v. 20. They joined together in their preparations, that they might help one another, so that all of them were pure, to a man. The purity of ministers adds much to the beauty of their ministrations; so does their unity. 2. Of the proselytes that communicated with them in this ordinance: All such as had separated themselves unto them, had left their country and the superstitions of it and cast in their lot with the Israel of God, and had turned from the filthiness of the heathen of the land, both their idolatries and immoralities, to seek the Lord God of Israel as their God, did eat the passover. 3. Of the great pleasure and satisfaction wherewith they kept the feast of unleavened bread, v. 22. The Lord had made them joyful, had given them both cause to rejoice and hearts to rejoice.

Ezra's precious name at first, in the title of the book, but this chapter introduces him into public action in another reign, that of Artaxerxes. Zerubbabel and Jeshua by this time have grown old, if not gone off; nor do we hear any more of Haggai and Zechariah; they have finished their testimony. What shall become of the cause of God and Israel when these useful instruments are laid aside? Trust God, who has the residue of the Spirit, to raise up others in their room. Ezra here, and Nehemiah in the next book, are as serviceable in their days as those were in theirs. I. An account, in general, of Ezra himself, and of his expedition to Jerusalem for the public good, ver. 1–10. II. A copy of the commission which Artaxerxes gave him, ver. 11–26. III. His thankfulness to God for it, ver. 27, 28.

Verses 1–10

I. Ezra's pedigree. He was one of the sons of Aaron, a priest. Him God chose to be an instrument of good to Israel, that he might put honour upon the priesthood, the glory of which had been much eclipsed by the captivity. He is said to be the son of Seraiah, that Seraiah, as is supposed, whom the king of Babylon put to death when he sacked Jerusalem, 2 Kings xxv. 18, 21. If we take the shortest computation, it was seventy-five years since Seraiah died; many reckon it much longer, and, because they suppose Ezra called out in the prime of his time to public service, therefore think that Seraiah was not his immediate parent, but his grandfather or great-grandfather, 1 Chron. vi. 4, &c.

II. His character. Though of the younger house, his personal qualifications made him very eminent. 1. He was a man of great learning, a scribe, a ready scribe, in the law of Moses, v. 6. He was very much conversant with the scriptures, especially the writings of Moses, had the words ready and was well acquainted with the sense and meaning of them. It is to be feared that learning ran low among the Jews in Babylon; but Ezra was instrumental to revive it. The Jews say that he collected and collated all the copies of the law he could find out, and published an accurate edition of it, with all the prophetical books, historical and poetical, that were given by divine inspiration, and so made up the canon of the Old Testament, with the addition of the prophecies and histories of his own time. Now that prophecy was about to cease it was time to promote scripture-knowledge, Mal. iv. 4. 2. He was a man of great piety and holy zeal (v. 10): He had prepared his heart to seek the law of the Lord, &c. The Chaldeans, among whom he was born and bred, were famed for literature, especially the study of the stars, to which, being a studious man, we may suppose that Ezra was tempted to apply himself. But he got over the temptation; the law of his God was more to him than all the writings of their magicians and astrologers. He sought the law of the Lord, that is, he searched the scriptures, and sought the knowledge of God, of his mind and will. He set it before him as his rule. He set himself to teach Israel the statutes and judgments of that law. He first learned and then taught. He also first did and then taught. He prepared his heart to do all this, or he fixed his heart.

III. His expedition to Jerusalem for the good of his country: He went up from Babylon (v. 6), and, in four months' time, came to Jerusalem, v. 8. 1. How kind the king was to him. He granted him all his request, whatever he desired to put him into a capacity to serve his country. 2. How kind his people were to him. When he went many more went with him, because they would venture to dwell in Jerusalem when he had gone thither. 3. How kind his God was to him. He obtained this favour from his king and country by the good hand of the Lord that was upon him, v. 6, 9.

Verses 11–26

The commission which the Persian emperor granted to Ezra, giving him authority to act for the good of the Jews. The commission runs Artaxerxes, King of kings. This however is too high a title for any mortal man to assume; he was indeed king of some kings, but to speak as if he were king of all kings was to usurp his prerogative who hath all power both in heaven and in earth. He sends greeting to his trusty and well-beloved Ezra, whom he calls a scribe of the law of the God of heaven (v. 12). He reckoned it more his honour to be a scribe of God's law than to be a peer or prince of the empire.

I. He gives Ezra leave to go up to Jerusalem, and as many of his countrymen as pleased to go up with him, v. 13.

II. He gives him authority to enquire into the affairs of Judah and Jerusalem, v. 14. The rule of his enquiry was to be the law of his God, which was in his hand. He must enquire whether the Jews, in their religion, had and did according to that law—whether the temple was built, the priesthood was settled, and the sacrifices were offered conformably to the divine appointment. If he found anything amiss, he must get it amended, and, like Titus in Crete, must set in order the things that were wanting, Titus i. 5. Thus are the Jews restored to their ancient privilege of governing themselves by that law.

III. He entrusts him with the money that was freely given by the king himself and his counsellors, and collected among his subjects, for the service of the house of God, v. 15, 16. Ezra was entrusted, (1) To receive this money and to carry it to Jerusalem. (2) To lay out this money in the best manner, in sacrifices to be offered upon the altar of God (v. 17), and in whatever else he or his brethren thought fit (v. 18), with this limitation only that it should be after the will of their God.

IV. He draws him a bill, or warrant rather, upon the treasurers on that side the river, requiring them to furnish him with what he had occasion for out of the king's revenues, and to place it to the king's account, v. 20, 22. This was considerately done; for Ezra, having yet to enquire into the state of things, knew not what he should have occasion for and was modest in his demand.

V. He charges him to let nothing be wanting that was requisite to be done in or about the temple for the honour of the God of Israel. In this charge (v. 23), 1. How honourably he speaks of God. He had called him before the God of Jerusalem; but here, lest it should be thought that he looked upon him as a local deity, he calls him twice, with great veneration, the God of heaven. 2. How strictly he eyes the word and law of God, which, it is likely, he had read and admired: "Whatsoever is commanded by your God let it be done, let it be diligently done, with care and speed."

VI. He exempts all the ministers of the temple from paying taxes to the government. From the greatest of the priests to the least of the Nethinim, it shall not be lawful for the king's officers to impose that toll, tribute, or custom upon them, which the rest of the king's subjects paid, v. 24.

VII. He empowers Ezra to nominate and appoint judges and magistrates for all the Jews on that side the river, v. 25, 26. It was a great favour to the Jews to have such nobles of themselves, and especially to have them of Ezra's nomination. 1. All that knew the laws of Ezra's God (that is, all that professed the Jewish religion) were to be under the jurisdiction of these judges, which intimates that they were exempted from the jurisdiction of the heathen magistrates. 2. These judges were allowed and encouraged to make proselytes: Let them teach the laws of God to those that do not know them. They were not allowed to make new laws, but must see the laws of God duly executed; and they were entrusted with the sword in order that they might be a terror to evil doers.

Verses 27–28

Two things Ezra blessed God for:—1. For his commission. Blessed be God (says he) that put such a thing as this into the king's heart. God can put things into men's hearts which would not arise there of themselves, and into their heads too, both by his providence and by his grace, in things pertaining both to life and godliness. If any good appear to be in our own hearts, or in the hearts of others, we must own it was God that put it there, and bless him for it. When princes and magistrates act for the suppression of vice, and the encouragement of religion, we must thank God that put it into their hearts to do so. 2. For the encouragement he had in pursuance of his commission (v. 28): He has extended mercy to me. Ezra himself was a man of courage, yet he attributed his encouragement not to his own heart, but to God's hand: "I was strengthened to undertake the services, as the hand of the Lord my God was upon me, to direct and support me."

CHAP. VIII

This chapter gives us a more particular narrative of Ezra's journey to Jerusalem. I. The company that went up with him, ver. 1–20. II. The solemn fast which he kept with his company, to implore God's presence with them in this journey, ver. 21–23. III. The care he took of the treasure he had with him, and the charge he gave concerning it to the priests, to whose custody he committed it, ver. 24–30. IV. The care God took of him and his company in the way, ver. 31. V. Their safe arrival at Jerusalem, where they delivered their treasure to the priests (ver. 32–34), their commissions to the king's lieutenants (ver. 36), and offered sacrifices to God (ver. 35).

Verses 1–20

Ezra, having received his commission from the king, beats up for volunteers, as it were, sets up an ensign to assemble the outcasts of Israel and the dispersed of Judah, Isa. xi. 12. "Whoever of the sons of Sion, that dwell with the daughters of Babylon, is disposed to go to Jerusalem, now that the temple there is finished and the temple-service set a-going, now is their time."

1. Some offered themselves willingly to go with Ezra. The heads of the several families are here named, for their honour, and the numbers of the males that each brought in, amounting in all to 1,496. Several of their families, or clans, here named, we had before, ch. ii.

II. The Levites who went in this company were in a manner pressed into the service. Ezra appointed a general rendezvous of all his company at a certain place upon new-year's day, the first day of the first month, ch. vii. 9. There he mustered them, and found there none of the sons of Levi, v. 15. Some priests there were, but no others that were Levites. Where was the spirit of that sacred tribe? Ezra had money enough for the service of the temple, but wanted men. Eleven men of understanding, he chooses out of his company, to be employed for the filling up of this lamentable vacancy. Ezra sent them to a proper place, where there was a college of Levites, the place Casiphia, probably a street or square in Babylon allowed for that purpose—Silver Street one may call it, for ceseph signifies silver. He sent them to a proper person, to Iddo, the chief president of the college, to urge him to send some of the juniors, ministers for the house of our God, v. 17. Though the warning was short, they brought about forty Levites to attend Ezra. Of the Nethinim, the servitors of the sacred college, more appeared forward to go. Of them 220, upon this hasty summons, enlisted themselves, and had the honour to be expressed by name in Ezra's muster-roll, v. 20.

Ezra has procured Levites, but what will that avail, unless he have God with him?

I. The steadfast confidence he had in God and in his gracious protection. God's servants have his power engaged for them; his enemies have it engaged against them. This Ezra believed with his heart, and with his mouth made confession of it before the king; and therefore he was ashamed to ask of the king a convoy, lest the king, and those about him, suspected either God's power to help his people or Ezra's confidence in that power. Not but that those who depend upon God must use proper means for their preservation, and they need not be ashamed to do so.

II. The solemn application he made to God in that confidence: He proclaimed a fast, v. 21. For public mercies public prayers must be made. Their fasting was, 1. To express their humiliation. This he declares to be the meaning of it, "that we might afflict ourselves before our God for our sins, and so be qualified for the pardon of them." 2. To excite their supplications. Prayer was always joined with religious fasting. Their errand to the throne of grace was to seek of God the right way, that is, to commit themselves to the guidance of the divine Providence, to put themselves under the divine protection, and to beg of God to guide and keep them in their journey and bring them safely to their journey's end.

III. The good success of their doing so (v. 23): We besought our God by joint-prayer, and he was entreated of us.

Verses 24–30

An account of the particular care which Ezra took of the treasure he had with him, that belonged to God's sanctuary, 1. Having committed the keeping of it to God, he committed the keeping of it to proper men, whose business it was to watch it, though without God they would have waked in vain. 2. Having prayed to God to preserve all the substance they had with them, he shows himself especially solicitous for that part of it which belonged to the house of God and was an offering to him. Twelve chief priests, and as many Levites, he appointed to this trust (v. 24, 30). Ezra tells them why he put those things into their hands (v. 28): You are holy unto the Lord, the vessels are holy also; and who so fit to take care of holy things as holy persons? He weighed to them the silver, the gold, and the vessels (v. 25), because he expected to have it from them again by weight. The charge he gave them with these treasures (v. 29): "Watch you, and keep them, that they be not lost, nor embezzled, nor mingled with the other articles. Keep them together; keep them by themselves; keep them safely, till you weigh them in the temple, before the great men there."

Verses 31–36

Ezra goes to Jerusalem, but his multitude made his marches slow and his stages short. His God was good, and he acknowledged his goodness: The hand of our God was upon us. Even the common perils of journeys oblige us to sanctify our going out with prayer and our returns in peace with praise and thanksgiving; much more in such a dangerous expedition as this was. They were brought in safety to their journey's end, v. 32. His companions were devout. As soon as they came to be near the altar they thought themselves obliged to offer sacrifice, whatever they had done in Babylon, v. 35. Among their sacrifices they had a sin-offering; for it is the atonement that sweetens and secures every mercy to us. The number of their offerings related to the number of the tribes, twelve bullocks, twelve he-goats, and ninety-six rams, intimating the union of the two kingdoms, according to what was foretold, Ezek. xxxvii. 22. They did not any longer go two tribes one way and ten another, but all the twelve met by their respresentatives at the same altar. Even the enemies of the Jews became their friends, bowed to Ezra's commission, and, instead of hindering the people of God, furthered them (v. 36).

CHAP. IX

Now that Ezra presided their enemies had either their hearts turned or at least their hands tied; their neighbours were civil, and we hear of no wars nor rumours of wars; all was as well as could be, considering that they were few, and poor, and subjects to a foreign prince. Look at home; nothing of Baal, nor Ashtaroth, nor Moloch, no images, nor groves, nor golden calves, no, nor so much as high places, but the temple was duly respected and the temple service carefully kept up. Yet all was not well. I. A complaint brought to Ezra of the many marriages that had been made with strange wives, ver. 1, 2. II. The great trouble which he, and others influenced by his example, were in upon this information, ver. 3, 4. III. The solemn confession which he made of this sin to God, ver. 5–15.

Verses 1–4

Ezra saw nothing amiss, but information is brought him that many of the people, and some of the rulers, had married wives out of heathen families, and joined themselves in affinity with strangers.

I. The sin was mingling with the people of those lands (v. 2), associating with them both in trade and in conversation, and taking their daughters in marriages to their sons. They disobeyed the express command of God, which forbade all intimacy with the heathen, and particularly in matrimonial contracts, Deut. vii. 3. They exposed themselves, and much more their children, to the peril of idolatry, the very sin that had once been the ruin of their nation.

II. The persons that were guilty of this sin, not only some of the unthinking people of Israel, that knew no better, but many of the priests and Levites, whose office it was to teach the law, and in whom it was a greater crime. Miserable is the case of that people whose leaders debauch them and cause them to err.

III. The information was given to Ezra. It was given by the princes, those of them that had kept their integrity and with it their dignity. They applied to Ezra, hoping that his wisdom, authority, and interest would prevail.

IV. The impression this made upon Ezra (v. 3): He rent his clothes, plucked off his hair, and sat down astonished. It grieved him to the heart to think that a people called by God's name should so grossly violate his law. Sorrow for sin must be great sorrow; such Ezra's was, as for an only son or a first-born.

V. The influence which Ezra's grief for this had upon others. Public notice was soon taken of it, and all the devout serious people that were at hand assembled themselves to him. All good people ought to own those that appear and act in the cause of God against vice and profaneness, to stand by them, and do what they can to strengthen their hands.

A most pathetic address Ezra makes to Heaven upon this occasion.

I. He made this address—at the evening sacrifice, v. 5. Then devout people used to come into the courts of the temple to offer up their own prayers. In their hearing Ezra chose to make this confession, that they might be made duly sensible of the sins of their people. The sacrifice, and especially the evening sacrifice, was a type of the great propitiation. Ezra had faith in this penitential address to God; he makes confession with his hand, as it were, upon the head of that great sacrifice, through which we receive the atonement.

II. His preparation for this address. 1. He rose up from his heaviness, and so far shook off the burden of his grief as was necessary to the lifting up of his heart to God. 2. He fell upon his knees, put himself into the posture of a penitent, representing the people for whom he was now an intercessor. 3. He spread out his hands, as one affected with what he was going to say, offering it up unto God.

III. The address itself. If we give prayer its full latitude, it is the offering up of pious and devout affections to God. His address is a penitent confession of sin, not his own, but the sin of his people. Though he himself was wholly clear from this guilt, yet he puts himself into the number of the sinners, because he was a member of the same community—our sins and our trespass. He owns their sins to have been very great: "Our iniquities are increased over our heads (v. 6); we are ready to perish in them as in deep waters." But let this be the comfort of true penitents that though their sins reach to the heavens God's mercy is in the heavens, Ps. xxxvi. 5. They were not forsaken in their bondage, but even in Babylon had the tokens of God's presence,—they were a remnant of Israelites left, a few out of many, and those narrowly escaped out of the hands of their enemies, by the favour of the kings of Persia. They had a nail in his holy place, that is (as it is explained, v. 9), that they had set up the house of God. They had their religion settled and the service of the temple in a constant method. This enlightened their eyes and revived their hearts; it was life from the dead to them. "Now," says Ezra, "how ungrateful are we to offend a God that has been so kind to us!" The sin was against an express command: We have forsaken thy commandments, v. 10. Gen. xxxiv. 14. But, besides that, God had strictly forbidden it. He recites the command, v. 11, 12. Nothing could be more express: Give not your daughters to their sons, nor take their daughters to your sons. The reason given is because, if they mingled with those nations, they would pollute themselves. It was an unclean land, and they were a holy people. Ezra, in a penitential sense of the great malignity that was in their sin, acknowledged that, though the punishment was very great, it was less than they deserved. He speaks as one much ashamed. With this he begins (v. 6), O my God! I am ashamed and blush, O my God! to lift up my face unto thee. Sin is a shameful thing. Holy shame is as necessary an ingredient in true and ingenuous repentance as holy sorrow. The sins of others should be our shame, and we should blush for those who do not blush for themselves. The publican, when he went to the temple to pray, hung down his head more than ever, as one ashamed, Luke xviii. 13. True penitents are at a loss what to say. Shall we say, We have not sinned, or, God will not require it? If we do, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. Shall we say, Have patience with us and we will pay thee all, with thousands of rams, or our first-born for our transgression? God will not thus be mocked: he knows we are insolvent. Shall we say, There is no hope, and let come on us what will? That is but to make bad worse. True penitents should, as Ezra, beg of God to teach them. What shall we say? Say, "I have sinned; I have done foolishly; God be merciful to me a sinner;" and the like. See Hos. xiv. 2. He speaks as one much assured of the righteousness of God. "Thou art righteous, wise, just, and good; thou wilt neither do us wrong nor be hard upon us; and therefore behold we are before thee, we lie at thy feet, waiting our doom; we cannot stand before thee, insisting upon any righteousness of our own, having no plea to support us and therefore we fall down before thee, in our trespass, and cast ourselves on thy mercy. Do unto us whatsoever seemeth good unto thee, Judges x. 15. We have nothing to say, nothing to do, but to make supplication to our Judge," Job ix. 15. Thus does this good man lay his grief before God and then leave it with him.

CHAP. X

That grievance redressed which was lamented in the foregoing chapter. I. How the people's hearts were prepared for the redress of it, ver. 1. II. How it was proposed to Ezra by Shechaniah, ver. 2–4. III. How the proposal was put in execution. 1. The great men were sworn to stand to it, ver. 5. 2. Ezra appeared first in it, ver. 6. 3. A general assembly was called, ver. 7–9. 4. They all, in compliance with Ezra's exhortation, agreed to the reformation, ver. 10–14. 5. Commissioners were appointed to enquire who had married strange wives and to oblige them to put them away, which was done accordingly (ver. 15–17), and a list of the names of those that were found guilty given in, ver. 18–44.

Verses 1–5

I. What good impressions were made upon the people by Ezra's humiliation and confession of sin. No sooner was it noised in the city that their new governor, in whom they rejoiced, was himself in grief, for them and their sin, than presently there assembled to him a very great congregation, to mingle their tears with him, v. 1. See what a happy influence the good examples of great ones may have upon their inferiors. When Ezra, a scribe, a scholar, a man in authority under the king, so deeply lamented the public corruptions, they concluded that they were indeed very grievous.

II. What a good motion Shechaniah made upon this occasion. The place was Bochim—a place of weepers; but, for aught that appears, there was a profound silence among them till Shechaniah (one of Ezra's companions from Babylon, ch. viii. 3, 5) stood up, and made a speech addressed to Ezra, in which he owns the national guilt, sums up all Ezra's confession in one word, and sets to his seal that it is true: "We have trespassed against God, and have taken strange wives," v. 2. It does not appear that Shechaniah was himself culpable in this matter, but his father was guilty, and several of his father's house (as appears v. 26), and therefore he reckons himself among the trespassers. Now there is hope; now that the disease is discovered it is half-cured. The sin that truly troubles us shall not ruin us. The case is plain; what has been done amiss must be undone again as far as possible. Let us put away all the wives, and such as are born of them, v. 3. Ezra despaired of ever bringing the people to it, but Shechaniah, who conversed more with the people than he did, assured him the thing was practicable if they went wisely to work. As to the case of being unequally yoked with unbelievers, Shechaniah's counsel will not hold now; such marriages, it is certain, are sinful, and ought not to be made, but they are not null. Quod fieri non debuit, factum valet—That which ought not to have been done must, when done, abide. Our rule, under the gospel is, If a brother has a wife that believeth not, and she be pleased to dwell with him, let him not put her away, 1 Cor. vii. 12, 13. Shechaniah said to Ezra and the people: Let us covenant, not only that, if we have strange wives ourselves, we will put them away, but that, if we have not, we will do what we can in our places to oblige others to put away theirs.

Verses 6–14

An account of the proceedings concerning the strange wives. Ezra sent orders to all the children of the captivity to attend him at Jerusalem within three days (v. 7, 8). Within the time limited the generality of the people met at Jerusalem and made their appearance in the street of the house of God, v. 9. Ezra gave the charge at this great assize. He found that since their return out of captivity they had increased the trespass of Israel by marrying strange wives, which would certainly be a means of again introducing idolatry. He called them together that they might confess their sin to God, and that they might separate themselves from all idolaters, especially idolatrous wives, v. 10, 11. The people submitted not only to Ezra's jurisdiction in general, but to his inquisition and determination in this matter: "As thou hast said, so must we do," v. 12.

Verses 15–44

The congregation dismissed, that each in his respective place might gain and give intelligence to facilitate the matter. The commissioners that sat upon this matter. Ezra was president, and with him certain chief men of the fathers who were qualified with wisdom and zeal above others for this service, v. 16. They began the first day of the tenth month to examine the matter (v. 16), which was but ten days after this method was proposed (v. 9), and they finished in three months, v. 17. About 113 in all are here named who had married strange wives, and some of them, it is said (v. 44), had children by them, which implies that not many of them had, God not crowning those marriages with the blessing of increase. Whether the children were turned off with the mothers, as Shechaniah proposed, does not appear; it should seem not: however, it is probable that the wives which were put away were well provided for, according to their rank.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE BOOK OF NEHEMIAH

This book continues the history of the children of the captivity, the poor Jews, that had lately returned out of Babylon to their own land. At this time not only the Persian monarchy flourished in great pomp and power, but Greece and Rome began to make a figure. Of the affairs of those high and mighty states we have authentic accounts extant; but the sacred and inspired history takes cognizance only of the state of the Jews. Ezra the scribe and Nehemiah the tirshatha, though neither of them ever wore a crown, commanded an army, conquered any country, or was famed for philosophy or oratory, yet both of them, being pious praying men, and very serviceable in their day to the interests of religion, were really greater men and more honourable, not only than any of the Roman consuls or dictators, but than Xenophon, or Demosthenes, or Plato himself, who lived at the same time, the bright ornaments of Greece. Nehemiah's agency for the advancing of the settlement of Israel we have a full account of in this book, wherein he records not only the works of his hands, but the workings of his heart, in the management of public affairs. Twelve years, from his twentieth year (ch. i. 1) to his thirty-second year (ch. xiii. 6), he was governor of Judæa, under Artaxerxes king of Persia, whom Dr. Lightfoot supposes to be the same Artaxerxes as Ezra had his commission from. This book relates, I. Nehemiah's concern for Jerusalem and the commission he obtained from the king to go thither, ch. i., ii. II. His building the wall of Jerusalem notwithstanding the opposition he met with, ch. iii., iv. III. His redressing the grievances of the people, ch. v. IV. His finishing the wall, ch. vi. V. The account he took of the people, ch. vii. VI. The religious solemnities of reading the law, fasting, and praying, and renewing their covenants, to which he called the people, ch. viii.–x. VII. The care he took for the replenishing of the holy city and the settling of the holy tribe, ch. xi., xii. VIII. His zeal in reforming various abuses, ch. xiii. Some call this the second book of Ezra, not because he was the penman of it, but because it is a continuation of the history of the foregoing book, with which it is connected, v. 1. This was the last historical book that was written, as Malachi was the last prophetical book, of the Old Testament.

CHAP. I

Nehemiah at the Persian court, I. Inquisitive concerning the state of the Jews and Jerusalem, ver. 1, 2. II. Informed of their deplorable condition, ver. 3. III. Fasting and praying thereupon (ver. 4), with a particular account of his prayer, ver. 5–11.

Verses 1–4

I. Nehemiah's station at the court of Persia. He was in Shushan the palace, or royal city, of the king of Persia, where the court was ordinarily kept (v. 1), and (v. 11) he was the king's cup-bearer. By this place at court he would be the bettter qualified for the service of his country in that post for which God had designed him, as Moses was the fitter to govern for being bred up in Pharaoh's court, and David in Saul's. He would also have the fairer opportunity of serving his country by his interest in the king and those about him. God has his remnant in all places; we read of Obadiah in the house of Ahab, saints in Cæsar's household, and a devout Nehemiah in Shushan the palace. God can make the courts of princes sometimes nurseries and sometimes sanctuaries to the friends and patrons of the church's cause.

II. Nehemiah's tender and compassionate enquiry concerning the state of the Jews in their own land, v. 2. It happened that a friend and relation of his came to the court, with some other company, by whom he had an opportunity of informing himself fully how it went with the children of the captivity and what posture Jerusalem, the beloved city, was in. Nehemiah lived at ease, in honour and fulness, himself, but could not forget that he was an Israelite, nor shake off the thoughts of his brethren in distress, but in spirit (like Moses, Acts vii. 23) he visited them and looked upon their burdens. Though he was a great man yet he did not think it below him to take cognizance of his brethren that were low and despised, nor was he ashamed to own his relation to them and concern for them. Though he did not go to settle at Jerusalem himself he did not therefore judge nor despise those that had returned.

III. The melancholy account which is here given him of the present state of the Jews and Jerusalem, v. 3. Hanani, the person he enquired of, has this character given of him (ch. vii. 2), that he feared God above many, and therefore would not only speak truly, but, when he spoke of the desolations of Jerusalem, would speak tenderly. It is probable that his errand to court at this time was to solicit some favour, some relief or other, that they stood in need of. Now the account he gives is, 1. That the holy seed was miserably trampled on and abused, in great affliction and reproach, insulted upon all occasions by their neighbours, and filled with the scorning of those that were at ease. 2. That the holy city was exposed and in ruins. The wall of Jerusalem was still broken down, and the gates were, as the Chaldeans left them, in ruins. This made the condition of the inhabitants both very despicable under the abiding marks of poverty and slavery, and very dangerous, for their enemies might when they pleased make an easy prey of them. The temple was built, the government settled, and a work of reformation brought to some head, but here was one good work yet undone; this was still wanting.

IV. The great affliction this gave to Nehemiah and the deep concern it put him into, v. 4. 1. He wept and mourned. 2. He fasted and prayed.

Verses 5–11

Nehemiah's prayer, a prayer that has reference to all the prayers which he had for some time before been putting up to God day and night, while he continued his sorrows for the desolations of Jerusalem, and withal to the petition he was now intending to present to the king his master for his favour to Jerusalem.

I. His humble and reverent address to God. It teaches us to draw near to God, 1. With a holy awe of his majesty and glory, remembering that he is the God of heaven, infinitely above us, infinitely excelling all the principalities and powers both of the upper and of the lower world, angels and kings. 2. With a holy confidence in his grace and truth, for he keepeth covenant and mercy for those that love him, not only the mercy that is promised, but even more than he promised.

II. His general request for the audience and acceptance of all the prayers and confessions he now made to God (v. 6): "Let thy ear be attentive to the prayer, which I pray before thee."

III. His penitent confession of sin; not only Israel has sinned but I and my father's house have sinned, v. 6.

IV. The pleas he urges for mercy for his people Israel.

1. He pleads what God had of old said to them. He had said indeed that, if they broke covenant with him, he would scatter them among the nations, and that threatening was fulfilled in their captivity: never was people so widely dispersed as Israel was at this time, though at first so closely incorporated; but he had said withal that if they turned to him (as now they began to do, having renounced idolatry and kept to the temple service) he would gather them again. This he quotes from Deut. xxx. 1–5, and begs leave to put God in mind of it (though the Eternal Mind needs no remembrancer) as that which he guided his desires by, and grounded his faith and hope upon, in praying this prayer. If God were not more mindful of his promises than we are of his precepts we should be undone. Our best pleas therefore in prayer are those that are taken from the promise of God, the word on which he has caused us to hope, Ps. cxix. 49.

2. He pleads the relation wherein of old they stood to God: "These are thy servants and thy people (v. 10), whom thou hast set apart for thyself, and taken into covenant with thee. Wilt thou suffer thy sworn enemies to trample upon and oppress thy sworn servants? If thou wilt not appear for thy people, whom wilt thou appear for?" See Isa. lxiii. 19. As an evidence of their being God's servants he gives them this character (v. 11): "They desire to fear thy name; they are not only called by thy name, but really have a reverence for thy name; they now worship thee, and thee only, according to thy will, and have an awe of all the discoveries thou art pleased to make of thyself; this they have a desire to do."

3. He pleads the great things God had formerly done for them (v. 10).

Lastly, He concludes with a particular petition, that God would prosper him in his undertaking, and give him favour with the king. Mercy in the sight of this man is what he prays for, meaning not the king's mercy, but mercy from God in his address to the king. Favour with men is then comfortable when we can see it springing from the mercy of God.

CHAP. II

How Nehemiah wrestled with God and prevailed we read in the foregoing chapter; now here we are told how, like Jacob, he prevailed with men also, and so found that his prayers were heard and answered. I. He prevailed with the king to send him to Jerusalem with a commission to build a wall about it, and grant him what was necessary for it, ver. 1–8. II. He prevailed against the enemies that would have obstructed him in his journey (ver. 9–11) and laughed him out of his undertaking, ver. 19, 20. III. He prevailed upon his own people to join with him in this good work, viewing the desolations of the walls (ver. 12–16) and then gaining them to lend every one a hand towards the rebuilding of them, ver. 17, 18.

Verses 1–8

Nehemiah had prayed for the relief of his countrymen. Nearly four months passed, from Chisleu to Nisan (from November to March), before Nehemiah made his application to the king for leave to go to Jerusalem, either because the winter was not a proper time for such a journey, or because it was so long before his month of waiting came, and there was no coming into the king's presence uncalled, Esther iv. 11. Now that he attended the king's table he hoped to have his ear.

I. The occasion which he gave the king to enquire into his cares and griefs, by appearing sad in his presence. He took up the wine and gave it to the king when he called for it, expecting that then he would look him in the face. He had not used to be sad in the king's presence, but conformed to the rules of the court (as courtiers must do), which would admit no sorrows, Esther iv. 2. Good men should do what they can by their cheerfulness to convince the world of the pleasantness of religious ways and to roll away the reproach cast upon them as melancholy; but there is a time for all things, Eccles. iii. 4. Nehemiah now saw cause both to be sad and to appear. so. The miseries of Jerusalem gave him cause to be sad, and his showing his grief would give occasion to the king to enquire into the cause.

II. The kind notice which the king took of his sadness and the enquiry he made into the cause of it (v. 2): Why is thy countenance sad, seeing thou art not sick?

III. The account which Nehemiah gave the king of the cause of his sadness, which he gave with meekness and fear. He modestly asked, "Why should not my countenance be sad as it is when the city, the place of my fathers' sepulchres, lieth waste?" He assigns the ruins of Jerusalem as the true cause of his grief.

IV. The encouragement which the king gave him to tell his mind, and the application he thereupon made in his heart to God, v. 4. The king had an affection for him, and was not pleased to see him melancholy. It is also probable that he had a kindness for the Jews' religion; he had discovered it before in the commission he gave to Ezra, who was a churchman, and now again in the power he put Nehemiah into, who was a statesman. Wanting therefore only to know how he might be serviccable to Jerusalem, he asks this its anxious friend, "For what dost thou make request? Something thou wouldst have; what is it?" Nehemiah immediately prayed to the God of heaven that he would give him wisdom to ask properly and incline the king's heart to grant him his request. It was a secret sudden ejaculation; he lifted up his heart to that God who understands the language of his heart: Lord, give me a mouth and wisdom; Lord, give me favour in the sight of this man.

V. His humble petition to the king. He asked for a commission to go as governor to Judah, to build the wall of Jerusalem. He also asked for a convoy (v. 7), and an order upon the governors, not only to permit and suffer him to pass through their respective provinces, but to supply him with what he had occasion for, with another order upon the keeper of the forest of Lebanon to give him timber for the work that he designed.

VI. The king's great favour to him in asking him when he would return, v. 6. He intimated that he was unwilling to lose him. He would spare him awhile, and let him have what clauses he pleased inserted in his commission, v. 8. Here was an immediate answer to his prayer. In the account he gives of the success of his petition he takes notice, 1. Of the presence of the queen; she sat by (v. 6), which (they say) was not usual in the Persian court, Esther i. 11. 2. Of the power and grace of God. He gained his point according to the good hand of his God upon him.

Verses 9–20

I. How Nehemiah was dismissed by the court he was sent from. The king appointed captains of the army and horsemen to go with him (v. 9), both for his guard and to show that he was a man whom the king did delight to honour, that all the king's servants might respect him accordingly.

II. How he was received by the country he was sent to.

1. By the Jews and their friends at Jerusalem.

(1) While he concealed his errand they took little notice of him. He was at Jerusalem three days (v. 11), and it does not appear that any of the great men of the city waited on him to congratulate him on his arrival, but he remained unknown.

(2) Though they took little notice of him he took great notice of them and their state. He arose in the night, and viewed the ruins of the walls, probably by moonlight (v. 13), that he might see what was to be done and in what method they must go about it, whether the old foundation would serve, and what there was of the old materials that would be of use. Those that would build up the church's walls must first take notice of the ruins of those walls. Those that would know how to amend must enquire what is amiss, what needs reformation, and what may serve as it is.

(3) When he disclosed his design to the rulers and people they cheerfully concurred with him in it. He did not tell them, at first, what he came about (v. 16), because he would not seem to do it for ostentation, and because, if he found it impracticable, he might retreat the more honourably. But when he had viewed and considered the thing, and probably felt the pulse of the rulers and people, he told them what God had put into his heart (v. 12), even to build up the wall of Jerusalem, v. 17. "Come, therefore, and let us build up the wall." He did not undertake to do the work without them (it could not be the work of one man), nor did he charge or command imperiously, though he had the king's commission; but in a friendly brotherly way he exhorted and excited them to join with him in this work. To encourage them hereto, he speaks of the design, First, As that which owed its origin to the special grace of God. He takes not the praise of it to himself, as a good thought of his own, but acknowledges that God put it into his heart. Secondly, As that which owed its progress hitherto to the special providence of God. He produced the king's commission, told them how readily it was granted and how forward the king was to favour his design, in which he saw the hand of his God good upon him. They presently came to a resolution, one and all, to concur with him: Let us rise up and build. So they strengthened their hands, their own and one another's, for this good work. Many a good work would find hands enough to be laid to it if there were but one good head to lead in it.

2. By those that wished ill to the Jews. Sanballat and Tobiah, two of the Samaritans, but by birth the former a Moabite, the latter an Ammonite, when they saw one come armed with a commission from the king to do service to Israel, were exceedingly grieved that all their little paltry arts to weaken Israel were thus baffled and frustrated by a fair, and noble, and generous project to strengthen them. When they saw a man come in that manner, who professedly sought the welfare of the children of Israel, it vexed them to the heart. When he began to act they set themselves to hinder him, but in vain, v. 19, 20. With what good reason the Jews slighted these discouragements. They bore up themselves with this that they were the servants of the God of heaven, the only true and living God, that they were acting for him in what they did, and that therefore he would bear them out and prosper them, though the heathen raged, Ps. ii. 1.

CHAP. III

Saying and doing are often two things: many are ready to say, "Let us rise up and build," who sit still and do nothing, like that fair-spoken son who said, "I go, Sir, but went not." The undertakers here were none of those. As soon as they had resolved to build the wall about Jerusalem they lost no time, but set about it. This chapter gives an account of two things:—I. The names of the builders which are recorded here to their honour, for they were such as herein discovered a great zeal for God and their country. II. The order of the building; they took it before them, and ended where they began. They repaired, 1. From the sheep-gate to the fish-gate, ver. 1, 2. 2. Thence to the old-gate, ver. 3–5. 3. Thence to the valley-gate, ver. 6–12. 4. Thence to the dung-gate, ver. 13, 14. 5. Thence to the gate of the fountain, ver. 15. 6. Thence to the water-gate, ver. 16–26. 7. Thence by the horse-gate to the sheep-gate again, where they began (ver 27 32), and so they brought their work quite round the city.

Verses 1–32

Several things are observable in the account here given of the buildings of the wall about Jerusalem:—

I. That Eliashib the high priest, with his brethren the priests, led the van in this troop of builders, v. 1. If there be labour in it, who so fit as they to work? if danger, who so fit as they to venture? The priests repaired the sheep-gate, so called because through it were brought the sheep that were to be sacrificed in the temple; and therefore the priests undertook the repair of it because the offerings of the Lord made by fire were their inheritance. And of this gate only it is said that they sanctified it with the word and prayer.

II. That the undertakers were very many, who each took his share, some more and some less, in this work, according as their ability was.

III. That many were active in this work who were not themselves inhabitants of Jerusalem, and therefore consulted purely the public welfare and not any private interest or advantage of their own. Here are the men of Jericho with the first (v. 2), the men of Gibeon and Mizpah (v. 7), and Zanoah, v. 13. Every Israelite should lend a hand towards the building up of Jerusalem.

IV. That several rulers, both of Jerusalem and of other cities, were active in this work, thinking themselves bound in honour to do the utmost that their wealth and power enabled them to do for the furtherance of this good work.

V. Here is a just reproach fastened upon the nobles of Tekoa, that they put not their necks to the work of their Lord (v. 5), that is, they would not come under the yoke of an obligation to this service; as if the dignity and liberty of their peerage were their discharge from serving God and doing good.

VI. Two persons joined in repairing the old gate (v. 6), and so were co-founders, and shared the honour of it between them. The good work which we cannot compass ourselves we must be thankful to those that will go partners with us in. Some think that this is called the old gate because it belonged to the ancient Salem, which was said to be first built by Melchizedek.

VII. Several good honest tradesmen, as well as priests and rulers, were active in this work—goldsmiths, apothecaries, merchants, v. 8, 32. They did not think their callings excused them, nor plead that they could not leave their shops to attend the public business, knowing that what they lost would certainly be made up to them by the blessing of God upon their callings.

VIII. Some ladies are spoken of as helping forward this work—Shallum and his daughters (v. 12), who, though not capable of personal service, yet having their portions in their own hands, or being rich widows, contributed money for buying materials and paying workmen. St. Paul speaks of some good women that laboured with him in the gospel, Phil. iv. 3.

IX. Of some it is said that they repaired over against their houses (v. 10, 23, 28, 29), and of one (who, it is likely, was only a lodger) that he repaired over against his chamber, v. 30. When a general good work is to be done each should apply himself to that part of it that falls nearest to him and is within his reach. If every one will sweep before his own door, the street will be clean; if everyone will mend one, we shall be all mended. If he that has but a chamber will repair before that, he does his part.

X. Of one it is said that he earnestly repaired that which fell to his share (v. 20). It is good to be thus zealously affected in a good thing; and it is probable that this good man's zeal provoked very many to take the more pains and make the more haste.

XI. Of one of these builders it is observed that he was the sixth son of his father, v. 30. His five elder brethren, it seems, laid not their hands to this work, but he did. In doing that which is good we need not stay to see our elders go before us; if they decline it, it does not therefore follow that we must. Thus the younger brother, if he be the better man, and does God and his generation better service, is indeed the better gentleman; those are most honourable that are most useful.

XII. Some of those that had first done helped their fellows, and undertook another share where they saw there was most need. Meremoth repaired, v. 4 and again, v. 21. And the Tekoites, besides the piece they repaired (v. 5), undertook another piece (v. 27), which is the more remarkable because their nobles set them a bad example by withdrawing from the service, which, instead of serving them for an excuse to sit still, perhaps made them the more forward to do double work, that by their zeal they might either shame or atone for the covetousness and carelessness of their nobles.

Lastly, Here is no mention of any particular share that Nehemiah himself had in this work. A namesake of his is mentioned, v. 16. But did he do nothing? Yes, though he undertook not any particular piece of the wall, yet he did more than any of them, for he had the oversight of them all; half of his servants worked where there was most need, and the other half stood sentinel, as we find afterwards (ch. iv. 16), while he himself in his own person walked the rounds, directed and encouraged the builders, set his hand to the work where he saw occasion, and kept a watchful eye upon the motions of the enemy, as we shall find in the next chapter. The pilot need not haul at a rope; it is enough for him to steer.

CHAP. IV

We left all hands at work for the building of the wall about Jerusalem. But such good work is not wont to be carried on without opposition; now here we are told what opposition was given to it, and what methods Nehemiah took to forward the work, notwithstanding that opposition. I. Their enemies reproached and ridiculed their undertaking, but their scoffs they answered with prayers: they heeded them not, but went on with their work notwithstanding, ver. 1–6. II. They formed a bloody design against them, to hinder them by force of arms, ver. 7, 8, 10–12. To guard against this Nehemiah prayed (ver. 9), set guards (ver. 13), and encouraged them to fight (ver. 14), by which the design was broken (ver. 15), and so the work was carried on with all needful precaution against a surprise, ver. 16–23.

Verses 1–6

Here is, I. The spiteful scornful reflection which Sanballat and Tobiah cast upon the Jews for their attempt to build the wall about Jerusalem. The intelligence was brought to Samaria, that nest of enemies to the Jews, and here we are told how they received the tidings. 1. In heart. They were very angry at the undertaking, and had great indignation, v. 1. It vexed them that Nehemiah came to seek the welfare of the children of Israel (ch. ii. 10); but, when they heard of this great undertaking for their good, they were out of all patience. 2. In word. They despised it, and made it the subject of their ridicule. "These feeble Jews" (v. 2), "what will they do for materials? Will they revive the stones out of the rubbish? And what mean they by being so hasty? Do they think to make the walling of a city but one day's work, and to keep the feast of dedication with sacrifice the next day? Poor silly people! See how ridiculous they made themselves!" "If a fox go up, not with his subtlety, but with his weight, he will break down their stone wall."

II. Nehemiah's humble and devout address to God when he heard of these reflections. He did not answer these fools according to their folly; he did not upbraid them with their weakness, but looked up to God by prayer.

1. He begs of God to take notice of the indignities that were done them (v. 4), and in this we are to imitate him: Hear, O our God! for we are despised.

2. He begs of God to avenge their cause and turn the reproach upon the enemies themselves (v. 4, 5); and this was spoken rather by a spirit of prophecy than by a spirit of prayer, and is not to be imitated by us who are taught of Christ to pray for those that despitefully use and persecute us. Christ himself prayed for those that reproached him: Father, forgive them.

III. The vigour of the builders, notwithstanding these reflections, v. 6. They made such good speed that in a little time they had run up the wall to half its height, for the people had a mind to work; their hearts were upon it, and they would have it forwarded.

I. The conspiracy which the Jews' enemies formed against them, to stay the building by slaying the builders. The conspirators were not only Sanballat and Tobiah, but other neighbouring people whom they had drawn into the plot. They were very wroth. Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce, and their wrath, for it was cruel. Nothing would serve but they would fight against Jerusalem, v. 8. Why, what quarrel had they with the Jews? They hated the Jews' piety, and were therefore vexed at their prosperity and sought their ruin. The hindering of good work is that which bad men aim at and promise themselves; but good work is God's work, and it shall prosper.

II. The discouragements which the builders themselves laboured under. At the very time when the adversaries said, Let us cause the work to cease, Judah said, "Let us even let it fall, for we are not able to go forward with it," v. 10. They represent the labourers as tired, and the remaining difficulties, even of that first part of their work, the removing of the rubbish, as insuperable, and therefore they think it advisable to desist for the present. Active leading men have many times as much ado to grapple with the fears of their friends as with the terrors of their enemies.

III. The information that was brought to Nehemiah of the enemies' designs, v. 12. There were Jews that dwelt by them, in the country, who, though they had not zeal enough to bring them to Jerusalem to help their brethren in building the wall, yet, having by their situation opportunity to discover the enemies' motions, had so much honesty and affection to the cause as to give intelligence of them; nay, that their intelligence might be the more credited, they came themselves to give it, and they said it ten times, repeating it as men in earnest, and under a concern, and the report was confirmed by many witnesses. "Whatever place you turn to, they are against us, so that you have need to be upon your guard on all sides."

IV. The pious and prudent methods which Nehemiah, hereupon, took to baffle the design, and to secure his work and workmen.

1. It is said (v. 14) he looked. (1) He looked up, engaged God for him, and put himself and his cause under the divine protection (v. 9): We made our prayer unto our God. That was the way of this good man, and should be our way; all his cares, all his griefs, all his fears, he spread before God, and thereby made himself easy. This was the first thing he did; before he used any means, he made his prayer to God, for with him we must always begin. (2) He looked about him. Having prayed, he set a watch against them. The instructions Christ has given us in our spiritual warfare agree with this example, Matt. xxvi. 41. Watch and pray. If we think to secure ourselves by prayer only, without watchfulness, we are slothful and tempt God; if by watchfulness, without prayer, we are proud and slight God; and, either way, we forfeit his protection.

2. Observe, (1) How he posted the guards, v. 13. In the lower places he set them behind the wall, that they might annoy the enemy over it, as a breast-work; but in the higher places, where the wall was raised to its full height, he set them upon it, that from the top of it they might throw down stones or darts upon the heads of the assailants: he set them after their families, that mutual relation might engage them to mutual assistance. (2) How he animated and encouraged the people, v. 14. "Come," says he, "be not afraid of them, but behave yourselves valiantly, considering, [1] Whom you fight under. You cannot have a better captain: Remember the Lord, who is great and terrible; you think your enemies great and terrible, but what are they in comparison with God, especially in opposition to him? He is great above them to control them, and will be terrible to them when he comes to reckon with them." The reigning fear of God is the best antidote against the ensnaring fear of man.

V. The disappointment which this gave to the enemies, v. 15. When they found that their design was discovered, and that the Jews were upon their guard, they concluded that it was to no purpose to attempt anything, but that God had brought their counsel to nought. They knew they could not gain their point but by surprise, and, if their plot was known, it was quashed. The Jews hereupon returned everyone to his work, with so much the more cheerfulness because they saw plainly that God owned it and owned them in the doing of it.

When the builders had so far reason to think the design of the enemies broken as to return to their work, yet they were not so secure as to lay down their arms. 1. While one half were at work, the other half were under their arms, holding spears, and shields, and bows, not only for themselves but for the labourers too, who would immediately quit their work, and betake themselves to their weapons, upon the first alarm, v. 16. Thus dividing their time between the trowels and the spears they are said to work with one hand and hold their weapons with the other (v. 17), which cannot be understood literally, for the work would require both hands; but it intimates that they were equally employed in both. 2. Every builder had a sword by his side (v. 18). which he could carry without hindering his labour. The word of God is the sword of the Spirit, which we ought to have always at hand and never to seek, both in our labours and in our conflicts as Christians. 3. Care was taken both to get and give early notice of the approach of the enemy, in case they should endeavour to surprise them. Nehemiah kept a trumpeter always by him to sound an alarm upon the first intimation of danger. The work was large, and the builders were dispersed; for in all parts of the wall they were labouring at the same time. Nehemiah continually walked round to oversee the work and encourage the workmen. When they acted as workmen, it was requisite they should be dispersed wherever there was work to do; but when as soldiers it was requisite they should come into close order, and be found in a body. Thus should the labourers in Christ's building be ready to unite against a common foe. 4. The inhabitants of the villages were ordered to lodge within Jerusalem, with their servants, not only that they might be the nearer to their work in the morning, but that they might be ready to help in case of an attack in the night, v. 22. 5. Nehemiah himself, and all his men, kept closely to their business. The spears were held up, with the sight of them to terrify the enemy, not only from sun to sun, but from twilight to twilight every day, v. 21.

CHAP. V

How bravely Nehemiah, as a wise and faithful governor, stood upon his guard against the attacks of enemies abroad, we read in the foregoing chapter. Here we have him no less bold and active to redress grievances at home, and, having kept them from being destroyed by their enemies, to keep them from destroying one another. I. The complaint which the poor made to him of the great hardships which the rich (of whom they were forced to borrow money) put upon them, ver. 1–5. II. The effectual course which Nehemiah took both to reform the oppressors and to relieve the oppressed, ver. 6–13. III. The good example which he himself, as governor, set them of compassion and tenderness, ver. 14–19.

Verses 1–5

Hard times and hard hearts made the poor miserable.

I. The times they lived in were hard. There was a dearth of corn (v. 3), probably for want of rain. When the markets are high, and provisions scarce and dear, the poor soon feel from it, and are pinched by it. That which made the scarcity here complained of the more grievous was that their sons and their daughters were many, v. 2. The families that were most necessitous were most numerous. As corn was dear, so the taxes were high; the king's tribute must be paid, v. 4. This mark of their captivity still remained upon them. Now, it seems, they had not wherewithal of their own to buy corn and pay taxes, but were necessitated to borrow. Their families came poor out of Babylon; they had been at great expense in building them houses, and had not yet got up their strength, when these new burdens came upon them.

II. The persons they dealt with were hard. Money must be had, but it must be borrowed; and those that lent them money, taking advantage of their necessity, were very hard upon them. 1. They exacted interest from them at twelve per cent, the hundredth part every month, v. 11. But if the poor borrow to maintain their families, and we be able to help them, it is certain we ought either to lend freely what they have occasion for, or (if they be not likely to repay it) to give freely something towards it. 2. They forced them to mortgage to them their lands and houses for the securing of the money (v. 3), and not only so, but took the profits of them for interest (v. 5, compare v. 11), that by degrees they might make themselves masters of all they had. Yet this was not the worst. 3. They took their children for bond-servants, to be enslaved or sold at pleasure, v. 5. "Our heirs must be their slaves, and it is not in our power to redeem them." This they made a humble remonstrance of to Nehemiah, not only because they saw he was a great man that could relieve them, but a good man that would. Let us lament the hardships which many in the world are groaning under; putting our souls into their souls' stead, and remembering in our prayers and succours those that are burdened, as burdened with them. But let those who show no mercy expect judgment without mercy. It was an aggravation of the sin of these oppressing Jews that they were themselves so lately delivered out of the house of bondage, which obliged them in gratitude to undo the heavy burdens, Isa. lviii. 6.

The foregoing complaint was made to Nehemiah at the time when he had his head and hands as full as possible of the public business about building the wall; yet, perceiving it to be just, he did not reject it. The case called for speedy interposition, and therefore he applied himself immediately to the consideration of it, knowing that, let him build Jerusalem's walls ever so high, so thick, so strong, the city could not be safe while such abuses as these were tolerated.

I. He was very angry (v. 6).

II. He consulted with himself, v. 7. By this it appears that he did not say or do anything unadvisedly. Before he rebuked the nobles, he consulted with himself what to say, and when, and how.

III. He rebuked the nobles and rulers, who were the monied men, and whose power perhaps made them the more bold to oppress. Let no man imagine that his dignity sets him above reproof.

IV. He set a great assembly against them. He called the people together to bear their testimony (which the people will generally be forward to do) against the oppressions and extortions, v. 12. Ezra and Nehemiah were both of them very wise, good, useful men, yet, in cases not unlike, there was a great deal of difference between their management: when Ezra was told of the sin of the rulers in marrying strange wives he rent his clothes, and wept, and prayed, and was hardly persuaded to attempt a reformation, fearing it to be impracticable, for he was a man of a mild tender spirit; when Nehemiah was told of as bad a thing he kindled immediately, reproached the delinquents, incensed the people against them, and never rested till, by all the rough methods he could use, he forced them to reform; for he was a man of a hot and eager spirit. Very holy men may differ much from each other in their natural temper. 2. God's work may be well done and yet different methods taken in the doing of it, which is a good reason why we should neither arraign the management of others nor make our own a standard.

V. He fairly reasoned the case with them, and showed them the evil of what they did. The regular way of reforming men's lives is to endeavour, in the first place, to convince their consciences. He lays it before them, 1. That those whom they oppressed were their brethren. 2. That they were but lately redeemed out of the hand of the heathen. The body of the people were so by the wonderful providence of God. "Now," says he, "have we taken all this pains to get their liberty out of the hands of the heathen, and shall their own rulers enslave them?" 3. That it was a great sin thus to oppress the poor (v. 9). 4. That it was a reproach to their profession. "Consider the reproach of the heathen our enemies; they will say, These Jews, that profess so much devotion to God, see how barbarous they are one to another." Nothing exposes religion more to the reproach of its enemies than the worldliness and hard-heartedness of the professors of it.

VI. He earnestly pressed them not only not to make their poor neighbours any more such hard bargains, but to restore that which they had got into their hands, v. 11. See how familiarly he speaks to them: Let us leave off this usury, putting himself in, as becomes reprovers, though far from being any way guilty of the crime. Though he had authority to command, yet, for love's sake, he rather beseeches.

VII. He got a promise from them (v. 12): We will restore them. He sent for the priests to give them their oath that they would perform this promise. So let God shake out every man that performeth not this promise, v. 13. This was a threatening to which the people said Amen. With this Amen the people praised the Lord. This cheerfulness in promising was well, but that which follows was better: They did according to this promise, and adhered to what they had done.

Nehemiah relates more particularly what his practice was, not in pride or vainglory, but as an inducement both to his successors and to the inferior magistrates to be as tender as might be of the people's ease.

I. He intimates what had been the way of his predecessors, v. 15. He does not name them, because what he had to say of them was not to their honour, and in such a case it is good to spare names. The government allowed them forty shekels of silver (so much a day, it is probable); but, besides that, they obliged the people to furnish them with bread and wine, and they suffered their servants to squeeze the people, and to get all they could out of them.

II. He tells us what had been his own way.

1. In general, he had not done as the former governors did. The fear of God restrained him from oppressing the people. He was thus generous purely for conscience' sake. Nehemiah, for his part, got nothing, except the satisfaction of doing good: Neither bought we any land, v. 16.

2. More particularly, observe (1) How little Nehemiah received of what he might have required. So far was he from extorting more than his due that he never demanded that, but lived upon what he had got in the king of Persia's court and his own estate in Judæa: the reason he gives for this piece of self-denial is, Because the bondage was heavy upon the people. In our demands we must consider not only the justice of them, but the ability of those on whom we make them. (2) How much he gave which he might have withheld. [1] His servants' work, v. 16. [2] His own meat, v. 17, 18.

III. He concludes with a prayer (v. 19): Think upon me, my God, for good. 1. Nehemiah here mentions what he had done for this people to shame the rulers out of their oppressions. 2. He mentions it to God in prayer, not as if he thought he had hereby merited any favour from God, as a debt. "If God do but think upon me for good, I have enough."

CHAP. VI

The cries of oppressed poverty being stilled, the building of the wall goes forward, and in this chapter we find it finished with joy. How the Jews' enemies were baffled in their design to put a stop to it by force we read before, ch. iv. Here we find how their endeavours to drive Nehemiah off from it were frustrated. I. When they courted him to an interview, with design to do him a mischief, he would not stir, ver. 1–4. II. When they would have made him believe his undertaking was represented as seditious and treasonable, ver. 5–9. III. When they hired pretended prophets to advise him to retire, ver. 10–14. IV. Notwithstanding the secret correspondence that was kept up between them and some false and treacherous Jews, the work was finished, ver. 15–19.

Verses 1–9

Two plots upon Nehemiah.

I. A plot to trepan him into a snare. The enemies had an account that all the breaches of the wall were made up, so that they considered it as good as done, though at that time the doors of the gates were off the hinges (v. 1); they must therefore now or never, by one bold stroke, take off Nehemiah. 1. With subtlety they courted him to meet them in a village in the lot of Benjamin: "Come, let us meet together to consult about the common interests of our provinces." But they thought to do him a mischief. 2. He declined the motion. His care was that the work might not cease; he knew it would if he left it ever so little; and why should it cease while I come down to you? Four times I answered them (says he) after the same manner, v. 4.

II. A plot to terrify him from his work. This therefore Sanballat attempts, but in vain. 1. He endeavours to possess Nehemiah with an apprehension that his undertaking to build the walls of Jerusalem was generally represented as factious and seditious, v. 5–7. This is written to him in an open letter, as a thing generally known and talked of, and Gashmu will aver it for truth, that Nehemiah was aiming to make himself king and to shake off the Persian yoke. Now Sanballat pretends to inform Nehemiah of this as a friend—"Let us take counsel together how to quell the report." He hoped, like Judas, to kiss and kill. Nehemiah not only denied that such things were true, but that they were reported; he was better known than to be thus suspected. 2. Thus he escaped the snare and kept his ground. While we keep a good conscience, let us trust God with our good name.

He lifts up his heart to Heaven in this short prayer: Now therefore, O God! strengthen my hands. When, in our Christian work and warfare, we are entering upon any particular services or conflicts, this is a good prayer—"Now therefore, O God! strengthen my hands."

Verses 10–14

The Jews' enemies leave no stone unturned, to take Nehemiah off from building the wall about Jerusalem. Now they try to drive him into the temple for his own safety; let him be anywhere but at his work.

I. How basely the enemies managed this temptation.

1. That which they designed was to bring Nehemiah to do a foolish thing, that they might laugh at him (v. 13): That I should be afraid, and so they might have matter for an evil report, and might reproach me.

2. The tools they made use of were a pretended prophet and prophetess, whom they hired to persuade Nehemiah to quit his work and retire for his own safety. The pretended prophet was Shemaiah, of whom it is said that he was shut up in his own house, under pretence of retirement for meditation. Nehemiah went to his house to consult him, v. 10. Other prophets there were, and one prophetess, Noadiah (v. 14), that were in the interest of the Jews' enemies.

3. The pretence was plausible. These prophets suggested to Nehemiah that the enemies would come and slay him, in the night. They pretended to be much concerned for his safety. They very gravely advised him to hide himself in the temple till the danger was over. If Nehemiah had been prevailed upon to do this, immediately the people would both have left off their work and thrown down their arms, and everyone would have shifted for his own safety; and then the enemies might easily, and without opposition, have broken down the wall again.

II. Nehemiah vanquished this temptation, and came off conqueror.

1. He immediately resolved not to yield to it, v. 11. "Should such a man as I flee? I will not go in. I will rather die at my work than live in an inglorious retreat from it."

2. He was immediately aware of what was the rise of it (v. 12): "I perceived that God had not sent him, that he gave this advice, not by any divine direction, but with a design against me." Two things Nehemiah says he dreaded (1) Offending God: That I should be afraid, and do so, and sin. Sin is that which above anything we should dread; and a good preservative it is against sin to be afraid of nothing but sin. (2) Shaming himself: That they might reproach me.

3. He humbly begs of God to reckon with them for their base designs upon him (v. 14): My God, think thou upon Tobiah, and the rest of them, according to their works.

Nehemiah is here finishing the wall of Jerusalem, and yet still has trouble created by his enemies.

I. Tobiah, and the other adversaries of the Jews, had the mortification to see the wall built up, notwithstanding all their attempts to hinder it. The wall was finished in fifty-two days, and we have reason to believe they rested on the sabbaths, v. 15. Many were employed, and what they did they did cheerfully, because they loved it. When the enemies heard that the wall was finished before they thought it was well begun, they were much cast down in their own eyes, v. 16. They envied the prosperity and success of the Jews, grieved to see the walls of Jerusalem built. If it were of God, it was to no purpose to think of opposing it; it would certainly prevail and be victorious.

II. Nehemiah had the vexation notwithstanding this, to see some of his own people treacherously corresponding with Tobiah. Many in Judah were in a strict but secret confederacy with him to advance the interest of his country, though it would certainly be the ruin of their own. They were sworn unto him, not as their prince, but as their friend and ally, because both he and his son had married daughters of Israel, v. 18. See the mischief of marrying with strangers; for one heathen that was converted by it ten Jews were perverted. They had the impudence to court Nehemiah himself into a friendship with him. They were so false as to betray Nehemiah's counsels to him. Thus were all their thoughts against him for evil, yet God thought upon him for good.

CHAP. VII

Nehemiah, having fortified Jerusalem with gates and walls, his next care is, I. To see the city well kept, ver. 1–4. II. To see it well peopled, in order to which he here reviews and calls over the register of the children of the captivity, the families that returned at first, and records it, ver. 5–73. What use he made of it we shall find afterwards, when he brought one of ten to live in Jerusalem, ch. xi. 1.

Verses 1–4

God saith concerning his church (Isa. lxii. 6), I have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem! This is Nehemiah's care here; for dead walls, without living watchmen, are but a poor defence to a city.

I. He appointed the porters, singers, and Levites, in their places to their work. God's worship is the defence of a place, and his ministers, when they mind their duty, are watchmen on the walls.

II. He appointed two governors or consuls, to whom he committed the care of the city, and gave them in charge to provide for the public peace and safety. Hanani, his brother, who came to him with the tidings of the desolations of Jerusalem, was one, a man of approved integrity and affection to his country; the other was Hananiah, who had been ruler of the palace. Of this Hananiah it is said that he was a faithful man and one that feared God above many, v. 2.

III. He gave orders about the shutting of the gates and the guarding of the walls, v. 3, 4. The city, in compass, was large. The walls enclosed the same ground as formerly; but much of it lay waste, for the houses were not built; so that Nehemiah walled the city in faith, and with an eye to that promise of the replenishing of it which God had lately made by the prophet, Zech. viii. 3, &c. Though the people were now few, he believed they would be multiplied and therefore built the walls so as to make room for them. The care of Nehemiah for it. He ordered the rulers of the city themselves, 1. To stand by, and see the city-gates shut up and barred every night. 2. To take care that they should not be opened in the morning till they could see that all was clear and quiet. 3. To set sentinels who should, in case of the approach of the enemy, give timely notice to the city of the danger; and, as it came to their turn to watch, they must post themselves over against their own houses, because of them, they would be in a particular manner careful. The public safety depends upon everyone's particular care to guard himself and his own family against sin, that common enemy. They were made sensible that except the Lord kept the city the watchman waked but in vain, Ps. cxxvii. 1.

Verses 5–73

Another good project of Nehemiah's. He knew very well that the safety of a city, under God, depends more upon the number and valour of the inhabitants than upon the height or strength of its walls; and therefore he thought fit to take an account of the people, that he might find what families had formerly had their settlement in Jerusalem, that he might bring them back, and what families could be influenced by their religion, or by their business, to come and rebuild the houses in Jerusalem and dwell in them. It is the wisdom of the governors of a nation to keep the balance even between the city and country, that the metropolis be not so extravagantly large as to drain and impoverish the country, nor yet so weak as not to be able to protect it.

I. Whence this good design of Nehemiah's came. He owns, My God put it into my heart, v. 5.

II. What method he took in prosecution of it.

1. He called the rulers together, and the people, that he might have an account of the present state of their families—their number and strength, and where they were settled.

2. He reviewed the old register of the genealogy of those who came up at the first, and compared the present accounts with that; and here we have the repetition of that out of Ezra ii. There are many differences in the numbers between this catalogue and that in Ezra. What differences there are we may suppose to arise either from the mistakes of transcribers, or from the diversity of the copies from which they were taken. Or perhaps one was the account of them when they set out from Babylon with Zerubbabel, the other when they came to Jerusalem. The sum totals are all just the same there and here, except of the singing-men and singing-women, which there are 200, here 245. An account of the offerings which were given towards the work of God, v. 70, &c. differs much from that in Ezra ii. 68, 69, and it must be questioned whether it refers to the same contribution; here the tirshatha, or chief governor, who there was not mentioned, begins the offering; and the single sum mentioned there exceeds all those here put together; yet it is probable that it was the same, but that followed one copy of the lists, this another; for the last verse is the same here that it was Ezra ii. 70, and Ezra iii. 1. Blessed be God that our faith and hope are not built upon the niceties of names and numbers, genealogy, and chronology, but on the great things of the law and gospel.

CHAP. VIII

Ezra came up out of Babylon thirteen years before Nehemiah came, yet we have here a piece of good work which he did, that might have been done before, but was not done till Nehemiah came, who was a man of a more lively, active spirit. His zeal set Ezra's learning on work, and then great things were done, as we find here, I. The public and solemn reading and expounding of the law, ver. 1–8. II. The joy which the people were ordered to express upon that occasion, ver. 9–12. III. The solemn keeping of the feast of tabernacles according to the law, ver. 13–18.

Verses 1–8

An account of a solemn religious assembly, and the good work that was done in that assembly.

I. The time of it was the first day of the seventh month, v. 2. That was the day of the feast of trumpets, which is called a sabbath, and on which they were to have a holy convocation, Lev. xxiii. 24; Num. xxix. 1. But that was not all: it was on that day that the altar was set up, and they began to offer their burnt-offerings after their return out of captivity, a recent mercy in the memory of many then living.

II. The place was in the street that was before the water-gate (v. 1), a spacious broad street, able to contain so great a multitude, which the court of the temple was not; for probably it was not now built nearly so large as it had been in Solomon's time. Sacrifices were to be offered only at the door of the temple, but praying, and praising, and preaching, were, and are, services of religion as acceptably performed in one place as in another. When this congregation thus met in the street of the city no doubt God was with them.

III. The persons that met were all the people, who were not compelled to come, but voluntarily gathered themselves together by common agreement, as one man: not only men came, but women and children. Little ones, as they come to the exercise of reason, must be trained up in the exercises of religion.

IV. The master of this assembly was Ezra the priest. 1. His call to the service was very clear; for being in office as a priest, and qualified as a scribe, the people spoke to him to bring the book of the law and read it to them, v. 1. 2. His post was very convenient. He stood in a pulpit or tower of wood, which they made for the word, for the preaching of the word, that what he said might be the more gracefully delivered and the better heard, and that the eyes of the hearers might be upon him, Luke iv. 20. 3. He had several assistants. Some of these stood with him (v. 4), six on his right hand and seven on his left. Others who are mentioned (v. 7) seem to have been employed at the same time in other places near at hand, to read and expound to those who could not come within hearing of Ezra.

V. The religious exercises performed in this assembly were not ceremonial, but moral, praying and preaching. Ezra, as president of the assembly, was, 1. The people's mouth to God, and they affectionately joined with him, v. 6. He blessed the Lord as the great God, and the people said Amen, Amen, lifted up up their hands and bowed their heads in reverence. 2. God's mouth to the people, and they attentively hearkened to him. Ezra brought the law before the congregation, v. 2. Ministers, when they go to the pulpit, should take their Bibles with them; Ezra did so; thence they must fetch their knowledge. See 2 Chron. xvii. 9. He opened the book with great reverence and solemnity, in the sight of all the people v. 5. He and others read in the book of the law, from morning till noon (v. 3), and they read distinctly, v. 8. Let those that read and preach the word learn also to deliver themselves distinctly, as those who understand what they say and are affected with it themselves, and who desire that those they speak to may understand it, retain it, and be affected with it likewise. It is a snare for a man to devour that which is holy. What they read they expounded. It is requisite that those who hear the word should understand it. It is therefore required of those who are teachers by office that they explain the word and give the sense of it. When Ezra opened the book all the people stood up (v. 5), thereby showing respect both to Ezra and to the word he was about to read.

I. The people were wounded with the words of the law that were read to them. The law shows men their sins, and their misery and danger because of sin. Therefore when they heard it they all wept (v. 9): it was a good sign that their hearts were tender, like Josiah's when he heard the words of the law. They wept to think how they had offended God.

II. They were healed and comforted with the words of peace that were spoken to them. It was one of the solemn feasts, on which it was their duty to rejoice; and even sorrow for sin must not hinder our joy in God, but rather lead us to it. Ezra was pleased to see them so affected with the word, but Nehemiah observed to him, and Ezra concurred in the thought, that it was now unseasonable. This day was holy and therefore was to be celebrated with joy and praise, not as if it were a day to afflict their souls. They forbade the people to mourn and weep (v. 9): Be not sorry (v. 10); hold your peace, neither be you grieved, v. 11. They commanded them to testify their joy, to put on the garments of praise instead of the spirit of heaviness. They allowed them, in token of their joy, to feast themselves. But then it must be, 1. With charity to the poor: "Send portions to those for whom nothing is prepared that your abundance may supply their want, that they may rejoice with you." 2. It must be with piety and devotion: The joy of the Lord is your strength. Holy joy will be oil to the wheels of our obedience.

III. The assembly complied with the directions that were given them. Their weeping was stilled (v. 11) and they made great mirth, v. 12. Those that sow in tears shall reap in joy; those that tremble at the convictions of the word may triumph in the consolations of it. They made mirth, not because they had the fat to eat and the sweet to drink, and a great deal of good company, but because they had understood the words that were declared to them. The darkness of trouble arises from the darkness of ignorance and mistake. When the words were first declared to them they wept; but, when they understood them, they rejoiced, finding at length precious promises made to those who repented and reformed and that therefore there was hope in Israel.

Verses 13–18

I. The people's renewed attendance upon the word. The next day after, though it was no festival, the chief of them came together again to hear Ezra expound (v. 13). Now the priests and the Levites themselves came with the chief of the people to Ezra, as it is in the margin, that they might instruct in the words of the law; they came to be taught themselves, that they might be qualified to teach others. Now, they being by trial made more sensible than ever of their own deficiencies and his excellencies, on the second day their humility set them at Ezra's feet, as learners of him.

II. The people's ready obedience to the word as soon as they were made sensible of their duty therein. It is probable that Ezra, after the wisdom of his God that was in his hand (Ezra vii. 25), when they applied to him for instruction out of the law on the second day of the seventh month, read to them those laws which concerned the feasts of that month, and, among the rest, that of the feast of tabernacles, Lev. xxiii. 34; Deut. xvi. 13. 1. The divine appointment of the feast of tabernacles reviewed, v. 14, 15. They found written in the law a commandment concerning it. This feast of tabernacles was a memorial of their dwelling in tents in the wilderness, a representation of our tabernacle state in this world. The conversion of the nations to the faith of Christ is foretold under the figure of this feast (Zech. xiv. 16); they shall come to keep the feast of tabernacles, as having here no continuing city. The people were themselves to fetch boughs of trees (they of Jerusalem fetched them from the mount of Olives) and to make booths, or arbours, of them, in which they were to lodge. 2. This appointment religiously observed, v. 16, 17. (1) They observed the ceremony: They sat in booths, which the priests and Levites set up in the courts of the temple; those that had houses of their own set up booths on the roofs of them, or in their courts; and those that had not, set them up in the streets. All their holy feasts, but this especially, were to be celebrated with joy. (2) They attended the reading and expounding of the word of God during all the days of the feast, v. 18.

CHAP. IX

An account of an occasional fast that was kept as a day of humiliation. I. How this fast was observed, ver. 1–3. II. What were the heads of the prayer that was made to God on that occasion, concluding with a solemn resolution of new obedience, ver. 4–38.

Verses 1–3

A general account of a public fast which the children of Israel kept, probably by order from Nehemiah. It was a fast that men appointed, but such a fast as God had chosen; for, 1. It was a day to afflict the soul, Isa. lviii. 5. Probably they assembled in the courts of the temple, and they there appeared in sackcloth and in the posture of mourners, with earth on their heads, v. 1. They were restrained from weeping, ch. viii. 9, but now they were directed to weep. 2. It was a day to loose the bands of wickedness, and that is the fast that God has chosen, Isa. lviii. 6. Without this, spreading sackcloth and ashes under us is but a jest. 3. It was a day of communion with God. They fasted to him, even to him (Zech. vii. 5); for, (1) They spoke to him in prayer. Fasting without prayer is a body without a soul, a worthless carcase. (2) They heard him speaking to them by his word; for they read in the book of the law that, in the glass of the law, we may see our deformities and defilements, and know what to acknowledge and what to amend. The time was equally divided between these two. Three hours they spent in reading, expounding, and applying the scriptures, and three hours in confessing sin and praying; so that they stayed together six hours, and spent all the time in the solemn acts of religion, without saying, Behold, what a weariness is it!

Verses 4–38

An account how the work of this fast-day was carried on. 1. The names of the ministers that were employed. They are twice named (v. 4, 5). Either they prayed successively, or, as some think, there were eight several congregations at some distance from each other, and each had a Levite to preside in it. 2. The work itself in which they employed themselves. (1) They prayed to God for the pardon of the sins of Israel and God's favour to them. (2) They praised God; for the work of praise is not unseasonable on a fast-day; in all acts of devotion we must aim at this, to give unto God the glory due to his name. The summary of their prayers we have here upon record.

1. An awful adoration of God, as a perfect and glorious Being, and the fountain of all beings, v. 5, 6. The congregation is called upon to signify their concurrence herewith by standing up; and so the minister directs himself to God, blessed be thy glorious name. God is here adored, 1. As the only living and true God: Thou art Jehovah alone. 2. As the Creator of all things: Thou hast made heaven, earth, and seas, and all that is in them. 3. As the great Protector of the whole creation: "Thou preservest in being all the creatures thou hast given being to." 4. As the object of the creatures' praises: "The host of heaven, the world of holy angels, worshippeth thee, v. 6. But thy name is exalted above all blessing and praise."

II. A thankful acknowledgment of God's favours to Israel.

1. Many of these are here reckoned up in order before him.

2. The particular instances of God's goodness to Israel here recounted. (1) The call of Abraham, v. 7. (2) The covenant God made with him to give the land of Canaan to him and his seed, a type of the better country, v. 8. (3) The deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, v. 9–11. It was seasonable to remember this now that they were interceding for the perfecting of their deliverance out of Babylon. (4) The conducting of them through the wilderness, by the pillar of cloud and fire, which showed them which way they should go, when they should remove, and when and where they should rest, directed all their stages and all their steps, v. 12. It was also a visible token of God's presence with them, to guide and guard them.

(5) The plentiful provision made for them in the wilderness, that they might not perish for hunger: Thou gavest them bread from heaven, and water out of the rock (v. 15), and, to hold up their hearts, a promise that they should go in and possess the land of Canaan. They had meat and drink, food convenient in the way, and the good land at their journey's end; what would they more? This also is repeated (v. 20, 21) as that which was continued, notwithstanding their provocations: Forty years didst thou sustain them. (6) The giving of the law upon Mount Sinai. The Lawgiver was very glorious, v. 13. "Thou didst not only send, but camest down thyself, and didst speak with them," Deut. iv. 33. No nation under the sun had such right judgments, true laws, and good statutes, Deut. iv. 8. And with the law and the sabbath, he gave his good Spirit to instruct them, v. 20. Besides the law given on Mount Sinai, the five books of Moses, which he wrote as he was moved by the Holy Ghost, were constant instructions to them. (7) The putting of them in possession of Canaan, that good land, kingdoms and nations, v. 22. They were made so numerous as to replenish it (v. 23) and so victorious as to be masters of it (v. 24). (8) God's great readiness to pardon their sins, and work deliverance for them, when they had by their provocations brought his judgments upon themselves. Afterwards, when they were settled in Canaan and sold themselves by their sins into the hands of their enemies, upon their submission and humble request he gave them saviours (v. 27), the judges, by whom God wrought many a great deliverance for them when they were on the brink of ruin. (9) The admonitions and fair warnings he gave them by his servants the prophets. When he delivered them from their troubles he testified against their sins (v. 28, 29), that they might not misconstrue their deliverances as connivances at their wickedness. The testimony of the prophets was the testimony of the Spirit in the prophets, and it was the Spirit of Christ in them, 1 Peter i. 10, 11. They spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, and what they said is to be received accordingly. (10) The lengthening out of his patience and the moderating of his rebukes: Many years did he forbear them (v. 30), as loth to punish them, and waiting to see if they would repent; and when he did punish them, he did not utterly consume them nor forsake them, v. 31.

III. A penitent confession of sin, their own sins, and the sins of their fathers.

1. They begin with the sins of Israel in the wilderness: They, even our fathers dealt proudly and hardened their necks, v. 16. Pride is at the bottom of men's obstinacy and disobedience. When men make no right use either of God's ordinances or of his providences, what can be expected from them? Two great sins are here specified, which they were guilty of in the wilderness—meditating a return, (1) To Egyptian slavery, which, for the sake of the garlick and onions, they preferred before the glorious liberty of the Israel of God attended with some difficulty and inconvenience. (2) To Egyptian idolatry: They made a molten calf, and were so sottish as to say, This is thy God.

2. They next bewail the provocations of their fathers after they were put in possession of Canaan.

3. They at length come nearer to their own day, and lament the sins which had brought those judgments upon them which they had long been groaning under and were now but in part delivered from. Two things they charge upon themselves and their fathers, as the cause of their troubles:—(1) A contempt of the good law God had given them: They sinned against thy judgments, the dictates of divine wisdom, and the demands of divine sovereignty. (2) A contempt of the good land God had given them (v. 35). Those that would not serve God in their own land were made to serve their enemies in a strange land, as was threatened, Deut. xxviii. 47, 48.

IV. A humble representation of the judgments of God, which they had been and were now under.

1. Former judgments are remembered. They had not taken warning. In the days of the judges their enemies vexed them (v. 27); and, when they did evil again, God did again leave them in the hand of their enemies.

2. Their present calamitous state is laid before the Lord (v. 36, 37): We are servants this day. Freeborn Israelites are enslaved, and the land which they had long held by a much more honourable tenure, they now held by, from, and under, the kings of Persia, whose vassals they were. This, they honestly own, was for their sins. Poverty and slavery are the fruits of sin; it is sin that brings us into all our distresses.

V. Their address to God under these calamities. 1. By way of request, that their trouble might not seem little, v. 32. It is the only petition in all this prayer. The trouble was universal; it had come on their kings, princes, priests, prophets, fathers, and all their people; they had all shared in the sin (v. 34), and now all shared in the judgment. It was of long continuance: From the time of the kings of Assyria, who carried the ten tribes captive, unto this day. "Lord, let it not all seem little and not worthy to be regarded, or not needing to be relieved." They do not prescribe to God what he shall do for them, but leave it to him. 2. By way of acknowledgment, notwithstanding, that really it was less than they deserved, v. 33. They own the justice of God in all their troubles.

VI. The result and conclusion of this whole matter. After this long remonstrance of their case was made they came at last to this resolution. "Because of all this, we make a sure covenant with God; in consideration of our frequent departures from God, we will now more firmly than ever bind ourselves to him. Because we have smarted so much for sin, we will now steadfastly resolve against it, that we may not any more withdraw the shoulder." A certain number of the princes, priests, and Levites, were chosen as the representatives of the congregation, to subscribe and seal it for and in the name of the rest.

CHAP. X

A particular account of the covenant which in the close of the foregoing chapter was resolved upon, I. The names of those that set their hands and seals to it, ver. 1–27. II. An account of those who signified their consent and concurrence, ver. 28, 29. III. The covenant itself, and the articles of it in general, that they would "keep God's commandments" (ver. 29); in particular, that they would not marry with the heathen (ver. 30), nor profane the sabbath, nor be rigorous with their debtors (ver. 31), and that they would carefully pay their church-dues, for the maintenance of the temple service, ver. 32–39.

Verses 1–31

When Israel was first brought into covenant with God it was done by sacrifice and the sprinkling of blood, Exod. xxiv. But here it was done by the more natural and common way of sealing and subscribing the written articles of the covenant.

I. The names of those public persons who, as the representatives and heads of the congregation, set their hands and seals to this covenant. Nehemiah, who was the governor, signed first. Next to him subscribed twenty-two priests. Next to the priests, seventeen Levites subscribed this covenant, among whom we find all or most of those who were the mouth of the congregation in prayer, ch. ix. 4, 5. Those that lead in prayer should lead in every other good work. Next to the Levites, forty-four of the chief of the people gave it under their hands for themselves and all the rest.

II. The concurrence of the rest of the people with them, and the rest of the priests and Levites, who signified their consent to what their chiefs did. With them joined, 1. Their wives and children; for they had transgressed, and they must reform. 2. The proselytes of other nations, all that had separated themselves from the people of the lands, their gods and their worship, unto the law of God, and the observance of that law. See what conversion is; it is separating ourselves from the course and custom of this world, and devoting ourselves to the conduct of the word of God. And, as there is one law, so there is one covenant, one baptism, for the stranger and for him that is born in the land. The concurrence of the people is expressed, v. 29. They clave to their brethren one and all.

III. The general purport of this covenant. They laid upon themselves no other burden than this necessary thing, which they were already obliged to by all other engagements of duty, interest, and gratitude—to walk in God's law, and to do all his commandments, v. 29.

IV. Some of the particular articles of this covenant, such as were adopted to their present temptations. 1. That they would not intermarry with the heathen, v. 30. 2. That they would keep no markets on the sabbath day, or any other day of which the law has said, You shall do no work therein. The sabbath is a market day for our souls, but not for our bodies. 3. That they would not be severe in exacting their debts, but would observe the seventh year as a year of release, according to the law, v. 31.

I. It was resolved, in general, that the temple service should be carefully kept up, that the work of the house of their God should be done in its season, according to the law, v. 33. It is likely to go well with our houses when care is taken that the work of God's house may go well. It was likewise resolved that they would never forsake the house of their God (v. 39), for the house of any other god, or for the high places, as idolaters did, nor forsake it for their farms and merchandises, as those did that were atheistical and profane. Those that forsake the worship of God forsake God.

II. It was resolved, in pursuance of this, that they would liberally maintain the temple service, and not starve it if the people would do theirs, which was to find them materials to work upon. Now here it was agreed and concluded, 1. That a stock should be raised for the furnishing of God's table and altar plentifully. The people therefore agreed to contribute yearly, every one of them, the third part of a shekel, about ten pence a-piece for the bearing of this expense. When everyone will act, and everyone will give, though but little, towards a good work, the whole amount will be considerable. The tirshatha did not impose this tax, but the people made it an ordinance for themselves, and charged themselves with it, v. 32, 33. 2. That particular care should be taken to provide wood for the altar, to keep the fire always burning upon it. 3. That all those things which the divine law had appointed for the maintenance of the priests and Levites should be duly paid in, that they might not be under any temptation to neglect it for the making of necessary provision for their families. First-fruits and tenths were then the principal branches of the minister's revenues; and they here resolve to bring in the first fruits justly and to bring in their tenths likewise. This was the law (Num. xviii. 21–28); but these dues had been withheld, in consequence of which God, by the prophet, charges them with robbing him (Mal. iii. 8, 9), at the same time encouraging them to be more just to him and his receivers, with a promise that, if they brought the tithes into the store-house, he would pour out blessings upon them, v. 10. This therefore they resolved to do, that there might be meat in God's house. "We will do it (say they) in all the cities of our tillage," v. 37. In all the cities of our servitude, so the LXX, for they were servants in their own land, ch. ix. 36. Though they paid great taxes to the kings of Persia, and had much hardship put upon them, they would not make that an excuse for not paying their tithes, but would render to God the things that were his, as well as to Cæsar the things that were his.

CHAP. XI

Jerusalem was walled round, but it was not as yet fully inhabited. Nehemiah's next care is to bring people into it. I. The methods taken to replenish it, ver. 1, 2. II. The principal persons that resided there, of Judah and Benjamin (ver. 3–9), of the priests and Levites, ver. 10–19. III. The several cities and villages of Judah and Benjamin that were peopled by the rest of their families, ver. 20–36.

Jerusalem is called here the holy city (v. 1), because there the temple was, and God had chosen to put his name there; the holy seed should all have chosen to dwell there, but, on the contrary, they declined. 1. Because a greater strictness was expected from the inhabitants of Jerusalem than from others. Those who care not for being holy themselves are shy of dwelling in a holy city. Or, 2. Because Jerusalem, of all places, was most hated by the heathen their neighbours, which made that the post of danger (as the post of honour usually is) and therefore they were not willing to expose themselves there. Fear of persecution and reproach, keeps many out of the holy city, and makes them backward to appear for God and religion, not considering that, as Jerusalem is threatened and insulted by its enemies, so it is with a special care protected by its God and made a quiet habitation, Isa. xxxiii. 20; Ps. xlvi. 4, 5. Or, 3. Because it was more for their worldly advantage to dwell in the country. Jerusalem was no trading city, and therefore there was no money to be got there by merchandise, as there was in the country by corn and cattle.

I. By what means it was replenished. 1. The rulers dwelt there, v. 1. That was the proper place for them to reside in, because there were set the thrones of judgment (Ps. cxxii. 5). Their dwelling there would invite and encourage others too. Magnates magnetes —the mighty are magnetic. 2. There were some that willingly offered themselves to dwell at Jerusalem, nobly foregoing their own secular interest for the public welfare, v. 2. They sought the good of Jerusalem, because of the house of the Lord their God. 3. They, finding that yet there was room, concluded upon a review of their whole body to bring one in ten to dwell in Jerusalem; who they should be was determined by lot, the disposal whereof, all knew, was of the Lord.

II. By what persons it was replenished. 1. Many of the children of Judah and Benjamin dwelt there; for, originally, part of the city lay in the lot of one of those tribes and part in that of the other; but the greater part was in the lot of Benjamin, and therefore here we find of the children of Judah only 468 families in Jerusalem (v. 6), but of Benjamin 928, v. 7, 8. Though the Benjamites were more in number, yet of the men of Judah it is said (v. 6) that they were valiant men, fit for service, and able to defend the city in case of an attack. Judah has not lost its ancient character of a lion's whelp, bold and daring. Of the Benjamites that dwelt in Jerusalem we are here told who was overseer, and who was second, v. 9. 2. The priests and Levites did many of them settle at Jerusalem. Of those that did the work of the house in their courses here were 822 of one family, 242 of another, and 128 of another, v. 12–14. It is said of some of them that they were mighty men of valour (v. 14). Some of the Levites also came and dwelt at Jerusalem, yet but few in comparison, 284 in all (v. 18), with 172 porters (v. 19), for much of their work was to teach the good knowledge of God up and down the country, for which purpose they were to be scattered in Israel. (1) It is said of one of the Levites that he had the oversight of the outward business of the house of God, v. 16. The priests were chief managers of the business within the temple gates; but this Levite was entrusted with the secular concerns of God's house, the collecting of the contributions, the providing of materials for the temple service, and the like. Those who take care of the outward concerns of the church, the serving of its tables, are as necessary in their place as those who take care of its inward concerns, who give themselves to the word and prayer. (2) It is said of another that he was the principal to begin the thanksgiving in prayer. Probably he had a good ear and a good voice, and was a scientific singer, and therefore was chosen to lead the psalm. He was precentor in the temple.

Verses 20–36

Some account of the other cities, in which dwelt the residue of Israel, v. 20. It was requisite that Jerusalem should be replenished, yet not so as to drain the country. 1. The Nethinims, the posterity of the Gibeonites, dwelt in Ophel, which was upon the wall of Jerusalem (ch. iii. 26). 2. Though the Levites were dispersed through the cities of Judah, yet they had an overseer who resided in Jerusalem, superior of their order and their provincial. 3. Some of the singers were appointed to look after the necessary repairs of the temple, they were over the business of the house of God, v. 22. The king of Persia allotted a particular maintenance for them, besides what belonged to them as Levites, v. 23. 4. Here is one that was the king's commissioner at Jerusalem. He is said to be at the king's hand, or on the king's part, in all matters concerning the people, to determine controversies that arose between the king's officers and his subjects, to see that what was due to the king from the people was duly paid in and what was allowed by the king for the temple service was duly paid out, and happy it was for the Jews that one of themselves was in this post. 5. An account of the villages, or country towns, which were inhabited by the residue of Israel—the towns in which the children of Judah dwelt (v. 25–30), those that were inhabited by the children of Benjamin (v. 31–35), and divisions for the Levites among both, v. 36.

CHAP. XII

I. The names of the chief of the priests and the Levites that came up with Zerubbabel, v. 1–9. II. The succession of the high priests, ver. 10, 11. III The names of the next generation of the other chief priests, ver. 12–21. IV. The eminent Levites that were in Nehemiah's time, ver. 22–26. V. The solemnity of dedicating the wall of Jerusalem, ver. 27–43. VI. The settling of the offices of the priests and Levites in the temple, ver. 44–47.

Verses 1–26

The names, of a great many priests and Levites, that were eminent in their day among the returned Jews. Perhaps it is intended to stir up their posterity, who succeeded them in the priest's office and inherited their dignities and preferments, to imitate their courage and fidelity. The succession of high priests during the Persian monarchy, from Jeshua, who was high priest at the time of the restoration, to Jaddua (or Jaddus), who was high priest when Alexander the Great, after the conquest of Tyre, came to Jerusalem, and paid great respect to this Jaddus, who met him in his pontifical habit, and showed him the prophecy of Daniel, which foretold his conquests. The next generation of priests, who were chief men, and active in the days of Joiakim, sons of the first set. All those who are mentioned v. 1, &c., as eminent in their generation, are again mentioned, though with some variation in several of the names, v. 12, &c., except two, as having sons that were likewise eminent in their generation—a rare instance, that twenty good fathers should leave behind them twenty good sons. The next generation of Levites, or rather a latter generation; for those priests who are mentioned flourished in the days of Joiakim the high priest, these Levites in the days of Eliashib, v. 22. Then a generation of Levites was raised up, who were recorded chief of the fathers (v. 22), and were eminently serviceable to the interests of the church, and their service not the less acceptable for their being Levites only. Eliashib the high priest being allied to Tobiah (ch. xiii. 4), the other priests grew remiss; but then the Levites appeared the more zealous. Those who were now employed in expounding (ch. viii. 7) and in praying (ch. ix. 4, 5) were all Levites, not priests, regard being had to their personal qualifications more than to their order.

The dedication of the wall of Jerusalem.

I. The meaning of this dedication of the wall. It was not done till the city was pretty well replenished, ch. xi. It was a solemn thanksgiving to God for his great mercy. They devoted the city in a peculiar manner to God and to his honour, and took possession of it for him and in his name. This city was (as never any other was) a holy city, the city of the great king (Ps. xlviii. 2 and Matt. v. 35). They put the city and its walls under the divine protection, owning that unless the Lord kept the city the walls were built in vain.

II. With what solemnity it was performed, under the direction of Nehemiah. The Levites from all parts of the country were summoned to attend. There was a general rendezvous, v. 28. 29. They purified themselves, v. 30, then the people. Then they purified the gates and the wall. This purification was performed by sprinkling the water of purifying (or of separation, as it is called, Num. xix. 9) on themselves and the people, the walls and the gates—a type of the blood of Christ, with which our consciences being purged from dead works, we become fit to serve the living God (Heb. ix. 14). The princes, priests, and Levites, walked round upon the wall in two companies, with musical instruments, to signify the dedication of it all to God (v. 36). They had a rendezvous where they divided themselves into two companies. Half of the princes, with several priests and Levites, went on the right hand, Ezra leading their van, v. 36. The other half of the princes and priests, who gave thanks likewise, went to the left hand, Nehemiah bringing up the rear, v. 38. At length both companies met in the temple, where they joined their thanksgivings, v. 40. The crowd of people, it is likely, walked some within the wall and others without. The people greatly rejoiced, v. 43. Their shouts, coming from a sincere and hearty joy, are here taken notice of; for God graciously accepts honest zealous services, though there is in them little of part. The women and children rejoiced; and their hosannas were not despised.

When the solemnities of a thanksgiving day leave such impressions on ministers and people as that both are more careful and cheerful in doing their duty afterwards, then they are indeed acceptable to God. So it was here. 1. The ministers were more careful than they had been of their work, v. 45. The singers kept the ward of their God, attending in due time to the duty of their office; the porters, too, kept the ward of the purification, that is, they took care to preserve the purity of the temple. 2. The people were more careful than they had been of the maintenance of their ministers, v. 44. Now, (1) Care is here taken for the collecting of their dues. They were modest, and would rather lose their right than call for it themselves. The people were many of them careless and would not bring their dues unless they were called upon; and therefore some were appointed whose office it should be to gather into the treasuries, out of the fields of the cities, the portions of the law for the priests and Levites (v. 44). (2) Care is taken that, being gathered in, they might be duly paid out, v. 47. They gave the singers and porters their daily portion, over and above what was due to them as Levites; for we may suppose that when David and Solomon appointed them their work (v. 45, 46), above what was required from them as Levites, they settled a fund for their further encouragement. For the other Levites, the tithes, here called the holy things, were duly set apart for them, out of which they paid the priests their tithe according to the law.

CHAP. XIII

Nehemiah, having finished what he undertook for the fencing and filling of the holy city, returned to the king his master, who was not willing to be long without him, as appears, ver. 6. But, after some time, he obtained leave to come back again to Jerusalem, to redress grievances, and purge out some corruptions which had crept in in his absence. I. He turned out from Israel the mixed multitude, the Moabites and Ammonites especially, ver. 1–3. With a particular indignation, he expelled Tobiah out of the lodgings he had got in the court of the temple, ver. 4–9. II. He secured the maintenance of the priests and Levites, ver. 10–14. III. He restrained the profanation of the sabbath day, ver. 15–22. IV. He checked the growing mischief of marrying strange wives, ver. 23–31.

Verses 1–9

Israel was not to mingle with the nations, nor suffer any of them to incorporate with them.

I. The law to this purport happened to be read on that day, in the audience of the people (v. 1), on the day of the dedication of the wall. They found a law, that the Ammonites and Moabites should not be naturalised, should not settle among them, nor unite with them, v. 1. The reason given is because they had been injurious and ill-natured to the Israel of God (v. 2), had not shown them common civility, but sought their ruin. This law we have, with this reason, Deut. xxiii. 3–5.

II. The people's ready compliance with this law, v. 3. See the benefit of the public reading of the word of God; it discovers to us sin and duty, good and evil, and shows us wherein we have erred. They separated from Israel all the mixed multitude, which had of old been a snare to them, for the mixed multitude fell a-lusting, Num. xi. 4. These they expelled.

III. The particular case of Tobiah, who was an Ammonite. He had the same enmity to Israel that his ancestors had, the spirit of an Ammonite, witness his indignation at Nehemiah (ch. ii. 10).

1. How basely Eliashib the chief priest took this Tobiah in to be a lodger even in the courts of the temple. He was allied to Tobiah (v. 4), by marriage first and then by friendship. His grandson had married Sanballat's daughter, v. 28. Probably some other of his family had married Tobiah's. It was expressly provided by the law that the high priest should marry one of his own people, else he profanes his seed among his people, Lev. xxi. 14, 15. In the courts of the temple, out of several little chambers used for store-chambers, he contrived to make a state-room for Tobiah, v. 5. That Tobiah the Ammonite should be entertained with respect in Israel, in the courts of God's house, as if to confront God himself; this was next to setting up an idol there. An Ammonite must not come into the congregation; and shall one of the worst and vilest of the Ammonites be courted into the temple itself? Well might Nehemiah add (v. 6), But all this time was not I at Jerusalem. If he had been there, the high priest durst not have done such a thing.

2. How bravely Nehemiah, the chief governor, threw him out, and all that belonged to him, and restored the chambers to their proper use. When he came to Jerusalem, and was informed by the good people who were troubled at it what an intimacy had grown between their chief priest and their chief enemy, it grieved him sorely (v. 7, 8). Nehemiah has power and he will use it for God. Tobiah shall be expelled. He fears not his resentments, or Eliashib's, but expels the intruder, by casting forth all his household stuff. Our Saviour thus cleansed the temple, that the house of prayer might not be a den of thieves. And thus those that would expel sin out of their hearts, those living temples, must throw out all those things that are the food and fuel of lust. The temple stores shall be brought in again, and the vessels of the house of God put in their places; but the chambers must first be sprinkled with the water of purification, and so cleansed. Thus, when sin is cast out of the heart by repentance, let the blood of Christ be applied to it by faith, and then let it be furnished with the graces of God's Spirit for every good work.

Another grievance redressed by Nehemiah.

I. The Levites had been wronged. Their portions had not been given them, v. 10. The Levites were so modest as not to sue for them; for the Levites and singers fled every one to his field. This comes in as a reason either, 1. Why their payments were withheld. The Levites were non-residents: when they should have been doing their work about the temple, they were at their farms in the country; and therefore the people were little inclined to give them their maintenance. Or rather, 2. It is the reason why Nehemiah soon perceived that their dues had been denied them, because he missed them from their posts. "They have gone to get a livelihood for themselves and their families out of their grounds; for their profession would not maintain them." A scandalous maintenance makes a scandalous ministry.

II. Nehemiah laid the fault upon the rulers. Nehemiah began with the rulers, and called them to an account: "Why is the house of God forsaken? v. 11. Why are the Levites starved out of it?"

III. He delayed not to bring the dispersed Levites to their places again, and set them in their stations (as the word is), v. 11.

IV. He obliged the people to bring in their tithes, v. 12.

V. He provided that just and prompt payment should be made of the Levites' stipends. Commissioners were appointed to see to this (v. 13).

VI. Having no recompence from those for whom he did these good services, he looks up to God as his paymaster (v. 14): Remember me, O my God! concerning this. Nehemiah was a man much in pious ejaculations. He only prays, Remember me, not Reward me.

Verses 15–22

Another instance of that blessed reformation in which Nehemiah was so active. He revived sabbath-sanctification, and maintained the authority of the fourth commandment.

I. The law of the sabbath was very strict and much insisted on, and with good reason, for religion is never in the throne while sabbaths are trodden under foot. But Nehemiah discovered even in Judah this law was wretchedly violated. 1. The husbandmen trod their winepresses and brought home their corn on that day (v. 15), though there was an express command that in earing-time, and in harvest-time, they should rest on the sabbaths (Exod. xxxiv. 21). 2. The carriers loaded their asses with all manner of burdens, and made no scruple of it, though there was a particular proviso in the law for the cattle resting (Deut. v. 14) and that they should bear no burden on the sabbath day, Jer. xvii. 21. 3. The hawkers, and pedlars, and petty chapmen, that were men of Tyre, that famous trading city, sold all manner of wares on the sabbath day (v. 16).

II. The reformation of it.

1. He testified against those who profaned it, v. 15, and again v. 21.

2. He reasoned with the rulers concerning it, took the nobles of Judah to task, v. 17. He charges them with it: You do it. They did not carry corn, nor sell fish, but, they connived at those that did, and did not use their power to restrain them, and so made themselves guilty, as those magistrates do who bear the sword in vain. They set a bad example in other things. If the nobles allowed themselves in sports and recreations, in idle visits and idle talk, on the sabbath day, the men of business, both in city and country, would profane it by their worldly employments, as more justifiable. He reasons the case with them (v. 18). If they did not take warning, but returned to the same sins again, they had reason to expect further judgments: You bring more wrath upon Israel by profaning the sabbath.

3. He took care to prevent the profanation of the sabbath, as one that aimed only at reformation. If he could reform them, he would not punish them, and, if he should punish them, it was but that he might reform them. This is an example to magistrates to be heirs of restraint, and prudently to use the bit and bridle, that there may be no occasion for the lash. He ordered the gates of Jerusalem to be kept shut from the evening before the sabbath to the morning after, and set his own servants to watch them, that no burdens should be brought in on the sabbath day, nor late the night before, nor early in the morning after, lest sabbath time should be encroached upon, v. 19. He threatened those who came with goods to the gates, telling them that, if they came again, he would certainly lay hands on them (v. 21). He charged the Levites to take care about the due sanctifying of the sabbath, that they should cleanse themselves in the first place, and so give a good example to the people, and that they should some of them come and keep the gates, v. 22. Then there is likely to be a reformation, in this and other respects, when magistrates and ministers join their forces. The cure he wrought was lasting. In our Saviour's time, we find the Jews in the other extreme, over-scrupulous in the ceremonial part of Sabbath-sanctification.

4. He concludes this passage with a prayer (v. 22).

One instance more of Nehemiah's pious zeal for the purifying of his countrymen as a peculiar people to God.

I. They had corrupted themselves by marrying strange wives. This was complained of in Ezra's time, and much done towards a reformation, Ezra ix and x. Nehemiah, like a good governor, enquired into the state of the families of those that were under his charge, that he might reform what was amiss in them, and so heal the streams by healing the springs. He found that many of the Jews had married wives of Ashdod, of Ammon, and of Moab (v. 23). He talked with the children, and found they were children of strangers, for their speech betrayed them. The children were bred up with their mothers, and learned of them and their nurses and servants to speak, so that they could not speak the Jews' language, or not purely, but half in the speech of Ashdod, or Ammon, or Moab, according as the country was which the mother was a native of.

II. What course Nehemiah took to purge out this corruption.

1. He showed them the evil of it, and the obligation he lay under to witness against it. He quotes a precept, to prove that it was in itself a great sin; and makes them swear to that precept: You shall not give your daughters unto their sons, &c., which is taken from Deut. vii. 3. He quotes a precedent, to show the pernicious consequences of it, which made it necessary to be animadverted upon by the government (v. 26): Did not Solomon king of Israel sin by these things?

2. He showed himself highly displeased at it, that he might awaken them to a due sense of the evil of it: He contended with them, v. 25. He showed them how frivolous their excuses were, and argued it warmly with them. When he had silenced them he cursed them, that is, he denounced the judgments of God against them, and showed them what their sin deserved. Ezra, in this case, had plucked off his own hair, in holy sorrow for the sin; Nehemiah plucked off their hair, in a holy indignation at the sinners.

3. He obliged them not to take any more such wives, and separated those whom they had taken: He cleansed them from all strangers, both men and women (v. 30), and made them promise with an oath that they would never do so again, v. 25.

4. He took particular care of the priests' families, that they might not lie under this stain, this guilt. He found, upon enquiry, that a branch of the high priest's own family, one of his grandsons, had married a daughter of Sanballat, that notorious enemy of the Jews (ch. ii. 10; iv. 1), and so had, in effect, twisted interests with the Samaritans, v. 28. It seems this young priest would not put away his wife, and therefore Nehemiah chased him from him, deprived him, degraded him, and made him for ever incapable of the priesthood. Josephus says that this expelled priest was Manasseh, and that when Nehemiah drove him away he went to his father-in-law Sanballat, who built him a temple upon Mount Gerizim, like that at Jerusalem, and promised him he should be high priest in it, and that then was laid the foundation of the Samaritans' pretensions, which continued warm to our Saviour's time. Here are Nehemiah's prayers on this occasion. (1) He prays, Remember them, O my God! v. 29. "Lord, convince and convert them; put them in mind of what they should be and do, that they may come to themselves." (2) He prays, Remember me, O my God! v. 31.

THE BOOK OF ESTHER

God deals not with us according to our folly and weakness. Those Jews who were scattered in the provinces of the heathen were taken care of, as well as those who were gathered in the land of Judæa, and were wonderfully preserved, when doomed to destruction and appointed as sheep for the slaughter. Who drew up this story is uncertain. Mordecai was as able as any man to relate, on his own knowledge, the several passages of it. That he wrote such an account of them as was necessary to inform his people of the grounds of their observing the feast of Purim we are told (ch. ix. 20, Mordecai wrote these things, and sent them enclosed in letters to all the Jews). It is the narrative of a plot laid against the Jews to cut them all off. The name of God is not found in this book; but the apocryphal addition to it (which is not in the Hebrew, nor was ever received by the Jews into the canon), containing six chapters, begins thus, Then Mordecai said, God has done these things. But, though the name of God be not in it, the finger of God is, directing many minute events for the bringing about of his people's deliverance. In such ways as God here took to defeat Haman's plot he will still protect his people. I. How Esther came to be queen and Mordecai to be great at court, who were to be the instruments of the intended deliverance, ch. i., ii. II. Upon what provocation, and by what arts, Haman the Amalekite obtained an order for the destruction of all the Jews, ch. iii. III. The great distress the Jews were in, ch. iv. IV. The defeating of Haman's particular plot against Mordecai's life, ch. v.–vii. V. The defeating of his general plot against the Jews, ch. viii. VI. The care that was taken to perpetuate the remembrance of this, ch. ix., x.

CHAP. I

The design of recording the story is to show how way was made for Esther to the crown, in order to her being instrumental to defeat Haman's plot, and this long before the plot was laid, that we may observe and admire the foresight and vast reaches of Providence. Ahasuerus the king, I. In his height feasts all his great men, ver. 1–9. II. In his heat he divorces his queen, because she would not come to him when he sent for her, ver. 10–22. This shows how God serves his own purposes even by the sins and follies of men.

Verses 1–9

Which of the kings of Persia this Ahasuerus was the learned are not agreed. Mordecai is said to have been one of those that were carried captive from Jerusalem (ch. ii. 5, 6), whence it should seem that this Ahasuerus was one of the first kings of that empire. Dr. Lightfoot thinks that he was that Artaxerxes who hindered the building of the temple, who is called also Ahasuerus (Ezra iv. 6, 7), after his great-grandfather of the Medes, Dan. ix. 1.

I. Of the vast extent of his dominion. In the time of Darius and Cyrus there were but 120 provinces (Dan. vi. 1); now there were 127, from India to Ethiopia, v. 1. It had become an over-grown kingdom, which in time would sink with its own weight.

II. Of the great pomp and magnificence of his court. He made a most extravagant feast to show the riches of his glorious kingdom and the honour of his excellent majesty, v. 4. This was vain glory, to no purpose at all. If he had shown the riches of his kingdom as some of his successors did, in contributing towards the building of the temple (Ezra vi. 8; vii. 22), it would have turned to a much better account. Two feasts Ahasuerus made:—1. One for his nobles and princes, which lasted a hundred and eighty days, v. 3, 4. 2. Another was made for all the people, both great and small, which lasted seven days in the court of the garden, v. 5. The tents which were there pitched for the company, were very fine and rich; so were the beds and the pavement under their feet, v. 6.

III. Of the good order which in some respects was kept there notwithstanding. Yet the Chaldee paraphrase says that the vessels of the sanctuary were used in this feast, to the great grief of the pious Jews. Two things which are laudable from the account here given:—1. The drinking was according to the law, probably some law lately made; none did compel, no, not by a continual proposing of it (as Josephus explains it). This caution of a heathen prince, even when he would show his generosity, may shame many who are called Christians, who think they do not bid their friends welcome, unless they make them drunk, and, under pretence of sending the health round, send the sin round, and death with it. 2. There was no mixed dancing, Vashti feasted the women in her own apartment, in the royal house, v. 9. Thus, while the king showed the honour of his majesty, she and her ladies showed the honour of their modesty, which is truly the majesty of the fair sex.

Ahasuerus's feast; it ended in heaviness by his own folly. An unhappy falling out between the king and queen, broke off the feast abruptly, and sent the guests away silent and ashamed.

I. It was certainly the king's weakness to send for Vashti into his presence when he was drunk, and in company with gentlemen in the same condition. When his heart was merry with wine Vashti must come, well dressed as she was, with the crown on her head, that the princes and people might see what a handsome woman she was, v. 10, 11. Hereby, 1. He dishonoured himself as a husband, who ought to be to her a covering of the eyes (Gen. xx. 16), not to uncover them. 2. It was against the custom of the Persians for the women to appear in public, and he put a great hardship upon her when he did not court, but command her to do so uncouth a thing, and make her a show.

II. She refused to come (v. 12); though he sent his command by seven honourable messengers, yet she persisted in her denial. Had she come, while it was evident that she did it in pure obedience, it would have been no reflection upon her modesty. Perhaps she refused in a haughty manner, and then it was certainly evil; she scorned to come at the king's commandment. What a mortification was this to him!

III. The king thereupon grew outrageous. He that had rule over 127 provinces had no rule over his own spirit, but his anger burned in him, v. 12.

IV. Though he was very angry, he would not do anything till he advised with his privy-counsellors. Of these counsellors it is said that they were learned men, for they knew law and judgment,—that they were wise men, for they knew the times,—and that the king put great confidence in them and honour upon them, for they saw the king's face and sat first in the kingdom, v. 13, 14.

1. The question proposed to this cabinet-council (v. 15): What shall we do to the queen Vashti according to the law?

2. The proposal which Memucan made, that Vashti should be divorced for her disobedience. (1) He shows what would be the bad consequences of the queen's disobedience to her husband, if it were passed by. (2) He shows what would be the good consequence of a decree against Vashti that she should be divorced. Therefore they gave this judgment against her, that she come no more before the king, and this judgment so ratified as never to be reversed, v. 19.

3. The edict that passed according to this proposal, signifying that the queen was divorced for contumacy, according to the law, and that, if other wives were in like manner undutiful to their husbands, they must expect to be in like manner disgraced (v. 21, 22): were they better than the queen?

CHAP. II

Two things were working towards the deliverance of the Jews from Haman's conspiracy.—I. The advancement of Esther to be queen instead of Vashti. Many others were candidates for the honour (ver. 1–4); but Esther, an orphan, a captive-Jewess (ver. 5–7), recommended herself to the king's chamberlain first (ver. 8–11) and then to the king (ver 12–17), who made her queen, ver. 18–20 II. The good service that Mordecai did to the king in discovering a plot against his life, ver. 21–23.

Vashti being humbled for her height, Esther is advanced for her humility. Observe,

I. The extravagant course that was taken to please the king with another wife instead of Vashti. Josephus says that when his anger was over he would have been reconciled to Vashti but that, by the constitution of the government, the judgment was irrevocable. Therefore, to make him forget her, they contrived how to entertain him first with a great variety of concubines. All the provinces of his kingdom must be searched for fair young virgins, and officers appointed to choose them, v. 3. After the king had once taken them to his bed they were looked upon as secondary wives, were maintained by the king accordingly, and might not marry. We may see, by this instance, to what absurd practices those came who were destitute of divine revelation, and who, as a punishment for their idolatry, were given up to vile affections. Having broken through that law of creation which resulted from God's making man, they broke through another law, which was founded upon his making one man and one woman. See what need there was of the gospel of Christ to purify men from the lusts of the flesh and to reduce them to the original institution.

II. The overruling providence of God bringing Esther to be queen. She came in her turn, after several others, and it was found that Esther excelled them all. Concerning Esther,

1. Her origin and character. (1) She was one of the children of the captivity, a Jewess and a sharer with her people in their bondage. (2) She was an orphan; her father and mother were both dead (v. 7), but, when they had forsaken her, then the Lord took her up, Ps. xxvii. 10. (3) She was a beauty, fair of form, good of countenance; so it is in the margin, v. 7. Her wisdom and virtue were her greatest beauty, but it is an advantage to a diamond to be well set. (4) Mordecai, her cousin-german, was her guardian, brought her up, and took her for his own daughter. Let God be acknowledged in raising up friends for the fatherless and motherless; let it be an encouragement to that pious instance of charity that many who have taken care of the education of orphans have lived to see the good fruit of their care and pains, abundantly to their comfort. Mordecai being Esther's guardian we are told, [1] How tender he was of her, as if she had been his own child (v. 11). [2] How respectful she was to him. Though in relation she was his equal, yet, being in age and dependance his inferior, she honoured him as her father—did his commandment, v. 20. She did not show her people or her kindred, because Mordecai had charged her that she should not, v. 10. He did not bid her tell a lie to conceal her parentage; he only told her not to proclaim her country. She being born in Shushan, and her parents being dead, all took her to be of Persian extraction.

2. Her preferment. Who would have thought that a Jewess, a captive, an orphan, was born to be a queen, an empress! The king's chamberlain honoured her (v. 9), and was ready to serve her. The king himself fell in love with her. The more natural beauty is the more agreeable. The king loved Esther above all the women, v. 17. Now he needed not to take time to deliberate; he is soon determined to set the royal crown upon her head, and make her queen, v. 17. This was done in his seventh year (v. 16). He graced the solemnity of her coronation with a royal feast (v. 18). He also granted a release to the provinces, either a remittance of the taxes in arrear or an act of grace for criminals. Esther still did the commandment of Mordecai, as when she was brought up with him, v. 20. Mordecai sat in the king's gate; that was the height of his preferment: he was one of the porters or door-keepers of the court.

This good service which Mordecai did to the government, in discovering a plot against the life of the king, is here recorded, because the mention of it will again occur to his advantage. No step is yet taken towards Haman's design of the Jews' destruction, but several steps are taken towards God's design of their deliverance. God now gives Mordecai an opportunity of doing the king a good turn, that he might have the fairer opportunity afterwards of doing the Jews a good turn. 1. A design was laid against the king by two of his own servants, who sought to lay hands on him, not only to make him a prisoner, but to take away his life, v. 21. 2. Mordecai got notice of their treason, and, by Esther's means, discovered it to the king, hereby confirming her in and recommending himself to the king's favour. 3. The traitors were hanged, as they deserved, but not till their treason was, upon search, fully proved against them (v. 23), and the whole matter was recorded in the king's journals, with a particular remark that Mordecai was the man who discovered the treason.

CHAP. III

A very black and mournful scene here opens, which threatens the ruin of all the people of God. I. Haman is made the king's favourite, ver. 1. II. Mordecai refuses to give him the honour he demands, ver. 2–4. III. Haman, for his sake, vows to be revenged upon all the Jews, ver. 5, 6. IV. He, upon a malicious suggestion, obtains an order from the king to have them all massacred upon a certain day, ver. 7–13. V. This order is dispersed through the kingdom, ver. 14, 15.

Verses 1–6

I. Haman advanced by the prince, and adored thereupon by the people. Haman was an Agagite (an Amalekite, says Josephus), probably of the descendants of Agag, a common name of the princes of Amalek, as appears, Num. xxiv. 7. The king took a fancy to him (princes are not bound to give reasons for their favours), made him his favourite, his confidant, his prime-minister of state. It is plain that he was not a man of honour or justice, of any true courage or steady conduct, but proud, and passionate, and revengeful; yet was he promoted, and caressed, and there was none so great as he.

II. Mordecai adhering to his principles with a bold and daring resolution, and therefore refusing to reverence Haman as the rest of the king's servants did, v. 2. He was urged to it by his friends. They spoke daily to him (v. 4), to persuade him to conform, but all in vain: he hearkened not to them, but told them plainly that he was a Jew, and could not in conscience do it. It does not appear that anyone scrupled at conforming to it except Mordecai; and yet his refusal was pious, conscientious, and pleasing to God, for the religion of a Jew forbade him, 1. To give such extravagant honours as were required to any mortal man, especially so wicked a man as Haman was. In the apocryphal chapters of this book (ch. xiii. 12–14) Mordecai is brought in thus appealing to God in this matter: Thou knowest, Lord, that it was neither in contempt nor pride, nor for any desire of glory, that I did not bow down to proud Haman, for I could have been content with goodwill, for the salvation of Israel, to kiss the soles of his feet; but I did this that I might not prefer the glory of man above the glory of God, neither will I worship any but thee. 2. He especially thought it a piece of injustice to his nation to give such honour to an Amalekite, one of that nation with which God had sworn that he would have perpetual war (Exod. xvii. 16) and concerning which he had given that solemn charge (Deut. xxv. 17), Remember what Amalek did.

III. Haman meditating revenge. Some that hoped thereby to curry favour with Haman took notice to him of Mordecai's rudeness, waiting to see whether he would bend or break, v. 4. Haman then observed it himself, and was full of wrath, v. 5. It is soon resolved that Mordecai must die. Haman thinks his life nothing towards a satisfaction for the affront: thousands of innocent and valuable lives must be sacrificed to his indignation; and therefore he vows the destruction of all the people of Mordecai, for his sake, because his being a Jew was the reason he gave why he did not reverence Haman.

Haman doubts not but to find desperate and bloody hands enough to cut all their throats if the king will but give him leave. He obtained leave, and commission to do it.

I. He makes a false and malicious representation of the Jews, and their character, to the king, v. 8. He would have the king believe, 1. That the Jews were a despicable people, and that it was not for his credit to harbour them: "A certain people there is, scattered abroad and dispersed in all the provinces as fugitives and vagabonds on the earth, and inmates in all countries, the burden and scandal of the places where they live." 2. That they were a dangerous people. "They have laws of their own, and conform not to the statutes of the kingdom, and may be looked upon as disaffected to the government, which may end in a rebellion."

II. He bids leave to destroy them all, v. 9. He knew there were many that hated the Jews. Let it be written therefore that they may be destroyed. Give but orders for a general massacre of all the Jews. If the king will gratify him in this matter, he will make him a present of ten thousand talents, which shall be paid into the king's treasuries. This, he thought, would obviate the strongest objection that the government must needs sustain loss in its revenues by the destruction of so many of its subjects. No doubt Haman knew how to re-imburse himself out of the spoil of the Jews, which his janizaries were to seize for him (v. 13), and so to make them bear the charges of their own ruin.

III. He obtains what he desired, a full commission to do what he would with the Jews, v. 10, 11. The king was so bewitched with Haman, that he was willing to believe the worst concerning the Jews, and therefore he gave them up into his hands, as lambs to the lion: The people are thine, do with them as it seemeth good unto thee. So little did he consider how much Haman would gain in the spoil, that he gave him withal the ten thousand talents: The silver is thine.

IV. He then consults with his soothsayers to find out a lucky day for the designed massacre, v. 7. The resolve was taken up in the first month, in the twelfth year of the king, when Esther had been his wife about five years. The lot fell upon the twelfth month, so that Mordecai and Esther had eleven months for the defeating of the design. Haman, though eager to have the Jews cut off, yet will submit to the laws of his superstition. God's wisdom serves its own purposes by men's folly. Haman has appealed to the lot, and to the lot he shall go, which, by adjourning the execution, gives judgment against him and breaks the neck of the plot.

V. The bloody edict is drawn up, signed, and published, giving orders to the militia of every province to be ready against the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, and, on that day, to murder all the Jews, men, women, and children, and seize their effects, v. 12–14. No crime is laid to their charge; but die they must, without mercy.

VI. The different temper of the court and city hereupon. The court was very merry upon it: The king and Haman sat down to drink. Haman was afraid lest the king's conscience should smite him for what he had done, to prevent which he kept him drinking. This cursed method many take to drown their convictions, and harden their own hearts and the hearts of others in sin. The city was very sad upon it: The city of Shushan was perplexed, not only the Jews themselves, but all their neighbours that had any principles of justice and compassion. It grieved them to see men that lived peaceably treated so barbarously. But the king and Haman cared for none of these things.

CHAP. IV

Things here begin to work towards a deliverance, and they begin at the right end. I. The Jews' friends lay to heart the danger and lament it, ver. 1–4. II. Matters are concerted between Mordecai and Esther for the preventing of it. 1. Esther enquires into this case, and received a particular account of it, ver 5 7. 2. Mordecai urges her to intercede with the king for a revocation of the edict, ver. 8, 9. III. Esther objects the danger of addressing the king uncalled, ver. 10–13. IV. Mordecai presses her to venture, ver. 13, 14. V. Esther, after a religious fast of three days, promises to do so (ver. 15–17), and we shall find that she sped well.

Verses 1–4

An account of the general sorrow that there was among the Jews upon the publishing of Haman's bloody edict against them. 1. Mordecai cried bitterly, rent his clothes, and put on sackcloth, v. 1, 2. He not only thus vented his grief, but proclaimed it, that all might take notice of it that he was not ashamed to own himself a friend to the Jews, and a fellow-sufferer with them. It was nobly done thus publicly to espouse what he knew to be a righteous cause, and the cause of God, even when it seemed a desperate and a sinking cause. Mordecai knew that Haman's spite was against him primarily, and that it was for his sake that the rest of the Jews were struck at; and therefore it troubled him greatly that his people should suffer for his scruples. But, being able to appeal to God that what he did he did from a principle of conscience, he could with comfort commit his own cause and that of his people to him. Notice is here taken of a law that none might enter into the king's gate clothed with sackcloth. None must come near the king in a mourning dress, because he was not willing to hear the complaints of such. Nothing but what was gay and pleasant must appear at court. This obliged Mordecai to keep his distance, and only to come before the gate, not to take his place in the gate. 2. All the Jews in every province laid it much to heart, v. 2. They denied themselves the comfort of their tables (for they fasted and mingled tears with their meat and drink), and they lay in sackcloth and ashes. 3. Esther the queen, upon a general intimation of the trouble Mordecai was in, was exceedingly grieved, v. 4. Mordecai's grief was hers, and the Jews' danger was her distress. Esther sent change of raiment to Mordecai, but because he would make her sensible of the greatness of his grief, and consequently of the cause of it, he received it not, but was as one that refused to be comforted.

Verses 5–17

So strictly did the laws of Persia confine the wives, especially the king's wives, that it was not possible for Mordecai to have a conference with Esther, but divers messages are here carried between them by Hatach, whom the king had appointed to attend her.

I. She sent to Mordecai to know more fully what the trouble was which he was now lamenting (v. 5) and why it was that he would not put off his sackcloth.

II. Mordecai sent her an authentic account of the whole matter, with a charge to her to intercede with the king: Mordecai told him all that had happened unto him (v. 7), what a pique Haman had against him for not bowing to him, and by what arts he had procured this edict. He sent her also a true copy of the edict, that she might see what imminent danger she and her people were in, and charged her, if she had any respect for him or any kindness for the Jewish nation, that she should rectify the misinformations with which the king was imposed upon.

III. She sent her case to Mordecai, that she could not, without peril of her life, address the king.

1. The law was express, and all knew it, that whosoever came to the king uncalled should be put to death, unless he was pleased to hold out the golden sceptre to them. This made the royal palace little better than a royal prison, and the kings themselves could not but become morose. It was bad for their subjects; for what good had they of a king that they might never have liberty to apply to for the redress of grievances. It is not thus in the court of the King of kings; to the footstool of his throne of grace we may at any time come boldly, and may be sure of an answer of peace to the prayer of faith. It was particularly very uncomfortable for their wives (for there was not a proviso in the law to except them).

2. Her case was at present very discouraging. Providence so ordered it that, just at this juncture, she was under a cloud, and the king's affections cooled towards her, for she had been kept from his presence thirty days.

IV. Mordecai still insisted upon it that, whatever hazard she might run, she must apply to the king in this great affair, v. 13, 14. He suggested to her, 1. That it was her own cause, for that the decree to destroy all the Jews did not except her: "Think not therefore that thou shalt escape in the king's house, that the palace will be thy protection, and the crown save thy head: no, thou art a Jewess, and, if the rest be cut off, thou wilt be cut off too." 2. That it was a cause which, one way or other, would certainly be carried, and which therefore she might safely venture in. "If thou shouldst decline the service, enlargement and deliverance will arise to the Jews from another place." This was the language of a strong faith, which staggered not at the promise when the danger was most threatening, but against hope believed in hope. 3. That if she deserted her friends now, through cowardice and unbelief, she would have reason to fear that some judgment from heaven would be the ruin of her and her family: "Thou and thy father's house shall be destroyed, when the rest of the families of the Jews shall be preserved." 4. That divine Providence had an eye to this in bringing her to be queen: "Who knows whether thou hast come to the kingdom for such a time as this?" We should every one of us consider for what end God has put us in the place where we are, and, when any particular opportunity of serving God and our generation offers itself, we must take care that we do not let it slip. These things Mordecai urges to Esther; and some of the Jewish writers, who are fruitful in invention, add another thing which had happened to him (v. 7) which he desired she might be told, "that going home, the night before, in great heaviness, upon the notice of Haman's plot, he met three Jewish children coming from school, of whom he enquired what they had learned that day; one of them told him his lesson was, Prov. iii. 25, 26, Be not afraid of sudden fear; the second told him his was, Isa. viii. 10, Take counsel together, and it shall come to nought; the third told him his was Isa. xlvi. 4, I have made, and I will bear, even I will carry and will deliver you.

V. Esther hereupon resolved, whatever it might cost her, to apply to the king, but not till she and her friends had first applied to God. Let them first by fasting and prayer obtain God's favour, and then she should hope to find favour with the king, v. 15, 16. She spoke,

1. With the piety and devotion that became an Israelite, for she believed that God's favour was obtained by prayer. She knew it was the practice of good people, in extraordinary cases, to join fasting with prayer. She therefore, (1) Desired that Mordecai would direct the Jews that were in Shushan to sanctify a fast and call a solemn assembly, to meet in the respective synagogues to which they belonged, and to pray for her, and to keep a solemn fast. (2) She promised that she and her family would sanctify this fast in her apartment of the palace, for she might not come to their assemblies. Those who are confined to privacy may join their prayers with those of the solemn assemblies of God's people; those that are absent in body may be present in spirit.

2. With the courage and resolution that became a queen. "When we have sought God in this matter, I will go in unto the king to intercede for my people. I know it is not according to the king's law, but it is according to God's law; and therefore I will venture, and, if I perish, I perish. I cannot lose my life in a better cause. Better do my duty and die with them." She said not this in despair or passion, but in a holy resolution to do her duty and trust God with the issue.

CHAP. V

The last news we had of Haman left him in his cups, ch iii. 15. Our last news of Queen Esther left her in tears, fasting and praying. Now this chapter brings in, I. Esther in her joys, smiled upon by the king and honoured with his company at her banquet of wine, ver. 1–8. II. Haman upon the fret, because he had not Mordecai's cap and knee, and with great indignation setting up a gallows for him, ver. 9–14.

Verses 1–8

I. Esther's bold approach to the king, v. 1. When the time appointed for their fast was finished she lost no time, but on the third day, when the impressions of her devotions were fresh upon her spirit, she addressed the king. Now she put on her royal apparel, that she might the better recommend herself to the king, and laid aside her fast-day clothes. In the Apocrypha (Esther xiv. 16), she thus appeals to God: Thou knowest, Lord, I abhor the sign of my high estate which is upon my head, in the days wherein I show myself, &c. She stood in the inner court over against the king, expecting her doom, between hope and fear.

II. The favourable reception which the king gave her. When he saw her she obtained favour in his sight.

The apocryphal author and Josephus say that she took two maids with her, on one of whom she leaned, while the other bore up her train,—that her countenance was cheerful and very amiable, but her heart was in anguish,—that the king, lifting up his countenance that shone with majesty, at first looked very fiercely upon her, whereupon she grew pale, and fainted, and bowed herself on the head of the maid that went by her; but then God changed the spirit of the king, and, in a fear, he leaped from his throne, took her in his arms till she came to herself, and comforted her with loving words. Here we are only told,

1. That he protected her from the law, and assured her of safety, by holding out to her the golden sceptre (v. 2), which she thankfully touched the top of, thereby presenting herself to him as a humble petitioner.

2. That he encouraged her address (v. 3): What wilt thou, queen Esther, and what is thy request? Esther feared that she should perish, but was promised that she should have what she might ask for, though it were the half of the kingdom. Let us from this story infer, as our Saviour does from the parable of the unjust judge, an encouragement to pray always to our God, and not faint, Luke xviii. 6–8. Esther came to a proud imperious man; we come to the God of love and grace. She was not called; we are: the Spirit says, Come, and the bride says, Come. She had a law against her; we have a promise, many a promise, in favour of us: Ask, and it shall be given you. She had no friend to introduce her, or intercede for her, while on the contrary he that was then the king's favourite was her enemy; but we have an advocate with the Father, in whom he is well pleased. Let us therefore come boldly to the throne of grace.

3. That all the request she had to make to him, at this time, was that he would please to come to a banquet which she had prepared for him, and bring Haman along with him, v. 4, 5. She would endeavour to bring him into a pleasant humour, and soften his spirit, that he might with the more tenderness receive the complaint she had to make to him. She would please him, by making court to Haman his favourite, and inviting him to come whose company she knew he loved and whom she desired to have present when she made her complaint.

4. That he readily came, and ordered Haman to come along with him (v. 5). There he renewed his kind enquiry (What is thy petition?) and his generous promise, that it should be granted, even to the half of the kingdom (v. 6), a proverbial expression, by which he assured her that he would deny her nothing in reason.

5. That then Esther thought fit to ask no more than a promise that he would please to accept of another treat, the next day, in her apartment, and Haman with him (v. 7, 8), intimating to him that then she would let him know what her business was. The putting of it off thus she knew would be well taken as an expression of the great reverence she had for the king, and her unwillingness to be too pressing upon him.

Verses 9–14

Haman, in whom pride and wrath had so much the ascendant,

I. Puffed up with the honour of being invited to Esther's feast. He was joyful and glad of heart at it, v. 9. He thought it was because she was exceedingly charmed with his conversation that the next day she had invited him also to come with the king.

II. Mordecai was as determined as ever: He stood not up, nor moved for him, v. 9. Haman can as ill bear it as ever; nay, the higher he is lifted up, the more impatient is he of contempt and the more enraged at it. Gladly would he have drawn his sword and run Mordecai through for affronting him thus; but he hoped shortly to see him fall with all the Jews, and therefore with much ado prevailed with himself to forbear stabbing him.

III. Meditating revenge, Haman was assisted by his wife and his friends, v. 14. For the pleasing of his fancy they advise him to get a gallows ready, and have it set up before his own door, that, as soon as ever he could get the warrant signed, there might be no delay of the execution. This is very agreeable to Haman, who has the gallows made and fixed immediately; it must be fifty cubits high, for the greater disgrace of Mordecai and to make him a spectacle to everyone that passed by. They advised him to go early in the morning to the king, and get an order from him for the hanging of Mordecai.

CHAP. VI

A very surprising scene opens in this chapter. Haman, when he hoped to be Mordecai's judge, was made his page, to his great confusion and mortification; and thus way was made for the defeat of Haman's plot and the deliverance of the Jews. I. The providence of God recommends Mordecai in the night to the king's favour, ver. 1–3. II. Haman, who came to incense the king against him, is employed as an instrument of the king's favour to him, ver. 4–11. III. From this his friends read him his doom, which is executed in the next chapter, ver. 12–14.

Verses 1–3

When Satan put it into the heart of Haman to contrive Mordecai's death, God put it into the heart of the king to contrive Mordecai's honour. The steps which Providence took towards the advancement of Mordecai.

I. On that night could not the king sleep. His sleep fled away (so the word is); and perhaps, like a shadow, the more carefully he pursued it the further it went from him.

II. When he could not sleep he called to have the book of records, the Journals of his reign, read to him, v. 1. But God put it into his heart to call for it, rather than for music or songs, which would have been more likely to compose him to rest.

III. The servant that read to him lighted on that article which concerned Mordecai. Among other things it was found written that Mordecai had discovered a plot against the life of the king which prevented the execution of it, v. 2. How Mordecai's good service was recorded we read ch. ii. 23, and here it is found upon record.

IV. The king enquired what honour and dignity had been done to Mordecai for this, suspecting that this good service had gone unrewarded.

V. The servants informed him that nothing had been done to Mordecai for that eminent service; in the king's gate he sat before, and there he still sat. Humility, modesty, and self-denial, though in God's account of great price, yet commonly hinder men's preferment in the world. Mordecai rises no higher than the king's gate, while proud ambitious Haman gets the king's ear and heart; but, though the aspiring rise fast, the humble stand fast. Mordecai is at this time, by the king's edict, doomed to destruction, with all the Jews, though it is owned that he deserved dignity.

Verses 4–11

It is now morning, and people begin to stir.

I. Haman is so impatient to get Mordecai hanged that he comes early to court, before any other business is brought to get a warrant for his execution (v. 4), which he makes sure that he shall have at the first word. He could tell the king that he was so confident of the justice of his request, and the king's favour to him in it, that he had got the gallows ready: one word from the king would complete his satisfaction.

II. The king is so impatient to have Mordecai honoured that he sends to know who is in the court that is fit to be employed in it. Word is brought him that Haman is in the court, v. 5. Let him come in, says the king, the fittest man to be made use of both in directing and in dispensing the king's favour; and the king knew nothing of any quarrel he had with Mordecai. Haman is brought in immediately, proud of the honour done him in being admitted into the king's bed-chamber before he was up. Now Haman thinks he has the fairest opportunity he can wish for to solicit against Mordecai; but the king's heart is as full as his, and it is fit he should speak first.

III. The king asks Haman how he should express his favour to one whom he had marked for a favourite: What shall be done to the man whom the king delights to honour? v. 6.

IV. Haman concludes that he himself is the favourite intended, and therefore prescribes the highest expressions of honour that could be bestowed upon a subject. Now Haman thinks he is carving out honour for himself, and therefore does it very liberally, v. 8, 9.

V. The king confounds him with a positive order that he should immediately go himself and put all this honour upon Mordecai the Jew, v. 10. If the king had but said, as Haman expected, Thou art the man! But how is he thunderstruck when the king bids him not to order all this to be done, but to do it himself to Mordecai the Jew, the very man he hated above all men and whose ruin he was now designing!

VI. Haman dares not dispute nor so much as seem to dislike the king's order, but, with the greatest reluctance brings it to Mordecai, who did no more cringe to Haman now than he had done, valuing his counterfeit respect no more than he had valued his concealed malice. The apparel is brought, Mordecai is dressed up, and rides in state through the city, recognized as the king's favourite, v. 11.

Verses 12–14

I. How little Mordecai was puffed up with his advancement. He came again to the king's gate (v. 12); he returned to his place and the duty of it immediately, and minded his business as closely as he had done before.

II. How much Haman was cast down with his disappointment. To wait upon any man, especially Mordecai, and at this time, when he hoped to have seen him hanged, was enough to break such a proud heart.

III. How his doom was read to him by his wife and his friends: "If Mordecai be, as they say he is, of the seed of the Jews, before whom thou hast begun to fall, never expect to prevail against him; for thou shalt surely fall before him," v. 13. This Mordecai was of the seed of the Jews; feeble Jews their enemies sometimes called them, but formidable Jews they sometimes found them. They are a holy seed, a praying seed, in covenant with God, and a seed that the Lord hath all along blessed, and therefore let not their enemies expect to triumph over them.

IV. He was now sent for to the banquet that Esther had prepared, v. 14. He thought it seasonable in hopes it would revive his drooping spirits and save his sinking honour.

CHAP. VII

The second banquet to which the king and Haman were invited: and there, I. Esther presents her petition to the king for her life and the life of her people, ver. 1–4. II. She plainly tells the king that Haman is the man who designed her ruin and the ruin of all her friends, ver. 5, 6. III. The king thereupon gave orders for the hanging of Haman upon the gallows that he had prepared for Mordecai, which was done accordingly, ver. 7–10.

Verses 1–6

The king in humour, and Haman out of humour, meet at Esther's table.

I. The king urged Esther, a third time, to tell him what her request was, for he longed to know, and repeated his promise that it should be granted, v. 2.

II. Esther, at length, surprises the king with a petition for the preservation of herself and her countrymen from death and destruction, v. 3, 4. That a friend, a wife, should have occasion to present such a petition was very affecting: Let my life be given me at my petition, and my people at my request. To move the king the more she suggests she and her people were bought and sold. They had not sold themselves by any offence against the government, but were sold to gratify the pride and revenge of one man. That it was not their liberty only, but their lives that were sold. "Had we been sold" (says she) "into slavery, I would not have complained; for in time we might have recovered our liberty, though the king would have made but a bad bargain of it. Whatever had been paid for us, the loss of so many industrious hands out of his kingdom would have been more damage to the treasury than the price would countervail." We are sold (says she) to be destroyed, to be slain, and to perish. She refers to the words of the decree (ch. iii. 13), which aimed at nothing short of their destruction.

III. The king stands amazed at the remonstrance, and asks (v. 5). "Who is he, and where is he, that durst presume in his heart to do so? We sometimes startle at the mention of that evil which yet we ourselves are chargeable with. Ahasuerus is amazed at that wickedness which he himself was guilty of; for he consented to that bloody edict against the Jews. Thou art the man, might Esther too truly have said.

IV. Esther plainly charges Haman with it before his face: "Here he is, let him speak for himself, for therefore he is invited: The adversary and enemy is this wicked Haman (v. 6); it is he that has designed our murder."

V. Haman is apprehensive of his danger: He was afraid before the king and queen; and it was time for him to fear when the queen was his prosecutor, the king his judge, and his own conscience a witness against him.

Verses 7–10

I. The king retires in anger. He rose from table in a great passion, and went into the palace garden to cool himself and to consider what was to be done, v. 7. He blames himself, that he should be such a fool as to doom a guiltless nation to destruction, and his own queen among the rest, upon the base suggestions of a self-seeking man, without examining the truth of his allegations. He condemned Haman whom he had laid in his bosom, that he should be such a villain as to draw him to consent to so wicked a measure.

II. Haman becomes a humble petitioner to the queen for his life. He might easily perceive by the king's hastily flying out of the room that there was evil determined against him. How mean Haman looks, when he stands up first and then falls down at Esther's feet, to beg she would save his life and take all he had. How great Esther looks, who of late had been neglected and doomed! Now her sworn enemy owns that he lies at her mercy, and begs his life at her hand. The day is coming when those that hate and persecute God's chosen ones would gladly be beholden to them.

III. The king returns yet more exasperated against Haman.

IV. Those about him were ready to be the instruments of his wrath. The courtiers that adored Haman when he was the rising sun set themselves as much against him now that he is a falling star. As soon as the king spoke an angry word they covered Haman's face, as a condemned man; they marked him for execution. Those that are hanged commonly have their faces covered. One of those that had been lately sent to Haman's house, to fetch him to the banquet, informed the king of the gallows which Haman had prepared for Mordecai, v. 9.

V. The king gave orders that he should be hanged upon his own gallows, which was done accordingly.

CHAP. VIII

I. His plot was to raise an estate for himself; and all his estate, being confiscated for treason, is given to Esther and Mordecai, ver. 1, 2. II. His plot was to ruin the Jews; and as to that, 1. Esther earnestly intercedes for the reversing of the edict against them, ver. 3–6. 2. It is in effect done by another edict, here published, empowering the Jews to stand up in their own defence against their enemies, ver. 7–14. III. This occasions great joy to the Jews and all their friends, ver. 15–17.

Verses 1–2

1. Esther enriched. Haman was hanged as a traitor, therefore his estate was forfeited to the crown, and the king gave it all to Esther. 2. Mordecai advanced. His procession, this morning, through the streets of the city, was but a sudden blaze of honour; but here we have the more durable preferments to which he was raised. He is owned as the queen's cousin, which till now, though Esther had been four years queen, the king did not know. So humble, so modest, a man was Mordecai, and so far from being ambitious of a place at court, that he concealed his relation to the queen, and her obligations to him as her guardian. Now, at length, Esther had told what he was to her, near akin, who took care of her when she was an orphan, and one whom she still respected as a father. All the trust he had reposed in Haman, and all the power he had given him, are here transferred to Mordecai; for the ring which he had taken from Haman he gave to Mordecai, and made this trusty humble man his confidant. The queen makes him her steward, for the management of Haman's estate, She set Mordecai over the house of Haman.

Verses 3–14

Haman, the chief enemy of the Jews, was hanged, Mordecai and Esther, their chief friends, were sufficiently protected; but many others there were in the king's dominions that hated the Jews and desired their ruin, and to their rage and malice all the rest of that people lay exposed for the edict against them was still in force.

I. The queen here makes intercession with much affection and importunity. She came, a second time, uncalled into the king's presence (v. 3), and was as before encouraged to present her petition, by the king's holding out the golden sceptre to her, v. 4. Her petition is that the king, having put away Haman, would put away the mischief of Haman and his device against the Jews. This petition Esther presents with much affection: She fell down at the king's feet and besought him with tears (v. 3), every tear as precious as any of the pearls with which she was adorned. If it please the king and if I have found favour in his sight—and again, "If the thing itself seem right and reasonable before the king, and if I that ask it be pleasing in his eyes, let the decree be reversed." She enforces her petition with a pathetic plea: "For how can I endure to see the evil that shall come upon my people?"

II. The king here takes a course for the preventing of the mischief that Haman had designed. The king knew, and informed the queen, that, according to the constitution of the Persian government, the former edict could not be revoked (v. 8): What is written in the king's name, and sealed with the king's ring, may not, under any pretence whatsoever, be reversed. Yet he found an expedient to undo the devices of Haman, and defeat his design, by singing and publishing another decree to authorize the Jews to stand upon their defence, vim vi repellere, et invasorem occidere—to oppose force to force, and destroy the assailant. This would be their effectual security. "Write for the Jews as it liketh you (v. 8), saving only the honour of our constitution. Let the mischief be put away as effectually as may be without reversing the letters." This edict was to be drawn up and published in the respective languages of all the provinces. The purport of this decree was to commission the Jews, upon the day which was appointed for their destruction, to draw together in a body for their own defence. And, 1. To stand for their life, that, whoever assaulted them, it might be at their peril. 2. They might not only act defensively, but might destroy, and slay, and cause to perish, all the power of the people that would assault them. Now, (1) This showed his kindness to the Jews, and sufficiently provided for their safety; for the latter decree would be looked upon as a tacit revocation of the former. But, (2) It shows the absurdity of their constitution that none of the king's edicts might be repealed; for it laid the king here under a necessity of enacting a civil war in his own dominions, between the Jews and their enemies, so that both sides took up arms by his authority, and yet against his authority.

Verses 15–17

Here is a blessed change, Mordecai in purple and all the Jews in joy. 1. Mordecai in purple, v. 15. Having obtained an order for the relief of all the Jews, he was easy, he put on the royal apparel. His robes were rich, blue and white, of fine linen and purple; so was his coronet: it was of gold. These things were marks of the king's favour, and the fruit of God's favour to his church. The city Shushan was sensible of its advantage in the preferment of Mordecai, and therefore rejoiced and was glad. 2. The Jews in joy, v. 16, 17. The Jews, who awhile ago were under a dark cloud, dejected and disgraced, now had light and gladness, joy and honour, a feast and a good day. One good effect of this deliverance was that many of the people of the land, that were considerate, sober, and well inclined, became Jews, were proselyted to the Jewish religion, renounced idolatry, and worshipped the true God only. We will go with you, for we have heard, we have seen, that God is with you, the shield of your help, and the sword of your excellency, Deut. xxxiii. 29.

CHAP. IX

Two royal edicts in force, both given at the court of Shushan, one bearing date the thirteenth day of the first month, appointing that on the thirteenth day of the twelfth month then next ensuing all the Jews should be killed; another bearing date the twenty-third day of the third month, empowering the Jews, on the day appointed for their slaughter, to draw the sword in their own defence. The Jews' cause was to be tried by battle and the day was fixed by authority. Their enemies resolved not to lose the advantages given them by the first edict, in hope to overpower them by numbers; the Jews relied on the goodness of their God and the justice of their cause. I. What a glorious day it was, that year, to the Jews, and the two days following—a day of victory and triumph, both in the city Shushan and in all the rest of the king's provinces, ver. 1–19. II. What a memorable day it was made to posterity, by an annual feast, in commemoration of this great deliverance, called "the feast of Purim", ver. 20–32.

Verses 1–19

A decisive battle fought between the Jews and their enemies, in which the Jews were victorious. Neither side could call the other rebels, for they were both supported by the royal authority.

I. The enemies of the Jews were the aggressors.

II. But the Jews were the conquerors. That very day when the king's decree for their destruction was to be put in execution, and which the enemies thought would have been their day, proved God's day, Ps. xxxvii. 13. They gathered themselves together in their cities, embodied, and stood upon their defence, offering violence to none, but bidding defiance to all. If they had not had an edict to warrant them, they durst not have done it, but, being so supported, they strove lawfully. Had they acted separately, each family apart, they would have been an easy prey to their enemies; but acting in concert, and gathering together in their cities, they strengthened one another, and durst face their enemies. All the officers of the king, who, by the bloody edict, were ordered to help forward their destruction (ch. iii. 12, 13), conformed to the latter edict and helped the Jews, which turned the scale on their side, v. 3. The provinces would generally do as the rulers of the provinces inclined, and therefore their favouring the Jews would greatly further them. But why did they help them? Not because they had any kindness for them, but because the fear of Mordecai fell upon them, he having manifestly the countenance both of God and the king. No man could withstand them (v. 2), but they did what they would to those that hated them, v. 5. So strangely were the Jews strengthened and animated, and their enemies weakened and dispirited, that none of those who had marked themselves for their destruction escaped. On the thirteenth day of the month Adar they slew in the city Shushan 500 men (v. 6) and the ten sons of Haman, v. 10. On the fourteenth day they slew in Shushan 300 more, who had escaped the sword on the former day of execution, v. 15. This Esther obtained leave of the king for them to do, for the greater terror of their enemies, and the utter crushing of that malignant party of men. That which justifies them in the execution of so many is that they did it in their own just and necessary defence; they stood for their lives, authorized to do so by the law of self-preservation, as well as by the king's decree. The king's commission had warranted them to take the spoil of their enemies for a prey (ch. viii. 11), and a fair opportunity they had of enriching themselves with it. But the Jews would not do so by them, 1. That they might, to the honour of their religion, evidence a holy and generous contempt of worldly wealth, in imitation of their father Abraham, who scorned to enrich himself with the spoils of Sodom. 2. That they might make it to appear that they aimed at nothing but their own preservation, and used their interest at court for the saving of their lives, not for the raising of their estates. 3. Their commission empowered them to destroy the families of their enemies, even the little ones and the women, ch. viii. 11. But their humanity forbade them to do that. They slew none but those they found in arms; and therefore they did not take the spoil, but left it to the women and little ones. Herein they acted with a consideration and compassion well worthy of imitation.

Verses 20–32

To perpetuate the remembrance of it to posterity,

I. The history was written, and copies of it were dispersed among all the Jews in all the provinces of the empire, both nigh and far, v. 20. Mordecai wrote all these things. And if this book be the same that he wrote, as many think it is, what a difference there is between Mordecai's style and Nehemiah's. Nehemiah, at every turn, takes notice of divine Providence and the good hand of his God upon him, which is very proper to stir up devout affections in the minds of his readers; but Mordecai never so much as mentions the name of God in the whole story. Nehemiah wrote his book at Jerusalem, where religion was in fashion. Mordecai wrote his at Shushan the palace, where policy reigned more than piety, and he wrote according to the genius of the place. Because there is so little of the language of Canaan in this book, many think it was not written by Mordecai, but was an extract out of the journals of the kings of Persia.

II. A festival was instituted, to be observed yearly from generation to generation by the Jews, in remembrance of this wonderful work which God wrought for them, that the children who should be born might know it, and declare it to their children, that they might set their hope in God, Ps. lxxviii. 6, 7. Posterity would reap the benefit of this deliverance, and therefore ought to celebrate the memorial of it. Concerning this festival

1. It was observed—every year on the fourteenth and fifteenth days of the twelfth month, just a month before the passover, v. 21. They kept two days together as thanksgiving days, and did not think them too much to spend in praising God. On the fourteenth day country-Jews rested, and on the fifteenth those in Shushan, and both those days they kept.

2. It was called—The feast of Purim (v. 26), from Pur, a Persian word which signifies a lot, because Haman had by lot determined this to be the time of the Jews' destruction, but the Lord, at whose disposal the lot is, had determined it to be the time of their triumph.

3. It was not a divine institution, and therefore it is not called a holy day, but a human appointment, by which it was made a good day, v. 19, 22. (1) The Jews ordained it, and took it upon themselves (v. 27), voluntarily undertook to do as they had begun, v. 23. (2) Mordecai and Esther confirmed their resolve, that it might be the more binding on posterity, and might come well recommended by those great names. They wrote, [1] With all authority (v. 29), Esther being queen and Mordecai prime-minister of state. [2] With words of peace and truth. Though they wrote with authority, they wrote with tenderness,

4. It was to be observed—by all the Jews, and by their seed, and by all such as joined themselves to them, v. 27. A concurrence in joys and praises is one branch of the communion of saints.

5. It was to be observed—that the memorial of the great things God had done for his church might never perish from their seed, v. 28. When Esther, in peril of her life, came before the king, he repealed the edict, v. 25. This also must be remembered. Good deeds done for the Israel of God ought to be remembered, for the encouragement of others to do the like. The more cries we have offered up in our trouble, and the more prayers for deliverance, the more we are obliged to be thankful to God for deliverance.

6. How it was to be observed. They should make it, (1) A day of cheerfulness, a day of feasting and joy (v. 22). (2) A day of generosity, sending portions one to another, in token of mutual respect, and being knit by this and other public common dangers and deliverances so much the closer to each other in love. (3) A day of charity, sending gifts to the poor. Those that have received mercy must, in token of their gratitude, show mercy. Thanksgiving and almsgiving should go together, that, when we are rejoicing and blessing God, the heart of the poor may rejoice with us. They always, at the feast, read the whole story over in the synagogue each day, and put up three prayers to God, in the first of which they praise God for counting them worthy to attend this divine service; in the second they thank him for the miraculous preservation of their ancestors; in the third they praise him that they have lived to observe another festival in memory of it.

CHAP. X

This is but a part of a chapter; the rest of it, beginning at ver. 4, with six chapters more, being found only in the Greek, is rejected as apocryphal. In these three verses we have only some short hints, I. Concerning Ahasuerus in the throne, what a mighty prince he was, ver. 1, 2. II. Concerning Mordecai his favourite, what a distinguished blessing he was to his people, ver. 2, 3.

Verses 1–3

I. How great and powerful king Ahasuerus was. He had a vast dominion, both in the continent and among the islands, from which he raised a vast revenue. Besides the usual customs which the kings of Persia exacted (Ezra iv. 13), he laid an additional tribute upon his subjects (v. 1): The king laid a tribute. Besides this instance of the grandeur of Ahasuerus, many more might be given, that were acts of his power and of his might. These however are not recorded here in the sacred story, which is confined to the Jews, and relates the affairs of other nations only as they fell in with their affairs.

II. How great and good Mordecai was. Long had Mordecai sat contentedly in the king's gate, and now at length he is advanced. The declaration of the greatness to which the king advanced Mordecai was written in the chronicles of the kingdom, as very memorable, and contributing to the great achievements of the king. He was great among the Jews (v. 3), not only great above them, but great with them, dear to them, and much respected by them. He was good, for he did good. He did not disown his people the Jews, though they were strangers and captives, dispersed and despised. Still he wrote himself Mordecai the Jew. He did not seek his own wealth, or the raising of an estate for himself and his family. His power, his wealth, and all his interest in the king and queen, he improved for the public good. He did not side with any one party of his people against another, but, whatever differences there were among them, he was a common father to them all.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE BOOK OF JOB

This book of Job stands by itself, is not connected with any other, and is therefore to be considered alone. Many copies of the Hebrew Bible place it after the book of Psalms, and some after the Proverbs, which perhaps has given occasion to some learned men to imagine it to have been written by Isaiah or some of the later prophets. It is most fitly placed first in this collection of divine morals: also, being doctrinal, it is proper to precede and introduce the book of Psalms, which is devotional, and the book of Proverbs, which is practical; for how shall we worship or obey a God whom we know not? As to this book,

I. We are sure that it is given by inspiration of God, though we are not certain who was the penman of it. The Jews, though no friends to Job, because he was a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel, yet, as faithful conservators of the oracles of God committed to them, always retained this book in their sacred canon. The history is referred to by one apostle (James v. 11) and one passage (ch. v. 13) is quoted by another apostle, with the usual form of quoting scripture, It is written, 1 Cor. iii. 19. It seems most probable to me that Elihu was the penman of it, at least of the discourses, because (ch. xxxii. 15, 16) he mingles the words of a historian with those of a disputant. If Job wrote it himself, some of the Jewish writers themselves own him a prophet among the Gentiles; if Elihu, we find he had a spirit of prophecy which filled him with matter and constrained him, ch. xxxii. 18.

II. It is, for the substance of it, a true history, and not a romance, though the dialogues are poetical. No doubt there was such a man as Job; the prophet Ezekiel names him with Noah and Daniel, Ezek. xiv. 14. The narrative we have here of his prosperity and piety, his strange afflictions and exemplary patience, the substance of his conferences with his friends, and God's discourse with him out of the whirlwind, with his return at length to a very prosperous condition, no doubt is exactly true, though the inspired penman is allowed the usual liberty of putting the matter of which Job and his friends discoursed into his own words.

III. It is very ancient, though we cannot fix the precise time either when Job lived or when the book was written. So many, so evident, are its hoary hairs, the marks of its antiquity, that we have reason to think that holy Job was contemporary with Isaac and Jacob; though not coheir with them of the promise of the earthly Canaan, yet a joint-expectant with them of the better country, that is, the heavenly. Probably he was of the posterity of Nahor, Abraham's brother, whose first-born was Uz (Gen. xxii. 21), and in whose family religion was for some ages kept up, as appears, Gen. xxxi. 53, where God is called, not only the God of Abraham, but the God of Nahor. He lived before the age of man was shortened to seventy or eighty, as it was in Moses's time, before sacrifices were confined to one altar, before the general apostasy of the nations from the knowledge and worship of the true God, and while yet there was no other idolatry known than the worship of the sun and moon, and that punished by the Judges, ch. xxxi. 26–28. He lived while God was known by the name of God Almighty more than by the name of Jehovah; for he is called Shaddai—the Almighty, above thirty times in this book. He lived while divine knowledge was conveyed, not by writing, but by tradition; for to that appeals are here made, ch. viii. 8; xxi. 29; xv. 18; v. 1. And we have therefore reason to think that he lived before Moses, because here is no mention at all of the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, or the giving of the law. We conclude therefore that we are here got back to the patriarchal age, and, besides its authority, we receive this book with veneration for its antiquity.

IV. We are sure that it is of great use to the church, and to every good Christian, though there are many passages in it dark and hard to be understood. It is a book that finds a great deal of work for the critics; but enough is plain to make the whole profitable and it was all written for our learning.

1. This noble poem presents to us, in very clear and lively characters, these five things among others:—(1) A monument of primitive theology. The first and great principles of the light of nature, on which natural religion is founded, are here, in a warm, and long, and learned dispute, not only taken for granted, but by common consent plainly laid down as eternal truths. Were ever the being of God, his glorious attributes and perfections, his unsearchable wisdom, his irresistible power, his inconceivable glory, his inflexible justice, and his incontestable sovereignty, discoursed of with more clearness, fullness, reverence, and divine eloquence, than in this book? The creation of the world, and the government of it, are here admirably described, not as matters of nice speculation, but as laying most powerful obligations upon us to fear and serve, to submit to and trust in, our Creator. Moral good and evil, virtue and vice, were never drawn more to the life (the beauty of the one and the deformity of the other) than in this book; nor the inviolable rule of God's judgment more plainly laid down. These are not questions of the schools to keep the learned world in action. It appears by this book that they are sacred truths of undoubted certainty. (2) It presents us with a specimen of Gentile piety. This great saint was out of the pale of the covenant, no Israelite, no proselyte, and yet none like him for religion, nor such a favourite of heaven upon this earth. It was a truth therefore, before St. Peter perceived it, that in every nation he that fears God and works righteousness is accepted of him, Acts x. 35. There were children of God scattered abroad (John xi. 52) besides the incorporated children of the kingdom, Matt. viii. 11, 12. (3) It presents us with an exposition of the book of Providence. The prosperity of the wicked and the afflictions of the righteous have always been reckoned two as hard chapters as any in that book; but they are here expounded, and reconciled with the divine wisdom, purity, and goodness. (4) It presents us with a great example of patience and close adherence to God in the midst of the sorest calamities. Sir Richard Blackmore's most ingenious pen, in his excellent preface to his paraphrase on this book, makes Job a hero proper for an epic poem; for, says he, "He appears brave in distress and valiant in affliction, maintains his virtue, and with that his character, under the most exasperating provocations that the malice of hell could invent, and thereby gives a most noble example of passive fortitude, a character no way inferior to that of the active hero," &c. (5) It presents us with an illustrious type of Christ, the particulars of which we shall endeavour to take notice of as we go along. In general, Job was a great sufferer, was emptied and humbled, but in order to his greater glory. So Christ abased himself, that we might be exalted. The learned Bishop Patrick quotes St. Jerome more than once speaking of Job as a type of Christ, who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, who was persecuted, for a time, by men and devils, and seemed forsaken of God too, but was raised to be an intercessor even for his friends that had added affliction to his misery. When the apostle speaks of the patience of Job he immediately takes notice of the end of the Lord, that is, of the Lord Jesus (as some understand it), typified by Job, James v. 11.

2. In this book we have, (1) The history of Job's sufferings, and his patience under them (ch. i, ii), not without a mixture of human frailty, ch. iii. (2) A dispute between him and his friends upon them, in which, [1] The opponents were Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar. [2] The respondent was Job. [3] The moderators were, First, Elihu, ch. xxxii.-xxxvii. Secondly, God himself, ch. xxxviii.-xli. (3) The issue of all in Job's honour and prosperity, ch. xlii. Upon the whole, we learn that many are the afflictions of the righteous but that when the Lord delivers them out of them all the trial of their faith will be found to praise, and honour, and glory.

CHAP. I

The history of Job begins here with an account, I. Of his great piety in general (ver. 1), and in a particular instance, ver. 5. II. Of his great prosperity, ver. 2–4. III. Of the malice of Satan against him, and the permission he obtained to try his constancy, ver. 6–12. IV. Of the surprising troubles that befell him, the ruin of his estate (ver. 13–17), and the death of his children, ver. 18, 19. V. Of his exemplary patience and piety under these troubles, ver. 20–22. In all this he is set forth for an example of suffering affliction, from which no prosperity can secure us, but through which integrity and uprightness will preserve us.

Verses 1–3

Concerning Job,

I. He was a man; therefore subject to like passions as we are. He was Ish, a man in authority. The country he lived in was the land of Uz, in the eastern part of Arabia, near Euphrates. God has his remnant in all places. It was the privilege of the land of Uz to have so good a man as Job in it; the worse others were round about him the better he was. His name Job, or Jjob, some say, signifies one hated and counted as an enemy. Others make it to signify one that grieves or groans.

II. He was a very good man, eminently pious, and better than his neighbours: He was perfect and upright. It is the judgment of God concerning him, and we are sure that is according to truth. 1. Job was a religious man, one that feared God, that is, worshipped him. 2. He was sincere in his religion: He was perfect; not sinless, as he himself owns (ch. ix. 20): If I say I am perfect, I shall be proved perverse. But, having a respect to all God's commandments, aiming at perfection, he was really as good as he seemed to be, his heart was sound and his eye single. 3. He was upright in his dealings both with God and man, was faithful to his promises, steady in his counsels, true to every trust. 4. The fear of God reigning in his heart was the principle that governed his whole conversation. 5. He dreaded the thought of doing what was wrong; with the utmost abhorrence and detestation he eschewed evil. The fear of the Lord is to hate evil (Prov. viii. 13) and then by the fear of the Lord men depart from evil, Prov. xvi. 6.

III. He was prosperous and yet pious. Though it is hard and rare, it is not impossible, for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven. He was prosperous, and his prosperity put a lustre upon his piety, and gave him who was so good so much greater opportunity of doing good. 1. He had a numerous family. He was eminent for religion, and yet not a hermit, not a recluse, but the father and master of a family. 2. He had a good estate for the support of his family; his substance was considerable, v. 3. Riches are called substance. Job's substance is described, not by the acres of land he was lord of, but, (1) By his cattle—sheep and camels, oxen and asses. As soon as God had made man, and provided for his maintenance by the herbs and fruits, he made him rich and great by giving him dominion over the creatures, Gen. i. 28. (2) By his servants. He had a very good household or husbandry, and thus he both had honour and did good. Job's wealth, with his wisdom, entitled him to the honour and power he had in his country, which he describes (ch. xxix). Job was upright and therefore grew rich; for honesty is the best policy, and piety and charity are ordinarily the surest ways of thriving. The account of Job's piety and prosperity comes before the history of his great afflictions, to show that neither will secure us from the calamities of human life. Piety will not secure us, as Job's mistaken friends thought, for all things come alike to all; prosperity will not, as a careless world thinks, Isa. xlvii. 8.

A further account of Job's prosperity and his piety.

I. His great comfort in his children is taken notice of as an instance of his prosperity; for our temporary comforts are borrowed, depend upon others, and are as those about us are. It was a comfort to this good man, 1. To see his children grown up and settled in the world. All his sons were in houses of their own, probably married. 2. To see them thrive in their affairs, and able to feast one another, as well as to feed themselves. 3. To see them in health. 4. Especially to see them live in love, and unity, and mutual good affection, no jars or quarrels among them. 5. It added to his comfort to see the brothers so kind to their sisters, that they sent for them to feast with them. 6. They feasted in their own houses.

II. His great care about his children is taken notice of as an instance of his piety. Observe (v. 5) Job's pious concern for the spiritual welfare of his children.

1. He was jealous over them with a godly jealousy; and so we ought to be over ourselves and those that are dearest to us, as far as is necessary to our care and endeavour for their good.

2. As soon as the days of their feasting were over he called them to the solemn exercises of religion.

3. He sent to them to prepare for solemn ordinances, sent and sanctified them, ordered them to examine their own consciences and repent of what they had done amiss in their feasting. Thus he kept his authority over them for their good, and they submitted to it, though they had got into houses of their own. Still he was the priest of the family, and at his altar they all attended, valuing their share in his prayers more than their share in his estate. Parents cannot give grace to their children (it is God that sanctifies) but they ought by seasonable admonitions and counsels to further their sanctification.

4. He offered sacrifice for them. Job, like Abraham, had an altar for his family. On this extraordinary occasion, he offered more sacrifices than usual, according to the number of them all, one for each child. "For this child I prayed, according to its particular temper, genius, and condition," to which the prayers, as well as the endeavours, must be accommodated. He rose early as one whose heart was upon his work. He required his children to attend the sacrifice.

5. Thus he did continually. The acts of repentance and faith must be often renewed, because we often repeat our transgressions. He that serves God uprightly will serve him continually.

Verses 6–12

Job was not only so rich and great, but withal so wise and good, that one would think the mountain of his prosperity stood so strong that it could not be moved; but here we have a thick cloud gathering over his head. The devil, having a great enmity to Job for his eminent piety, begged and obtained leave to torment him. It does not at all derogate from the credibility of Job's story in general to allow that this discourse between God and Satan, in these verses, is parabolical, like that of Micaiah (1 Kings xxii. 19, &c.), and an allegory designed to represent the malice of the devil against good men and the divine check and restraint which that malice is under.

I. Satan among the sons of God (v. 6), an adversary (so Satan signifies) to God, to men, to all good: he thrust himself into an assembly of the sons of God that came to present themselves before the Lord. This means either, 1. A meeting of the saints on earth. Professors of religion, in the patriarchal age, were called sons of God (Gen. vi. 2); they had then religious assemblies and stated times for them. But there was a Satan among the sons of God; when they came together he is among them, to distract and disturb them. Or, 2. A meeting of the angels in heaven. They are the sons of God, ch. xxxviii. 7. Satan was one of them originally.

II. His examination, how he came thither (v. 7): The Lord said unto Satan, Whence comest thou? He knew very well whence he came, and with what design he came thither, that as the good angels came to do good he came for a permission to do hurt; but he would, by calling him to an account, show him that he was under check and control.

III. The account he gives of himself and of the tour he had made. I come (says he) from going to and fro on the earth. 1. He could not pretend he had been doing any good. 2. He would not own he had been doing any hurt. While we are on this earth we are within his reach, and with so much subtlety, swiftness, and industry, does he penetrate into all the corners of it, that we cannot be in any place secure from his temptations. 3. He yet seems to give some representation of his own character. Perhaps it is spoken proudly. Perhaps it is spoken fretfully, and with discontent. He had been walking to and fro, and could find no rest, but was as much a fugitive and a vagabond as Cain in the land of Nod. Perhaps it is spoken carefully: "I have been hard at work, going to and fro," in quest of an opportunity to do mischief.

IV. The question God puts to him concerning Job (v. 8): Hast thou considered my servant Job? How honourably God speaks of Job: "Yonder is my servant Job; there is none like him." How closely he gives to Satan this good character of Job: Hast thou set thy heart to my servant Job? designing hereby to answer the devil's seeming boast of the interest he had in this earth. Saith God, "Job is my faithful servant." Satan may boast, but he shall not triumph. As if he had said, "Satan, I know thy errand; thou hast come to inform against Job; but hast thou considered him?"

V. The devil's base insinuation against Job, in answer to God's encomium of him. He could not deny but that Job feared God, but suggested that he was mercenary in his religion, and therefore a hypocrite (v. 9): Doth Job fear God for nought? How impatient the devil was of hearing Job praised, though it was God himself that praised him. Those are like the devil who cannot endure that anybody should be praised but themselves. How slily he censured him as a hypocrite, not asserting that he was so, but only asking, "Is he not so?" This is the common way of slanderers, whisperers, backbiters, to suggest that by way of query which yet they have no reason to think is true. How unjustly he accused him as mercenary, to prove him a hypocrite. It was a great truth that Job did not fear God for nought; he got much by it, for godliness is great gain: but it was a falsehood that he would not have feared God if he had not got this by it, as the event proved. Job's friends charged him with hypocrisy because he was greatly afflicted, Satan because he greatly prospered.

VI. The complaint Satan made of Job's prosperity, v. 10. God's peculiar people are taken under his special protection, they and all that belong to them; divine grace makes a hedge about their spiritual life, and divine providence about their natural life. He had prospered him, not in idleness or injustice but in the way of honest diligence: Thou hast blessed the work of his hands. The devil speaks of it with vexation. "I see thou hast made a hedge about him, round about." The wicked one saw it and was grieved, and argued against Job that the only reason why he served God was because God prospered him so well.

VII. The proof Satan undertakes to give of the hypocrisy and mercenariness of God's religion, if he might but have leave to strip him of his wealth. "Let it be put to this issue," says he (v. 11); "make him poor, frown upon him, turn thy hand against him, and then see where his religion will be; touch what he has and it will appear what he is. How spitefully he speaks of the impression it would make upon Job: "He will not only let fall his devotion, but even curse thee to thy face." God declared Job the best man then living: now, if Satan can prove him a hypocrite, it will follow that God had not one faithful servant among men and that there was no such thing as true and sincere piety in the world, but religion was all a sham, and Satan was king de facto—in fact, over all mankind.

VIII. The permission God gave to Satan to afflict Job for the trial of his sincerity. 1. It is matter of wonder that God should give Satan such a permission as this, but he did it for his own glory, the honour of Job, the explanation of Providence, and the encouragement of his afflicted people in all ages. He suffered Job to be tried, as he suffered Peter to be sifted, but took care that his faith should not fail (Luke xxii. 32). 2. It is matter of comfort that God has the devil in a chain. He could not afflict Job without leave from God first asked and obtained, and then no further than he had leave: "Only upon himself put not forth thy hand; meddle not with his body, but only with his estate." It is a limited power that the devil has.

IX. Satan's departure from this meeting of the sons of God. He went forth now, not to go to and fro, rambling through the earth, but with a direct course, to fall upon poor Job, who is carefully going on in the way of his duty, and knows nothing of the matter.

Verses 13–19

A particular account of Job's troubles.

I. Satan brought them upon him on the very day that his children began their course of feasting, at their elder brother's house (v. 13).

II. They all come upon him at once; while one messenger of evil tidings was speaking another came, and, before he had told his story, a third, and a fourth, followed immediately. 1. That there might appear a more than ordinary displeasure of God against him in his troubles. 2. That he might not have leisure to consider, and reason himself into a gracious submission, but might be overwhelmed by a complication of calamities.

III. They took from him all that he had, and made a full end of his enjoyments.

1. He had 500 yoke of oxen, and 500 she-asses, and a competent number of servants to attend them; and all these he lost at once, v. 14, 15. His neighbours the Sabeans, carried off the oxen and asses, and slew the servants that faithfully and bravely did their best to defend them, and one only escaped. When Satan has God's permission to do mischief he will not want mischievous men to be his instruments in doing it.

2. He had 7,000 sheep, and shepherds that kept them; and all those he lost at the same time by lightning, v. 16. Job was ready to reproach the Sabeans, and fly out against them for their injustice and cruelty, when the next news immediately directs him to look upwards. The fire of God has fallen from heaven. All his sheep and shepherds were not only killed, but consumed by it at once, and one shepherd only was left alive to carry the news to poor Job. This would tempt Job to say, It is in vain to serve God. The messenger called the lightning the fire of God. How terrible then were the tidings of this destruction, which came immediately from the hand of God!

3. He had 3,000 camels, and servants tending them; and he lost them all at the same time by the Chaldeans, who came in three bands, and drove them away, and slew the servants, v. 17. When the way of the wicked prospers, and they carry off their booty, while just and good men are suddenly cut off, God's righteousness is like the great deep, the bottom of which we cannot find, Ps. xxxvi. 6.

4. His dearest and most valuable possessions were his ten children; and, to conclude the tragedy, news is brought him, at the same time, that they were killed and buried in the ruins of the house in which they were feasting, and all the servants that waited on them, except one that came express with the tidings, of it v. 18, 19. This was the greatest of Job's losses, and therefore the devil reserved it for the last, that, if the other provocations failed, this might make him curse God. Our children are pieces of ourselves; it is very hard to part with them, and touches a good man in as tender a part as any. But to part with them all at once, and for them to be all cut off in a moment, who had been so many years his cares and hopes, went to the quick indeed. They all died together. They died suddenly. They died when they were feasting and making merry. Had they died suddenly when they were praying, he might the better have borne it. They were taken away when he had most need of them to comfort him under all his other losses.

The devil had done all he desired leave to do against Job, to provoke him to curse God. He whom the rising sun saw the richest of all the men in the east was before night poor to a proverb. If his riches had been, as Satan insinuated, the only principle of his religion, now that he had lost his riches he would certainly have lost his religion; but the account we have, in these verses, of his pious deportment under his affliction, sufficiently proved the devil a liar and Job an honest man.

I. He conducted himself like a man under his afflictions (v. 20), he arose, and rent his mantle, and shaved his head, which were the usual expressions of great sorrow, to show that he was sensible of the hand of the Lord that had gone out against him; yet he did not break out into any extravagant passion. He kept his temper, and bravely maintained the possession and repose of his own soul, in the midst of all these provocations. The time when he began to show his feelings was not till he heard of the death of his children, and then he rent his mantle. A worldly unbelieving heart would have said, "Now that the meat is gone it is well that the mouths are gone too." But Job knew better, and would have been thankful if Providence had spared his children, though he had had little or nothing for them, for Jehovah-jireh—the Lord will provide.

II. He conducted himself like a wise and good man under his affliction, like one that feared God and eschewed the evil of sin more than that of outward trouble.

1. He humbled himself under the hand of God, and accommodated himself to the providences he was under, as one that knew how to want as well as how to abound.

2. He composed himself with quieting considerations, that he might not be disturbed and put out of the possession of his own soul by these events. He reasons from the common state of human life, which he describes with application to himself: Naked came I (as others do) out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither. St. Paul refers to this of Job, 1 Tim. vi. 7. We brought nothing of this world's goods into the world, but have them from others; and it is certain that we can carry nothing out, but must leave them to others. This consideration silenced Job under all his losses. He is but where he was at first. He looks upon himself only as naked, not maimed, not wounded; he was himself still his own man, when nothing else was his own, and therefore but reduced to his first condition. He is but where he must have been at last, and is only unclothed, or unloaded rather, a little sooner than he expected. If we put off our clothes, before we go to bed, it is some inconvenience, but it may be the better borne when it is near bed-time.

3. We may well rejoice to find Job in this good frame, because this was the very thing upon which the trial of his integrity was put. The devil said that he would, under his affliction, curse God; but he blessed him, and so proved himself an honest man.

(1) He acknowledged the hand of God both in the mercies he had formerly enjoyed and in the afflictions he was now exercised with: The Lord gave, and the Lord has taken away. The same that gave hath taken away; and may he not do what he will with his own? See how Job looks above instruments, and keeps his eye upon the first Cause.

(2) He adored God in both. When all was gone he fell down and worshipped. Afflictions must not divert us from, but quicken us to, the exercises of religion. Weeping must not hinder sowing, nor hinder worshipping. He gives God thanks for good designed him by his afflictions, for gracious supports under his afflictions, and the believing hopes he had of a happy issue at last.

Lastly, Here is the honourable testimony which the Holy Ghost gives to Job's constancy and good conduct under his afflictions. He passed his trials with applause, v. 22.

CHAP. II

Job honourably acquitted upon a fair trial between God and Satan concerning him. One would have thought, this would be conclusive, and that Job would never have his reputation called in question again; but Job is brought upon his trial, a second time. I. Satan moves for another trial, which should touch his bone and his flesh, ver. 1–5. II. God, for holy ends, permits it, ver. 6. III. Satan smites him with a very painful and loathsome disease, ver. 7, 8. IV. His wife tempts him to curse God, but he resists the temptation, ver. 9, 10. V. His friends come to condole with him and to comfort him, ver. 11–13 And in this that good man is set forth for an example of suffering affliction and of patience.

Verses 1–6

Satan will have Job's cause called over again.

I. The court set, and the prosecutor making his appearance (v. 1, 2), as before, ch. i, 6, 7. The angels attended God's throne and Satan among them. He is asked the same question as before, Whence comest thou? and answers as before, From going to and fro in the earth; as if he had been doing no harm.

II. The judge himself pleading for him (v. 3): "Hast thou considered my servant Job better than thou didst, a perfect and an upright man; for thou seest he still holds fast his integrity?" Satan is condemned for his allegations against Job: "Thou movedst me against him, as an accuser, to destroy him without cause." How well it is for us that neither men nor devils are to be our judges, for perhaps they would destroy us, right or wrong; but our judgment proceeds from the Lord, whose judgment never errs nor is biassed. Job is commended for his constancy notwithstanding the attacks made upon him. Still he holds fast his integrity. Constancy crowns integrity.

III. The accusation further prosecuted, v. 4. Skin for skin, and all that a man has, will he give for his life. Men will not only venture, but give, their estates to save their lives. Satan grounds upon this an accusation of Job, slyly representing him, 1. As unnatural to those about him, and one that laid not to heart the death of his children and servants. 2. As wholly selfish, and minding nothing but his own ease and safety.

IV. A challenge given to make a further trial of Job's integrity (v. 5): "Put forth thy hand now and touch his bone and his flesh, and then he will curse thee to thy face, and let go his integrity." Nothing is more likely to ruffle the thoughts and put the mind into disorder than acute pain and distemper of body. St. Paul himself had much ado to bear a thorn in the flesh, nor could he have borne it without special grace from Christ, 2 Cor. xii. 8, 9.

V. A permission granted to Satan to make this trial, v. 6. "He is in thy hand, do thy worst with him; only save his life, or his soul. Afflict him, but not to death." "Save his soul," that is, "his reason" (or some), "preserve to him the use of that, for otherwise it will be no fair trial; if in his delirium, he should curse God, that will be no disproof of his integrity. It would be the language not of his heart, but of his distemper."

Verses 7–10

The devil, having got leave to tear and worry poor Job, presently fell to work with him, as a tormentor first and then as a tempter. Artfully is the temptation managed with all the subtlety of the old serpent, who is here playing the same game against Job that he played against our first parents (Gen. iii).

I. He provokes him to curse God by smiting him with sore boils, and so making him a burden to himself, v. 7, 8.

1. The disease with which Job was seized was very grievous: Satan smote him with boils, sore boils, all over him, from head to foot, an erysipelas, perhaps, in a higher degree.

2. Instead of healing salves, he took a potsherd, a piece of a broken pitcher, to scrape himself withal. A very sad pass this poor man had come to. Even Lazarus had some ease from the tongues of the dogs that came and licked his sores; but poor Job has no help afforded him. None of those he had formerly been kind to had so much gratitude as to minister to him in his distress, either because the disease was loathsome and noisome or because they apprehended it to be infectious. Instead of reposing in a soft and warm bed, he sat down among the ashes. Thus did he humble himself under the mighty hand of God, and bring his mind to the meanness and poverty of his condition. The Septuagint reads it, He sat down upon a dunghill without the city, but the original says no more than that he sat in the midst of the ashes.

II. Satan urges him, by the persuasions of his own wife, to curse God, v. 9. She was spared to him, when the rest of his comforts were taken away, for this purpose, to be a troubler and tempter to him. If Satan leaves anything that he has permission to take away, it is with a design of mischief. She banters Job for his constancy in his religion: "Dost thou still retain thy integrity? Art thou so tame and sheepish as thus to truckle to a God who is so far from rewarding thy services with marks of his favour that he strips thee, and scourges thee, without any provocation given? Is this a God to be still loved, and blessed, and served?" She urges him to renounce his religion, to blaspheme God, and dare him to do his worst: Curse God and die; be thy own deliverer by being thy own executioner; end thy troubles by ending thy life. These are two of the blackest and most horrid of all Satan's temptations. Nothing is more contrary to natural conscience than blaspheming God, nor to natural sense than self-murder.

III. He bravely resists and overcomes the temptation, v. 10.

1. He was very indignant at having such a thing mentioned to him: "What! Curse God? I abhor the thought of it. Get thee behind me, Satan." In other cases Job reasoned with his wife with a great deal of mildness, even when she was unkind to him (ch. xix. 17): I entreated her for the children's sake of my own body. But, when she persuaded him to curse God, he was much displeased, and showed her the evil of what she said. In such a pious household as Job had his wife was one that had been well affected to religion, but now, when all their estate and comfort were gone, she could not bear the loss with that temper of mind that Job had. When Peter was a Satan to Christ he told him plainly, Thou art an offence to me. If those whom we think wise and good at any time speak that which is foolish and bad, we ought to reprove them faithfully.

2. He reasoned against the temptation: Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil also? Those whom we reprove we must endeavour to convince. He argues for, not only the bearing, but the receiving of evil: Shall we not receive evil, that is, "Shall we not expect to receive it? If God give us so many good things, shall we be surprised, or think it strange, if he sometimes afflict us, when he has told us that prosperity and adversity are set the one over against the other?" 1 Peter iv. 12. "Shall we not set ourselves to receive it aright?" The word signifies to receive as a gift, and denotes a pious affection and disposition of soul under our afflictions, accounting them gifts (Phil. i. 29), accepting them as punishments of our iniquity (Lev. xxvi. 41), acquiescing in the will of God in them ("Let him do with me as seemeth him good"). "Shall we receive so much good as has come to us from the hand of God during all those years of peace and prosperity, and shall we not now receive evil, when God thinks fit to lay it on us?" If we receive so much good for the body, shall we not receive some good for the soul; something which, by saddening the countenance, makes the heart better?

IV. Thus Job still held fast his integrity, and Satan's design against him was defeated: In all this did not Job sin with his lips. Grace got the upper hand and he took care that the root of bitterness might not spring up to trouble him, Heb. xii. 15.

Verses 11–13

An account of the kind visit which Job's three friends paid him in his affliction. Some, who were his enemies, triumphed in his calamities, ch. xvi. 10; xix. 18; xxx. 1, &c. But his friends concerned themselves for him, and endeavoured to comfort him. Three of them are here named (v. 11), Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar. These three were eminently wise and good men, as appears by their discourses. They were old men, had a great reputation for knowledge, and much deference was paid to their judgment, ch. xxxii. 6.

I. Job, in his prosperity, had contracted a friendship with them. Much of the comfort of this life lies in acquaintance and friendship with those that are prudent and virtuous; and he that has a few such friends ought to value them highly. Job's three friends are supposed to have been all of them of the posterity of Abraham. Eliphaz descended from Teman, the grandson of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 11), Bildad (it is probable) from Shuah, Abraham's son by Keturah, Gen. xxv. 2. Zophar is thought by some to be the same with Zepho, a descendant from Esau, Gen. xxxvi. 11. The preserving of so much wisdom and piety among those that were strangers to the covenants of promise was a happy presage of God's grace to the Gentiles, when the partition-wall should in the latter days be taken down. Esau was rejected; yet many that came from him inherited some of the best blessings.

II. They continued their friendship with Job in his adversity, when most of his friends had forsaken him, ch. xix. 14. They come to share with him in his griefs, as formerly they had come to share with him in his comforts. Many a good lesson is to be learned from the troubles of others; we may look upon them and receive instruction, and be made wise and serious. Some good word may be spoken to them which may help to make them easy. Job's friends came to mourn with him, to mingle their tears with his, and so to comfort him. It is much more pleasant to visit those in affliction to whom comfort belongs than those to whom we must first speak conviction. They were not sent for, but came of their own accord (ch. vi. 22). They came with a design to comfort him, and yet proved miserable comforters, through their unskilful management of his case. When they saw him at some distance he was so disfigured and deformed with his sores that they knew him not, v. 12. What a change will a sore disease, or oppressing care and grief, make in the countenance, in a little item! Is this Job? Observing him thus miserably altered, they did not leave him, in a fright or loathing, but expressed so much the more tenderness towards him. The sight of them revived Job's grief, and set him a weeping afresh, which fetched floods of tears from their eyes. They rent their clothes, and sprinkled dust upon their heads, as men that would strip themselves, and abase themselves, with their friend that was stripped and abased. They had many a time, it is likely, sat with him on his couches and at his table, in his prosperity, and were therefore willing to share with him in his grief and poverty because they had shared with him in his joy and plenty. They resolved to stay with him till they saw him mend or end, and therefore took lodgings near him, though he was not now able to entertain them. Every day, for seven days together, they came and sat with him, as his companions in tribulation. They sat with him, but none spoke a word to him, only they all attended to the particular narratives he gave of his troubles. By their silence so long they would intimate that what they afterwards said was well considered and digested and the results of many thoughts. We should think twice before we speak once, especially in such a case as this, think long, and we shall be the better able to speak short and to the purpose.

CHAP. III

"You have heard of the patience of Job," says the apostle, James v. 11. So we have, and of his impatience too. In this chapter we find him cursing his day. I. Complaining that he was born, ver. 1–10. II. Complaining that he did not die as soon as he was born, ver. 11–19. III. Complaining that his life was now continued when he was in misery, ver. 20–26.

Verses 1–10

Long was Job's heart hot within him; and, while he was musing the fire burned, and the more for being stifled and suppressed. So long Job and his friends sat thinking, but said nothing; they were afraid of speaking what they thought, lest they should grieve him, and he durst not give vent to his thoughts, lest he should offend them. Job first gives vent to his thoughts. In short, he cursed the day of his birth, wished he had never been born.

I. The extremity of his troubles and the discomposure of his spirits may excuse it in part, but he can by no means be justified in it. Now he has forgotten the good he was born to, the lean kine have eaten up the fat ones, and he is filled with thoughts of the evil only, and wishes he had never been born. The prophet Jeremiah himself expressed his painful sense of his calamities in language, not much unlike this: Woe is me, my mother, that thou hast borne me! Jer. xv. 10. Cursed be the day wherein I was born, Jer. xx. 14, &c. There is no condition of life a man can be in in this world but he may in it (if it be not his own fault) so honour God, and work out his own salvation, and make sure a happiness for himself in a better world, that he will have no reason at all to wish he had never been born, but a great deal of reason to say that he had his being to good purpose. Yet it must be owned, if there were not another life after this, so many are the sorrows and troubles of this that we might sometimes be tempted to say that we were made in vain (Ps. lxxxix. 47), and to wish we had never been. Let us observe it, to the honour of the spiritual life above the natural, that though many have cursed the day of their first birth, never any cursed the day of their new-birth, nor wished they never had had grace, and the Spirit of grace, given them.

II. Job cursed his day, but he did not curse his God—was weary of his life, and would gladly have parted with that, but not weary of his religion: he resolutely cleaves to that, and will never let it go. The dispute between God and Satan concerning Job was not whether Job had his infirmities, and whether he was subject to like passions as we are (that was granted), but whether he was a hypocrite, who secretly hated God, and, if he were provoked, would show his hatred; and, upon trial, it proved that he was no such man. The particular expressions which Job used in cursing his day are full of poetical fancy, flame, and rapture. We need not be particular in our observations upon them. When he would express his passionate wish that he had never been, he falls foul upon the day, and wishes,

(1) That earth might forget it.

(2) That Heaven might frown upon it: Let not God regard it from above, v. 4. Let the gloominess of the day represent Job's condition, whose sun went down at noon.

(3) That all joy might forsake it: Let no joyful voice come therein (v. 7); let it be a long night, and not see the eye-lids of the morning (v. 9), which bring joy with them.

(4) That all curses might follow it (v. 8): "Let none ever desire to see it, but, on the contrary, let those curse it that curse the day. Whatever day any are tempted to curse, let them at the same time bestow one curse upon my birth-day." What a foolish thing it was to wish that his eyes had never seen the light, that so they might not have seen sorrow, which yet he might hope to see through, and beyond which he might see joy!

Verses 11–19

Job, perhaps reflecting upon himself for his folly in wishing he had never been born, follows it, and thinks to mend it, with another, little better, that he had died as soon as he was born. Job here complains of life as a curse, and covets death and the grave as the greatest and most desirable bliss. Surely Satan was deceived in Job when he applied that maxim to him, All that a man hath will he give for his life; for never any man valued life at a lower rate than he did.

I. He ungratefully quarrels with life, and is angry that it was not taken from him as soon as it was given him (v. 11, 12): Why died not I from the womb? What a weak and helpless creature man is when he comes into the world, and how slender the thread of life is when it is first drawn. What a merciful and tender care divine Providence took of us at our entrance into the world. What a great deal of vanity and vexation of spirit attends human life. If we had not a God to serve in this world, and better things to hope for in another world, considering the faculties we are endued with and the troubles we are surrounded with, we should be strongly tempted to wish that we had died from the womb. How much soever life is embittered, we must say, "It was of the Lord's mercies that we died not from the womb, that we were not consumed." Hatred of life is a contradiction to the common sense and sentiments of mankind, and to our own at any other time. When the old man in the fable, being tired with his burden, threw it down with discontent and called for Death, and Death came to him and asked him what he would have with him, he then answered, "Nothing, but to help me up with my burden."

II. He passionately applauds death and the grave, and seems quite in love with them. To desire to die that we may be with Christ, that we may be free from sin, and that we may be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven, is the effect and evidence of grace; but to desire to die only that we may be quiet in the grave, and delivered from the troubles of this life, savours of corruption. Job here frets himself with thinking that if he had but died as soon as he was born: I should have been (says he, v. 14) with kings and counsellors of the earth, whose pomp, power, and policy, cannot set them out of the reach of death, nor secure them from the grave, nor distinguish theirs from common dust in the grave. Though they filled their houses with silver, yet they were forced to leave it all behind them, no more to return to it. Some, by the desolate places which the kings and counsellors are here said to build for themselves, understand the sepulchres or monuments they prepared for themselves in their life-time; and by the gold which the princes had, and the silver with which they filled their houses, they understand the treasures which, they say, it was usual to deposit in the graves of great men. Such arts have been used to preserve their dignity, if possible, on the other side death, and to keep themselves from lying with those of inferior rank; but it will not do: death is, and will be, an irresistible leveller. Death mingles sceptres with spades. There a hidden untimely birth (v. 16), a child that either never saw light or but just opened its eyes and peeped into the world, and, not liking it, closed them again and hastened out of it, lies as soft and easy, lies as high and safe, as kings, and counsellors, and princes, that had gold. "And therefore," says Job, "would I have lain there in the dust, rather than live to lie here in the ashes! Then should I have lain still, and been quiet, which now I cannot do, I cannot be, but am still tossing and unquiet; then I should have slept, where as now sleep departeth from my eyes; then had I been at rest, whereas now I am restless." Now that life and immortality are brought to a much clearer light by the gospel than before good Christians can give a better account than this of the gain of death. But all that poor Job dreamed of was rest and quietness in the grave out of the fear of evil tidings and out of the feeling of sore boils. Then should I have been quiet. How finely he describes the repose of the grave. Those that now are troubled will there be out of the reach of trouble (v. 17): There the wicked cease from troubling. Those that are now toiled will there see the period of their toils. There the weary are at rest. Those that were here enslaved are there at liberty. Death is the prisoner's discharge, the relief of the oppressed, and the servant's manumission (v. 18).

Job here complains that his life was now continued and not cut off.

I. He thinks it hard, in general, that miserable lives should be prolonged (v. 20–22): Wherefore is light in life given to those that are bitter in soul? Life is called light, because pleasant and serviceable for walking and working. It is candle-light; the longer it burns the shorter it is, and the nearer to the socket. This light is said to be given us. Job reckons that to those who are in misery it is δῶρον ἄδωρον—gift and no gift, while the light only serves them to see their own misery. He here speaks of those who long for death, when they have outlived their comforts and usefulness, are burdened with age and infirmities, with pain or sickness, poverty or disgrace, and yet it comes not; while, at the same time, it comes to many who dread it and would put it far from them. The continuance and period of life must be according to God's will, not according to ours. It is not fit that we should be consulted how long we would live and when we would die; our times are in a better hand than our own. Some dig for it as for hidden treasures, that is, would give anything for a fair dismission out of this world. It may be a sin to long for death, but I am sure it is no sin to long for heaven.

II. He thinks himself, in particular, hardly dealt with, that he might not be eased of his pain and misery by death. To be thus impatient of life for the sake of the troubles we meet with is not only unnatural in itself, but ungrateful to the giver of life. Grace teaches us, in the midst of life's greatest comforts, to be willing to die, and, in the midst of its greatest crosses, to be willing to live. He had no comfort of his life: My sighing comes before I eat, v. 24. His griefs returned as duly as his meals, and affliction was his daily bread. He had no prospect of bettering his condition: His way was hidden, and God had hedged him in, v. 23. That which made his grief now the more grievous was that he was not conscious either of negligence or security in the day of his prosperity, which might provoke God thus to chastise him. He had kept up such a fear of trouble as was necessary to the maintaining of his guard. He was afraid for his children when they were feasting, lest they should offend God (ch. i. 5), afraid for his servants lest they should offend his neighbours; he took all the care he could of his own health, yet all would not do. He had not been secure, nor indulged himself in ease and softness, yet trouble came. Thus his way was hidden, for he knew not wherefore God contended with him.

CHAP. IV

Job having given vent to his passion, his friends here come gravely to give vent to their judgment upon his case. The dispute begins, and it soon becomes fierce. The opponents are Job's three friends. Job himself is respondent. Elihu appears, first, as moderator, and at length God himself gives judgment upon the controversy. The question in dispute is whether Job was an honest man or no. Satan durst not pretend that his cursing his day was a constructive cursing of his God; no, he cannot deny but that Job still holds fast his integrity; but Job's friends will needs have it that, if Job were an honest man, he would not have been thus sorely afflicted, and therefore urge him to confess himself a hypocrite in the profession he had made of religion: "No," says Job, "that I will never do; I have offended God, but my heart, notwithstanding, has been upright with him;" and still he holds fast the comfort of his integrity. Eliphaz, who, it is likely, was the senior, begins with him in this chapter, in which, I. He bespeaks a patient hearing, ver. 2. II. He compliments Job with an acknowledgment of the eminence and usefulness of the profession he had made of religion, ver. 3, 4. III. He charges him with hypocrisy in his profession, grounding his charge upon his present troubles and his conduct under them, ver. 5, 6. IV. To make good the inference, he maintains that man's wickedness is that which always brings God's judgments, ver. 7–11. V. He corroborates his assertion by a vision which he had, in which he was reminded of the incontestable purity and justice of God, and the meanness, weakness, and sinfulness of man, ver. 12–21. By all this he aims to bring down Job's spirit and to make him both penitent and patient under his afflictions.

Verses 1–6

I. Eliphaz excuses the trouble he is now about to give to Job by his discourse (v. 2): "If we assay a word with thee, offer a word of reproof and counsel, wilt thou be grieved and take it ill? We have reason to fear thou wilt; but there is no remedy: Who can refrain from words?" With what tenderness he speaks of Job, and his present afflicted condition: "If we tell thee our mind, wilt thou be grieved?" We should show ourselves backward to say that which we foresee will be grievous, though ever so necessary. With what assurance he speaks of the truth of what he was about to say: Who can withhold himself from speaking? It is foolish pity not to reprove our friends, even our friends in affliction, for what they say or do amiss, only for fear of offending them.

II. He exhibits a twofold charge against Job.

1. As to his particular conduct under this affliction. He charges him with weakness and faint-heartedness.

(1) He takes notice of Job's former serviceableness to the comfort of others. He owns that Job had instructed many, not only his own children and servants. With suitable counsels and comforts he strengthened the weak hands for work and service and the spiritual warfare. Those who have abundance of spiritual riches should abound in spiritual charity. But why does Eliphaz mention this here? Perhaps he praises him thus for the good he had done that he might make the intended reproof the more passable with him. He remembers how Job had comforted others as a reason why he might justly expect to be himself comforted. He speaks in pity, lamenting that through the extremity of his affliction he could not apply those comforts to himself which he had formerly administered to others. He mentions it, upbraiding him with his knowledge, and the good offices he had done for others, as if he had said, "Thou that hast taught others, why dost thou not teach thyself?"

(2) He upbraids him with his present low-spiritedness, v. 5. "Now that it has come upon thee, now that it touches thee, thou faintest, thou art troubled." He makes too light of Job's afflictions: "It touches thee." The very word that Satan himself had used, ch. i. 11; ii. 5. Had Eliphaz felt but the one-half of Job's affliction, he would have said, "It smites me, it wounds me;" but, speaking of Job's afflictions, he makes a mere trifle of it. He makes too much of Job's resentments. Men in deep distress must have grains of allowance, and a favourable construction put upon what they say.

2. As to his general character before this affliction. He charges him with wickedness and false-heartedness, and this article of his charge was utterly groundless and unjust. How unkindly does he upbraid him with the great profession of religion he had made, as if it had all now come to nothing and proved a sham (v. 6): "Is not this thy fear, thy confidence, thy hope, and the uprightness of thy ways? Does it not all appear now to be a mere pretence? For, hadst thou been sincere in it, God would not thus have afflicted thee, nor wouldst thou have behaved thus under the affliction." This was the very thing Satan aimed at, to prove Job a hypocrite. When he could not himself do this to God, he endeavoured, by his friends, to do it to Job himself, and to persuade him to confess himself a hypocrite. But, by the grace of God, Job was enabled to hold fast his integrity, and would not bear false witness against himself. Those that pass rash and uncharitable censures upon their brethren, and condemn them as hypocrites, do Satan's work. This verse is differently read in several editions of our common English Bibles. One of the first, in 1612, has it, "Is not this thy fear, thy confidence, the uprightness of thy ways, and thy hope? Does it not appear now that all the religion both of thy devotion and of thy conversation was only in hope and confidence that thou shouldst grow rich by it? If it had been sincere, would it not have kept thee from this despair? It is true, if thou faint in the day of adversity, thy strength, thy grace, is small (Prov. xxiv. 10); but it does not therefore follow that thou hast no grace, no strength at all." A man's character is not to be taken from a single act.

Eliphaz here advances another argument to prove Job a hypocrite, and will have not only his impatience under his afflictions to be evidence against him, but even his afflictions themselves.

I. Good men were never thus ruined. For the proof of this he appeals to Job's own observation (v. 7): "Remember, I pray thee; and give me an instance of any one that was righteous, and yet was cut off as thou art." If we understand it of a final destruction, his principle is true. None that are righteous perish for ever, 2 Thess. ii. 3. But, if we understand it of any temporal calamity, his principle is not true.

II. Wicked men were often thus ruined. For the proof of this he vouches his own observation (v. 8): "Even as I have seen, many a time, those that plough iniquity, and sow wickedness, reap accordingly; by the blast of God they perish, v. 9." We have reason to think that, whatever profession of religion thou hast made, thou hast but ploughed iniquity and sown wickedness. Some, by iniquity and wickedness, understand wrong and injury done to others. They shall be paid in their own coin. Those who are troublesome shall be troubled. He further describes their destruction (v. 9): By the blast of God they perish. Some think that in attributing the destruction of sinners to the blast of God, and the breath of his nostrils, he refers to the wind which blew the house down upon Job's children. He speaks particularly of tyrants and cruel oppressors, under the similitude of lions, v. 10, 11. The Hebrew tongue has five several names for lions, and they are all here used to set forth the terrible tearing power, fierceness, and cruelty, of proud oppressors. The voice of their roaring shall be stopped. God will take away their power to do hurt: The teeth of the young lions are broken. They shall not enrich themselves with the spoil of their neighbours. Even the old lion is famished, and perishes for lack of prey. They shall not leave a succession: The stout lion's whelps are scattered abroad, to seek for food themselves, which the old ones used to bring in for them, Nah. ii. 12. Perhaps Eliphaz intended, in this, to reflect upon Job, as if he, being the greatest of all the men of the east, had got his estate by spoil, but now his power and estate were gone, and his family was scattered: if so, it was a pity that a man whom God praised should be thus abused.

Eliphaz, having undertaken to convince Job of the sin and folly of his discontent and impatience, here vouches a vision which he relates to Job. It would have been well if he had kept to the purport of this vision, which would serve for a ground on which to reprove Job for his murmuring, but not to condemn him as a hypocrite. The people of God had not then any written word to quote, and therefore God sometimes notified to them even common truths by the extraordinary ways of revelation. We that have Bibles have there (thanks be to God) a more sure word to depend upon than even visions and voices, 2 Peter i. 19.

I. This message was sent to Eliphaz secretly. Some of the sweetest communion gracious souls have with God is in secret, where no eye sees but that of him who is all eye. God has ways of bringing conviction, counsel, and comfort, to his people, unobserved by the world, by private whispers, as powerfully and effectually as by the public ministry. He received a little thereof, v. 12. We know little in comparison with what is to be known, and with what we shall know when we come to heaven. It was brought to him in the visions of the night (v. 13), when he had retired from the world and the hurry of it, and all about him was composed and quiet. It was prefaced with terrors: Fears came upon him, and trembling, v. 14. A holy awe and reverence of God and his majesty being struck upon his spirit, he was thereby prepared for a divine visit.

II. Concerning this apparition which Eliphaz saw we are here told (v. 15, 16) it was real, and not a dream. If some have been so knavish as to impose false visions on others, and some so foolish as to be themselves imposed upon, it does not therefore follow but that there may have been apparitions of spirits, both good and bad. He could not discern the form thereof, so as to frame any exact idea of it in his own mind, much less to give a description of it. His conscience was to be awakened and informed, not his curiosity gratified.

III. The message was delivered in a still small voice, and this was it (v. 17): "Shall mortal man be more just than God, the immortal God? Shall a man be thought to be, or pretend to be, more pure than his Maker?" It is a reproof of Job's murmuring and discontent: "Shall a man pretend to be more just and pure than God? more truly to understand, and more strictly to observe, the rules and laws of equity than God?"

IV. Eliphaz shows how little the angels themselves are in comparison with God, v. 18. Angels are God's servants, waiting servants, working servants. If the world were left to the government of the angels, and they were trusted with the sole management of affairs, they would take false steps, and everything would not be done for the best, as now it is. Angels are intelligences, but finite ones. Thence he infers how much less man is, how much less to be trusted in or gloried in. If there is such a distance between God and angels, what is there between God and man! Look upon man in his life, and he is very mean, v. 19. Take man in his best estate, and he is a very despicable creature in comparison with the holy angels, though honourable if compared with the brutes. Angels are pure spirits; the souls of men dwell in houses of clay: such the bodies of men are. Angels are free; human souls are houses, and the body is a cloud, a clog, to it; it is its cage; it is its prison. Angels are fixed, but the very foundation of that house of clay in which man dwells is in the dust. We stand but upon the dust; some have a higher heap of dust to stand upon than others, but still it is the earth that stays us up and will shortly swallow us up. Angels are immortal, but man is soon crushed like a moth between one's fingers. A little thing will destroy his life. He is crushed before the face of the moth, so the word is. Is such a creature as this to be trusted in, or can any service be expected from him by that God who puts no trust in angels themselves? In his death he appears yet more despicable, and unfit to be trusted. Men are mortal and dying, v. 20, 21. They are dying daily, and continually wasting: Destroyed from morning to evening. In death all their excellency passes away; beauty, strength, learning, not only cannot secure them from death, but must die with them, nor shall their pomp, their wealth, or power, descend after them. Their wisdom cannot save them from death. Shall such a mean, weak, foolish, sinful, dying creature as this pretend to be more just than God and more pure than his Maker? No, instead of quarrelling with his afflictions, let him wonder that he is out of hell.

CHAP. V

Eliphaz, for the making good of his charge against Job, had vouched a word from heaven, sent him in a vision. In this chapter he appeals to those that bear record on earth, to the saints, the faithful witnesses of God's truth in all ages, ver. 1. They will testify, I. That the sin of sinners is their ruin, ver. 2–5. II. That affliction is the common lot of mankind, ver. 6, 7. III. That when we are in affliction it is our wisdom and duty to apply to God, for he is able and ready to help us, ver. 8–16. IV. That the afflictions which are borne well will end well; and Job particularly, if he would come to a better temper, might assure himself that God had great mercy in store for him, ver. 17–27. So that he concludes his discourse in somewhat a better humour than he began it.

Verses 1–5

So well assured is Eliphaz of the goodness of his own cause that he moves Job himself to choose the arbitrators (v. 1): Call now, if there be any that will answer thee. "Canst thou produce an instance of anyone that was really a saint that was reduced to such an extremity as thou art now reduced to? God never dealt with any that love his name as he deals with thee, and therefore surely thou art none of them. Did ever any good man curse his day as thou dost?" To which of the saints wilt thou turn? Good people are called saints even in the Old Testament; and therefore I know not why we should appropriate the title to those of the New Testament, and not say St. Abraham, St. Moses, and St. Isaiah, as well as St. Matthew and St. Mark; and St. David the psalmist, as well as St. David the British bishop. There are two things which Eliphaz here maintains, and in which he doubts not but all the saints concur with him:—

I. That the sin of sinners directly tends to their own ruin (v. 2): Wrath kills the foolish man, his own wrath, and therefore he is foolish for indulging it. Envy is the rottenness of the bones, and so slays the silly one that frets himself with it. "So it is with thee," says Eliphaz, "while thou quarrellest with God thou doest thyself the greatest mischief." Job had told his wife she spoke as the foolish women; now Eliphaz tells him he acted as the foolish men, the silly ones.

II. That their prosperity is short and their destruction certain, v. 3–5. He seems here to parallel Job's case with that which is commonly the case of wicked people. Job's prosperity was now at an end, and so has the prosperity of other wicked people quickly been. Eliphaz foresaw their ruin. Those who looked only at present things blessed their habitation, and thought them happy. He saw, at length, what he had foreseen. His family was undone, and his estate ruined. In these particulars he plainly and very invidiously reflects on Job's calamities. His children were crushed, v. 4. This is commonly understood of the destruction of the families of wicked men, to oblige them to restore what they have ill-gotten. They leave it to their children; but the rightful owners will crush their children, and cast them by due course of law. His estate was plundered, v. 5. Job's was so. The hungry robbers, the Sabeans and Chaldeans, ran away with it, and swallowed it; and this, says he, I have often observed in others. What has been got by spoil and rapine has been lost in the same way. The careful owner hedged it about with thorns, and then thought it safe; but the fence proved insignificant against the greediness of the spoilers, which will go through the thorns and briers, and burn them together, Isa. xxvii. 4.

Verses 6-16

Eliphaz, having touched Job, in mentioning the loss of his estate and the death of his children as the just punishment of his sin, that he might not drive him to despair, here begins to encourage him. Now he speaks in the accents of kindness, as if he would atone for the hard words he had given him.

I. He reminds him that no affliction comes by chance, nor is to be attributed to second causes: It doth not come forth of the dust, nor spring out of the ground, as the grass doth, v. 6. If men be bad, they must not lay the blame upon the soil, the climate, or the stars, but on themselves.

II. He reminds him that trouble and affliction are what we have all reason to expect in this world: Man is brought to trouble (v. 7), not as man, but as sinful man. Such is the frailty of our bodies, and the vanity of our enjoyments, that our troubles arise as naturally as the sparks fly upwards. Why then should we be surprised at our afflictions as strange, or quarrel with them as hard.

III. He directs him how to behave himself under his affliction (v. 8): I would seek unto God; surely I would: so it is in the original. It is easy to say what we would do if we were in such a one's case; but, when it comes to the trial, perhaps it will be found not so easy to do as we say. Good and seasonable advice Eliphaz transfers to himself in a figure: "For my part, the best way I should think I could take, if I were in thy condition, would be to apply to God." We must by prayer fetch in mercy and grace from God, though he contend with us. His favour we must seek when we have lost all we have in the world. Is any afflicted? let him pray. It is heart's ease, a salve for every sore. To God would I commit my cause, having laid it at his feet, I would lodge it in his hand.

IV. He encourages him thus to seek to God, and commit his cause to him. In general, he doeth great things (v. 9), great indeed, for he can do anything, he doth do everything, and all according to the counsel of his own will. The works of nature are mysterious; and the wisest philosophers have owned themselves at a loss. The designs of Providence are much more deep and unaccountable, Rom. xi. 33. He doeth great things without number; his power is never exhausted, nor will all his purposes ever be fulfilled till the end of time. Now, by the consideration of this, Eliphaz intends to convince Job of his fault and folly in quarrelling with God. He gives some instances of God's dominion and power. God doeth great things in the kingdom of nature: He gives rain upon the earth (v. 10), put here for all the gifts of common providence, all the fruitful seasons by which he filleth our hearts with food and gladness, Acts xiv. 17. He doeth great things in the affairs of the children of men, not only enriches the poor and comforts the needy, by the rain he sends (v. 10), but, in order to the advancing of those that are low, he disappoints the devices of the crafty; for v. 11 is to be joined to v. 12. God can defeat all the designs of his and his people's enemies. How were the plots of Ahithophel, Sanballat, and Haman baffled! How were the confederacies of Syria and Ephraim against Judah, of Gebal, and Ammon, and Amalek, against God's Israel, the kings of the earth and the princes against the Lord and against his anointed, broken! The learned men of the heathen were befooled by their own vain philosophy. When God infatuates men they are perplexed, and at a loss, even in those things that seem most plain and easy (v. 14): They meet with darkness even in the daytime: nay (as in the margin), They run themselves into darkness by the violence and precipitation of their own counsels. See ch. xii. 20, 24, 25. He exalts the humble, v. 11. The lowly in heart, and those that mourn, he advances, comforts, and makes to dwell on high, in the munitions of rocks, Isa. xxxiii. 16. So the poor, who began to despair, has hope. The experiences of some are encouragements to others to hope the best in the worst of times; for it is the glory of God to send help to the helpless and hope to the hopeless.

Eliphaz gives Job a comfortable prospect of the issue of his afflictions, if he did but recover his temper and accommodate himself to them.

I. The seasonable word of caution and exhortation that he gives him (v. 17): "Despise not thou the chastening of the Almighty. Call it a chastening, which comes from the father's love and is designed for the child's good. Let grace conquer the antipathy which nature has to suffering, and reconcile thyself to the will of God in it." We must never think it a thing below us to come under his discipline, but reckon, on the contrary, that God really magnifies man when he thus visits and tries him, ch. vii. 17, 18. Do not overlook and disregard it, as if it were only a chance, and the production of second causes, but take great notice of it as the voice of God and a messenger from heaven.

II. The comfortable words of encouragement which he gives him.

1. Happy is the man whom God correcteth if he make but a due improvement of the correction. Correction is an evidence of his sonship and a means of his sanctification; it mortifies his corruptions, weans his heart from the world, draws him nearer to God, brings him to his Bible, brings him to his knees, and so is working for him, a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. The issue and consequence of it would be very good, v. 18. When God makes sores by the rebukes of his providence he binds up by the consolations of his Spirit.

2. In the following verses Eliphaz addresses himself directly to Job, and gives him many precious promises of great and kind things which God would do for him if he did but humble himself under his hand. And, though Job's friends spoke both of God and Job some things that were not right, yet the general doctrines they laid down expressed the pious sense of the patriarchal age, and as St. Paul quoted v. 13 for canonical scripture, and as the command v. 17 is no doubt binding on us, so these promises must be, received and applied as divine promises, and we may through patience and comfort of this part of scripture have hope.

(1) It is here promised that as afflictions and troubles recur deliverances shall be graciously repeated, be it ever so often: In six troubles he shall be ready to deliver thee; yea, and in seven, v. 19.

(2) Whatever troubles good men may be in, there shall no evil touch them; they shall do them no real harm; they may hiss, but they cannot hurt, Ps. xci. 10.

(3) When desolating judgments are abroad, they shall be taken under special protection, v. 20.

(4) Whatever is maliciously said against them, it shall not affect them to do them any hurt, v. 21. The best men, and the most inoffensive, cannot secure themselves from calumny, reproach, and false accusation. From these a man cannot hide himself, but God can hide him, so that the most malicious slanders shall not disturb his peace nor blemish his reputation.

(5) They shall have a holy security and serenity of mind, arising from their hope and confidence in God. When dangers are most threatening they shall not be afraid of destruction, no, not when they see it coming (v. 21), nor of the beasts of the field when they set upon them, nor of men as cruel as beasts; at destruction and famine thou shalt laugh (v. 22). Blessed Paul laughed at destruction when he said, O death! where is thy sting? when, in the name of all the saints, he defied all the calamities of this present time to separate us from the love of God, concluding that in all these things we are more than conquerors, Rom. viii. 35, &c.

(6) Being at peace with God, there shall be a covenant of friendship between them and the whole creation, v. 23. "When thou walkest over thy grounds thou shalt not need to fear stumbling, for thou shalt be at league with the stones of the field, not to dash thy foot against any of them, nor shalt thou be in danger from the beasts of the field, for they shall all be at peace with thee."

(7) Their houses and families shall be comfortable to them, v. 24. That peace is thy tabernacle (so the word is); peace is the house in which those dwell who dwell in God, and are at home in him. "Thou shalt visit" (that is, enquire into the affairs of) "thy habitation, and take a review of them, and shalt not sin." God will provide a settlement for his people, mean perhaps and movable, a cottage, a tabernacle, but a fixed and quiet habitation. "Thou shalt not sin," or wander; that is, as some understand it, "thou shalt not be a fugitive and a vagabond." They shall have wisdom to govern their families aright, to order their affairs with discretion, which is here called visiting their habitation. Family piety crowns family peace and prosperity.

(8) Their posterity shall be numerous and prosperous. Job had lost all his children; "but," says Eliphaz, "if thou return to God, he will again build up thy family." It is a comfort to parents to see the prosperity, especially the spiritual prosperity, of their children; if they are truly good, they are truly great, how small a figure soever they may make in the world.

(9) Their death shall be seasonable, and they shall finish their course, at length, with joy and honour, v. 26. If the providence of God do not give us long life, yet if the grace of God give us to be satisfied with the time allotted us, we may be said to come to a full age. Our times are in God's hand; it is well they are so, for he will take care that those who are his shall die in the best time: however their death may seem to us untimely, it will be found not unseasonable.

3. In the last verse he recommends these promises to Job, as faithful sayings, which he might be confident of the truth of: "Lo, this we have searched, and so it is. We have indeed received these things by tradition from our fathers, but we have diligently studied them, and been confirmed in our belief of them from our own observation and experience; and we are all of a mind that so it is." Hear it, and know thou it for thy good. It is not enough to hear and know the truth, but we must improve it, and be made wiser and better by it. Know it for thyself (so the word is) not only "This is true," but "this is true concerning me." That is indeed a good sermon to us which does us good.

CHAP. VI

Eliphaz concluded his discourse with an air of assurance. Job is not convinced by all he had said, but still justifies himself in his complaints and condemns him for the weakness of his arguing. I. He shows that he had just cause to complain as he did of his troubles, and so it would appear to any impartial judge, ver. 2–7. II. He continues his passionate wish that he might speedily be cut off and so be eased of all his miseries, ver. 8–13. III. He reproves his friends for their uncharitable censures of him and their unkind treatment, ver. 14–30. It must be owned that Job, in all this, spoke much that was reasonable, but with a mixture of passion and human infirmity. And in this contest, as indeed in most contests, there was fault on both sides.

Verses 1–7

Eliphaz, in the beginning of his discourse, had been very sharp upon Job, and yet it does not appear that Job gave him any interruption, but when he had concluded, he makes his reply, in which he speaks very feelingly.

I. He represents his calamity, in general, as much heavier than either he had expressed it or they had apprehended it, v. 2, 3. He would gladly appeal to a third person, who had just weights and just balances with which to weigh his grief and calamity. He wished that they would set his grief and all the expressions of it in one scale, his calamity and all the particulars of it in the other, and they would find (as he says, ch. xxiii. 2) that his stroke was heavier than his groaning; for, whatever his grief was, his calamity was heavier than the sand of the sea. "Therefore (says he) my words are swallowed up;" that is, "Therefore you must excuse both the brokenness and the bitterness of my expressions." He complains that his friends undertook to administer spiritual physic to him before they thoroughly understood his case. He excuses the passionate expressions he had used when he cursed his day. Though he could not himself justify all he had said, yet he thought his friends should not thus violently condemn it. He bespeaks the charitable and compassionate sympathy of his friends with him.

II. He complains of the trouble and terror of mind he was in as the sorest part of his calamity, v. 4. Herein he was a type of Christ, who, in his sufferings, complained most of the sufferings of his soul. Now is my soul troubled, John xii. 27. My soul is exceedingly sorrowful, Matt. xxvi. 38. My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? Matt. xxvii. 46. Poor Job sadly complains The arrows of the Almighty are within me. That which cut him to the heart was to think that the God he loved and served had laid him under these marks of his displeasure. Note, Trouble of mind is the sorest trouble. A wounded spirit who can bear! The poison or heat of these arrows is said to drink up his spirit, because it disturbed his reason, shook his resolution, exhausted his vigour, and threatened his life. He saw himself charged by the terrors of God, as by an army set in battle-array, and surrounded by them.

III. He reflects upon his friends for their severe censures of his complaints. Their reproofs were causeless. He complained, it is true, now that he was in this affliction, but he never used to complain. He did not bray when he had grass, nor low over his fodder, v. 5. But, now that he was utterly deprived of all his comforts, he must be a stock or a stone, and not have the sense of an ox or a wild ass, if he did not give some vent to his grief. He was forced to eat unsavoury meats, and was so poor that he had not a grain of salt wherewith to season them, nor to give a little taste to the white of an egg, which was now the choicest dish he had at his table, v. 6. Food which once he would have scorned to touch was his sorrowful meat, v. 7.

The troubled sea rages most when it dashes against a rock. Job, instead of unsaying what he had said, says it here again with more vehemence than before.

I. He is still most passionately desirous to die. He could see no end of his trouble but death, and had not patience to wait the time appointed for that. He has a request to make; there is a thing he longs for (v. 8): That it would please God to destroy me, v. 9. Though Job was extremely desirous of death, and very angry at its delays, yet he did not offer to destroy himself, nor to take away his own life, only he begged that it would please God to destroy him.

II. He puts this desire into a prayer, that God would grant him this request.

III. He promises himself effectual relief, and the redress of all his grievances, by the stroke of death (v. 10): Then should I yet have comfort. If Job had not had a good conscience, he could not have spoken with this assurance of comfort on the other side death.

IV. He challenges death to do its worst. If he could not die without bitter pains yet, in prospect of dying at last, he would make nothing of dying pangs: "I would harden myself in sorrow. Let him not spare; I desire no mitigation of that pain which will put a happy period to all my pains."

V. He grounds his comfort upon the testimony of his conscience for him that he had been faithful and firm to his profession of religion: I have not concealed the words of the Holy One.

VI. He justifies himself, in this extreme desire of death, from the deplorable condition he was now in, v. 10, 12, and very ingeniously, yet perversely, argues against the encouragements that were given him. "What is my strength, that I should hope? You see how I am weakened and brought low, and therefore what reason have I to hope that I should see better days? Is my strength the strength of stones? Are my muscles brass and my sinews steel? No, they are not, and therefore I cannot hold out always in this pain and misery, but must needs sink under the load." What is our strength? It is depending strength. We have no more strength than God gives us; for in him we live and move. "What is my end, that I should desire to prolong my life? What comfort can I promise myself in life, comparable to the comfort I promise myself in death?"

VII. He obviates the suspicion of his being delirious (v. 13): Is not my help in me? "Do you think wisdom is driven quite from me, and that I am gone distracted? No, I am not mad, most noble Eliphaz, but speak the words of truth and soberness."

Eliphaz had been very severe in his censures of Job; and his companions had intimated their concurrence with him. Their unkindness poor Job complains of, as an aggravation of his calamity and a further excuse of his desire to die; for what satisfaction could he expect in this world when those that should have been his comforters thus proved his tormentors?

I. He shows what reason he had to expect kindness from them. His expectation was grounded upon the common principles of humanity (v. 14): "To him that is afflicted pity should be shown from his friend; and he that does not show that pity forsakes the fear of the Almighty." Inhumanity is impiety and irreligion. He that withholds compassion from his friend forsakes the fear of the Almighty. So the Chaldee. When a man is afflicted he will see who are his friends indeed and who are but pretenders.

II. He shows how wretchedly he was disappointed in his expectations from them (v. 15): "My brethren, who should have helped me, have dealt deceitfully as a brook." None questioned but that the drift of their discourses would be to comfort Job with the remembrance of his former piety, the assurance of God's favour to him, and the prospect of a glorious issue; but, instead of this, they fall upon him with their reproaches and censures, condemn him as a hypocrite, and pour vinegar instead of oil, into his wounds. We cannot expect too little from the creature nor too much from the Creator. God will out-do our hopes as much as men come short of them. This disappointment which Job met with he here illustrates by the failing of brooks in summer. His expectations from them, which their coming so solemnly to comfort him had raised, he compares to the expectation which the weary thirsty travellers have of finding water in the summer where they have often seen it in great abundance in the winter, v. 19. The troops of Tema and Sheba, the caravans of the merchants of those countries, whose road lay through the deserts of Arabia, looked and waited for supply of water from those brooks. "Hard by here," says one, "A little further," says another, "when I last travelled this way, there was water enough; we shall have that to refresh us." The disappointment of his expectation is here compared to the confusion which seizes the poor travellers when they find heaps of sand where they expected floods of water. In the winter, when they were not thirsty, there was water enough. Everyone will applaud and admire those that are full and in prosperity. But in the heat of summer, when they needed water, then it failed them; it was consumed (v. 17); it was turned aside, v. 18. When Job was in prosperity his friends were something to him, but "Now you are nothing, now I can find no comfort but in God." You are not what you have been, what you should be, what you pretend to be, what I thought you would have been; for you see my casting down and are afraid. You are afraid lest, if you own me, you should be obliged to keep me.

Verses 22–30

Poor Job goes on here to upbraid his friends with their unkindness. If they would but think impartially, and speak as they thought, they could not but own,

I. That though he was necessitous, yet he was not craving, nor burdensome to his friends. Job would be glad to see his friends, but he did not say, Bring unto me (v. 22), or, Deliver me, v. 23. He did not desire to put them to any expense. "Did I send for you to deliver me out of the hand of the mighty? No, I never expected you should either expose yourselves to any danger or put yourselves to any charge upon my account." Job's not asking their help did not excuse them from offering it when he needed it and it was in the power of their hands to give it. It often happens that from man, even when we expect little, we have less, but from God, even when we expect much, we have more, Eph. iii. 20.

II. That, though he differed in opinion from them, yet he was not obstinate, but ready to yield to conviction (v. 24, 25): Teach me, and I will hold my tongue; for I have often found, with pleasure and wonder, how forcible right words are. But the method you take will never make proselytes: What doth your arguing prove? Your hypothesis is false, your surmises are groundless, your management is weak, and your application peevish and uncharitable.

III. That, though he had been indeed in a fault, yet they ought not to have given him such hard usage (v. 26, 27): "Do you imagine, or contrive with a great deal of art" (for so the word signifies), "to reprove words, some passionate expressions of mine in this desperate condition, as if they were certain indications of reigning impiety and atheism? A little charity would have served to excuse them, and to put a better construction upon them. Shall a man's spiritual state be judged of by some rash and hasty words, which a surprising trouble extorts from him? Is it kind, is it just, to criticise in such a case?" They took advantage of his weakness and the helpless condition he was in: You overwhelm the fatherless, a proverbial expression, denoting that which is most barbarous and inhuman. They made pretence of kindness: "You dig a pit for your friend; not only you are unkind to me, who am your friend, but, under colour of friendship, you ensnare me." When they came to see and sit with him he thought he might speak his mind freely to them. But this freedom of speech, which their professions of concern for him made him use, had exposed him to their censures, and so they might be said to dig a pit for him.

IV. That, though he had let fall some passionate expressions, yet in the main he was in the right, and that his afflictions, though very extraordinary, did not prove him to be a hypocrite or a wicked man. "Be content, and look upon me; what do you see in me that bespeaks me either a madman or a wicked man? Let the show of my countenance witness for me that, though I have cursed my day, I do not curse my God. You hear what I have to say: Is there iniquity in my tongue? that iniquity that you charge me with? Have I blasphemed God or renounced him? Return, I pray you, consider the thing over again without prejudice and you will find my righteousness is in it," that is, "I am in the right in this matter; and, though I cannot keep my temper as I should, I keep my integrity."

CHAP. VII

Job goes on to express the bitter sense he had of his calamities and to justify himself in his desire of death. I. He complains to himself and his friends of his troubles, and the constant agitation he was in, ver. 1–6. II. He turns to God, and expostulates with him (ver. 7, to the end), in which, 1. He pleads the final period which death puts to our present state, ver. 7–10. 2. He passionately complains of the miserable condition he was now in, ver. 11–16. 3. He wonders that God will thus contend with him, and begs for the pardon of his sins and a speedy release out of his miseries, ver. 17–21.

Verses 1–6

Job is here excusing what he could not justify, even his inordinate desire of death. I. Every man must die shortly. "Pray mistake not my desires of death, as if I thought the time appointed of God could be anticipated: no, I know very well that that is fixed; only in such language as this I take the liberty to express my present uneasiness: Is there not an appointed time (a warfare, so the word is) to man upon earth? and are not his days here like the days of a hireling?" Certainly there is, and it is easy to say by whom the appointment is made, even by him that made us and set us here. We are not to think that we are governed by the blind fate of the Stoics, nor by the blind fortune of the Epicureans, but by the wise, holy, and sovereign counsel of God. Man's life is a warfare, and as the days of a hireling. We are to look upon ourselves in this world, 1. As soldiers, exposed to hardship and in the midst of enemies; we must serve under command; and, when our warfare is accomplished, we must be disbanded. 2. As day-labourers, that have the work of the day to do in its day and must make up their account at night.

II. He had as much reason, he thought, to wish for death, as a poor servant or hireling that is tired with his work has to wish for the shadows of the evening, when he shall receive his penny and go to rest, v. 2. The comparison is plain, the application is somewhat obscure. Exactness of language is not to be expected from one in Job's condition. "As a servant earnestly desires the shadow, so and for the same reason I earnestly desire death; for I am made to possess, &c." Hear his complaint.

1. His days were useless, and had been so a great while. Every day was a burden to him, because he was in no capacity of doing good, or of spending it to any purpose. But when we are disabled to work for God, if we will but sit still quietly for him, it is all one; we shall be accepted.

2. His nights were restless, v. 3, 4. The night relieves the toil and fatigue of the day, not only to the labourers, but to the sufferers. But poor Job could not gain this relief. This made him dread the night as much as the servant desires it.

3. His body was noisome, v. 5.

4. His life was hastening apace towards a period, v. 6. He thought he had no reason to expect a long life, for he found himself declining fast (v. 6): My days are swifter than a weaver's shuttle, and he was therefore without hope of being restored to his former prosperity.

Verses 7–16

Job is here begging of God either to ease him or to end him. He represents himself to God,

I. As a dying man, surely and speedily dying (v. 7): O remember that my life is wind. He recommends himself to God as an object of his pity and compassion, with this consideration, that he was a frail creature and his abode in this world uncertain. The eye of him that hath here seen me shall see me no more there. Dying is work that is to be done but once. This is illustrated by the plotting out and scattering of a cloud. It is consumed and vanisheth away, is resolved into air and never knits again. Other clouds arise, but the same cloud never returns: so a new generation of the children of men is raised up (v. 10): He shall return no more to his house. From these premises he might have drawn a better conclusion than this (v. 11): Therefore I will not refrain my mouth; I will speak; I will complain. Better die praying and praising than die complaining and quarrelling.

II. As a distempered man, sorely and grievously distempered both in body and mind. In this part of his representation he is very peevish: "Am I a sea, or a whale (v. 12), a raging sea, that must be kept within bounds, or an unruly whale, that must be restrained by force from devouring all the fishes of the sea?" With poor Job, his bed, instead of comforting him, terrified him; and his couch, instead of easing his complaint, added to it. In Job's dreams, though they might partly arise from his distemper, we have reason to think Satan had a hand, for he delights to terrify those whom it is out of his reach to destroy; but Job looked up to God and mistook Satan's representations for the terrors of God setting themselves in array against him. We have reason to pray to God that our dreams may neither defile nor disquiet us. He covets to rest in his grave, that bed where there are no tossings to and fro, nor any frightful dreams, v. 15, 16. Doubtless this was Job's infirmity; for though a good man would not wish to live always in this world, and would choose strangling and death rather than sin, as the martyrs did, yet he will be content to live as long as pleases God, and will not choose death rather than life, because life is our opportunity of glorifying God and getting ready for heaven.

Job here reasons with God,

I. Concerning his dealings with man in general (v. 17, 18): What is man, that thou shouldst magnify him? We mistake God, and the nature of his providence, if we think it any lessening to him to take notice of the meanest of his creatures. Job owns God's favour to man in general, even when he complains of his own particular troubles. "What is man, a poor, mean, weak creature, that thou, the great and glorious God, shouldst deal with him as thou dost? What is man, 1. That thou shouldst put such honour upon him, shouldst magnify him, by taking him into covenant and communion with thyself? 2. That thou shouldst set thy heart upon him, as dear to thee. 3. That thou shouldst visit him with thy compassions every morning."

II. Concerning his dealings with him in particular.

1. That he was the butt to God's arrows: "Thou hast set me as a mark against thee," v. 20. "My case is singular, and none is shot at as I am." 2. That he was a burden to himself, ready to sink under the load of his own life. 3. That he had no intermission of his griefs (v. 19): "How long will it be ere thou cause thy rod to depart from me, or abate the rigour of the correction, at least for so long as that I may swallow down my spittle?" It should seem, Job's distemper lay much in his throat, and almost choked him, so that he could not swallow his spittle. He complains (ch. xxx. 18) that it bound him about like the collar of his coat. "Lord," says he, "wilt not thou give me some respite, some breathing time?" ch. ix. 18. He ingenuously owns himself guilty before God: I have sinned. God had said of him that he was a perfect and an upright man; yet he says of himself, I have sinned. Those may be upright who yet are not sinless; and those who are sincerely penitent are accepted, through a Mediator, as evangelically perfect. Job maintained, against his friends, that he was not a hypocrite, not a wicked man; and yet he owned to his God that he had sinned. Penitent confessions would drown and silence passionate complaints. He seriously enquires how he may make his peace with God: "What shall I do unto thee, having done so much against thee?" In our repentance we must keep up good thoughts of God, as one that delights not in the ruin of his creatures, but would rather they should return and live. "Thou art the Saviour of men; be my Saviour, for I cast myself upon thy mercy." He earnestly begs for the forgiveness of his sins, v. 21. The heat of his spirit, as, on the one hand, it made his complaints the more bitter, so, on the other hand, it made his prayers the more lively and importunate; as here: "Why dost thou not pardon my transgression?" When the mercy of God pardons the transgression that is committed by us the grace of God takes away the iniquity that reigns in us. Wherever God removes the guilt of sin he breaks the power of sin.

CHAP. VIII

Job's friends are like Job's messengers; the latter followed one another close with evil tidings, the former followed him with harsh censures: both, unawares, served Satan's design; these to drive him from his integrity, those to drive him from the comfort of it. Eliphaz did not reply to what Job had said in answer to him, but left it to Bildad. Eliphaz had undertaken to show that because Job was sorely afflicted he was certainly a wicked man, Bildad is much of the same mind, and will conclude Job a wicked man unless God do speedily appear for his relief. In this chapter he endeavours to convince Job, I. That he had spoken too passionately, ver. 2. II. That he and his children had suffered justly, ver. 3, 4. III. That, if he were a true penitent, God would soon turn his captivity, ver. 5–7. IV. That it was a usual thing for Providence to extinguish the joys and hopes of wicked men as his were extinguished; and therefore that they had reason to suspect him for a hypocrite, ver. 8–19. V. That they would be abundantly confirmed in their suspicion unless God did speedily appear for his relief, ver. 20–22.

Verses 1–7

I. Bildad reproves Job for what he had said (v. 2), checks his passion, but (as is too common) with greater passion. Job spoke a great deal of good sense, but Bildad turns it all off with this, How long wilt thou speak these things? Bildad compares Job's discourse to a strong wind.

II. He justifies God in what he had done. This he had no occasion to do at this time (for Job did not condemn God, as he would have it thought he did), or he might at least have done it without reflecting upon Job's children, as he does here. 1. He is right in general, that God doth not pervert judgment, nor ever go contrary to any settled rule of justice, v. 3. 2. Yet he takes it for granted that Job's children (the death of whom was one of the greatest of his afflictions) had been guilty of some notorious wickedness, v. 4. Job readily owned that God did not pervert judgment; and yet it did not therefore follow either that his children died for some great transgression. It is true that we and our children have sinned against God, but extraordinary afflictions are not always the punishment of extraordinary sins, but sometimes the trial of extraordinary graces; and, in our judgment of another's case we ought to take the more favourable side, as our Saviour directs, Luke xiii. 2–4.

III. He put Job in hope that, if he were indeed upright, as he said he was, he should yet see a good issue of his present troubles: "Although thy children have sinned against him, and are cast away in their transgression, yet if thou be pure and upright thyself, and as an evidence of that wilt now seek unto God and submit to him, all shall be well yet," v. 5–7. This may be taken two ways, either, 1. As designed to prove Job a hypocrite and a wicked man by the continuance of his afflictions. Herein Bildad was not in the right; for a good man may be afflicted for his trial, not only very sorely, but very long, and yet, if for life, it is in comparison with eternity but for a moment. Or, 2. As designed to direct and encourage Job, that he might not thus run himself into despair, there might yet be hope if he would take the right course. He gives him good hopes that he shall yet again see good days, secretly suspecting, however, that he was not qualified to see them. Let not Job object that he had so little left to begin the world with again that it was impossible he should ever prosper as he had done; no, "Though thy beginning should be ever so small, a little meal in the barrel and a little oil in the cruse, God's blessing shall multiply that to a great increase." This is God's way of enriching the souls of his people with graces and comforts, not per saltum—as by a bound, but per gradum—step by step.

Bildad will not be so bold as to say with Eliphaz that none that were righteous were ever cut off thus (ch. iv. 7); yet he takes it for granted that God does ordinarily bring wicked men to shame and ruin in this world, and that, by making their prosperity short, he discovers their piety to be counterfeit. Whether this will certainly prove that all who are thus ruined must be concluded to have been hypocrites he will not say.

I. He proves the certain destruction of all the hopes and joys of hypocrites, by an appeal to antiquity. He insists not on his own judgment and that of his companions: We are but of yesterday, and know nothing, v. 9. He refers to the testimony of the ancients, v. 8. They will teach thee, and inform thee (v. 10), that all along, in their time, the judgments of God followed wicked men. The learned Bishop Patrick suggests that Bildad being a Shuhite, descended from Shuah one of Abraham's sons by Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2), in this appeal which he makes to history has a particular respect to the rewards which the blessing of God secured to the posterity of faithful Abraham.

II. He illustrates this truth by some similitudes.

1. The hopes and joys of the hypocrite are compared to a rush or flag, v. 11–13. It grows up out of the mire and water. The hypocrite cannot gain his hope without some false rotten ground or other out of which to raise it, and with which to support it and keep it alive, any more than the rush can grow without mire. He grounds it on his worldly prosperity, the plausible profession he makes of religion, the good opinion of his neighbours, and his own good conceit of himself, which are no solid foundation on which to build his confidence. It may look green and gay for a while (the rush outgrows the grass), but it is light, and hollow and empty. It withers presently, before any other herb, v. 12. Even while it is in its greenness it is dried away and gone in a little time. So are the paths of all that forget God (v. 13); they take the same way that the rush does, for the hypocrite's hope shall perish.

2. They are compared to a spider's web, or a spider's house (as it is in the margin), a cobweb, v. 14, 15. The hope of the hypocrite is the creature of his own fancy, and arises merely from a conceit of his own merit and sufficiency. There is a great deal of difference between the work of the bee and that of the spider. A diligent Christian, like the laborious bee, fetches in all his comfort from the heavenly dews of God's word; but the hypocrite, like the subtle spider, weaves his out of a false hypothesis of his own concerning God, as if he were altogether such an one as himself. He is very fond of it, as the spider of her web; wraps himself in it, calls it his house, leans upon it, and holds it fast. It is said of the spider that she takes hold with her hands, and is in kings' palaces, Prov. xxx. 28. So does a carnal worldling hug himself in the fulness and firmness of his outward prosperity; he prides himself in that house as his palace. It will be swept away, as the cobweb with the besom, when God shall come to purge his house.

3. The hypocrite is here compared to a flourishing and well-rooted tree, which, though it do not wither of itself, yet will easily be cut down and its place know it no more. See this tree fair and flourishing (v. 16) under the protection of his garden-wall and with the benefit of his garden-soil, taking deep root, never likely to be overthrown by stormy winds, for his roots are interwoven with the stones (v. 17); it grows in firm ground, not, as the rush, in mire and water. Thus does a wicked man, when he prospers in the world, think himself secure. See this tree felled and forgotten notwithstanding, destroyed from his place (v. 18).

Bildad sums up what he has to say in a few words, 1. On the one hand, if Job were a perfect upright man, God would not cast him away, v. 20. Though now he seemed forsaken of God, he would yet return to him, and his mouth should be filled with laughing, v. 21. Those that loved him would rejoice with him; but those that hated him, and had triumphed in his fall, would be ashamed of their insolence. Now it is true that God will not cast away an upright man; he may be cast down for a time, but he shall not be cast away for ever. 2. On the other hand, if he were a wicked man and an evil-doer, God would not help him, but leave him to perish in his present distresses (v. 20), and his dwelling-place should come to nought, v. 22. It is true that the dwelling-place of the wicked, sooner or later, will come to nought. Those only who make God their dwelling-place are safe for ever, Ps. xc. 1; xci. 1. Sin brings ruin on persons and families. Yet to argue (as Bildad slyly does) that because Job's family was sunk, and he himself at present seemed helpless, therefore he certainly was an ungodly wicked man, was neither just nor charitable.

CHAP. IX

Job's answer to Bildad's discourse, wherein he speaks honourably of God, humbly of himself, and feelingly of his troubles; but not one word by way of reflection upon his friends. In this chapter we have, I. The doctrine of God's justice laid down, ver. 2. II. The proof of it, from his wisdom, and power, and sovereign dominion, ver. 3–13. III. The application of it, in which, 1. He condemns himself, as not able to contend with God, ver. 14–21. 2. He maintains his point, that we cannot judge of men's character by their outward condition, ver. 22–24. 3. He complains of the greatness of his troubles, the confusion he was in, and the loss he was at what to say or do, ver. 25–35.

Verses 1–13

Bildad began with a rebuke to Job for talking so much, ch. viii. 2. Job makes no answer to that, but in what he next lays down as his principle, that God never perverts judgment, Job agrees with him: I know it is so of a truth, v. 2. How should man be just with God? Some understand this as a passionate complaint of God's strictness and severity, and it cannot be denied that there are, in this chapter, some peevish expressions. But I take this rather as a pious confession of man's sinfulness, and his own in particular, that, if God should deal with any of us according to the desert of our iniquities, we should certainly be undone.

I. He lays this down for a truth, that man is an unequal match for his Maker.

1. In dispute (v. 3): If he will contend with him, either at law or at any argument, he cannot answer him one of a thousand. When God spoke to Job out of the whirlwind he asked him a great many questions (Dost thou know this? Canst thou do that?) to none of which Job could give an answer, ch. xxxviii, xxxix. God can lay to our charge a thousand offences, and we cannot answer him so as to acquit ourselves from any of them.

2. In combat (v. 4): "Who hath hardened himself against him and hath prospered?" You cannot produce any instance of any daring sinner who has hardened himself against God, who did not find God too hard for him and pay dearly for his folly.

II. He proves it by showing what a God he is with whom we have to do: He is wise in heart, and therefore we cannot answer him at law; he is mighty in strength, and therefore we cannot fight it out with him. The devil promised himself that Job, in the day of his affliction, would curse God and speak ill of him, but, instead of that, he sets himself to honour God and to speak highly of him. The God of nature acts with an uncontrollable power and does what he pleases; for all the orders and all the powers of nature are derived from him and depend upon him. When he pleases he alters the course of nature, and turned back its streams, v. 4-5. Nothing more firm than the mountains. When we speak of removing mountains we mean that which is impossible; yet the divine power can make them change their seat. He can level them, and overturn them. Men have much ado to pass over them, but God, when he pleases, can make them pass away. Nothing more fixed than the earth on its axletree; yet God can, when he pleases, shake the earth out of its place, heave it off its centre, and make even its pillars to tremble. God has power enough to shake the earth from under that guilty race of mankind which makes it groan under the burden of sin, and so to shake the wicked out of it (Chap. xxxviii. 13); yet he continues the earth, and man upon it, and does not make it, as once, to swallow up the rebels. Nothing more constant than the rising sun, it never misses its appointed time; yet God, when he pleases, can suspend it. Thus great is God's power; and how great then is his goodness, which causes his sun to shine even upon the evil and unthankful, though he could withhold it! Job here speaks of what God can do; but, if we must understand it of what he has done in fact, all these verses may perhaps be applied to Noah's flood. As long as he pleases he preserves the settled course and order of nature; and this is a continued creation. He himself alone, by his own power, and without the assistance of any other, Spreads out the heaven (v. 8), not only did spread them out at first, but still spreads them out. He treads upon the waves of the sea; that is, he suppresses them and keeps them under, that they return not to deluge the earth (Ps. civ. 9), which is given as a reason why we should all fear God and stand in awe of him, Jer. v. 22. God makes the constellations; three are named for all the rest (v. 9), Arcturus, Orion, and Pleiades, and in general the chambers of the south. The stars he makes to be what they are to man, and inclines the hearts of men to observe them, which the beasts are not capable of doing. Not only those stars which we see and give names to, but those also in the other hemisphere, about the antarctic pole, which never come in our sight, called here the chambers of the south, are under the divine direction and dominion. Consider what God does in the government of the world, and you will say, He is wise in heart and mighty in strength. He does many things and great, many and great to admiration, v. 10. God is a great God, and doeth great things, a wonder-working God; his works of wonder are so many that we cannot number them and so mysterious that we cannot find them out. He acts invisibly and undiscerned, v. 11. "He goes by me in his operations, and I see him not, I perceive him not. His way is in the sea," Ps. lxxvii. 19. Our finite understandings cannot fathom his counsels, apprehend his motions, or comprehend the measures he takes; we are therefore incompetent judges of God's proceedings, because we know not what he does nor what he designs. The arcania imperii—secrets of government, are things above us, which therefore we must not pretend to expound. He acts with an incontestable sovereignty, v. 12. What action can be brought against him? Or who will say unto him, What doest thou? God is not obliged to give us a reason of what he does. The meaning of his proceedings we know not now; it will be time enough to know hereafter, when it will appear that what seemed now to be done by prerogative was done in infinite wisdom and for the best. He acts with an irresistible power, which no creature can resist, v. 13. If God will not withdraw his anger the proud helpers do stoop under him; that is, He certainly breaks and crushes those that proudly help one another against him.

What Job had said of man's utter inability to contend with God he here applies to himself, and in effect despairs of gaining his favour. It arises from the dark and cloudy apprehensions which at present he had of God's displeasure against him.

I. He durst not dispute with God (v. 14): "If the proud helpers do stoop under him, how much less shall I (a poor weak creature, so far from being a helper that I am very helpless) answer him? What can I say against that which God does?"

II. He durst not insist upon his own justification before God. Though he vindicated his own integrity to his friends, and would not yield that he was a hypocrite and a wicked man, as they suggested, yet he would never plead it as his righteousness before God.

1. He knew so much of God that he durst not stand a trial with him, v. 15–19. God knew him better than he knew himself and therefore (v. 15), "Though I were righteous in my own apprehension, and my own heart did not condemn me, yet God is greater than my heart, and knows those secret faults and errors of mine which I do not and cannot understand, and is able to charge me with them, and therefore I would not answer." Job will therefore cast himself upon God's mercy, and not think to come off by his own merit. God answers before we call and not because we call, and gives gracious answers to our prayers, but not for our prayers (v. 16): "If I had called, and he had answered, had given the thing I called to him for, yet, so weak and defective are my best prayers, that I would not believe he had therein hearkened to my voice; I could not say that he had saved with his right hand and answered me" (Ps. lx. 5), "but that he did it purely for his own name's sake." Job was not conscious to himself of any extraordinary guilt, and yet fell under extraordinary afflictions, v. 17, 18. Job was broken with a tempest. Job's troubles came so thickly upon him that he had no breathing time, and he was filled with bitterness. And he presumes to say that all this was without cause, without any great provocation given. Here, no doubt, he spoke unadvisedly with his lips; he reflected on God's goodness in saying that he was not suffered to take his breath (while yet he had such good use of his reason and speech as to be able to talk thus) and on his justice in saying that it was without cause. There is no disputing (said one once to Cæsar) with him that commands legions. Much less is there any with him that has legions of angels at command.

2. He knew so much of himself that he durst not stand a trial, v. 21, 20. "If I go about to justify myself, and to plead a righteousness of my own, my defence will be my offence, and my own mouth shall condemn me even when it goes about to acquit me." A good man, who knows the deceitfulness of his own heart, is suspicious of more evil in himself than he is really conscious of, and therefore will by no means think of justifying himself before God. "Though I were free from gross sin, though my conscience should not charge me with any enormous crime, yet would I not believe my own heart so far as to insist upon my innocency nor think my life worth striving for with God."

Here Job touches briefly upon the main point now in dispute between him and his friends. They maintained that those who are righteous and good always prosper in this world, and none but the wicked are in misery and distress; he asserted, on the contrary, that it is a common thing for the wicked to prosper and the righteous to be greatly afflicted. "I said it, and say it again, that all things come alike to all." Now, 1. It must be owned that there is very much truth in what Job here means, that temporal judgments, when they are sent abroad, fall both upon good and bad. Let this reconcile God's children to their troubles; they are but trials, designed for their honour and benefit, and, if God be pleased with them, let not them be displeased. On the other hand, the wicked are so far from being made the marks of God's judgments that the earth is given into their hand, v. 24, into the hand of the wicked one (in the original, the word is singular). The wicked have the earth given them, but the righteous have heaven given them, and which is better—heaven without earth or earth without heaven? Job ought not to have said, He laughs at it, for God doth not afflict willingly. When the spirit is heated, either with dispute or with discontent, we need to set a watch before the door of our lips.

Verses 25–35

Job grows more querulous. When we are in trouble we are allowed to complain to God, as the Psalmist often, but must by no means complain of God, as Job here.

I. His complaint here of the passing away of the days of his prosperity is proper enough (v. 25, 26): "My days (that is, all my good days) are gone, never to return, gone of a sudden, gone ere I was aware."

II. His complaint of his present uneasiness is excusable, v. 27, 28. He did his endeavour to compose himself as his friends advised him. He would fain forget his complaints and praise God. He found he could not do it: "I am afraid of all my sorrows."

III. His complaint of God as implacable and inexorable was by no means to be excused. He knew better, and, at another time, would have been far from harbouring any such hard thoughts of God. Good men do not always speak like themselves; but God, who considers their frame and the strength of their temptations, gives them leave afterwards to unsay what was amiss by repentance and will not lay it to their charge.

1. Job seems to speak here, (1) As if he despaired of obtaining from God any relief or redress of his grievances: "I know that thou wilt not hold me innocent.

My afflictions have continued so long upon me. Why then do I labour in vain to clear myself and maintain my own integrity?" v. 29. With men it is often labour in vain for the most innocent to go about to clear themselves. But it is not so in our dealings with God, to whom it was never in vain to commit a righteous cause (v. 30, 31): "If I wash myself with snow-water, and make my integrity ever so evident, it will be all to no purpose; judgment must go against me. Thou shalt plunge me in the ditch (the pit of destruction, so some, or rather the filthy kennel, or sewer), which will make me so offensive in the nostrils of all about me that my own clothes shall abhor me and I shall even loathe to touch myself." He saw his afflictions coming from God. Yet these words are capable of a good construction. If we keep our hands ever so clean from the pollutions of gross sin, which fall under the eye of the world,—yet God, who knows our hearts, can charge us with so much secret sin as will for ever take off all our pretensions to purity and innocency, and make us see ourselves odious in the sight of the holy God. Paul, while a Pharisee, made his hands very clean; but when the commandment came and discovered to him his heart-sins, made him know lust, that plunged him in the ditch. (2) As if he despaired to have a fair hearing with God. He complains that he was not upon even terms with God (v. 32): "He is not a man, as I am. I could venture to dispute with a man like myself." Neither is there any days-man between us. This complaint that there was not is in effect a wish that there were, and so the LXX read it: O that there were a mediator between us! Job would gladly refer the matter, but no creature was capable of being a referee, and therefore he must even refer it still to God himself and resolve to acquiesce in his judgment. Our Lord Jesus is the blessed days-man, who has mediated between heaven and earth. The gospel leaves no room for such a complaint as this. Job knew not how to address God with the confidence with which he was formerly wont to approach him, v. 34, 35. "Let him take his rod away from me." He means not so much his outward afflictions as his fear which terrified him.

2. From all this let us pity those that are wounded in spirit, and keep up good thoughts of God in our minds, for hard thoughts of him are the inlets of much mischief.

CHAP. X

Job owns that he was full of confusion (ver. 15), he knew not what to say, and perhaps sometimes scarcely knew what he said. In this chapter, 1. He complains of the hardships he was under (ver. 1–7), and then comforts himself with this, that he was in the hand of the God that made him, ver. 8–13. II. He complains again of the severity of God's dealings with him (ver. 14–17), and then comforts himself with this, that death would put an end to his troubles, ver. 18–22.

Verses 1–7

1. A passionate resolution to persist in his complaint, v. 1. He resolves to give himself some ease by giving vent to his resentments. "My soul is weary of my life." He will give vent to the bitterness of his soul by violent words. Job's corruption speaks here, yet grace puts in a word. 1. He will complain, but he will leave his complaint upon himself. 2. He will speak, but it shall be the bitterness of his soul that he will express, not his settled judgment. If I speak amiss, it is not I, but sin that dwells in me, not my soul, but its bitterness.

II. A humble petition to God. He will speak, but the first word shall be a prayer, v. 2. 1. That he might be delivered from the sting of his afflictions, which is sin. "Thou dost correct me; I will bear that as well as I can; but O do not condemn me!" It is the comfort of those who are in Christ Jesus, that though they are in affliction, there is no condemnation to them, Rom. viii. 1. "Lord, do not condemn me; my friends condemn me, but do not thou." 2. That he might be made acquainted with the true cause of his afflictions, and that is sin too: Lord, show me wherefore thou contendest with me. When God afflicts us he contends with us, and when he contends with us there is always a reason.

III. A peevish expostulation with God concerning his dealings with him.

1. He thinks it unbecoming the goodness of God, and the mercifulness of his nature, to deal so hardly with his creature as to lay upon him more than he can bear (v. 3): Is it good unto thee that thou shouldst oppress? What profit is there in my blood? Far be it from Job to think that God did him wrong, but he is quite at a loss how to reconcile his providences with his justice, as good men have often been, and must wait until the day shall declare it.

2. He thinks it unbecoming the infinite knowledge of God to put his prisoner thus upon the rack, as it were, by torture, to extort a confession from him, v. 4–6. Many things are hidden from eyes of flesh, the most curious and piercing; there is a path which even the vulture's eye has not seen: but nothing is, or can be, hidden from the eye of God, to which all things are naked and open. Eyes of flesh see the outward appearance only, but God sees everything truly. Eyes of flesh discover things gradually, but God sees everything at one view. Eyes of flesh are soon tired, but the keeper of Israel neither slumbers nor sleeps, nor does his sight every decay. God sees not as man sees, that is, he does not judge as man judges, but we are sure that the judgment of God is according to truth. God is not short-sighted, like man, so he is not short-lived (v. 5): "Are thy days as the days of man, few and evil?" Men grow wiser by experience and must take time for their searches. But it is not so with God; to him nothing is past, nothing future, but everything present.

3. He thinks it looked like an abuse of his omnipotence to keep a poor prisoner in custody, whom he knew to be innocent, only because there was none that could deliver him out of his hand (v. 7): Thou knowest that I am not wicked. He had already owned himself a sinner, but he here stands to it that he was not devoted to sin, not an enemy to God. I cannot say that I am not wanting, or I am not weak; but through grace, I can say, I am not wicked: thou knowest I am not, for thou knowest I love thee.

I. Job eyes God as his Creator and preserver, and describes his dependence upon him as the author and upholder of his being.

1. God made us, he, and not our parents, who were only the instruments of his power and providence in our production. He made us, and not we ourselves. The soul also, which animates the body, is his gift. Job takes notice of both here. (1) The body is made as the clay (v. 9), cast into shape as the clay is formed into a vessel, according to the skill and will of the potter. The formation of human bodies in the womb is described by an elegant similitude (v. 10, Thou hast poured me out like milk, which is coagulated into cheese), and by an induction of some particulars, v. 11. Though we come into the world naked, yet the body is itself both clothed and armed. The skin and flesh are its clothing; the bones and sinews are its armour, not offensive, but defensive. The vital parts, the heart and lungs, are thus clothed, not to be seen—thus fenced, not to be hurt. The admirable structure of human bodies is an illustrious instance of the wisdom, power, and goodness of the Creator. What a pity it is that these bodies should be instruments of unrighteousness which are capable of being temples of the Holy Ghost! (2) The soul is the life, the soul is the man, and this is the gift of God: Thou hast granted me life, breathed into me the breath of life, without which the body would be but a worthless carcase. God is the Father of spirits: he made us living souls, and endued us with the powers of reason; he gave us life and favour, and life is a favour. Now Job was in a better mind than he was when he quarrelled with life as a burden, and asked, Why died I not from the womb?

2. God maintains us. Having lighted the lamp of life, he does not leave it to burn upon its own stock, but continually supplies it with fresh oil: "Thy visitation has preserved my spirit, kept me alive, protected me from the adversaries of life, and blessed me with the daily supplies it needs and craves."

II. He pleads this with God (v. 9): Remember, I beseech thee, that thou hast made me. 1. "Thou hast made me, and needest not to examine me by scourging, not to put me upon the rack for the discovery of what is within me." 2. "Thou hast made me, as the clay, by an act of sovereignty; and wilt thou by a like act of sovereignty unmake me again?" 3. "Wilt thou destroy the work of thy own hands? Wilt thou not spare and help me, and stand by the work of thy own hands?" Ps. cxxxviii. 8. Job knew not how to reconcile God's former favours and his present frowns, but concludes (v. 13), "These things hast thou hidden in thy heart."

I. Job's passionate complaints. On this harsh and unpleasant string he harps much, in which, though he cannot be justified, he may be excused. If we think it looks ill in him, let it be a warning to us to keep our temper better.

1. He complains of the strictness of God's judgment and the rigour of his proceedings against him, and is ready to call it summum jus—justice bordering on severity. (1) That he took all advantages against him: "If I sin, then thou markest me," v. 14. (2) That he prosecuted those advantages to the utmost: Thou wilt not acquit me from my iniquity. While his troubles continued he could not take the comfort of his pardon, nor hear that voice of joy and gladness; so hard is it to see love in God's heart when we see frowns in his face and a rod in his hand. (3) That, whatever was his character, his case at present was very uncomfortable, v. 15. [1] If he be wicked, he is certainly undone in the other world: If I be wicked, woe to me. [2] If he be righteous, yet he dares not lift up his head, dares not answer as before, ch. ix. 15. He is so oppressed and overwhelmed with his troubles that he cannot look up with any comfort or confidence.

2. He complains of the severity of the execution. God (he thought) did not only punish him for every failure, but punish him in a high degree, v. 16, 17. God hunted him as a lion. God was not only strange to him, but showed himself marvellous upon him, by bringing him into uncommon troubles and so making him a prodigy, a wonder unto many. That which made his afflictions most grievous was that he felt God's indignation in them. It was growing, still growing worse and worse. This he insists much upon; when he hoped the tide would turn, and begin to ebb, still it flowed higher and higher.

3. He complains of his life, and that ever he was born to all this trouble and misery (v. 18, 19): "If this was designed for my lot, why was I brought out of the womb, and not smothered there, or stifled in the birth?" Mr. Caryl gives this a good turn in favour of Job. "We may charitably suppose," says he, "that that which troubled Job was that he was in a condition of life which (as he conceived) hindered the main end of his life, which was the glorifying of God. He feared lest his troubles should reflect dishonour upon God and give occasion to his enemies to blaspheme; and therefore he wishes, O that I had given up the ghost! A godly man reckons that he lives to no purpose if he do not live to the praise and glory of God." If that was his meaning, it was grounded on a mistake; for we may glorify the Lord in the fires.

II. Job's humble requests. He prays, 1. That God would see his affliction (v. 15). 2. That God would grant him some ease.

CHAP. XI

Poor Job's wounds were yet bleeding, his sore still runs and ceases not, but none of his friends bring him any oil, any balm; Zophar, the third, pours into them as much vinegar as the two former had done. I. He exhibits a very high charge against Job, as proud and false in justifying himself, ver. 1–4. II. He appeals to God for his conviction (ver. 5) and that Job might be made sensible, 1. Of God's unerring wisdom and his inviolable justice, ver. 6. 2. Of his unsearchable perfections, ver. 7–9. 3. Of his incontestable sovereignty and uncontrollable power, ver. 10. 4. Of the cognizance he takes of the children of men, ver. 11, 12. III. He assures him that, upon his repentance and reformation (ver. 13, 14), God would restore him to his former prosperity and safety (ver. 15–19); but that, if he were wicked it was in vain to expect it, ver. 20.

It is sad to see what intemperate passions even wise and good men are sometimes betrayed into by the heat of disputation, of which Zophar here is an instance. Eliphaz began with a very modest preface, ch. iv. 2. Bildad was a little more rough upon Job, ch. viii. 2. But Zophar falls upon him without mercy. Should a man full of talk be justified? And should thy lies make men hold their peace? Is this the way to comfort Job? Does this become one that appears as an advocate for God and his justice?

I. He represents Job otherwise than what he was, v. 2, 3. He would have him thought one that loved to hear himself talk; and all this that it might be looked upon as a piece of justice to chastise him. We have read and considered Job's discourses in the foregoing chapters, and have found them full of good sense, that his principles are right, his reasonings strong, and that what there is in them of heat and passion a little charity will excuse and overlook; and yet Zophar here invidiously represents him, 1. As a man that never considered what he said. Should not the multitude of words be answered? Truly, sometimes it is no great matter whether it be or no. Should a man full of talk (margin, a man of lips, that is all tongue, a mere voice) be justified? Should he be justified in his loquacity, as in effect he is if he be not reproved for it? No, for in the multitude of words there wanteth not sin. 2. As a man that made no conscience of what he said—a liar, and one that hoped by the impudence of lies to silence his adversaries (should thy lies make men hold their peace?)—one that bantered all mankind. Job was not mad, but spoke the words of truth and soberness, and yet was thus misrepresented.

II. He charges Job with saying that which he had not said (v. 4): Thou hast said, My doctrine is pure. Job spoke better of God than his friends did. If he had expressed himself unwarily, yet it did not therefore follow but that his doctrine was true. But he charges him with saying, I am clean in thy eyes. Job had not said so: he had indeed said, Thou knowest that I am not wicked (ch. x. 7); but he had also said, I have sinned. He had indeed maintained that he was not a hypocrite as they charged him; but to infer thence that he would not own himself a sinner was an unfair insinuation.

III. He appeals to God, and wishes him to appear against Job. Nothing will serve him but that God must immediately appear to silence and condemn him. We are commonly ready with too much assurance to interest God in our quarrels, and to conclude that, if he would but speak, he would take our part and speak for us, as Zophar here: O that God would speak! for he would certainly open his lips against thee; whereas, when God did speak, he opened his lips for Job against his three friends. Zophar despairs to convince Job himself, and therefore desires God would convince him of two things:—

1. The unsearchable depth of God's counsels. Zophar desires that God himself would show Job so much of the secrets of the divine wisdom as might convince him that they are at least double to that which is, v. 6. What we know of God is nothing to what we cannot know. What is hidden is more than double to what appears, Eph. iii. 9. God knows a great deal more evil of us than we do of ourselves; so some understand it.

2. The unexceptionable justice of his proceedings. "God exacteth of thee less than thy iniquity deserves," or (as some read it), "he remits thee part of thy iniquity."

Zophar here speaks concerning God and his greatness and glory, concerning man and his vanity and folly.

I. God is an incomprehensible Being. We that are so little acquainted with the divine nature are incompetent judges of the divine providence; and, when we censure the dispensations of it, we talk of things that we do not understand. Zophar here shows, that God's nature infinitely exceeds the capacities of our understandings: "Canst thou find out God, find him out to perfection?" v. 7, 8. We may, by searching find God (Acts xvii. 27); we may apprehend him, but we cannot comprehend him; we may know that he is, but cannot know what he is. This is a good reason why we should always speak of God with humility and caution and never quarrel with him, why we should be thankful for what he has revealed of himself and long to be where we shall see him as he is, 1 Cor. xiii. 9, 10. We cannot fathom God's designs, nor find out the reasons of his proceedings. His judgments are a great deep. Paul attributes such immeasurable dimensions to the divine love as Zophar here attributes to the divine wisdom, and yet recommends it to our acquaintance. Eph. iii. 18, 19, That you may know the breadth, and length, and depth, and height, of the love of Christ. God is a sovereign Lord (v. 10): If he cut off by death (margin, If he make a change, for death is a change; if he make a change in nations, in families, in the posture of our affairs), or if he gather to himself man's spirit, then who can hinder him? God is a strict and just observer of the children of men (v. 11): He knows vain men. He takes knowledge of the vanity of men (that is, their little sins; so some) their vain thoughts and vain words, and unsteadiness in that which is good. He observes bad men: He sees gross wickedness also. Will he not then consider it?

II. See here what man is, and let him be humbled, v. 12. God sees vain man that he would be wise, would be thought so, though he is born like a wild ass's colt, so sottish and foolish, unteachable and untameable. He is a vain creature—empty; so the word is. God made him full, but he emptied himself, and now he is raca, a creature that has nothing in him. He has become like the beasts that perish (Ps. xlix. 20; lxxiii. 22), an idiot, born like an ass, the most stupid animal, an ass's colt, not yet brought to any service. If ever he come to be good for any thing, it is owing to the grace of Christ, who once, in the day of his triumph, served himself by an ass's colt. He is a wilful ungovernable creature. An ass's colt may be made good for something, but the wild ass's colt will never be reclaimed, nor regards the crying of the driver. See Chap. xxxix. 5–7. Yet he is a proud creature and self-conceited. Now is such a creature as this fit to contend with God or call him to an account?

Zophar, as the other two, here encourages Job to hope for better times if he would but come to a better temper.

I. He gives him good counsel (v. 13, 14), as Eliphaz did (ch. v. 8), and Bildad, (ch. viii. 5). He must look within, and get his mind changed and the tree made good. He must prepare his heart; there the work of conversion and reformation must begin. He must look up, and stretch out his hands towards God, that is, must pray to him with earnestness and importunity. To give the hand to the Lord signifies to yield ourselves to him and to covenant with him, 2 Chron. xxx. 8. Job had prayed, but Zophar would have him to pray in a better manner, not as an appellant, but as a petitioner and humble suppliant. He must amend what was amiss (v. 14): "If iniquity be in thy hand (that is, if there be any sin which thou dost yet live in the practice of) put it far away." The guilt of sin is not removed if the gain of sin be not restored. He must do his utmost to reform his family too: "Let not wickedness dwell in thy tabernacles; let not thy house harbour or shelter any wicked persons, any wicked practices, or any wealth gotten by wickedness."

II. He assures him of comfort if he took this counsel, v. 15, &c. "Then shalt thou lift up thy face towards heaven without spot; thou mayest come boldly to the throne of grace, and not with that terror and amazement expressed," ch. ix. 34. Thou shalt be steadfast, and shalt not fear. Job was full of confusion (ch. x. 15), while he looked upon God as his enemy and quarrelled with him; but Zophar assures him that, if he would submit and humble himself, his mind would be composed. "Thou shalt forget thy misery; thou shalt be perfectly freed from the impressions it makes upon thee, and thou shalt remember it as waters that pass away, or are poured out of a vessel, which leave no taste or tincture behind them as other liquors do." Job had endeavoured to forget his complaint (ch. ix. 27), but found he could not. Zophar here thinks to please Job. Though now his light was eclipsed it should shine out again, and more brightly than ever (v. 17). Though now he was in a continual fear and terror, he should live in a holy rest and security, and find himself continually safe and easy (v. 18): Thou shalt be secure, because there is hope. "Thou shalt dig about thee," that is, "Thou shalt be as safe as an army in its intrenchments." Those that submit to God's government are safe both day and night. "Thou shalt dig in safety, thou and thy servants for thee, and not be again set upon by the plunderers, who fell upon thy servants at plough," ch. i. 14, 15. It is no part of the promised prosperity that he should live in idleness, but that he should have a calling and follow it, and, when he was about the business of it, should be under the divine protection. "Thou shalt lie down (v. 19), not forced to wander where there is no place to lay thy head on, but thou shalt go to bed at bedtime, and not only shall none hurt thee, but none shall make thee afraid nor so much as give thee an alarm." Though now he was slighted, yet he should be courted: "Many shall make suit to thee, and think it their interest to secure thy friendship."

III. Zophar concludes with a brief account of the doom of wicked people (v. 20): But the eyes of the wicked shall fail. He suspected that Job would not take his counsel, and here tells him what would then come of it, setting death as well as life before him. When a wicked man dies his expectation perishes, Prov. xi. 7. Their hope shall be as a puff of breath (margin), vanished and gone past recall. Those that will not fly to God will find it in vain to think of flying from him.

CHAP. XII

Job's answer to Zophar's discourse, in which, as before, he first reasons with his friends (see ch. xiii. 19) and then turns to his God. In this chapter he addresses himself to his friends, and, I. He condemns the judgment they had given of his character, ver. 1–5. II. He contradicts what they had said of the destruction of wicked people in this world, showing that they often prosper, ver. 6–11. III He consents to what they had said of the wisdom, power, and sovereignty of God, and enlarges upon it, ver. 12–25.

Verses 1–5

The reproofs Job gives to his friends.

I. He upbraids them with their conceit of themselves, and the good opinion they seemed to have of their own wisdom. 1. He represents them as claiming the monopoly of wisdom, v. 2. He speaks ironically: "No doubt you are the people; you think yourselves fit to dictate and give law to all mankind, and therefore every top-sail must lower to you, and, right or wrong, we must all say as you say, and you three must be the people, the majority, to have the casting vote. You not only think there are none, but that there will be none, as wise as you, and therefore that wisdom must die with you, that all the world must be fools when you are gone, and in the dark when your sun has set." It is folly for us to think that there will be any great irreparable loss of us when we are gone, since God can raise up others, more fit than we are, to do his work. 2. He does himself the justice to put in his claim as a sharer in the gifts of wisdom (v. 3). "But I have understanding (a heart) as well as you, nay, I fall not lower than you;" as it is in the margin. "I am as well able to judge of the methods and meanings of the divine providence, and to construe the hard chapters of it, as you are." He says not this to magnify himself. "Yea, who knows not such things as these? What things you have said that are true are plain truths, which many can talk as excellently of as either you or I." But he says it to humble them, and check the value they had for themselves as doctors of the chair.

II. He complains of the great contempt with which they had treated him (v. 4): I am as one mocked. We are apt to call reproofs reproaches, and to think ourselves mocked when we are but advised and admonished. Yet there was colour for this charge; they came to comfort him, but they vexed him, and therefore he thought they mocked him. They were his neighbours, his friends, his companions (so the word signifies), and they were professors of religion, such as called upon God, and said that he answered them. Job had a God to go to, with whom he could lodge his appeal. The mockers were themselves rich and at ease, and therefore they despised him who had fallen into poverty. It is the way of the world. Those that prosper are praised, but of those that are going down it is said, "Down with them."

Verses 6–11

Job's friends went upon this principle, that wicked people cannot prosper long in this world; the eyes of the wicked shall fail, ch. xi. 20. This principle Job here opposes, and maintains that God, in disposing men's outward affairs, acts as a sovereign, reserving the exact distribution of rewards and punishments for the future state.

I. He asserts it as an undoubted truth that wicked people may, and often do, prosper long in this world, v. 6. They are robbers, and such as provoke God, the worst kind of sinners, blasphemers and persecutors. (Perhaps he refers to the Sabeans and Chaldeans, who had robbed him, and had always lived by spoil and rapine, and yet prospered.) Even their tabernacles prosper, those that live with them and those that come after them and descend from them. It seems as if a blessing were entailed upon their families; and that is sometimes preserved to succeeding generations which was got by fraud. We cannot therefore judge of men's piety by their plenty, nor of what they have in their heart by what they have in their hand.

II. He appeals even to the inferior creatures for the proof of this—the beasts, and fowls, and trees, and even the earth itself; consult these, and they shall tell thee, v. 7, 8. Even among the brute creatures the greater devour the less and the stronger prey upon the weaker, and men are as the fishes of the sea, Hab. i. 14. If sin had not entered, we may suppose there would have been no such disorder among the creatures, but the wolf and the lamb would have lain down together. Zophar had made a vast mystery of it, ch. xi. 7. "So far from that," says Job, "what we are concerned to know we may learn even from the inferior creatures; for who knows not from all these? v. 9. Anyone may easily gather from the book of the creatures that the hand of the Lord has wrought this." A wise Providence guides and governs all these things by rules. From God's sovereign dominion over the inferior creatures we should learn to acquiesce in all his disposals of the affairs of the children of men.

III. He resolves all into the absolute propriety which God has in all the creatures (v. 10): In whose hand is the soul of every living thing. All the creatures, and mankind particularly, derive their being from him. All souls are his; and may he not do what he will with his own? The name Jehovah is used here (v. 9), and it is the only time that we meet with it in all the discourses between Job and his friends; for God was, in that age, more known by the name of Shaddai—the Almighty.

IV. Those words—(v. 11), Doth not the ear try words, as the mouth tastes meat?—may be taken either as the conclusion to the foregoing discourse or the preface to what follows. The mind of man has as good a faculty of discerning between truth and error, when duly stated, as the palate has of discerning between what is sweet and what is bitter. Job seems to appeal to any man's impartial judgment in this controversy.

This is a noble discourse of Job's concerning the wisdom, power, and sovereignty of God. It were well if wise and good men, that differ about minor things, would dwell most upon those great things in which they are agreed. On this subject Job speaks like himself. Here are no passionate complaints, no peevish reflections, but everything masculine and great.

I. He asserts the unsearchable wisdom and irresistible power of God. It is allowed that among men there is wisdom and understanding, v. 12. But it is to be found only with the ancient, who get it by long experience and constant experience; and, when they have got the wisdom, they have lost their strength. But now with God there are both wisdom and strength, wisdom to design the best and strength to accomplish what is designed. He does not get counsel or understanding, as we do, by observation, but he has it essentially and eternally in himself, v. 13. Happy are those who have this God for their God, for they have infinite wisdom and strength engaged for them. Foolish and fruitless are all the attempts of men against him (v. 14): He breaketh down, and it cannot be built again.

II. He gives an instance, for the proof of this doctrine in nature, v. 15. God has the command of the waters, binds them as in a garment (Prov. xxx. 4), holds them in the hollow of his hand (Isa. xl. 12). 1. Great droughts are sometimes great judgments: He withholds the waters, and they dry up; if the heaven be as brass, the earth is as iron. 2. Great wet is sometimes a great judgment. He raises the waters, and overturns the earth, the productions of it, the buildings upon it.

III. He gives many instances of it in God's powerful management of the children of men.

1. In general (v. 16): With him are strength and reason (so some translate it), strength and consistency with himself: it is an elegant word in the original. With him are the very quintessence and extract of wisdom. With him are power and all that is; so some read it. He is what he is of himself, and by him and in him all things subsist. Having this strength and wisdom, he knows how to make use, not only of those who are wise and good, but even of those who are foolish and bad, who, one would think, could be made no way serviceable to the designs of his providence: The deceived and the deceiver are his; the simplest men that are deceived are not below his notice; the subtlest men that deceive cannot with all their subtlety escape his cognizance.

2. He next descends to the particular instances of the wisdom and power of God in the revolutions of states and kingdoms. Some think that Job here refers to the extirpation of those powerful nations, the Rephaim, the Zuzim, the Emim, and the Horites (mentioned Gen. xiv. 5, 6; Deut. ii. 10, 20), in which perhaps it was particularly noticed how strangely they were infatuated and enfeebled: if so, it is designed to show it is God that does it, and we must therein observe his sovereign dominion, even over those that think themselves most powerful, politic, and absolute. Compare this with that of Eliphaz, ch. v. 12, &c. Those that were wise are sometimes strangely infatuated, and in this the hand of God must be acknowledged (v. 17): He leadeth counsellors away spoiled. His counsel stands, while all their devices are brought to nought. He maketh the judges fools. By a work on their minds he deprives them of their qualifications for business, and so they become really fools. Let not the wise man therefore glory in his wisdom, nor the ablest counsellors and judges be proud of their station, but humbly depend upon God for the continuance of their abilities. Even the aged, who seem to hold their wisdom, by prescription, may yet be deprived of it by the infirmities of age, which make them twice children: He taketh away the understanding of the aged, v. 20. Those that were high and in authority are strangely brought down, impoverished, and enslaved, and it is God that humbles them (v. 18): He looseth the bond of kings, and taketh from them the power wherewith they ruled their subjects, unbuckles their belts, so that the sword drops from their side, and then no marvel if the crown quickly drops from their head, on which immediately follows the girding of their loins with a girdle, a badge of servitude. Those that were strong are strangely weakened, and it is God that weakens them (v. 21) and overthrows the mighty, v. 19. Those that were famed for eloquence, and entrusted with public business, are strangely silenced, and have nothing to say (v. 20): He removeth away the speech of the trusty, so that they cannot speak as they intended and as they used to do, with freedom and clearness, but blunder, and falter, and make nothing of it. Those that were honoured and admired strangely fall into disgrace (v. 21): He poureth contempt upon princes. That which was secret, and lay hidden, is strangely brought to light and laid open (v. 22): He discovers deep things out of darkness. Plots closely laid are discovered and defeated; wickedness closely committed and artfully concealed is discovered. Kingdoms have their ebbings and flowings, their waxings and wanings; and both are from God (v. 23). He taketh away the heart of the chief of the people, their leaders most famed for their martial fire. They are heartless, and ready to flee at the shaking of a leaf. Those that were driving on their projects with full speed are strangely bewildered and at a loss, wandering like men in a desert (v. 24), groping like men in the dark, and staggering like men in drink, v. 25. Heaven and earth are shaken, but the Lord sits King for ever, and with him we look for a kingdom that cannot be shaken.

CHAP. XIII

Job here comes to make application of what he had said. I. He is very bold with his friends, comparing himself with them, notwithstanding the mortifications he was under, ver. 1, 2, condemning them for their falsehood, their partiality (ver. 4–8), and threatening them with the judgments of God for their so doing (ver. 9–12), desiring them to be silent (ver. 5, 13, 17), and turning from them to God, ver. 3. II. He is very bold with his God. 1. In some expressions his faith is very bold, yet that is not more bold than welcome, ver. 15, 16, 18. But, 2 In other expressions his passion is rather too bold in expostulations with God concerning the deplorable condition he was in (ver. 14, 19, &c.), complaining of the confusion he was in (ver. 20–22), and the loss he was at to find out the sin that provoked God thus to afflict him.

Verses 1-12

Job warmly expresses his resentment of the unkindness of his friends.

I. He comes up with them as one that did not need to be taught by them, v. 1, 2. They compelled him, as the Corinthians did Paul, to commend himself and his own knowledge, yet not in a way of self-applause, but of self-justification. Happy are those who not only see and hear, but understand, the greatness, glory, and sovereignty of God. This, he thought, would justify what he had said before (ch. xii. 3), which he repeats here (v. 2): "What you know, the same do I know also, so that I need not come to you to be taught; I am not inferior unto you in wisdom."

II. He turns from them to God (v. 3): Surely I would speak to the Almighty. Job would rather argue with God himself than with his friends.

III. He condemns them for their unjust and uncharitable treatment of him, v. 4. They falsely accused him, and that was unjust: You are forgers of lies. They framed a wrong hypothesis concerning the divine Providence, as if it did never remarkably afflict any but wicked men in this world, and thence they drew a false judgment concerning Job, that he was certainly a hypocrite. They undertook his cure, and pretended to be his physicians; but they were all physicians of no value, "idol-physicians, who can do me no more good than an idol can."

IV. He begs they would be silent and give him a patient hearing, v. 5, 6. "Hold your peace, and it shall be your wisdom, for thereby you will conceal your ignorance and ill-nature." Hear now my reasoning. Perhaps, though they did not interrupt him in his discourse, yet they seemed careless, and did not much heed what he said. He therefore begged that they would not only hear, but hearken.

V. He endeavours to convince them of the wrong they did to God's honour, while they pretended to plead for him, v. 7, 8. God and his cause did not need such advocates: "Will you think to contend for God, as if his justice were clouded and wanted to be cleared up, or as if he were at a loss what to say and wanted you to speak for him? If you were for ever silent, the heavens would declare his righteousness." Under pretence of justifying God in afflicting Job they magisterially condemned him as a hypocrite and a bad man. "This" (says he) "is speaking wickedly" (for uncharitableness and censoriousness are wickedness, great wickedness). God's truth needs not our lie, nor God's cause either our sinful policies or our sinful passions.

VI. He endeavours to possess them with a fear of God's judgment, and so to bring them to a better temper. Let them consider whether they could give him a good account of what they did (v. 9): "Is it good that he should search you out?" It is good to an upright man who means honestly that God should search him. But it is bad to him who looks one way and rows another that God should search him out. The severity of his rebukes and displeasure against them (v. 10): "If you do accept persons, though but secretly and in heart, he will surely reprove you. You that have great knowledge of God, and profess a fear of him, how dare you talk at this rate and give yourselves so great a liberty of speech?" There is in God a dreadful excellency. His excellencies in themselves are amiable, but considering man's distance from God by nature, and his defection and degeneracy by sin, his excellencies are dreadful. Let them consider themselves, and what an unequal match they were for this great God (v. 12): "Your remembrances (all that in you for which you hope to be remembered when you are gone) are like unto ashes, worthless and weak, and easily trampled on and blown away. Your bodies are like bodies of clay. Your remonstrances on God's behalf are no better than dust, and the arguments you accumulate but like so many heaps of dirt."

Job here takes fresh hold, fast hold, of his integrity, as one that was resolved not to let it go, nor suffer it to be wrested from him.

I. He entreats his friends and all the company to let him alone, and not interrupt him in what he was about to say (v. 13), but diligently to hearken to it, v. 17. He would have his own protestation to be decisive, for none but God and himself knew his heart. "Be silent therefore, and let me hear no more of you, but hearken diligently to what I say, and let my own oath for confirmation be an end of the strife."

II. He resolves to adhere to the testimony his own conscience gave of his integrity: "I will speak in my own defence, and let come on me what will, v. 13. I hope God will not make my necessary defence to be my offence, as you do. He will justify me (v. 18) and then nothing can come amiss to me." He resolves (v. 15) that he will maintain his own ways. "If I hold my tongue, and do not speak for myself, my silence now will for ever silence me, for I shall certainly give up the ghost," v. 19.

III. He complains of the extremity of pain and misery he was in (v. 14): Wherefore do I take my flesh in my teeth? That is, "Why do I suffer such agonies? I cannot but wonder that God should lay so much upon me when he knows I am not a wicked man." It would vex the most patient man, when he had lost everything else, to be denied the comfort (if he deserves it) of a good conscience and a good name.

IV. He still depends upon God for—justification and salvation, the two great things we hope for through Christ (v. 18): I have ordered my cause, and, upon the whole matter, I know that I shall be justified. Those whose hearts are upright with God, in walking not after the flesh but after the Spirit, may be sure that through Christ there shall be no condemnation to them, but that, whoever lays anything to their charge, they shall be justified (v. 16): He also shall be my salvation. He means it not of temporal salvation (he had little expectation of that); but concerning his eternal salvation he was very confident. He knew himself not to be a hypocrite, and therefore concluded he should not be rejected. Sincerity is our evangelical perfection; nothing will ruin us but the want of that. Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him, v. 15. This is a high expression of faith. We must rejoice in God when we have nothing else to rejoice in, and cleave to him, yea, though we cannot for the present find comfort in him.

V. He wishes to argue the case even with God himself, if he might but have leave to settle the preliminaries of the treaty, v. 20–22. "Withdraw thy hand far from me; for, while I am in this extremity, I am fit for nothing." "Let not thy dread make me afraid"; "Lord," says Job, "let me not be put into such a consternation of spirit, together with this bodily affliction; for then I must certainly drop the cause, and shall make nothing of it." How can even a good man, much less a bad man, reason with God, so as to be justified before him, when he is upon the rack of pain.

Verses 23–28

I. Job enquires after his sins, and begs to have them discovered to him. Make me to know my transgressions, v. 23. His friends were ready enough to tell him how numerous and how heinous they were, ch. xxii. 5. "But Lord," says he, "let me know them from thee; for thy judgment is according to truth, theirs is not." That which I see not, teach thou me. A true penitent is willing to know the worst of himself; and we should all desire to know what our transgressions are, that we may be particular in the confession of them and on our guard against them for the future.

II. He bitterly complains of God's withdrawings from him (v. 24): Wherefore hidest thou thy face? This must be meant of something more than his outward afflictions; his soul was also sorely vexed. God hid his face as one strange to him, displeased with him. Note, The Holy Ghost sometimes denies his favours to the best and dearest of his saints and servants in this world. Evidences for heaven are eclipsed, communications interrupted, and the returns of comfort, for the present, despaired of, Ps. lxxvii. 7–9; lxxxviii. 7, 15, 16. These are grievous burdens to a gracious soul, that values God's loving-kindness as better than life, Prov. xviii. 14. A wounded spirit who can bear? Job, by asking here, Why hidest thou thy face? teaches us that, when at any time we are under the sense of God's withdrawings, we are to enquire into the reason of them—what is the sin for which he corrects us and what the good he designs us. Job's sufferings were typical of the sufferings of Christ, from whom not only men hid their faces (Isa. liii. 3), but God hid his, witness the darkness which surrounded him on the cross when he cried out, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?

III. He humbly pleads with God his own utter inability to stand before him (v. 25): "Wilt thou break a leaf, pursue the dry stubble?" We ought to have such an apprehension of the goodness and compassion of God as to believe that he will not break the bruised reed, Matt. xii. 20.

IV. He sadly complains of God's severe dealings with him. He owns it was for his sins that God thus contended with him, but thinks it hard (v. 26): Thou writest bitter things against me. Afflictions are bitter things. "Herein thou makest me to possess the iniquities of my youth," that is, "thou punishest me for them, and thereby puttest me in mind of them, and obligest me to renew my repentance for them." Time does not wear out the guilt of sin. God writes bitter things against us to bring forgotten sins to mind, and so to bring us to remorse for them as to break us off from them. "Thou puttest my feet also in the stocks to correct me for every false step. Thou settest a print upon the heels of my feet no sooner have I trodden wrong, though ever so little, than immediately I smart for it; the punishment treads upon the very heels of the sin." Now, (1) It was not true that God did thus seek advantages against him. But he is so far from this that he deals not with us according to the desert. This therefore was the language of Job's melancholy; his sober thoughts never represented God thus as a hard Master. (2) But we should keep such a strict and jealous eye as this upon ourselves and our own steps, both for the discovery of sin past and the prevention of it for the future.

V. He finds himself wasting away apace under the heavy hand of God, v. 28. He (that is, man) as a rotten thing, the principle of whose putrefaction is in itself, consumes even like a moth-eaten garment, which becomes continually worse and worse. While there is so little soundness in the soul, no marvel there is so little soundness in the flesh, Ps. xxxviii. 3.

CHAP. XIV

Job goes on to speak to God and himself. He had reminded his friends of their frailty and mortality (ch. xiii. 12); here he reminds himself of his own, and pleads it with God for some mitigation of his miseries. We have here an account, I. Of man's life, that it is, 1. Short, ver. 1. 2. Sorrowful, ver. 1. 3. Sinful, ver. 4. 4. Stinted, ver. 5, 14. II. Of man's death, that it puts a final period to our present life, to which we shall not again return (ver. 7–12), that it hides us from the calamities of life (ver. 13), destroys the hopes of life (ver. 18, 19), sends us away from the business of life (ver. 20), and keeps us in the dark concerning our relations in this life, how much soever we have formerly been in care about them, ver. 21, 22. III. The use Job makes of all this. 1. He pleads it with God, who, he thought, was too strict and severe with him (ver. 16, 17), begging that, in consideration of his frailty, he would not contend with him (ver. 3), but grant him some respite, ver. 6. 2. He engages himself to prepare for death (ver 14), and encourages himself to hope that it would be comfortable to him, ver. 15. This chapter is proper for funeral solemnities.

We are here led to think,

I. Of the original of human life. God is indeed its great original, for he breathed into man the breath of life and in him we live; but we date it from our birth, and thence we must date both its frailty and its pollution. 1. Its frailty: Man, that is born of a woman, is therefore of few days, v. 1. This may refer to the first woman, who was called Eve, or it may refer to every man's immediate mother. 2. Its pollution (v. 4): Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? Our blood is not only attainted by a legal conviction, but tainted with an hereditary disease. Our Lord Jesus, being made sin for us, is said to be made of a woman, Gal. iv. 4.

II. Of the nature of human life: it is a flower, it is a shadow, v. 2. The flower is fading, and all its beauty soon withers and is gone. The shadow is fleeting, and its very being will soon be lost and drowned in the shadows of the night.

III. Of the shortness and uncertainty of human life: Man is of few days. Life is here computed, not by months or years, but by days, for we cannot be sure of any day. Man sometimes no sooner comes forth than he is cut down—comes forth into the world and enters into the business of it than he is hurried away as soon as he has laid his hand to the plough. If not cut down immediately, yet he flees as a shadow, and never continues in one stay.

IV. Of the calamitous state of human life. Man, as he is short-lived, so he is sad-lived. During these few days he is full of trouble, not only troubled, but full of trouble, either toiling or fretting, grieving or fearing. When we come to heaven our days will be many, and perfectly free from trouble, and in the mean time faith, hope, and love, balance the present grievances.

V. Of the sinfulness of human life, arising from the sinfulness of the human nature. So some understand that question (v. 4), Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? He intends it as a plea with God for compassion: "Lord, be not extreme to mark my sins of human frailty and infirmity, for thou knowest my weakness. O remember that I am flesh!" The Chaldee paraphrase has an observable reading of this verse: Who can make a man clean that is polluted with sin? Cannot one? that is, God.

VI. Of the settled period of human life, v. 5. Nothing comes to pass by chance, so, not the execution done by a bow drawn at a venture. We are no more governed by the Stoic's blind fate than by the Epicurean's blind fortune. The consideration of our own inability to contend with God, of our own sinfulness and weakness, should engage us to pray, Lord, enter not into judgment with thy servant. Thus may we find some relief under great troubles by recommending ourselves to the compassion of that God who knows our frame and will consider it, and our being out of frame too.

Job here shows,

I. That death is a removal for ever out of this world. A man cut down by death will not revive again, as a tree cut down will. What hope there is of a tree he shows very elegantly, v. 7–9. If the body of the tree be cut down, and only the stem or stump left in the ground, though it seem dead and dry, yet it will shoot out young boughs again, as if it were but newly planted. But man has no such prospect of a return to life. The vegetable life is a cheap and easy thing: the scent of water will recover it. The animal life, in some insects and fowls, is so: the heat of the sun retrieves it. But the rational soul, when once retired, is too great, too noble, a thing to be recalled by any of the powers of nature; it is out of the reach of sun or rain, and cannot be restored but by the immediate operations of Omnipotence itself; for (v. 10) man dieth and wasteth away, yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he? Two words are here used for man:—Geber, a mighty man, though mighty, dies; Adam, a man of the earth, because earthy, gives up the ghost. After death: Where is he? He is not where he was; his place knows him no more; but is he nowhere? So some read it. Yes, he is somewhere; and it is a very awful consideration to think where those are that have given up the ghost, and where we shall be when we give it up. It has gone to the world of spirits, gone into eternity, gone to return no more to this world.

II. That yet there will be a return of man to life again in another world, at the end of time, when the heavens are no more. Then they shall awake and be raised out of their sleep. The resurrection of the dead was doubtless an article of Job's creed, as appears, ch. xix. 26.

1. A humble petition for a hiding-place in the grave, v. 13. It was not only in a passionate weariness of this life that he wished to die, but in a pious assurance of a better life, to which at length he should arise.

2. A holy resolution patiently to attend the will of God both in his death, and in his resurrection (v. 14): If a man die, shall he live again? All the days of my appointed time will I wait until my change come. Job's friends proving miserable comforters, he set himself to be the more his own comforter. His case was now bad, but he pleases himself with the expectation of a change.

3. A joyful expectation of bliss and satisfaction in this (v. 15): Then thou shalt call, and I will answer thee. Now, he was under such a cloud that he could not, he durst not, answer (ch. ix. 15, 35; xiii. 22); but he comforted himself with this, that there would come a time when God would call and he should answer. "Thou wilt have a desire to the work of thy hands. Thou hast mercy in store for me, not only as made by thy providence, but new-made by thy grace; otherwise he that made them will not save them." Grace in the soul is the work of God's own hands, and therefore he will not forsake it in this world (Ps. cxxxviii. 8), but will have a desire to it, to perfect it in the other, and to crown it with endless glory.

Job returns to his complaints; and, though he is not without hope of future bliss, he finds it very hard to get over his present grievances.

I. He complains of the particular hardships he apprehended himself under from the strictness of God's justice, v. 16, 17. Therefore he longed to go hence to that world where God's wrath will be past, because now he was under the continual tokens of it, as a child, under the severe discipline of the rod, longs to be of age. "When shall my change come? For now thou seemest to me to number my steps, and watch over my sin, and seal it up in a bag, as bills of indictment are kept safely, to be produced against the prisoner." See Deut. xxxii. 34. 1. Job does right to the divine justice in owning that he smarted for his sins and transgressions, that he had done enough to deserve all that was laid upon him. But, 2. He does wrong to the divine goodness in suggesting that God was extreme to mark what he did amiss, and made the worst of everything. He spoke to this purport, ch. xiii. 27, but we are punished less than our iniquities deserve. God does indeed seal and sew up, against the day of wrath, the transgression of the impenitent, but the sins of his people he blots out as a cloud.

II. He complains of the wasting condition of mankind in general. We live in a dying world.

1. We see the decays of the earth itself. (1) Of the strongest parts of it, v. 18. Nothing will last always, for we see even mountains moulder and come to nought; they wither and fall as a leaf; rocks wax old and pass away by the continual beating of the sea against them. The waters wear the stones with constant dropping, non vi, sed sæpe cadendo—not by the violence, but by the constancy with which they fall. On this earth everything is the worse for the wearing. Tempus edax rerum—Time devours all things. (2) Of the natural products of it. The things which grow out of the earth, and seem to be firmly rooted in it, are sometimes by an excess of rain washed away, v. 19.

2. No marvel then if we see the decays of man upon the earth, for he is of the earth, earthy. Job begins to think his case is not singular, and therefore he ought to reconcile himself to the common lot. How vain it is to expect much from the enjoyments of life: "Thou destroyest the hope of man," that is, "puttest an end to all the projects he had framed and all the prospects of satisfaction he had flattered himself with." Death will be the destruction of all those hopes which are built upon worldly confidences and confined to worldly comforts. Hope in Christ, and hope in heaven, death will consummate and not destroy. The consideration of this should moderate our cares concerning our children and families. God will know what comes of them when we are gone. To him therefore let us commit them, with him let us leave them, and not burden ourselves with needless fruitless cares concerning them. It is true wisdom, by making our peace with God in Christ and keeping a good conscience, to treasure up comforts which will support and relieve us against the pains and sorrows of a dying hour.

CHAP. XV

Perhaps Job thought, if he had not convinced, yet he had at least silenced all his three friends; but, it seems, he had not: in this chapter they begin a second attack upon him. Eliphaz here keeps close to the principles upon which he had condemned Job, and, I. He reproves him for justifying himself, and fathers on him many evil things which are unfairly inferred, ver. 2-13. II. He persuades him to humble himself before God and to take shame to himself, ver. 14-16. III. He reads him a long lecture concerning the woeful estate of wicked people, who harden their hearts against God and the judgments which are prepared for them, ver. 17-35. A good use may be made both of his reproofs (for they are plain) and of his doctrine (for it is sound), though both the one and the other are misapplied to Job.

Verses 1-16

Eliphaz here falls very foul upon Job, because he contradicted what he and his colleagues had said. Several great crimes Eliphaz here charges Job with, only because he would not own himself a hypocrite.

I. He charges him with folly and absurdity (v. 2, 3), that, whereas he had been reputed a wise man, he had now quite forfeited his reputation. It is common for angry disputants thus to represent one another's reasonings as impertinent and ridiculous. There is a great deal of vain knowledge, science falsely so called, that is useless, and therefore worthless. This is the knowledge that puffs up, with which men swell in a fond conceit of their own accomplishments. Vain knowledge or unprofitable talk ought to be reproved and checked, especially in a wise man, whom it worst becomes.

II. He charges him with impiety and irreligion (v. 4): "Thou castest off fear," that is, "the fear of God, and that regard to him which thou shouldst have; and then thou restrainest prayer." See what religion is summed up in, fearing God and praying to him, the former the most needful principle, the latter the most needful practice. Those who are prayerless are fearless and graceless. Those who either omit prayer or straiten and abridge themselves in it, quenching the spirit of adoption and denying themselves the liberty they might take in the duty, restrain prayer. This is bad enough, but it is worse to restrain others from prayer, to prohibit and discourage prayer, as Darius, Dan. vi. 7. Eliphaz charges this upon Job. He thought that Job talked of God with such liberty as if he had been his equal, that he had quite thrown off all religious regard to him. This charge was utterly false, and yet wanted not some colour. We ought not only to take care that we keep up prayer and the fear of God, but that we never drop any unwary expressions which may give occasion to those who seek occasion to question our sincerity and constancy in religion. "If this be true" (thinks Eliphaz) "which Job says, that a man may be thus surely afflicted and yet be a good man, then farewell all religion, farewell prayer and the fear of God. Thy mouth utters thy iniquity—teaches it," so the word is. "Thou teachest others to have the same hard thoughts of God and religion that thou thyself hast." But thou choosest the tongue of the crafty, that is, "Thou utterest thy iniquity with some show and pretence of piety, mixing some good words with the bad, as tradesmen do with their wares to help them off." Eliphaz, in his first discourse, had proceeded against Job upon mere surmise (ch. iv. 6, 7), but now he has got proof against him from his own discourses (v. 6): Thy own mouth condemns thee, and not I. But he should have considered that he and his fellows had provoked him to say that which now they took advantage of; and that was not fair.

III. He charges him with intolerable arrogancy and self-conceitedness. It was a just, and reasonable, and modest demand that Job had made (ch. xii. 3), Allow that I have understanding as well as you; but see how they seek occasion against him: that is misconstrued, as if he pretended to be wiser than any man. "Art thou the first man that was born? Wast thou made before the hills, as Wisdom herself was? (Prov. viii. 23, &c.) Dost thou know more of the world than any of us do? No, thou art but of yesterday even as we are," ch. viii. 9. In intimacy of acquaintance with God (v. 8): "Hast thou heard the secret of God?" He also represents him, (1) As assuming to himself such knowledge as none else had: "Dost thou restrain wisdom to thyself, as if none were wise besides?" Job had said (ch. xiii. 2), What you know, the same do I know also. (2) As opposing the stream of antiquity, a venerable name, under the shade of which all contending parties strive to shelter themselves: "With us are the grey-headed and very aged men (v. 10). We have the fathers on our side."

IV. He charges him with a contempt of the counsels and comforts that were given him by his friends (v. 11): Are the consolations of God small with thee? Eliphaz takes it ill that Job did not value the comforts which he and his friends administered to him more than it seems he did. He represents this as a slight put upon divine consolations in general, as if they were of small account with him, whereas really they were not. If he had not highly valued them, he could not have borne up as he did under his sufferings.

V. He charges him with opposition to God himself and to religion (v. 12, 13): "Why doth thy heart carry thee away into such indecent irreligious expressions?" He thought Job's spirit was soured against God, and so turned from what it had been, and exasperated at his dealings with him. Eliphaz wanted candour and charity, else he would not have put such a harsh construction upon the speeches of one that had such a settled reputation for piety and was now in temptation.

VI. He charges him with justifying himself to such a degree as even to deny his share in the common corruption and pollution of the human nature (v. 14): What is man, that he should be clean? that is, that he should pretend to be so, or that any should expect to find him so. What is he that is born of a woman, a sinful woman, that he should be righteous? With these plain truths Eliphaz thinks to convince Job, whereas he had just now said the same (ch. xiv. 4): Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? But does it therefore follow that Job is a hypocrite and a wicked man, which is all that he denied? By no means. Though man, as born of a woman, is not clean, yet, as born again of the Spirit, he is clean. Further to evince this he here shows, (1) That the brightest creatures are imperfect and impure before God, v. 15. He takes no complacency in the heavens themselves. How pure soever they seem to us, in his eye they had many a speck and many a flaw: The heavens are not clean in his sight. If the stars have no light in the sight of the sun, what light has the sun in the sight of God! See Isa. xxiv. 23. (2) That man is much more so (v. 16): How much more abominable and filthy is man! If saints are not to be trusted, much less sinners. If the heavens are not pure, which are as God made them, much less man, who is degenerated. Nay, he is abominable and filthy in the sight of God, and if ever he repent he is so in his own sight, and therefore he abhors himself.

Verses 17 35

Eliphaz comes to maintain his own thesis, upon which he built his censure of Job. Those who are wicked are certainly miserable, those who are miserable are certainly wicked, therefore Job was so.

I. His solemn preface (v. 17): "I will show thee that which is worth hearing, and not reason, as thou dost, with unprofitable talk." He promises to teach him, 1. From his own experience and observation: "That which I have myself seen, in divers instances, I will declare." 2. From the wisdom of the ancients (v. 18): Which wise men have told from their fathers. The wisdom and learning of the moderns are very much derived from those of the ancients. Good children will learn a good deal from their good parents; and what we have learned from our ancestors we must transmit to our posterity.

II. The discourse itself.

1. Those who are wise and good do ordinarily prosper in this world. This he only hints at (v. 19), that those were such as had the earth given to them, and to them only; they enjoyed it entirely and peaceably. Job had said, The earth is given into the hand of the wicked, ch. ix. 24. "No," says Eliphaz, "it is given into the hands of the saints, and they are not robbed and plundered by strangers making inroads upon them, as thou art by the Sabeans and Chaldeans."

2. Wicked people, and particularly tyrannizing rulers, are subject to continual terrors, and perish very miserably. Even those who impiously dare God's judgments will feel them at last. He speaks in the singular number—the wicked man. He meant Job himself, whom he expressly charges both with the tyranny and with the timorousness here described, ch. xxii. 9, 10. Here he thinks Job might, in this description, see his own face.

(1) He describes the sinner who lives thus miserably, v. 25–28. It is no ordinary sinner, that bids defiance to God, v. 25. Tell him of the divine law, and its obligations; he breaks those bonds asunder. Tell him of the divine wrath, and he bids the Almighty do his worst, and will not be controlled by law, or conscience. He stretches out his hand against God to show that, if it were in his power, he would ungod him. He strengthens himself (he would be valiant, so some read it) against the Almighty. It is the prodigious madness of presumptuous sinners that they enter the lists with Omnipotence. He runs upon him, upon God himself, even upon his neck, as a desperate combatant, when he finds himself an unequal match for his adversary, flies in his face, though, at the same time, he falls on his sword's point, or the sharp spike of his buckler. He wraps himself up in security and sensuality (v. 27): He covers his face with his fatness. This signifies both the pampering of his flesh with daily delicious fare and the hardening of his heart hereby against the judgments of God. The fat that covers his face makes him look bold and haughty, and that which covers his flanks makes him lie easy and soft, and feel little; but this will prove poor shelter against the darts of God's wrath. He enriches himself with the spoils of all about him, v. 28. They conceive mischief, and then they effect it by preparing deceit, pretending to protect those whom they design to subdue, and making leagues of peace the more effectually to carry on the operations of war.

(2) The miserable condition of this wicked man, both in spiritual and temporal judgments. His inward peace is continually disturbed. His own conscience accuses him, and with the pangs of that he travaileth in pain all his days, v. 20. His sins stare him in the face at every turn. He is vexed at the uncertainty of the continuance of his wealth and power: The number of years is hidden to the oppressor. He is under a certain fearful expectation of judgment. A dreadful sound is in his ears, v. 21. He knows that God is angry with him and that all the world hates him; he has done nothing to make his peace with either. Again (v. 23): He knows that the day of darkness (or the night of darkness rather) is ready at his hand, that it is appointed to him and cannot be put by. 'No marvel that it follows (v. 24), Trouble and anguish shall make him afraid of worse to come. If at any time he be in trouble, he despairs of getting out (v. 22). Such a dread he has of poverty, and such a waste does he discern upon his estate, that he is already, in his own imagination, wandering abroad for bread. How can he prosper when God runs upon him? so some understand that, v. 26. Whom God runs upon he will certainly run down. Many that get much by fraud and injustice, yet do not grow rich: it goes as it comes; it is got by one sin and spent upon another. He is in care to leave what he has got and kept to his children after him. But the branches of his family shall perish. They shall not be green, v. 32. The flame shall dry them up, v. 30. He shall shake them off as blossoms that never knit, or as the unripe grape, v. 33. Many a man's family is ruined by his iniquity. He is in care, when he is in trouble, how to get out of it (not how to get good by it); but in this also he is crossed (v. 30): He shall not depart out of darkness. He is in care to secure his partners, but that is in vain too, v. 34, 35. The congregation of them, the whole confederacy, they and all their tabernacles, shall be desolate.

(3) Will the prosperity of presumptuous sinners end thus miserably? Then (v. 31) let not him that is deceived trust in vanity. Those who trust to their sinful ways of getting wealth trust in vanity, and vanity will be their recompence. Those who trust to their wealth when they have gotten it, especially to the wealth they have gotten dishonestly, trust in vanity; for it will yield them no satisfaction. They will own at length, with the utmost confusion, that a deceived heart turned them aside, and that they cheated themselves with a lie in their right hand.

CHAP. XVI

Job's reply to that discourse of Eliphaz in the foregoing chapter; it is but the second part of the same song of lamentation with which he had before bemoaned himself, and is set to the same melancholy tune. I. He upbraids his friends with their unkind usage of him, ver. 1–5. II. He represents his own case as very deplorable, ver. 6–16. III. He still holds fast his integrity, concerning which he appeals to God's righteous judgment from the unrighteous censures of his friends, ver. 17–22.

Verses 1–5

Both Job and his friends undervalue one another's sense, and wisdom, and management. The longer the saw of contention is drawn the hotter it grows. Eliphaz had represented Job's discourses as idle, and unprofitable, and Job here gives his the same character. Job here reproves Eliphaz, 1. For needless repetitions (v. 2): "I have heard many such things." 2. For unskilful applications. "Miserable comforters are you all, who, instead of offering anything to alleviate the affliction add affliction to it, and make it yet more grievous." The patient's case is sad indeed when his medicines are poisons and his physicians his worst disease. 3. For endless impertinence. Job wishes that vain words might have an end, v. 3. 4. For obstinacy. What emboldeneth thee, that thou answerest? It is a great piece of confidence, to pass a judgment on men's spiritual state upon the view of their outward condition. 5. For the violation of the sacred laws of friendship. This is a cutting reproof, v. 4, 5. He desires his friends, in imagination, to suppose themselves in misery like him and him at ease like them. He represents the unkindness of their conduct towards him, by showing what he could do to them if they were in his condition: I could speak as you do. He shows them what they should do, by telling them what in that case he would do (v. 5): "I would strengthen you, and say all I could to assuage your grief, but nothing to aggravate it." What is the duty we owe to our brethren in their affliction? We should say and do all we can to strengthen them, to encourage their confidence in God, to support their sinking spirits, to assuage their grief—the causes of their grief, if possible, or at least their resentment of those causes. Good words cost nothing; but they may be of good service to those that are in sorrow, not only as it is some comfort to them to see their friends concerned for them, but as they may be so reminded of that which, through the prevalency of grief, was forgotten. Though hard words break no bones, yet kind words may help to make broken bones rejoice.

Verses 6–16

Job's complaint is here as bitter as anywhere in all his discourses. Sometimes giving vent to grief gives ease; but, "Though I speak" (says Job), "my grief is not assuaged, what I speak is so misconstrued as to be turned to the aggravation of my grief." At other times keeping silence makes the trouble the easier and the sooner forgotten; but (says Job) though I forbear what am I eased? If he complained he was censured as passionate; if not, as sullen. If he maintained his integrity, that was his crime; if he made no answer to their accusations, his silence was taken for a confession of his guilt.

I. His family was scattered (v. 7). He had company indeed, but such as he would rather have been without, for they seemed to triumph in his desolation.

II. His body was worn away with diseases and pains, v. 8. His face was furrowed, not with age, but sickness: Thou hast filled me with wrinkles. "They are witnesses for me, that my complaint is not causeless."

III. His enemy threatened him (v. 9): He tears me in his wrath. But who is this enemy? 1. Eliphaz, who showed himself very much exasperated against him, and what he said tore Job's good name and thundered nothing but terror to him. Or, 2. Satan. He was his enemy that hated him, and aimed to make him curse God. It is not improbable that this is the enemy he means. Or, 3. God himself. If we understand it of him, the expressions are indeed as rash as any he used. God hates none of his creatures; but Job's melancholy did thus represent to him the terrors of the Almighty.

IV. All about him were abusive to him, v. 10. Herein Job was a type of Christ, as many of the ancients make him: these very expressions are used in the predictions of his sufferings, Ps. xxii. 13, They gaped upon me with their mouths; and (Mic. v. 1), They shall smite the Judge of Israel with a rod upon the cheek, which was literally fulfilled, Matt. xxvi. 67.

V. God, instead of delivering him out of their hands, as he hoped, delivered him into their hands (v. 11): He hath turned me over into the hands of the wicked. Herein also Job was a type of Christ, who was delivered into wicked hands, to be crucified and slain, by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, Acts ii. 23.

VI. God not only delivered him into the hands of the wicked, but took him into his own hands too (v. 12): "I was at ease in the comfortable enjoyment of the gifts of God's bounty, yet he has broken me asunder, put me upon the rack of pain, and torn me limb from limb." "He has set me up for his mark, the butt at which he is pleased to let fly all his arrows." When God set him up for a mark his archers presently compassed him round. Whoever are our enemies, we must look upon them as God's archers, and see him directing the arrow. It is the Lord; let him do what seemeth him good. As if he had no mercy in reserve for him, he does not spare nor abate anything of the extremity. "He breaketh me with breach upon breach, follows me with one wound after another." Thus he thought that God ran upon him like a giant, whom he could not possibly stand before or confront. Even good men, when they are in great and extraordinary troubles, have much ado not to entertain hard thoughts of God.

VII. He had divested himself of all his honour, and all his comfort. Job, as one truly penitent and truly patient, humbled himself under the mighty hand of God, v. 15, 16. He consulted not either his ease or finery in his dress, but sewed sackcloth upon his skin; that clothing he thought good enough for such a defiled distempered body as he had. He insisted not upon any points of honour, but humbled himself under humbling providences: He defiled his horn in the dust, and refused the respect that used to be paid to his dignity. "My face is foul with weeping so constantly for my sins, for God's displeasure against me, and for my friends' unkindness: this has brought a shadow of death upon my eyelids."

Job's condition was very deplorable; but,

I. He had the testimony of his conscience that he had walked uprightly, and had never allowed himself in any gross sin. None was ever more ready than he to acknowledge his sins of infirmity; but he could not charge himself with any enormous crime, for which he should be made more miserable than other men, v. 17. Eliphaz had represented him as a tyrant and an oppressor. "No," says he, "I never did any wrong to any man, but always despised the gain of oppression." Eliphaz had charged him with hypocrisy in religion, but he specifies prayer, the great act of religion, and professes that in that he was pure, though not from all infirmity. It was not like the prayers of the Pharisees, who looked no further than to be seen of men, and to serve a turn.

1. This assertion of his own integrity he backs with a solemn imprecation of shame and confusion to himself if it were not true, v. 18. If there were any injustice in his hands, he wished it might not be concealed: O earth! cover thou not my blood, that is, "the innocent blood of others, which I am suspected to have shed." If there were any impurity in his prayers, he wished they might not be accepted: Let my cry have no place.

II. He could appeal to God's omniscience concerning his integrity, v. 19. The witness in our own bosoms for us will stand us in little stead if we have not a witness in heaven for us too; for God is greater than our hearts, and we are not to be our own judges. This therefore is Job's triumph, My witness is in heaven. It is an unspeakable comfort to a good man, when he lies under the censure of his brethren, that there is a God in heaven who knows his integrity and will clear it up sooner or later.

III. He had a God to go to before whom he might unbosom himself, v. 20, 21. "My friends (so they call themselves) scorn me; they set themselves not only to resist me, but to use all their art and eloquence" (so the word signifies) "to run me down." He doubted not but that God did now take cognizance of his sorrows: My eye pours out tears to God. Even tears, when sanctified to God, give ease to troubled spirits; and, if men slight our grief, this may comfort us, that God regards them. If he could but now have the same freedom at God's bar that men commonly have at the bar of the civil magistrate, he doubted not but to carry his cause, for the Judge himself was a witness to his integrity. The language of this wish is like that in Isa. l. 7, 8, I know that I shall not be ashamed, for he is near that justifies me.

IV. He had a prospect of death which would put a period to all his troubles. Such confidence had he towards God that he could take pleasure in thinking of the approach of death, when he should be determined to his everlasting state, as one that doubted not but it would be well with him then: When a few years have come (the years of number which are determined and appointed to me) then I shall go the way whence I shall not return. To die is to go the way whence we shall not return. It is to go a journey from the world of sense to the world of spirits. It is a journey to our long home. We must all of us very certainly go this journey; and it is comfortable to those who keep a good conscience to think of it, for it is the crown of their integrity.

CHAP. XVII

I. Job reflects upon the harsh censures which his friends had passed upon him, and, looking upon himself as a dying man (ver. 1), he appeals to God, and begs of him speedily to appear for him, and right him, because they had wronged him, and he knew not how to right himself, ver. 2–7. But he hopes that, though it should be a surprise, it will be no stumbling-block, to good people, to see him thus abused, ver. 8, 9. II. He reflects upon the vain hopes they had fed him with, ver. 10–16.

Verses 1–9

Job's discourse is broken and he passes suddenly from one thing to another, as is usual with men in trouble.

I. The deplorable condition which he describes to justify his own complaints.

1. He was a dying man, v. 1. He had said (ch. xvi. 22), "When a few years have come, I shall go that long journey." But here he corrects himself. "Why do I talk of years to come? My breath is already corrupt, I am a gone man." It concerns us therefore carefully to redeem the days of time, and to spend them in getting ready for the days of eternity. We are expected in our long home: The graves are ready for me. He speaks of the sepulchres of his fathers, to which he must be gathered.

2. He was a despised man (v. 6): "He" (that is, Eliphaz, so some, or God) "has made me a byword of the people, a laughing-stock to many, and aforetime I was as a tabret, that whoever chose might play upon." They made ballads of him; his name became a proverb; it is so still, As poor as Job. "He has now made me a by-word," a reproach of men, whereas, aforetime, in my prosperity, I was as a tabret, deliciæ humani generis—the darling of the human race.

3. He was a man of sorrows, v. 7. He wept so much that he had almost lost his sight: My eye is dim by reason of sorrow, ch. xvi. 16. He had become a perfect skeleton. "All my members are as a shadow. I am not to be called a man, but the shadow of a man."

II. The ill use which his friends made of his miseries. They condemned him as a hypocrite, because he was thus grievously afflicted.

1. Job looks upon himself as basely abused by them. "They are mockers, who deride my calamities, because I am thus brought low." They had all promised him that he would be happy if he would take their advice. Now all this he looked upon as flattery, and as designed to vex him so much the more. All this he calls their provocation, v. 2.

2. He condemns it. It was a sign that God had hidden their heart from understanding (v. 4). Those that are void of compassion are so far void of understanding. Where there is not the tenderness of a man one may question whether there be the understanding of a man. Therefore shalt thou not exalt them. Those are certainly kept back from honour whose hearts are hidden from understanding. He that thus violates the sacred laws of friendship forfeits the benefit of it, not only for himself, but for his posterity: "Even the eyes of his children shall fail, and, when they look for succour and comfort from their own and their father's friends, they shall look in vain as I have done, and be as much disappointed as I am in you." Those that wrong their neighbours may thereby, in the end, wrong their own children.

3. He appeals from them to God (v. 3): Lay down now, put me in a surety with thee. Those whose hearts condemn them not have confidence towards God, and can with humble and believing boldness beg of him to search and try them. Our English annotations give this reading of the verse: "Appoint, I pray thee, my surety with thee, namely, Christ who is with thee in heaven." "Who dares then contend with me? Who shall lay anything to my charge if Christ be an advocate for me?" Rom. viii. 32, 33.

III. The good use which the righteous should make of Job's afflictions from God, from his enemies, and from his friends, v. 8, 9. They are upright men, honest and sincere, and that act from a steady principle, with a single eye. This was Job's own character (ch. i. 1), and probably he speaks of such upright men especially as had been his intimates and associates. They are the innocent, not perfectly so, but innocence is what they aim at and press towards. Sincerity is evangelical innocency. They have clean hands, kept clean from the gross pollutions of sin, and, when spotted with infirmities, washed with innocency, Ps. xxvi. 6. Job's troubles will amaze them: Upright men shall be astonished at this; they will wonder to hear that so good a man as Job should be so grievously afflicted in body, name, and estate, that God should lay his hand so heavily upon him, and that his friends, who ought to have comforted him, should add to his grief. They would hereby be animated to confront the corrupt and pernicious inferences which evil men would draw from Job's sufferings, as that God has forsaken the earth, that it is in vain to serve him, and the like. The boldness of the attacks which profane people make upon religion should sharpen the courage and resolution of its friends and advocates. When vice is daring it is no time for virtue, through fear, to hide itself. The righteous, instead of drawing back at this frightful spectacle, shall with so much the more constancy and resolution hold on his way and press forward. Those who keep their eye upon heaven as their end will keep their feet in the paths of religion as their way, whatever difficulties and discouragements they meet with in it. By the sight of other good men's trials, and the experience of his own, he will be made more vigorous and lively in his duty, more warm and affectionate, more resolute and undaunted. The blustering wind makes the traveller gather his cloak the closer about him and gird it the faster.

Verses 10–16

Job's friends had pretended to comfort him with the hopes of his return to a prosperous estate.

I. It was their folly to talk so (v. 10): "Return, and come now, be convinced that you are in an error, and let me persuade you to be of my mind; for I cannot find one wise man among you, that knows how to explain the difficulties of God's providence or how to apply the consolations of his promises." It is our wisdom to comfort ourselves, and others, in distress, with that which will not fail, the promise of God, his love and grace, and a well-grounded hope of eternal life.

II. It would be his folly to heed them.

1. All his measures were already broken and he was full of confusion, v. 11, 12. He had had thoughts about enlarging his border, increasing his stock, and settling his children, and many pious thoughts, it is likely, of promoting religion in his country, but he concluded that all these thoughts of his heart were now at an end, and that he should never have the satisfaction of seeing his designs effected. But, if with full purpose of heart we cleave to the Lord, death will not break off that purpose. Job was under a constant uneasiness (v. 12): The thoughts of his heart being broken, they changed the night into day and shortened the light.

2. All his expectations from this world would very shortly be buried in the grave with him; so that it was a jest for him to think of such mighty things as they had flattered him with the hopes of, ch. v. 19, viii. 21; xi. 17. "Alas! you do but make a fool of me." He endeavours not only to reconcile himself to the grave, but to recommend it to himself: "It is my house." The grave is a house; to the wicked it is a prison-house (ch. xxiv. 19, 20); to the godly it is Bethabara, a passage-house in their way home. "There," says he, "I have made my bed." The grave is a bed, for we shall rest in it in the evening of our day on earth, and rise from it in the morning of our everlasting day, Isa. lvii. 2. Let this make good people willing to die; it is but going to bed; they are weary and sleepy, and it is time that they were in their beds. Why should they not go willingly, when their father calls? He saw all his hopes from this world dropping into the grave with him (v. 15, 16): "Seeing I must shortly leave the world, where is now my hope? How can I expect to prosper who do not expect to live?" He is not hopeless, but his hope is not where they would have it be. "No, that hope which I comfort myself with is something out of sight, not things that are seen, that are temporal, but things not seen, that are eternal."

CHAP. XVIII

In this chapter Bildad makes a second assault upon Job. In his first discourse (ch. viii) he had given him encouragement to hope that all should yet be well with him. He has grown more peevish, and is so far from being convinced by Job's reasonings that he is but more exasperated. I. He sharply reproves Job as haughty and passionate, and obstinate in his opinion, ver. 1–4. II. He enlarges upon the doctrine he had before maintained, concerning the misery of wicked people, ver. 5–21. In this he seems to have an eye to Job's complaints of the miserable condition he was in. "This," says Bildad, "is the condition of a wicked man; and therefore thou art one."

Verses 1–4

Bildad shoots his arrows, even bitter words, against poor Job, little thinking that, though he was a wise and good man, in this instance he was serving Satan's design in adding to Job's affliction.

I. He charges him with idle endless talk, as Eliphaz had done (ch. xv. 2, 3): How long will it be ere you make an end of words? v. 2. Bildad was weary of hearing others speak, and impatient till it came to his turn. How unbecoming this conduct is in others everyone can see; but few that are guilty of it can see it in themselves. Time was when Job had the last word in all debates (ch. xxix. 22): After my words they spoke not again. Then he was in power and prosperity; but now that he was impoverished and brought low he could scarcely be allowed to speak at all.

II. With a regardlessness of what was said to him, intimated in that, Mark, and afterwards we will speak.

III. With a haughty contempt and disdain of his friends and of that which they offered (v. 3): Wherefore are we counted as beasts? Job had indeed called them mockers, had represented them both as unwise and as unkind, but he did not count them beasts; yet Bildad so represents the matter. His hot spirit was willing to find a pretence to be hard upon Job. Those that incline to be severe upon others will have it thought that others have first been so upon them.

IV. With outrageous passion: He teareth himself in his anger, v. 4. Herein he seems to reflect upon what Job had said (ch. xiii. 14): Wherefore do I take my flesh in my teeth?

V. With a proud and arrogant expectation to give law even to Providence itself: "Shall the earth be forsaken for thee? There is no reason that the course of nature should be changed and the settled rules of government violated to gratify the humour of one man. Job, dost thou think the world cannot stand without thee; but that, if thou art ruined, all the world is ruined and forsaken with thee?" To expect that God's counsels should change, his method alter, and his word fail, to please us, is as absurd and unreasonable as to think that the earth should be forsaken for us and the rock removed out of its place.

Verses 5–10

The rest of Bildad's discourse is entirely taken up in an elegant description of the miserable condition of a wicked man, in which there is a great deal of truth. But it is not true that all wicked people are made miserable in this world; nor is it true that all who are brought into great distress are therefore to be deemed wicked men. Therefore, though Bildad thought the application of it to Job was easy, yet it was not safe nor just.

I. The destruction of the wicked foreseen and foretold, under the similitude of darkness (v. 5, 6): Yea, the light of the wicked shall be put out. "Yea," says Bildad, "so it is; thou art clouded, and straitened, and made miserable, and no better could be expected; for the light of the wicked shall be put out, and therefore thine shall."

II. The destruction represented under the similitude of a beast or bird caught in a snare, or a malefactor arrested and taken into custody in order to his punishment, v. 7–10. 1. Satan is preparing for his destruction. He is the robber that shall prevail against him (v. 9). He hunts for the precious life. 2. He is himself preparing for his own destruction by going on in sin, and so treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath. His own counsels cast him down, v. 7. He is cast into a net by his own feet (v. 8). 3. God is preparing for his destruction. The sinner is infatuated to run himself into the snare. The steps of his strength, his mighty designs and efforts, shall be straitened, so that he shall not compass what he intended; and the more he strives to extricate himself the more will he be entangled. The gin shall take him by the heel. He can no more escape the divine wrath that is in pursuit of him than a man, so held, can flee from the pursuer.

Bildad describes the destruction itself.

I. The dread of God's wrath (v. 11, 12): Terror shall make him afraid on every side. The terrors of the sinner's conscience shall haunt him, so that he shall never be easy. His feet will do him no service; they are fast in the snare, v. 9. He sees his ruin approaching. He feels himself utterly unable to grapple with it, either to escape it or to bear up under it.

II. Miserable indeed a wicked man's death is, how secure and jovial soever his life was. 1. See him dying, arrested by the first-born of death—some disease, or some stroke that has in it a more than ordinary resemblance of death itself. The harbingers of death devour the strength of his skin, bring rottenness into his bones and consume them. His confidence shall then be rooted out of his tabernacle (v. 14), that is, all that he trusted to for his support shall be taken from him. 2. See him dead. (1) He is then brought to the king of terrors. Death is terrible to nature; our Saviour himself prayed, Father, save me from this hour. But to the wicked it is in a special manner the king of terrors. How happy then are the saints, and how much indebted to the Lord Jesus, by whom death is so far abolished, and the property of it altered, that this king of terrors becomes a friend and servant! (2) He is then driven from light into darkness (v. 18), from the light of this world, and his prosperous condition in it, into darkness. (3) He is then chased out of the world, hurried and dragged away by the messengers of death, sorely against his will, chased as Adam out of paradise, for the world is his paradise. All the world is weary of him, and glad to get rid of him. This is death to a wicked man.

III. His family sunk and cut off, v. 15. Even the dwelling shall be ruined for the sake of his owner: Brimstone shall be scattered upon his habitation, rained upon it as upon Sodom, to the destruction of which this seems to have reference. Some think he here upbraids Job with the burning of his sheep and servants with fire from heaven. The reason is here given: Because it is none of his; that is, it was unjustly got. His children shall perish, either with him or after him, v. 16. Those who consult the true honour of their family, and the welfare of its branches, will be afraid of withering it by sin. The extirpation of the sinner's family is mentioned again (v. 19): He shall neither have son nor nephew. Sin entails a curse upon posterity. It is probable that Bildad reflects upon the death of Job's children and servants, as a further proof of his being a wicked man.

IV. His memory buried with him, or made odious; he shall either be forgotten or spoken of with dishonour (v. 17): His remembrance shall perish from the earth. All his honour shall be lost in the dust, so that he shall have no name in the street, departing without being desired.

V. Amazement at his fall, v. 20. Those that see it are affrighted. Horrible sins bring strange punishments. Ignorance of God is a wilful ignorance, for there is that to be known of him which is sufficient to leave them for ever inexcusable. They know not God, and then they commit all iniquity.

CHAP. XIX

Job's answer to Bildad's discourse. Though his spirit was grieved and Bildad was very peevish, yet he gave him leave to say all he designed to say, but, when he had done, he gave him a fair answer, in which, I. He complains of unkind usage. And very unkindly he takes it. 1. That his comforters added to his affliction, ver. 2–7. 2. That his God was the author of his afflictions, ver. 8–12. 3. That his relations and friends were strange to him, and shy of him, in his affliction, ver. 13–19. 4. That he had no compassion shown him in his affliction, ver. 20–22. II. He comforts himself with the believing hopes of happiness in the other world though he had so little comfort in this, making a very solemn confession of his faith, with a desire that it might be recorded as an evidence of his sincerity, ver. 23–27. III. He concludes with a caution to his friends not to persist in their hard censures of him, ver. 28, 29. His cheerful views of the future state may shame us Christians, and may serve to silence our complaints, or at least to balance them.

Verses 1–7

Bildad had twice begun with a How long (ch. viii. 2; xviii. 2), and therefore Job begins with a How long too, v. 2. Job had more reason to think those long who assaulted him than they had to think him long who only vindicated himself.

I. They vexed his soul. They were his friends; they came to comfort him, but with a great deal of gravity, and affectation of wisdom and piety, they set themselves to rob him of the only comfort he had now left him in a good God, a good conscience, and a good name; and this vexed him to the heart. They broke him in pieces with words. They reproached him (v. 3), gave him a bad character and made themselves strange to him, were shy of him now that he was in his troubles, and seemed as if they did not know him. They magnified themselves against him (v. 5), not only looked shy of him, but insulted him, magnifying themselves to depress him. They pleaded against him his reproach, that is, they made use of his affliction as an argument to prove him a wicked man.

II. They had thus abused him often (v. 3): These ten times you have reproached me, that is, very often. They were not ashamed of what they did, v. 3. They had reason to be ashamed of their hard-heartedness, of their uncharitableness, and of their deceitfulness, so ill becoming friends.

III. He answers their harsh censures, by showing them that what they condemned was capable of excuse, which they ought to have considered. The errors of his judgment were excusable (v. 4): "Be it indeed that I have erred, that I am in the wrong through ignorance or mistake." "But be it so," said Job, "my error remaineth with myself," that is, "I speak according to the best of my judgment, with all sincerity, and not from a spirit of contradiction." Hast thou faith? Have it to thyself. Some give this sense of these words: "If I be in an error, it is I that must smart for it; and therefore you need not concern yourselves." The breakings out of his passion, though not justifiable, yet were excusable, considering the vastness of his grief and the extremity of his misery. Know then that God has overthrown me, v. 6. Three things he would have them consider:—(1) He was overthrown, and could not help himself, enclosed as in a net, and could not get out. (2) God was the author of it, and that, in it, he fought against him. "I have enough to do to grapple with God's displeasure; let me not have yours also." (3) He could not obtain any hope of the redress of his grievances, v. 7. I cry out of wrong, but I am not heard.

Bildad had perverted Job's complaints by making them the description of the miserable condition of a wicked man; and yet he repeats them here, to move their pity, if they had any left in them.

I. He complains of the tokens of God's displeasure. "He hath kindled his wrath against me, which burns and pains me," v. 11. Enlightened consciences fear it now, but shall not feel it hereafter. Job's present apprehension was that God counted him as one of his enemies; and yet, at the same time, God loved him as his faithful friend. It is a gross mistake, but a very common one, to think that whom God afflicts he treats as his enemies; whereas, on the contrary, as many as he loves he rebukes and chastens; it is the discipline of his sons. "He has stripped me of my glory, my wealth, honour, power, and all the opportunity I had of doing good. My children were my glory, but I have lost them; and whatever was a crown to my head he has taken it from me, and has laid all my honour in the dust." Did he look down upon his present troubles? He saw God giving them their commission, and their orders to attack him. They are his troops, that act by his direction, which encamp against me, v. 12. It did not so much trouble him that his miseries came upon him in troops as that they were God's troops in whom it seemed as if God fought against him and intended his destruction. Time was when God's hosts encamped round him for safety. Now they surrounded him and destroyed him on every side, v. 10. He saw the hand of God cutting off all hope (v. 8): "He hath fenced up my way, that I cannot pass. I have now no way left to help myself." Hope in this life is a perishing thing, but the hope of good men, when it is cut off from this world, is but removed like a tree, transplanted from this nursery to the garden of the Lord. We shall have no reason to complain if God thus remove our hopes from the sand to the rock, from things temporal to things eternal.

II. He complains of the unkindness of his relations and of all his old acquaintance. In this also he owns the hand of God (v. 13): He has put my brethren far from me, that is, "He has laid those afflictions upon me which frighten them from me, and make them stand aloof from my sores." Yet this does not excuse Job's relations and friends from the guilt of horrid ingratitude and injustice to him. His kindred and acquaintance, his neighbours, and such as he had formerly been familiar with, who were bound by all the laws of friendship and civility, were estranged from him, v. 13. Poor Job was misused by his own family, and some of his worst foes were those of his own house. His own servants slighted him. His maids did not attend him in his illness, but counted him for a stranger and an alien, v. 15. Though he was now sickly, yet he was not cross and imperious, but entreated his servants with his mouth, when he had authority to command; and yet they would not be civil to him, neither kind nor just. But, one would think, when all forsook him, the wife of his bosom should have been tender of him: no, because he would not curse God and die, as she persuaded him, she did not care for coming near him, nor took any notice of what he said, v. 17. Even the little children who were born in his house, the children of his own servants, despised him (v. 18); they let him know that they neither feared him nor loved him.

III. He complains of the decay of his body; all the beauty and strength of that were gone (v. 20): My bone cleaves now to my skin.

IV. Upon all these accounts he recommends himself to the compassion of his friends. "Have pity upon me, have pity upon me, O you my friends! Have pity upon me, for the hand of God hath touched me." If they would not ease his affliction by their pity, yet they must not be so barbarous as to add to it by their censures and reproaches (v. 22): "Why do you persecute me as God?" If they did delight in his calamity, let them be satisfied with his flesh, which was wasted and gone, but let them not wound his spirit. Great tenderness is due to those that are in affliction, especially to those that are troubled in mind.

Verses 23–29

Here is much both of Christ and heaven in these verses: and he that said such things as these declared plainly that he sought the better country, that is, the heavenly; as the patriarchs of that age did, Heb. xi. 14. We have here Job's creed, or confession of faith. His belief in God the Father Almighty, the Maker of heaven and earth, and the principles of natural religion, he had often professed: but here we find him no stranger to revealed religion; though the revelation of the promised Seed, and the promised inheritance, was then discerned only like the dawning of the day, yet Job was taught of God to believe in a living Redeemer, and to look for the resurrection of the dead and the life of the world to come, for of these, doubtless, he must be understood to speak. These were the things he comforted himself with the expectation of, and not a deliverance from his trouble or a revival of his happiness in this world, as some would understand him. The expressions he here uses, of the Redeemer's standing at the latter day upon the earth, of his seeing God, and seeing him for himself, are wretchedly forced if they be understood of any temporal deliverance. Job was now under an extraordinary impulse of the blessed Spirit, which raised him above himself, gave him light, and gave him utterance. And some observe that, after this, we do not find in Job's discourses such passionate complaints of God and his providence as before. This hope quieted his spirit, stilled the storm, and, having here cast anchor within the veil, his mind was kept steady from this time forward.

I. Job makes this confession of his faith here. Never did anything come in more pertinently, or to better purpose. His friends reproached him as a hypocrite, but he appeals to his creed, to his faith, to his hope, and to his own conscience, which comforted him with the expectation of a blessed resurrection. These are not the words of him that has a devil. He appeals to the coming of the Redeemer, from this wrangle at the bar to the judgment of the bench. Job was now afflicted, and this was his cordial; when he was pressed above measure this kept him from fainting—he believed that he should see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living; not in this world, for that is the land of the dying.

II. With what a solemn preface he introduces it, v. 23, 24. He breaks off his complaints abruptly, to triumph in his comforts. That which Job here somewhat passionately wished for God graciously granted him. His words are written; they are printed in God's book; so that, wherever that book is read, there shall this be told for a memorial concerning Job.

III. His confession itself is written, v. 25–27.

1. He believes the glory of the Redeemer (v. 25): I know that my Redeemer liveth, that he is in being and is my life, and that he shall stand at last upon the earth. There is a Redeemer provided for fallen man, and Jesus Christ is that Redeemer. The word is Goël which is used for the next of kin, to whom, by the law of Moses, the right of redeeming a mortgaged estate did belong, Lev. xxv. 25. Our heavenly inheritance was mortgaged by sin; we are ourselves utterly unable to redeem it; Christ is near of kin to us, the next kinsman that is able to redeem; he has paid our debt, satisfied God's justice for sin, and so has taken off the mortgage and made a new settlement of the inheritance. Our persons also want a Redeemer; we are sold for sin, and sold under sin; our Lord Jesus has wrought out a redemption for us, and proclaims redemption to us, and so he is truly the Redeemer.

Because he lives we shall live also, John xiv. 19. When Job had lost all his wealth and all his friends, yet he was not separated from Christ, nor cut off from his relation to him: "Still he is my Redeemer." That next kinsman adhered to him when all his other kindred forsook him, and he had the comfort of it. I know (observe with what an air of assurance he speaks it, as one confident of this very thing), I know that my Redeemer lives.

2. He believes the happiness of the redeemed, and his own title to that happiness. He counts upon the corrupting of his body in the grave, and speaks of it with a holy carelessness and unconcernedness: Though, after my skin they destroy this body. Job mentions this, that the glory of the resurrection he believed and hoped for might shine the more brightly. The same power that made man's body at first, out of common dust, can raise it out of its own dust. He comforts himself with the hopes of happiness on the other side death and the grave: After I shall awake (so the margin reads it), though this body be destroyed, yet out of my flesh shall I see God. Soul and body shall come together again. That body which must be destroyed in the grave shall be raised again, a glorious body, Yet in my flesh I shall see God. Job speaks of seeing him with eyes of flesh, in my flesh, with my eyes; the same body that died shall rise again, a glorified body, a spiritual body, 1 Cor. xv. 44. Job and God shall come together again: In my flesh shall I see God. My eyes shall behold him, and not another.

IV. His creed spoke comfort to himself, but warning and terror to those that set themselves against him. It was a word of caution to them not to proceed and persist in their unkind usage of him, v. 28. A living, quickening, commanding, principle of grace in the heart, is the root of the matter, as necessary to our religion as the root to the tree. Love to God and our brethren, faith in Christ, hatred of sin—these are the root of the matter; other things are but leaves in comparison with these. Serious godliness is the one thing needful. We are to believe that many have the root of the matter in them who are not in everything of our mind—who have their follies, and weaknesses, and mistakes—and to conclude that it is at our peril if we persecute any such. Job and his friends differed in some notions concerning the methods of Providence, but they agreed in the root of the matter, the belief of another world. Good men need to be frightened from sin by the terrors of the Almighty, particularly from the sin of rashly judging their brethren, Matt. vii. 1; James iii. 1.

CHAP. XX

One would have thought that such an excellent confession of faith as Job made would satisfy his friends, but they do not seem to have taken any notice of it, and therefore Zophar attacks him with as much vehemence as before. I. His preface is short, but hot, ver. 2, 3. II. His discourse is long, and all upon one subject, the certain misery of wicked people and the ruin that awaits them. 1. He asserts, in general, that the prosperity of a wicked person is short, and his ruin sure, ver. 4–9. 2. He proves the misery of his condition by many instances—that he should have a diseased body, a troubled conscience, a ruined estate, a beggared family, an infamous name, and that he himself should perish under the weight of divine wrath, ver. 10–29. But the great mistake was that he imagined God never varied from this method, and therefore Job was, without doubt, a very bad man.

Verses 1–9

Here, I. Zophar begins very passionately (v. 2): Therefore do my thoughts cause me to answer. He takes no notice of what Job had said to move their pity. He excuses his haste with two things:—1. That Job had given him a strong provocation (v. 3): "I have heard the check of my reproach." Job's friends, I doubt, had spirits too high to deal with a man in his low condition; and high spirits are impatient of contradiction. They cannot bear a check but they call it the check of their reproach. 2. That his own heart caused him to answer (v. 2), for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks; but he fathers the instigation (v. 3) upon the spirit of his understanding.

II. Zophar proceeds to show the ruin and destruction of wicked people, insinuating that because Job was destroyed and ruined he was certainly a wicked man.

1. He appeals, (1) To Job's own knowledge and conviction: "Knowest thou not this?" (2) To the experience of all ages. It was known of old that the sin of sinners will be their ruin.

2. It is laid down (v. 5): The triumphing of the wicked is short, and the joy of the hypocrite but for a moment. Job's friends were loth to own, at first, that wicked people might prosper at all (ch. iv. 9), until Job proved it plainly (ch. ix. 24; xii. 6), and now Zophar yields it; but lays it down that they will not prosper long

3. It is illustrated, v. 6–9. (1) He supposes his prosperity to be very high, as high as you can imagine, v. 6. (2) He is confident that his ruin will accordingly be very great, and his fall the more dreadful for his having risen so high: He shall perish for ever, v. 7.

Verses 10–22

The instances of the miserable condition of the wicked man in this world are expressed with great fulness.

I. What his wickedness is for which he is punished.

1. The lusts of the flesh, here called the sins of his youth (v. 11). The forbidden pleasures of sense are said to be sweet in his mouth (v. 12); he indulges himself in all the gratifications of the carnal appetite, as yielding the satisfaction which he hides under his tongue, as the most dainty delicate thing that can be. He keeps it still within his mouth (v. 13); let him have that, and he desires no more. Or his hiding it and keeping it under his tongue denotes his industrious concealment of his beloved lust.

2. The love of the world and the wealth of it. He has swallowed down riches as eagerly as ever a hungry man swallowed down meat. It is that which he desired (v. 20). It is that which he laboured for (v. 18), all ways and methods, per fas, per nefas—right or wrong, to be rich. We must labour, not to be rich (Prov. xxiii. 4), but to be charitable, that we may have to give (Eph. iv. 28), not to spend. He expected rivers of sensual delights.

3. Violence and oppression, and injustice in his poor neighbours, v. 19. It is charged upon this wicked man, that he has forsaken the poor. He has oppressed them. He has violently taken away their houses.

II. His punishment for this wickedness. He shall never see the rivers, the floods, the brooks of honey and butter, with which he hoped to glut himself. The enjoyment sinks far below the raised expectation. He shall be diseased and distempered in his body; and how little comfort a man has in riches if he has not health! The sins of his youth shall lie down with him in the dust. He shall be disquieted and troubled in his mind: Surely he shall not feel quietness in his belly, v. 20. Let none expect to enjoy that comfortably which they have gotten unjustly. Even that wickedness which was sweet in the commission, and was rolled under the tongue as a delicate morsel, becomes bitter in the reflection, and, when it is reviewed, fills him with horror and vexation. It is turned into the gall of asps, than which nothing is more bitter, the poison of asps (v. 16), than which nothing more fatal, and so it will be to him. In the fulness of his sufficiency, when he thinks himself most sure of the continuance of his happiness, he shall be in straits, through the anxieties and perplexities of his own mind. He shall be dispossessed of his estate; that shall sink and dwindle away to nothing, so that he shall not rejoice therein, v. 18. His children shall seek to please the poor, while his own hands shall restore them their goods with shame (v. 18). Thus, he shall not save of that which he desired (v. 20), not only he shall not save it all, but he shall save nothing of it. In all this Zophar reflects upon Job, who had lost all and was reduced to the last extremity.

Zophar here comes to show their utter ruin at last.

I. Their ruin will take its rise from God's wrath and vengeance, v. 23. God shall cast the fury of his wrath upon him and rain it upon him. Every word here speaks terror. There is no fence against this, but in Christ, who is the only covert from the storm and tempest, Isa. xxxii. 2. Perhaps Zophar here reflects on the death of Job's children when they were eating and drinking.

II. Their ruin will be inevitable (v. 24). He shall flee from the iron weapon. If he escape the sword, yet the bow of steel shall strike him through.

III. It will be a total terrible ruin. O what terrors are upon him!

IV. Sometimes it is a ruin that comes upon him insensibly, v. 26. 1. The darkness he is wrapped up in is a hidden darkness, and it is hid in his secret place, whither he has retreated and where he hopes to shelter himself; he never retires into his own conscience but he finds himself in the dark and utterly at a loss. He is wasted by a soft gentle fire—the fire needs no blowing, and that is his case; he is ripe for ruin.

V. It is a ruin, not only to himself, but to his family: It shall go ill with him that is left in his tabernacle, for the curse shall reach him, and he shall be cut off. His goods shall flow away from his family as fast as ever they flowed into it.

VI. It is a ruin which will manifestly appear to be just and righteous, and what he has brought upon himself by his own wickedness; for (v. 27) the heaven shall reveal his iniquity.

VII. Zophar concludes like an orator (v. 29): This is the portion of a wicked man from God. Never was any doctrine better explained, or worse applied, than this by Zophar, who intended by all this to prove Job a hypocrite. Let us receive the good explication, and make a better application.

CHAP. XXI

Job's reply to Zophar's discourse, in which he complains less of his own miseries than he had done in his former discourses, and comes closer to the general question that was in dispute between him and them, Whether outward prosperity, and the continuance of it, were a mark of the true church and the true members of it, so that the ruin of a man's prosperity is sufficient to prove him a hypocrite, though no other evidence appear against him this they asserted, but Job denied. I. His preface here is designed for the moving of their affections, that he might gain their attention, ver. 1–6. II. His discourse is designed for the convincing of their judgments and the rectifying of their mistakes. He owns that God does sometimes hang up a wicked man as it were in chains, in terrorem—as a terror to others, but denies that he always does so; nay, he maintains that commonly he does otherwise, suffering even the worst of sinners to live all their days in prosperity and to go out of the world without any visible mark of his wrath upon them. 1. He describes the great prosperity of wicked people, ver. 7–13. 2. He shows their great impiety, in which they are hardened by their prosperity, ver. 14–16. 3 He foretells their ruin at length, but after a long reprieve, ver. 17–21. 4. He observes a very great variety in the ways of God's providence towards men, even towards bad men, ver. 22–26. 5. He overthrows the ground of their severe censures of him, by showing that the destruction of the wicked is reserved for the other world, and that they often escape to the last in this world (ver. 27, to the end), and in this Job was clearly in the right.

Verses 1-6

Job here recommends himself to the compassionate consideration of his friends. That which he entreats of them is very fair, that they would suffer him to speak (v. 3) and not break in upon him. They came to comfort him. "Now," says he, "let this be to your consolations (v. 2); if you have no other comforts to administer to me, be so just, as to give me a patient hearing. After I have spoken you may go on with what you have to say, and I will not hinder you, no, though you go on to mock me. If you will but give me a fair hearing, I believe I shall say that which will change your note and make you pity me rather than mock me. Is my complaint to man? No, if it were I see it would be to little purpose to complain. But my complaint is to God, and to him do I appeal. Let him be Judge between you and me." It was not a common case, but a very extraordinary one. He himself was amazed at it. "When I remember that terrible day in which I was on a sudden stripped of all my comforts, that day in which I was stricken with sore boils,—when I remember all the hard speeches with which you have grieved me,—I confess I am afraid, and trembling takes hold of my flesh, especially when I compare this with the prosperous condition of many wicked people, and the applauses of their neighbours, with which they pass through the world."

Verses 7-16

All Job's three friends, in their last discourses, had been very copious in describing the miserable condition of a wicked man in this world. "It is true," says Job, "remarkable judgments are sometimes brought upon notorious sinners, but not always; for we have many instances of the great and long prosperity of those that are openly and avowedly wicked; though they are hardened in their wickedness by their prosperity, yet they are still suffered to prosper."

I. He here describes their prosperity in the height, and breadth, and length of it. They live, and are not suddenly cut off by the strokes of divine vengeance. Not only do they live but they live in prosperity, 1 Sam. xxv. 6. They are mighty in power, are preferred to places of authority and trust. This is the day of God's patience, and, in some way or other, he makes use of their prosperity to serve his own counsels, while it ripens them for ruin. Their seed is established in their sight. They are easy and quiet, v. 9. Whereas Zophar had spoken of their continual frights and terrors, Job says, Their houses are safe both from danger and from the fear of it (v. 9). They are rich and thrive in their estates. Of this he gives only one instance, v. 10. They are merry and live a jovial life (v. 11, 12).

II. He shows how they abuse their prosperity and are confirmed and hardened by it in their impiety, v. 14, 15. God suffers them to prosper; but let us not wonder at it, for the prosperity of fools destroys them, by hardening them in sin, Prov. i. 32; Ps. lxxiii. 7–9. How light these prospering sinners make of God and religion, as if because they have so much of this world they had no need to look after another. How ill affected they are to God and religion; they abandon them, and cast off the thoughts of them. The world is the portion they have chosen, and take up with, and think themselves happy in; while they have that they can live without God. We desire not the knowledge of thy ways. The two great bonds by which we are drawn and held to religion are those of duty and interest. They will not believe it is their duty to be religious: What is the Almighty, that we should serve him? How slightly they speak of God: What is the Almighty? As if he were a mere name. How hardly they speak of religion. They call it a service which they look upon as a task and drudgery. How highly they speak of themselves: "That we should serve him; we who are rich and mighty in power, shall we be subject and accountable to him? No, we are lords," Jer. ii. 31. They will not believe it is their interest to be religious: What profit shall we have if we pray unto him? Is nothing to be called gain but the wealth and honour of this world? If we obtain the favour of God, and spiritual and eternal blessings, we have no reason to complain of losing by our religion.

III. He shows their folly herein, and utterly disclaims all concurrence with them (v. 19): Lo, their good is not in their hand, that is, they did not get it without God, and therefore they are very ungrateful to slight him thus. It was not their might, nor the power of their hand, that got them this wealth, and therefore they ought to remember God who gave it them. Nor can they keep it without God, and therefore they are very unwise to lose their interest in him and bid him to depart from them. Some give this sense of it: "Their good is in their barns and their bags, hoarded up there; it is not in their hand, to do good to others with it; and then what good does it do them? Therefore," says Job, "the counsel of the wicked is far from me. Far be it from me that I should be of their mind, say as they say, do as they do, and take my measures from them. Their posterity approve their sayings, though their way be their folly (Ps. xlix. 13); but I know better things than to walk in their counsel."

Verses 17–26

Job had described the prosperity of wicked people; now,

I. He opposes this to what his friends had maintained concerning their certain ruin in this life. "Tell me how often do you see the candle of the wicked put out? Do you not as often see it burnt down to the socket, until it goes out of itself? v. 17. How often do you see their destruction come upon them, or God distributing sorrows in his anger among them? Do you not as often see their mirth and prosperity continuing to the last?"

II. He reconciles this to the holiness and justice of God. Though wicked people prosper thus all their days, they are as stubble and chaff before the stormy wind, v. 18. They are light and worthless, and of no account either with God or with wise and good men. They are fitted to destruction, and continually lie exposed to it, and in the height of their pomp and power there is but a step between them and ruin. Though they prosper in this world, yet they shall be reckoned with in another world. He shall know it (v. 20): His eyes shall see his destruction which he would not be persuaded to believe. They will not see, but they shall see, Isa. xxvi. 11. The eyes that have been wilfully shut against the grace of God shall be opened to see his destruction. What pleasure has he in his house after him? v. 21. Little will the gain of the world profit him that has lost his soul.
